RICHARD, Protector of the Commonwealth of ENGLAND, &c., To the most Serene and Potent Prince, LEWIS, King of FRANCE.

Most Serene and Potent King, our Friend and Confederate;

So soon as our most serene father, Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, by the will of God so ordaining, departed this life upon the third of September, we being lawfully declared his successor in the supreme magistracy, though in the extremity of tears and sadness, could do no less than with the first opportunity by these our letters make known a matter of this concernment to your majesty; by whom, as you have been a most cordial friend to our father and this republic, we are confident the mournful and unexpected tidings will be as sorrowfully received. Our business now is, to request your majesty, that you would have such an opinion of us, as of one who has determined nothing more religiously and constantly, than to observe the friendship and confederacy contracted between your majesty and our renowned father: and with the same zeal and goodwill to confirm and establish the leagues by him concluded, and to carry on the same counsels and interests with your majesty. To which intent it is our pleasure that our ambassador, residing at your court, be empowered by the same commission as formerly; and that you will give the same credit to what he transacts in our name, as if it had been done by ourselves. In the mean time we wish your majesty all prosperity.

From our court at Whitehall, Sept. 5, 1658.

To the most Eminent Lord Cardinal MAZARINE.

THOUGH nothing could fall out more bitter and grievous to us, than to write the mournful news of our most serene and most renowned father's death; nevertheless, in regard we cannot be ignorant of the high esteem which he had for your eminency, and the great value which you had for him; nor have any reason to doubt, but that your eminency, upon whose care the prosperity of France depends, will no less bewail the loss of your constant friend, and most united confederate; we thought it of great moment, by these our letters, to make known this accident so deeply to be lamented, as well to your eminency as to the king; and to assure your eminency, which is but reason, that we shall most religiously observe all those things, which our father of most serene memory was bound by the league to see confirmed and ratified: and shall make it our business, that in the midst of your mourning for a friend so faithful and flourishing in all virtuous applause, there may be nothing wanting to preserve the faith of our confederacy. For the conservation of which on your part also, to the good of both nations, may God Almighty long preserve your eminency.

Westminster, Sept. 1658.

RICHARD, Protector of the Commonwealth of ENGLAND, &c., To the most Serene Prince, CHARLES GUSTAVUS, King of the SWEDES, GOTHS, and VANDALS, &c.

Most Serene and Potent King, our Friend and Confederate;

WHEN we consider with ourselves that it will be a difficult matter for us to be imitators of our father's virtues, unless we should observe and endeavour to hold the same confederacies which he by his prowess acquired, and out of his singular judgment thought most worthy to be embraced and observed; your majesty has no reason to doubt, that it behoves us to pay the same tribute of affection and goodwill, which our father of most serene memory always paid to your majesty. Therefore, although in this beginning of our government and dignity I may not find our affairs in that condition, as at present to answer to some particulars which your embassadors have proposed, yet it is our resolution to continue the league concluded by our father with your majesty, and to enter ourselves into a stricter engagement; and so soon as we shall rightly understand the state of affairs on both sides, we shall always be ready on our part to treat of those things, which shall be most chiefly for the united benefit of both republics. In the mean time, God long preserve your majesty to his glory, and the defence and safeguard of his orthodox church.

Richard, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, &c. To the most Serene and Potent Prince, Charles Gustavus, King of the Swedes, Goths, and Vandals, &c.

Most serene and potent King, our Friend and Confederate;

We have received two letters from your majesty, the one by your envoy, the other transmitted to us from our resident Philip Meadows, whereby we not only understood your majesty's unfeigned grief for the death of our most serene father, in expressions setting forth the real thoughts of your mind, and how highly your majesty esteemed his prowess and friendship, but also what great hopes your majesty conceived of ourselves advanced in his room. And certainly, as an accumulation of paternal honour in deeming us worthy to succeed him, nothing more noble, more illustrious, could befall us than the judgment of such a prince; nothing more fortunately auspicious could happen to us, at our first entrance upon the government, than such a congratulator; nothing, lastly, that could more vehemently incite us to take possession of our father's virtues, as our lawful inheritance, than the encouragement of so great a king. As to what concerns your majesty's interests, already under consideration between us, in reference to the common cause of the protestants, we would have your majesty have those thoughts of us, that since we came to the helm of this republic, though the condition of our affairs be such at present, that they chiefly require our utmost diligence, care, and vigilancy at home, yet that we hold nothing more sacred, and that there is not any thing more determined by us, than, as much as in us lies, never to be wanting to the league concluded by our father with your majesty. To that end, we have taken care to send a fleet into the Baltic sea, with those instructions which our agent, to that purpose empowered by us, will communicate to your majesty; whom God preserve in long safety, and prosper with success in defence of his orthodox religion.

Most serene and potent King, our Friend and Confederate;

We send to your majesty, nor could we send a present more worthy or more excellent, the truly brave and truly noble Sir George Ascue, knight, not only famed in war, and more especially for his experience in sea-affairs, approved and tried in many desperate engagements; but also endued with singular probity, modesty, ingenuity, learning, and for the sweetness of his disposition caressed by all men; and which is the sum of all, now desirous to serve under the banners of your majesty, so renowned over all the world for your military prowess. And we would have your majesty be fully assured, that whatsoever high employment you confer upon him, wherein fidelity, fortitude, experience, may shine forth in their true lustre, you cannot entrust a person more faithful, more courageous, nor easily more skilful. Moreover, as to those things we have given him in charge to communicate to your majesty, we request that he may have quick access, and favourable audience, and that you will vouchsafe the same credit to him as to ourselves if personally present: lastly, that you will give him that honour as you shall judge becoming a person dignified with his own merits and our recommendation. Now God Almighty prosper all your affairs with happy success to his own glory, and the safeguard of his orthodox church.

Most serene and potent King, our dearest
Friend and Confederate;

Samuel Piggot of London, merchant, in a petition delivered to us, sets forth, that he lately sent from London into France, upon the account of trade, two vessels, the one called the Post, Tiddie Jacob master, the other the Water-Dog, Garbrand Peters master. That from France, being laden with salt, they sailed for Amsterdam; at Amsterdam the one took in ballast only; the other laden with herrings, in copartnership with one Peter Heinbergh, sailed away for Stettin in Pomerania, which is under your jurisdiction, there to unlade her freight; but now he hears that both those vessels are detained somewhere in the Baltic sea by your forces; notwithstanding that he took care to send a writing with both those ships, sealed with the seal of the admiralty-court, by which it appeared that he alone was the lawful owner of both the vessels and goods, that part excepted which belonged to Heinbergh. Of all which, in regard he has made full proof before us, we make it our request to your majesty, (to prevent the ruin and utter shipwreck of the poor man's estate, by the loss of two ships at one time,) that you would command your officers to take care for the speedy discharge of the said vessels. God long preserve your majesty to his own glory, and the safeguard of his orthodox church.

RICHARD, Protector of the Commonwealth of ENGLAND, &c., To the high and mighty Lords, the States of WESTFRIEZLAND.

Most high and mighty Lords, our dearest
Friends and Confederates;

MARY GRINDER, widow, in a petition presented to us, has made a most grievous complaint, that whereas Thomas Killegrew, a commander in your service, has owed her for these eighteen years a considerable sum of money, she can by her agents neither bring him to pay the said money, nor to try his title at law to the same, if he has any. Which that he may not be compelled to do by the widow's attorney, he has petitioned your highnesses, that nobody may be suffered to sue him for any money that he owes in England. But should we signify no more than only this to your highnesses, that she is a widow, that she is in great want, the mother of many small children, which her creditor endeavours to deprive of almost all that little support they have in this world, we cannot believe we need make use of any greater arguments to your lordships, so well acquainted with those divine precepts forbidding the oppression of the widow and the fatherless, to persuade ye not to grant any such privilege, upon a bare petition, to the fraudulent subverter of the widow's right; and which for the same reason we assure ourselves you will never admit.

RICHARD, Protector of the Commonwealth of ENGLAND, &c., To the most Serene Prince, LEWIS, King of FRANCE.

Most Serene and Potent Prince, our most august Confederate and Friend;

WE have been given to understand, and that to our no small grief, that several protestant churches in Provence were so maliciously affronted and disturbed by a certain turbulent humourist, that the magistrates at Grenoble, who are the proper judges of such causes, thought him worthy of exemplary punishment; but that the convention of the clergy, which was held not far from those places, obtained of your majesty, that the whole matter should be removed up to Paris, there to be heard before your royal council. But they not having as yet made any determination in the business, those churches, and more especially that of Yvoire, are forbid to meet for the worship of God. Most earnestly therefore we request your majesty, that in the first place you would not prohibit those from preaching in public, whose prayers to God for your safety and the prosperity of your kingdom you are so free to suffer; then, that the sentence given against that impertinent disturber of divine service, by the proper judges of those causes at Grenoble, may be duly put in execution. God long preserve your majesty in safety and prosperity; to the end that, if you have any good opinion of our prayers, or think them prevalent with God, you may be speedily induced to suffer the same to be publicly put up to heaven by those churches, now forbid their wonted meetings.

Westminster, Feb. 18, 1659.

Most eminent Lord Cardinal;

THE most illustrious lady, late wife of the deceased duke of Richmond, is now going into France, together with the young duke her son, with an intention to reside there for some time. We therefore most earnestly request your eminency, that if any thing fall out, wherein your authority, favour, and patronage may be assisting to them, as strangers, you would vouchsafe to protect their dignity, and to indulge the recommendation of it not the meanest, in such a manner, that if any addition can be made to your civility towards all people, especially of illustrious descent, we may be sensible our letters have obtained it. Withal, your excellency may assure yourself, your recommendation, whenever you require the like from us, shall be of equal force and value in our esteem and care.

Westminster, Feb. 29, 1659.

RICHARD, Protector of the Commonwealth of ENGLAND, &c., To the most Serene Prince, JOHN, King of PORTUGAL.

Most Serene and potent Prince, our Friend and Confederate;

ALTHOUGH there are many things which we are bound to impart by writing to a king our friend, and in strict confederacy with our republic, yet there is nothing which we ever did more willingly, than what we do at this present, by these our letters to congratulate this last victory, so glorious to the kingdom of Portugal, obtained against our common enemy the Spaniard. By which, how great an advantage will accrue not only to your own but to the peace and repose of all Europe, and that perhaps for many years, there is nobody but understands. But there is one thing more, wherein we must acknowledge your majesty's justice, the most certain pledge of victory: that satisfaction has been given by the commissioners appointed at London, according to the 24th article of the league, to our merchants, whose vessels were hired by the Brazil company. Only there is one among them still remaining Alexander Bence of London, merchant, whose ship called the Three Brothers, John Wilks master, being hired and laden, and having performed two voyages for the said company, yet still they refuse to pay him his wages according to their covenants; when the rest that only performed single voyages are already paid. Which why it should be done, we cannot understand, unless those people think, in their judgment, that person more worthy of his hire, who did them only single service, than he who earned his wages twice. We therefore earnestly request your majesty, that satisfaction may be given, for his service truly performed, to this same single Alexander, to whom a double stipend is due; and that, by virtue of your royal authority, you would prefix the Brazil company as short a day as may be, for the payment of his just due, and repairing his losses; seeing that their delays have been the occasion, that the loss sustained by the merchant has very near exceeded the money itself which is owing for his wages. So God continue your majesty's prosperous successes against the common enemy.

RICHARD, Protector of the Commonwealth of ENGLAND, &c., To the most eminent Lord Cardinal MAZARINE.

Most Eminent Lord;

BY letters to your eminency, about eight months since, dated June 13, we recommended to your eminency the cause of Peter Pet, a person of singular probity, and in all naval sciences most useful both to us and our republic. His ship called the Edward, in the year 1646, as we formerly wrote, was taken in the mouth of the Thames by one Bascon, and sold in the port of Boulogne; and though the king in his royal council the 4th of November, 1647, decreed, that what money the council should think fitting to be given in recompense of the loss, should be forthwith paid in satisfaction to the owner; nevertheless, as he sets forth, he could never reap the benefit of that order. Now in regard we make no question but that your eminency, at our desire, gave strict command for the speedy execution of that decree; we make it therefore our renewed request, that you would vouchsafe to examine where the impediment lies, or through whose neglect or contumacy it came to pass, that in ten years time the king's decree was not obeyed; and employ your authority so effectually, that the money then decreed, which we thought long since satisfied, may be speedily demanded and paid to our petitioner. Thus your eminency will perform an act most grateful to justice, and lay moreover a singular obligation upon ourselves.

The Parliament of the Commonwealth of ENGLAND, &c. To the most Serene and Potent Prince, CHARLES GUSTAVUS, King of the SWEDES, GOTHS, and VANDALS, &c.

Most Serene and Potent King, our dearest Friend;

SINCE it has pleased the most merciful and omnipotent God, at whose disposal only the revolutions of all kingdoms and republics are, to restore us to our pristine authority, and the supreme administration of the English affairs; we thought it convenient in the first place to make it known to your majesty; and to signify moreover as well our extraordinary affection to your majesty, so potent a protestant prince, as also our most fervent zeal to promote the peace between your majesty and the king of Denmark, another most powerful protestant king, not to be reconciled without our assistance, and the good offices of our affection. Our pleasure therefore is, that our extraordinary envoy, Philip Meadows, be continued in the same employment with your majesty, with which he has been hitherto intrusted from this republic. To which end we impower him by these our letters to make proposals, act, and negotiate with your majesty, in the same manner as was granted him by his last recommendations: and whatsoever he shall transact and conclude in our name, we faithfully promise and engage, by God's assistance, to confirm and ratify. The same God long support your majesty, the pillar and support of the protestant interests.

Westminster, WILLIAM LENTHAL,
May 15, 1659. Speaker of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England.

The Parliament of the Commonwealth of ENGLAND, &c., To the most Serene Prince, FREDERICK, King of DENMARK.

Most serene King, and most dear Friend;

SEEING it now is come to pass, that by the will and pleasure of the most merciful and powerful God, the supreme moderator of all things, we are restored to our pristine place and dignity, in the administration of the public affairs, we thought it convenient in the first place, that a revolution of this government should not be concealed from your majesty's notice, a prince both our neighbour and confederate; and withal to signify how much we lay to heart your ill success: which you will easily perceive by our zeal and diligence, that never shall be wanting in us to promote and accomplish a reconciliation between your majesty and the king of Sweden. And therefore we have commanded our extraordinary envoy with the most serene king of Sweden, Philip Meadows, to attend your majesty, in our name, in order to these matters, and to impart, propound, act, and negotiate such things as we have given him in charge to communicate to your majesty: and what credit you shall give to him in this his employment, we request your majesty to believe it given to ourselves. God Almighty grant your majesty a happy and joyful deliverance out of all your difficulties and afflicting troubles, under which you stand so undauntedly supported by your fortitude and magnanimity.

WILLIAM LENTHAL,
Commonwealth of England.

COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, IRELAND, &c.

PUBLISHED BY CONSENT AND ADVICE OF HIS COUNCIL.

[WRITTEN IN LATIN BY JOHN MILTON, AND FIRST PRINTED IN 1655; TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH IN 1738.]

THAT the motives whereby we have been lately induced to make an attack upon certain islands in the West Indies, which have been now for some time in the hands of the Spaniards, are exceeding just and reasonable, every one will easily see, who considers in what a hostile manner that king and his subjects have all along, in those parts of America, treated the English nation; which behaviour of theirs as it was very unjust at the beginning, so ever since with the same injustice they have persevered in it, in a direct contrariety to the common law of nations, and to particular articles of alliance made betwixt the two kingdoms.

It must indeed be acknowledged, the English for some years past have either patiently borne with these injuries, or only defended themselves; which may possibly give occasion to some to look upon that late expedition of our fleet to the West Indies, as a war voluntarily begun by us, instead of considering that this war was first begun and raised by the Spaniards themselves, as in reality it will be found to be, and (though this republic have done all that lay in their power to establish peace and commerce in those parts) hitherto kept up and carried on by them with the greatest eagerness.

That the Spaniards themselves are the occasion of this war, will evidently appear to every one who considers how, as oft as they find opportunity, without any just cause, and without being provoked to it by any injury received, they are continually murdering, and sometimes even in cold blood butchering, any of our countrymen in America they think fit; while in the mean time they seize upon their goods and fortunes, demolish their houses and plantations, take any of their ships they happen to meet with in those seas, and treat the sailors as enemies, nay, even as pirates. For they give that opprobrious name to all, except those of their own nation, who venture to sail in those seas. Nor do they pretend any other or better right for so doing, than a certain ridiculous gift of the pope on which they rely, and because they were the first discoverers of some parts of that western region: by virtue of which name and title, which they arrogate to themselves, they maintain that the whole power and government of that western world is lodged only in their hands. Of which very absurd title we shall have occasion to speak more fully, when we come to consider the causes assigned by the Spaniards for their thinking themselves at liberty to exercise all sorts of hostilities against our countrymen in America, to such a degree, that whoever are driven upon those coasts by stress of weather or shipwreck, or any other accident, are not only clapt in chains by them as prisoners, but are even made slaves; while they, notwithstanding all this, are so unreasonable as to think, that the peace is broken, and very much violated by the English; and that even in Europe, if they attempt any thing against them in those parts, with a view to make reprisals, and to demand restitution of their goods.

But though the king of Spain's ambassadors in our country, depending on a Spanish faction which had always a very considerable influence in the last king's council, as well as his father's, did not scruple to make a great many unreasonable complaints and ridiculous demands upon the most trivial accounts, whenever the English did any thing of this kind; yet those princes, though too much attached to the Spaniards, would by no means have the hands of their subjects bound up, when the Spaniards thought they should have the free use of theirs. On the contrary, they allowed their subjects to repel force by force, and to consider such of the Spaniards, as could not be brought at any rate to keep the peace in those parts, as enemies. So that about the year 1640, when this affair was debated in the last king's council, and when the Spanish ambassador desired that some ships bound for America, lying in the mouth of the river, and just ready to weigh anchor, should be stopt, as being capable of doing mischief to the Spaniards in that part of the world; and when at the same time he refused the English, who asked it of him by some members of the council appointed for that purpose, the privilege of trading to the West Indies, it was nevertheless resolved upon, that these ships should pursue their intended voyage, which accordingly they did.

Thus far the aforesaid princes were not wanting to their subjects, when they made war in those places privately for their own interest, though, by reason of the power of the above-mentioned Spanish faction, they would not espouse their cause publicly, in the way they ought to have done, and in a manner suitable to the ancient glory of the English nation. And certainly, it would have been the most unbecoming and disgraceful thing in the world for us, who by the kind providence of God had in our possession so many ships equipped and furnished with every thing requisite to a war by sea, to have suffered these ships rather to have grown worm-eaten and rot at home for want of use, than to have been employed in avenging the blood of the English, as well as that of the poor Indians, which in those places has been so unjustly, so cruelly, and so often shed by the hands of the Spaniards: since God has made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, having determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. And surely God will one time or other take vengeance on the Spaniards, who have shed so much innocent blood, who have made such terrible havoc among the poor Indians, slain so many thousands of them with the utmost barbarity, done them so many injuries, and harassed and persecuted them in such a miserable manner, whatever time that may happen, and by whose hand soever it may be executed.

But in order to justify our conduct, there is no need of having recourse to the common relation that men have to one another, which is no other than that of brethren, whereby all great and extraordinary wrongs done to particular persons ought to be considered as in a manner done to all the rest of the human race; since their having so often robbed and murdered our own countrymen was cause sufficient of itself, for our having undertaken that late expedition, and has given us abundant reason to avenge ourselves on that people; to pass by at present a great many other reasons, and to take into consideration our own safety for the future, and likewise that of our allies, especially those among them who are of the orthodox religion; and to omit several other causes, whereby we were prompted to this expedition, of which we have no need at present to give a particular enumeration, since our principal design at this time is to declare and shew to the world the justice and equity of the thing itself, and not to reckon up all the particular causes of it. And that we may do this with the greater perspicuity, and explain generals by particulars, we must cast our eyes back a little upon things that are past, and strictly examine all the transactions betwixt the English and Spaniards, consider what has been the state of affairs on both sides, so far as may respect the mutual relation of the two kingdoms, both since the first discovery of America, and since the reformation: which two great events, as they happened much about the same time, so they produced every where vast changes and revolutions, especially amongst the English and Spaniards, who since that time have conducted and managed their affairs in a very different, if not quite contrary, way to what they did formerly. For though the last king and his father, against the will of almost all their subjects, patched up any way two leagues with the Spaniards; yet the different turns of the two nations, proceeding from the difference of their religious principles, and the perpetual dissensions that were in the West Indies, together with the jealousies and suspicions which the Spaniards had all along of the English, (being always mightily afraid of losing their treasures in America,) have not only frustrated all the late attempts made by this commonwealth to obtain a peace upon reasonable and honourable terms, but were likewise the principal reasons why Philip II, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, broke that ancient league, that had subsisted so long, without any violation, betwixt this nation and his ancestors of the house of Burgundy and Castile; and having made war upon that queen, proposed to subdue this whole nation: which very thing in the year 1588 he attempted with all his might, while in the mean time he was treating about the establishment of a peace; which certainly cannot but be still deeply rooted in the minds of the English, and will not easily be extirpated. And though after that there was some kind of peace and commerce in Europe, (and it was of such sort, that no Englishman durst profess his own religion within any part of the Spanish dominions, or have the Holy Bible in his house, or even aboard a ship,) yet in the West Indies the Spaniard from that time has never allowed them either to enjoy peace, or to have the privilege of trading; contrary to what was expressly stipulated concerning both these things in that league of the year 1542, concluded between Henry VIII, king of England, and the emperor Charles V, in which peace and free commerce were expressly established between these two princes and their people, through every part of their respective dominions, through all their ports and territories, without any exception of the West Indies, which was then subject to that emperor.

But as to that article, of a peace to be maintained on the part of both nations through all the countries of the world; this is indeed plainly contained in all the treaties of peace that were ever betwixt them, nor is there any exception relating to commerce in any of these treaties, till that which was made in the year 1604, with which that in the year 1630 does perfectly agree. In which two last treaties it was resolved upon, that both nations should have a privilege of trading in every part of one another's dominions, in all those places, where, before the war between Philip II, king of Spain, and Elizabeth queen of England, there was any commerce, according to what was usual and customary in ancient alliances and treaties made before that time. These are the very individual words of those treaties, which do plainly leave the matter dubious and uncertain, and so King James was satisfied to make peace with Spain any how, since he only renewed the very same treaty which had been concluded a little before the death of Queen Elizabeth, who charged her deputies when it was in agitation, among other things, to insist warmly on having a privilege of trading to the West Indies.

But King James, who was mightily desirous of making peace with the Spaniards, was content to leave that clause so expressed, as both parties might explain it in their own way, and as they judged would be most for their own advantage; though these words, "According to what is usual and customary in ancient alliances and treaties," are so to be understood as it is reasonable they should, according to what in justice ought to be done, and not according to what has been done on the part of the Spaniards, to their manifest violation, (which has afforded perpetual matter of complaint to the English, and has been an occasion of continual quarrels betwixt the two nations,) it is most evident from the express words of ancient treaties, that the English had a privilege both of peace and commerce, through all the Spanish dominions.

Moreover, if the way of observing ancient treaties and agreements is to be taken from their manifest violation, the Spaniards have some pretence for explaining that clause, in the last treaties, as debarring the English from all manner of commerce in these parts. And for all that, during one half the time that intervened betwixt the foresaid treaty in the year 1542, and the beginning of the war betwixt Philip II, and Elizabeth, so far as we can judge from the manner in which things were carried on, it would appear that trading in these places was as much allowed as prohibited. But when the Spaniards would permit no commerce at all, they and the English came from the exchange of goods to that of blows and wounds; and this not only before the war broke out betwixt Philip and Elizabeth, but likewise after a peace was made in the year 1604 by King James, and another by his son in 1630, and yet so as not to stop the course of trade through Europe. However, the king of Spain, after this late interruption of our trade, has now judged that the contests in America may be extended to Europe itself.

But we neither insist on the interpretation of treaties, nor the right of commerce by virtue of these treaties, or on any other account, as if this contest of ours with Spain were necessarily to be founded on these. This is built on the clearest and most evident reasons in the world, as will presently appear. Nevertheless, there are some things of such a nature, that though it be not so necessary to found a war upon them, yet they may very justly be obstacles to the establishing of a peace, or at least to the renewing of an alliance, in which these things are not granted, which have either been granted in former pactions, or may reasonably be expected. And this may serve as an answer to that question; Why, since we have renewed the ancient treaties we had formerly made with all other nations, we have not done the same with Spain? And may serve to convince the world, that in the articles of alliance we have not, as is objected, demanded his right eye, far less both eyes, by our refusing to be liable to the cruel and bloody inquisition in those places where we have been allowed to traffic, but have only insisted upon having such a privilege of carrying on trade, as we were not to be deprived of, either by ancient treaties, or the law of nature. For though the king of Spain has assumed to himself a power of prescribing us the laws and bounds of commerce, by authority of a law made by the pope, whereby he discharges all traffic with Turks, Jews, and other infidels:* and though under this pretence, even in time of peace, his ships of war, in other places besides the West Indies, have taken and plundered our ships; and though by the same authority of the pope, and under pretence of a certain gift he has from him, he claims the Indians for his subjects, as if forsooth they also were subject unto him, who are neither under his authority nor protection: yet we maintain, that neither the pope nor the king of Spain is invested with any such power, as either to rob them of their liberty, or us of the privilege of conversing and trading with them, which we have by the law of nature and nations, but especially with those who, as we formerly observed, are not under the power and government of the king of Spain.

Another obstacle to our renewing an alliance with Spain is sufficiently manifest, and at the same time very remarkable; which is this, that any of our ambassadors and public ministers who are sent into that kingdom, either for the sake of cultivating a good understanding, or about any other business, betwixt the two commonwealths, are altogether uncertain of their lives, the king being tied down to such opinions, as hinder him from providing for their safety against murderers, so as they may not be always in the most imminent danger; whose privileges, in order to keep up and preserve friendship between princes and commonwealths, have by the law of nations been always considered as inviolable, and as a thing much more sacred than those altars of refuge, whose privileges, built on the authority of the pope and the church of Rome, have been hitherto applied to elude the force of laws and justice, which we demanded should be put in execution against the murderers of Mr. Anthony Ascham, who was sent by this republic into Spain, to procure and establish friendship betwixt the two nations. For which barbarous murder there has never as yet been any satisfaction made, nor punishment inflicted on the authors of it, nor could this ever be obtained, though it was demanded by the parliament;* and in their name several times urged with the greatest warmth by the council of state. And this has been hitherto one continued obstacle, and a very just one too, to the renewing of an alliance betwixt the two nations; nay, if we consider how other nations have frequently acted in like cases, it may be considered as a very just cause for a war.

* William Stephens of Bristol and some other London merchants, in the years 1606 and 1607, trading with those people who live on the coast of Morocco, with three vessels, some ships belonging to the king of Spain that were pirating along these coasts, having come upon them in the bay of Saffia and the harbour of Santo Cruz, while they were lying at anchor, plundered them, without giving any other reason for their doing it than this, that the king their master would not allow of any commerce with infidels; and the loss these merchants sustained at that time was computed at more than 2000*l*.

But as to the disputes that have arisen in the West Indies, though we, both in the continent itself, and in the islands, have plantations as well as they, and have as good, nay, a better right to possess them, than the Spaniards have to possess theirs, and though we have a right to trade in those seas, equally good with theirs; yet without any reason, or any damage sustained, and that when there was not the least dispute about commerce, they have been continually invading our colonies in a hostile way, killing our men, taking our ships, robbing us of our goods, laying waste our houses and fields, imprisoning and enslaving our people: this they have been doing all along till these present times, wherein they have of late engaged in an expedition against them.

For which reason, contrary to what used to be done formerly in the like case, they have detained our ships and merchants, and confiscated their goods almost every where through the Spanish dominions; so that whether we turn our eyes to America or Europe, they alone are undoubtedly to be considered as the authors of the war, and the cause of all the inconveniences and all the bloodshed with which it may possibly be attended.

There are a great many instances of the most cruel and barbarous treatment, the English have perpetually met with from the Spaniards in the West Indies; and that even in time of peace, both since the year 1604, when the peace was patched up by King James, till the time that the war broke out again, and since that last peace, which was concluded in the year 1630, to this very day. We shall only mention a few of them.†

After a peace was concluded in the year 1605, a ship called the Mary, Ambrose Birch commander, was trading on the north coast of Hispaniola: the master being allured with promises of a safe and free commerce, by one father John and six of his accomplices, to go ashore to see some goods, twelve Spaniards in the mean time while going aboard to see the English goods, while the English suspecting no frauds were shewing them their wares, the priest giving a signal from the shore, the Spaniards every man drew his dagger, and stabbed all the English that were in the ship, except two who leaped into the sea, and the rest ashore were put to death with an unparalleled cruelty; the master himself stript of his clothes, and fastened to a tree, was exposed naked to be bit by the flies and vermin. And after he had continued in this miserable case for the space of twenty hours, a negro hearing his groans came to the place, and as he was just on the point of expiring, stabbed him with a spear. This ship with her goods was valued at 5400*l.*

Another ship called the Archer was taken at St. Domingo, and all the sailors put to death. She was reckoned worth 1300*l.*

Another ship, called the Friendship of London, with her loading, was taken by Lodowic Fajard, admiral of the Spanish fleet, all her goods confiscated, and the merchants and mariners thrown into the sea, except one boy who was reserved for a slave. This ship with her loading was estimated at 1500*l.*

The sailors going ashore out of another ship, called the Scorn, (the Spaniards having solemnly sworn they would do them no prejudice,) were all nevertheless bound to trees and strangled. The ship with all her goods was seized, and the merchants, to whom she belonged, lost at this time 1500*l.*

In the year 1606, a ship called the Neptune, was taken at Tortuga, by the Spanish guarda costas, valued at 4300*l.*‡

The same year, another ship, called the Lark, was taken by Lodowic Fajard, and confiscated with all her loading, valued at 4570*l.*

Another, called the Castor and Pollux, was taken by the Spaniards at Florida, by whom she was confiscated, and all her sailors either killed or made slaves; for they were never heard of afterwards. This vessel with her loading was valued at 15000*l.*§

In the year 1608, a Plymouth ship called the Richard, commanded by Henry Challins, fitted out at the expense of Lord Popham, lord chief justice of England, Ferdinand Gorges knight, and others, to go to Virginia, happening to be driven by stress of weather upon the southern part of the Canary Islands, in her way from thence to the coast of Virginia, she chanced to fall in with eleven Spanish ships returning from St. Domingo, who seized her; and though the captain, to rescue himself out of their hands, produced a royal passport, yet the ship with all her goods was confiscated, the captain himself barbarously used by them

* This is evident from the parliament's letter, signed by the hand of the Speaker, to the King of Spain, in the month of January, 1650, the words whereof are as follow. "We demand of your majesty, and insist upon it, "that public justice be at length satisfied for the barbarous murder of Anthony Ascham our resident at your court, and the rather, that after we "have seen condign punishment inflicted on the authors of such a detestable crime, we may be in no fear hereafter to send our ambassador to "your royal court, to lay before you such things as may be equally advantageous to your majesty and our commonwealth. On the contrary, "if we should suffer that blood, the shedding whereof was a thing in many "respects so remarkably horrible, to pass unrevenged, we must of necessity be partakers in that detestable crime in the sight of God, our only "deliverer and the eternal fountain of our mercies, and in the eye of the "whole English nation; especially if ever we should send any other of "our countrymen into that kingdom, where murder is allowed to go quite "unpunished. But we have so great an opinion of your majesty, that we "will not easily be brought to believe that your royal authority is subjected to any other power superior to it within your own dominions."

† As a ship called the Ulysses was trading along the coast of Guiana, the merchants and sailors happened to go ashore, by the persuasion of Berry, governor of that place, who had promised, nay, even sworn that they should receive no hurt; nevertheless there were thirty of them taken and committed to prison. Upon which the governor writes a letter to the merchant, acquainting him, that he had indeed taken thirty of his men, and that because some foreigners, who had come there to trade with them, had defrauded him of 20,000 ducats, which, if he would send him, he swore he would restore all his men, and allow him the liberty of commerce. The merchant sent him the sum he demanded, part in ready money, part in goods, which after the governor had received, he ordered all the thirty men to be fastened to trees and strangled, except the chirurgeon, who was reserved, to cure the governor of a certain disease. This ransom, together with other damages sustained there, was computed at 7000*l.*

‡ John Davis lost two ships with all their goods, and the Spaniards slew all the men that were aboard of them, to the entire loss of that voyage, and this was computed at 3500*l.*

§ Another ship belonging to some London merchants, John Lock commander, was taken by the Spanish fleet, at the isle of Tortuga, because she had been trading there, and had felled some trees; for this she was confiscated, most of the sailors put to death, and the rest condemned to the galleys. This was esteemed a loss of 5300*l.*

and sent to the galleys. This was a damage of more than 2500*l.*

A ship, called the Aid, was served much the same way by Lodowic Fajard, having been taken under pretence of friendship; she too with her goods was confiscated, and all the sailors sent to the galleys, where some were cudgelled to death for refusing to ply the oars. Which vessel with her goods, by the Spaniards' own estimation, was worth 7000*l.*

The same year another ship, called the gallant Anne, William Curry commander, as she was trading at Hispaniola, was likewise confiscated with all her goods, and all the sailors hanged; each of them, by way of ridicule, having a piece of paper sewed to his coat, which had these words written upon it, "Why came ye hither?" This ship with her burden was valued at 8000*l.* These instances do sufficiently shew what kind of peace the Spaniards maintained with us during the reign of King James, who was always very much afraid of breaking the peace with them. And we may also plainly discover the same acts of hostility and barbarous treatment ever since the last peace, which was made in the year 1630, to this very day. For this end we will first speak a little of those colonies, that were planted by some noblemen of this nation, in the isle of Catelina, which they call the isle of Providence, and the island of Tortuga, by them called the island of Association. These islands about the year 1629, being then quite uninhabited, having neither men nor cattle in them, were seized by the English, who at that time were at war with the Spaniards. The year following, when peace was established betwixt the two nations, the Spaniards having made no exception about these islands, King Charles, in a charter under the great seal of England, declared himself master of the isle of Providence and some other islands adjacent to it, which he thought no way inconsistent with his peace, and gave them in possession to some noblemen and their heirs, and next year he extended this grant to the isle of Tortuga.

And though the above-mentioned planters had got possession of these islands by the king's grant, and though this grant was exceeding well founded, first on the law of nature, since neither the Spaniards, nor any other people whatever, were in possession of these places when they seized them; and secondly, on the right of war, since they were taken possession of in time of war, and were not excepted in the articles of peace, whence it follows from the second article of the last treaty, that the title of the Spaniards to these islands (even supposing they had had one) was made null by their own consent: and though likewise, neither the aforesaid company of planters in general, nor any one of them in particular by any action of theirs, had given any just cause of offence, either to the king of Spain or to any of his subjects, till they had first in a violent manner attacked our ships and colonies, and had slain several of the English, and set fire to their houses: yet the Spaniards, being firmly resolved to break the peace in these places, about the twenty-second of January 1632, without any the least provocation, betwixt the isle of Tortuga and the cape of Florida, in a hostile manner fell upon a certain ship belonging to the company, called the Sea-Flower, on her return from the isle of Providence, in which engagement they slew some of the men aboard that ship, and wounded others.

After this, about the year 1634, the isle of Tortuga was attacked by four ships belonging to the Spaniards, without any injury done on the part of the English, in which attack upwards of sixty were slain, many wounded and taken prisoners, their houses burnt down and quite demolished, their most valuable goods carried off by the Spaniards, and the English almost wholly driven out of that island; of whom some were hanged, others carried to the Havanna, and detained in the most abject slavery. One Grymes, who had been a gunner in Tortuga, was distinguished from the rest, by a death remarkably cruel. Some of them flying for refuge to a certain desart island called Santa Cruz, were again set upon by the Spaniards, who even pursued them thither with three galleys in the month of March 1636, of whom forty were killed, and the rest taken prisoners, and used with the utmost barbarity.

In the year 1635, July 24th, the Spaniards, with two great ships and one galley, made likewise an attack upon the isle of Providence, and they fought for several hours, but at that time they were repulsed and forced to give over their enterprise. However, they attempted the same thing a second time, about the year 1640, with twelve ships, some large, and some of a lesser size, whereof the admiral's ship was called the Armadillo of Carthagena, one of the greater galleys of the royal plate-fleet, and having sent a great number of soldiers ashore, they were confident of making themselves masters of the whole island; but yet were repulsed with a great deal of damage, and forced to retreat. Nevertheless, having equipped another fleet, they returned a little after, when the planters, at variance among themselves, did not so much employ their thoughts about what method they should take to defend themselves, as about the terms upon which they might most advantageously surrender; which terms, upon their giving up the island, they found no difficulty to obtain. But the island was by this means wrested out of the hands both of the planters and the commonwealth, of whom the former sustained the loss of more than 80,000*l.* and the latter, besides the loss of the island, hereby received a very open and public affront. After the Spaniards had thus made themselves masters of the isle of Providence, a ship bringing some passengers hither, who wanted to transport themselves to this place from New-England, the Spaniards by stratagem having found means to get her brought within gun-shot, (the people in the ship knowing nothing of their late conquest of that island,) she was in great danger of being taken, and with very much difficulty rescued herself; the master of the ship, a very honest and worthy man, was killed by a bullet-shot from the island.

Nor were the Spaniards content to confine the acts of hostility, which they have exercised upon the people of that colony, within the boundaries of America, but have also treated them in the same hostile manner in Europe. For in the year 1638, December 25th, a ship belonging to that same company, called the Providence, Thomas Newman commander, two leagues from Dungeness on the very coast of England, was assaulted and taken by Sprengfeld, captain of a privateer belonging to Dunkirk, to which place this ship was brought, and her cargo detained, which even by the computation of many persons in that place, was reckoned to amount to the sum of 30,000*l.* As for the sailors, some were slain, some wounded, and the rest, after having been treated with the greatest inhumanity in their own ship, were hurried away to Dunkirk, where they met with much the same usage, till they found some way to make their escape; and though the owners demanded satisfaction in the most earnest manner, and the last king by his resident Mr. Balthasar Gerber, and both by letters written with his own hand, and the hand of secretary Coke, asked reparation on their behalf; yet they could neither procure the restitution of their goods, nor the least compensation for these losses.

But there are other examples of the Spanish cruelty, which are of a later date, and still more shocking; such as that of their coming from Porto-Rico and attacking Santa Cruz about the year 1651, an island that was not formerly inhabited, but at that time possessed by an English colony governed by Nicol. Philips, who with about an hundred more of the colony was barbarously murdered by the hands of the Spaniards, who besides this attacked the ships in the harbour, plundered their houses and razed them from the very foundation; and when they could find no more to sacrifice to their fury, (the rest of the inhabitants having fled to the woods,) returning to Porto-rico, they gave the miserable remnant, who were well nigh famished, time to remove from Santa Cruz, and to betake themselves to some other neighbouring islands. But a little time thereafter, they returned in quest and pursuit of those who sculked in the woods; but they had the good fortune to find a way of making their escape, and stealing away privately to other islands.

In the same year 1631, a ship belonging to John Turner being driven into the harbour of Cumanagola by tempestuous winds, was seized by the governor of that place, and confiscated with all her lading.

The same was done to captain Cranley's ship and her goods.*

And in the year 1650, a certain vessel pertaining to Samuel Wilson, loaden with horses, was taken on the high seas in her way to Barbadoes, and carried to the Havanna. Both the ship and her goods were confiscated, most of the sailors imprisoned, and like slaves obliged to work at the fortifications.

The same hardships were endured by the sailors aboard a certain ship of Barnstable about two years since, which in her return from some of our plantations in the Carribee islands, springing a leak hard by Hispaniola, the sailors to save themselves, being obliged to get into the long boat, got ashore, where they were all made slaves, and obliged to work at the fortifications.

By these, and many more examples of the same kind too long to be reckoned up, it is abundantly evident, the king of Spain and his subjects think they are no way bound by any condition of peace to be performed to us on their part in these places, since they have habitually exercised all sorts of hostilities against us, nay have even done such things as are more insufferable, and more grievous, than open acts of hostility; and since that cruelty, with which they usually treat the English in America, is so contrary to the articles of peace, that it does not so much as seem suitable to the laws of the most bloody war: however, in that embargo of the king of Spain, by which he orders our merchant ships and their goods to be seized and confiscated, the whole blame is laid upon the English, whom he brands with the odious names of treaty-breakers and violators of the most sacred peace, and likewise of free commerce, which he pretends to have so religiously maintained on his part, and gives out that we have violated the laws of peace and commerce with such strange and professed hostility, that we attempted to besiege the town of St. Domingo in the isle of Hispaniola. Which is the only cause he offers, why the goods of the English are confiscated in Spain, and the trading people confined; though this is likewise aggravated by his boasted humanity; for he maintains that he in the most friendly way received our fleets into his harbours,† where it could be of any advantage for them to enter, and that his ministers did not at all require of us a strict observance of the articles of peace, that were agreed to by the two crowns, which forbid both parties to enter a harbour with more than six or eight ships of war.

But as he, by talking in this strain, acquits our fleets of all trespasses and violations of treaty in these harbours, since if any such thing as is objected has been done and passed over, it has been done by the allowance of himself and his ministers; and as it is exceedingly manifest, that he has not been so favourable for nought, if he will but reflect with himself what vast profits he has received from our fleets, so on the other hand, that the king and his ministers have not at all in fact observed the agreements he speaks of, in the twenty-third article of which, the following provision is made in the most express terms; "That if any differences should happen to arise betwixt the two commonwealths, the subjects on both sides should be advertised, that they should have six months from the time of the advertisement to transport their effects, during which time there should be no arrest, interrupting, or damaging, of any man's person or goods."

* And also to one belonging to John Bland, commanded by Nicol. Philips, in the very same harbour.

† But Swanley, our admiral, was not so civilly treated in Sicily, in the harbour of Drepano, when in the year 1653, about the mouth of June, his ship called the Henry Bonaventure, together with a large and very rich Dutch ship called the Peter, which he had taken, was by the treachery of the Spanish governor in that place, taken by seven Dutch ships, under the command of the younger Trump in the very harbour, no further than a small gun's shot from the bulwarks, whereby the merchants, to whom that ship belonged, lost more than 63,000*l.*

In which affair, the king truly has shown but very little regard to those contracts, which he charges us with having broken, as appears from that late confiscation of our goods. But what he declares in that edict concerning the acts of hostility committed in the West Indies, their being to be considered as a violation of peace and free commerce in these parts, is a new and quite different explanation from what has ever been propounded hitherto by either of the two republics, though both parties have frequently had occasions to declare their judgment about this matter.

But seeing the king of Spain has declared both by word and deed, that the articles of peace ought to be thus understood, it follows, that by so many acts of hostility committed against the English in these parts, and which first began on his side, and have been continued from the very time of the last concluded treaty, as was formerly observed, to this very day; hence I say it follows, that he seems to be convinced, that the sacred bonds of friendship have been first broken on his side. Which thing is so clear and manifest, that our adversaries themselves in this controversy are ashamed to deny the fact, and choose rather to dispute with us concerning the right of possession; which must be in the following manner: as the king of Spain, among his other titles, has assumed that of king of the Indies, so they affirm, that the whole Indies and Indian sea, both south and north, belong to him, and that they are all enemies and pirates, who approach these places without his commission. Which if it were true, both we and all other nations ought to leave and restore to him all our possessions there, and having brought back whatever colonies we have sent thither, should beg his pardon for the injury we have done him; but if we consider a little more narrowly the truth and reasonableness of this title, we shall find that it is built upon a very slender and weak foundation, to have such a vast pile of war and contentions erected upon it, as the present is likely to be. They pretend to have a double title, one founded upon the pope's gift, and another upon their having first discovered those places. As to the first, we know the pope has been always very liberal in his gifts of kingdoms and countries, but in the mean time we cannot but think, that in so doing, he acts in a very different manner from him, whose vicar he professes himself, who would not so much as allow himself to be appointed a judge in the dividing of inheritances, far less give any one whole kingdoms at his pleasure, like the pope, who has thought fit to make a present of England, Ireland, and some other kingdoms.

But we deny his being invested with any such authority, nor do we think there is any nation so void of understanding, as to think that so great power is lodged in him, or that the Spaniards would believe this or acquiesce in it, if he should require them to yield up as much as he has bestowed. But if the French and others, who acknowledge the pope's authority in ecclesiastical matters, have no regard to this title of the Spaniards, it cannot be expected we should think of it any otherwise. And so we leave this point, as not deserving a fuller answer.

Nor is the other title of any greater weight, as if the Spaniards in consequence of their having first discovered some few parts of America, and given names to some islands, rivers, and promontories, had for this reason lawfully acquired the government and dominion of that new world. But such an imaginary title founded on such a silly pretence, without being in possession, cannot possibly create any true and lawful right. The best right of possession in America is that which is founded on one's having planted colonies there, and settled in such places as had either no inhabitants, or by the consent of the inhabitants, if there were any; or at least, in some of the wild and uncultivated places of their country, which they were not numerous enough to replenish and improve; since God has created this earth for the use of men, and ordered them to replenish it throughout.

If this be true, as the Spaniards will be found to hold their possessions there very unjustly, having purchased all of them against the will of the inhabitants, and as it were plucked them out of their very bowels, having laid the foundations of their empire in that place, in the blood of the poor natives, and rendered several large islands and countries, that were in a tolerable case when they found them, so many barren desarts, and rooted out all the inhabitants there; so the English hold their possessions there by the best right imaginable, especially those islands where the Spaniards have fallen upon their colonies, and quite demolished them; which islands had no other inhabitants at all, or if they had, they were all slain by the Spaniards, who had likewise deserted these places, and left them without any to improve or cultivate them: so that by the law of nature and nations they belong to any who think fit to take possession of them, according to that common and well-known maxim in law, " Such things as belong to none, and such as are abandoned by their former possessors, become his property who first seizes them." Although, granting that we had beat the Spaniards out of those places where we have planted our colonies, out of which they had at first expelled the inhabitants, we should have possessed them with better right, as the avengers of the murder of that people, and of the injuries sustained by them, than the Spaniards their oppressors and murderers. But since we have settled our colonies in such places as were neither possessed by the natives nor the Spaniards, they having left behind them neither houses nor cattle, nor any thing that could by any means keep up the right of possession, the justness of our title to these places was so much the more evident, and the injuries done us by the Spaniards so much the more manifest, especially our right to those places that were seized while the two nations were at war with each other, such as the isles of Providence and Tortuga, which if the Spaniards could have shewn to be theirs, by any former title which they have not yet produced, yet since they have not done it in the last treaty of peace, by the second article of this treaty, they have for the future cut themselves off from all such pretence, and if they had any right, have now lost it. It is unnecessary to talk any further upon this argument.

There is no intelligent person but will easily see how empty and weak those reasons are, that the Spaniard has for claiming to himself alone an empire of such a vast and prodigious extent. But we have said this much, in order to shew the weakness of those pretences, whereby the Spaniards endeavour to justify themselves for having treated us with so much cruelty and barbarity in the West Indies, for having enslaved, hanged, drowned, tortured, and put to death our countrymen, robbed them of their ships and goods, and demolished our colonies, even in the time of profound peace, and that without any injury received on their part: which cruel usage and havoc, made among our people, and such as were of the same orthodox faith with them, as oft as the English call to remembrance, they cannot miss to think that their former glory is quite gone, and their ships of war become entirely useless, if they suffer themselves to be any longer treated in such a disgraceful manner: and moreover, to be not only excluded from all free commerce in so great and opulent a part of the world, but likewise to be looked upon as pirates and robbers, and punished in the same manner as they, if they presume to sail those seas, or so much as look that way; or, in fine, have any intercourse or dealing even with their own colonies that are settled there.

Concerning the bloody Spanish inquisition we shall say nothing, this being a controversy common to all protestants, nor shall we speak of the many seminaries of English priests and jesuits nestling under the protection of the Spaniards, which is a perpetual cause of stumbling, and very great danger to the commonwealth; since what we principally propose is, to shew the grounds and reasons of the controversies in the West Indies, and we are confident we have made it plain to all, who weigh things fairly and impartially, that necessity, honour, and justice, have prompted us to undertake this late expedition. First, we have been prompted to it by necessity; it being absolutely necessary to go to war with the Spaniards, since they will not allow us to be at peace with them: and then honour, and justice, seeing we cannot pretend to either of these, if we sit still and suffer such unsufferable injuries to be done our countrymen, as those we have shewn to have been done them in the West Indies.

And truly they see but a very little way, who form their notion of the designs and intentions of the Spaniards, according to that friendly aspect, with which the present declension of their affairs has obliged them to look upon us in these parts of the world, (that face which they have put on being only a false one,) for it is certain they have the same mind, and the very same desires, which they had in the year 1588, when they endeavoured to subdue this whole island; nay, it is certain their hatred is more inflamed, and their jealousies and suspicions more increased by this change of the state of our affairs, and of the form of our republic. But if we omit this opportunity, which by reason of some things that have lately happened, may perhaps give us an occasion to fall upon some way, whereby through the assistance of God we may provide for our safety, against this old and implacable enemy of our religion and country; it may happen, he will recover such a degree of strength, as will render him as formidable and hard to be endured as before. One thing is certain, he always will and cannot but have the greatest indignation against us. Meanwhile, if we suffer such grievous injuries to be done our countrymen in the West Indies, without any satisfaction or revenge; if we suffer ourselves to be wholly excluded from that so considerable a part of the world; if we suffer our malicious and inveterate enemy (especially now, after he has made peace with the Dutch) to carry off without molestation, from the West Indies, those prodigious treasures, whereby he may repair his present damages, and again bring his affairs to such a prosperous and happy condition, as to deliberate with himself a second time, what he was thinking upon in the year 1588; namely, whether it would be more adviseable to begin with subduing England, in order to recover the United Provinces, or with them, in order to reduce England under his subjection; without doubt he will not find fewer, but more, causes why he should begin with England. And if God should at any time permit those intentions of his to have their desired effect, we have good ground to expect, that the residue of that cruel havoc, he made among our brethren at the foot of the Alps, will be first exercised upon us, and after that upon all protestants; which, if we may give credit to the complaints that were made by those poor orthodox Christians, was first designed and contrived in the court of Spain, by those friers whom they call missionaries.

All these things being considered, we hope the time will come, when all, but especially true Englishmen, will rather lay aside their private animosities among themselves, and renounce their own proper advantages, than through an excessive desire of that small profit to be made by trading to Spain, (which cannot be obtained but upon such conditions as are dishonourable and in some sort unlawful, and which may likewise be got some other way,) expose, as they now do, to the utmost danger, the souls of many young traders, by those terms upon which they now live and trade there, and suffer the lives and fortunes of many christian brethren in America, and in fine, the honour of this whole nation, to be exposed, and, what of all is the most momentous and important, let slip out of their hands the most noble opportunities of promoting the glory of God, and enlarging the bounds of Christ's kingdom: which, we do not doubt, will appear to be the chief end of our late expedition into the West Indies against the Spaniards, to all who are free of those prejudices which hinder people from clearly discerning the truth.

PRÆFATIO.

Tametsi vereor, si in defendendo populo Anglicano tam sim profusus verborum, vacuus rerum, quàm est plerisque visus in defensione regia Salmasius, nè verbosissimi simul et ineptissimi defensoris nomen meritus esse videar; tamen cùm in mediocri quavis materia tractanda nemo sibi adeò properandum esse existimet, quin exordio saltem aliquo pro dignitate suscepti à se operis uti soleat, id ego in re omnium ferè maxima dicenda si non omittam, neque nimis astringam, spero equidem, duas propemodum res, quas magnopere vellem, assecuturum me esse; alteram, ut causæ huic nobilissimæ, et seculorum omnium memoriâ dignissimæ nulla ex parte, quantum in me est, desim; alteram, ut reprehensam in adversario futilitatem et redundantiam, devitâsse tamen ipse nihilo minus judicer. Dicam enim res neque parvas neque vulgares; regem potentissimum, oppressis legibus, religione afflicta, pro libidine regnantem, tandem à suo populo, qui servitutem longam servierat, bello victum; indè in custodiam traditum; et cùm nullam omnino meliùs de se sperandi materiam vel dictis vel factis præberet, à summo demum regni concilio capite damnatum; et pro ipsis regiæ foribus securi percussum. Dicam etiam, quod ad levandos magna superstitione hominum animos multùm contulerit, quo jure, præsertim apud nos, judicatum hoc atque peractum sit; meosque cives fortissimos et integerrimos, deque universis orbis terrarum civibus ac populis egregiè meritos, ab improbissimis maledicorum, sive nostratium, sive exterorum calumniis, tum imprimis ab hujus inanissimi sophistæ maledictis, qui pro duce et coryphæo cæterorum se gerit, facilè defendam. Quæ enim ullius regis alto solio sedentis majestas unquam tanta eluxit, quanta tum populi Anglicani effulgebat, cùm, excussa illa veteri superstitione, quæ diu invaluerat, ipsum regem, seu potiùs de rege hostem, qui solus mortalium impunitatem sibi divino jure vendicabat, suis legibus irretitum judicio perfundere, et quo is quemcunque alium supplicio affecisset, eodem sontem ipsum afficere non vereretur. At quid ego hæc tanquam populi facta prædico? quæ ipsa per se penè vocem edunt, et præsentem ubique testantur Deum. Qui, quoties suæ sapientissimæ menti complacitum est, superbos et effrænatos reges, supra humanum modum sese attollentes, solet deturbare, et tota sæpe cum domo funditus evertit. Illius nos manifesto numine ad salutem et libertatem propè amissam subitò erecti, illum ducem secuti, et impressa passim divina vestigia venerantes, viam, haud obscuram sed illustrem, illius auspiciis commonstratum et patefactam ingressi sumus. Hæc ego omnia dignè satis explicare, et quod omnes fortasse gentes legant atque ætates, monumentis tradere, si diligentiâ solum meâ, cujusmodicunque est, meis tantùm viribus sperem me posse, frustra sim. Quæ enim oratio tam augusta atque magnifica, quod tam excellens ingenium, huic oneri subeundo par esse queat, ut, cùm illustrium virorum aut civitatum res gestas vix reperiatur tot seculis qui luculentè possit scribere, opinetur quisquam hæc, non hominum, sed omnipotentis planè Dei, gloriosè et mirabilitèr facta ullis se verbis aut stylo assequi posse? Quod quidem munus ut susciperem, tametsi summi in republica nostra viri sua authoritate perfecerunt, mihique hoc negotium datum esse voluerunt, ut quæ illi, Deo ductore, magnâ cum gloriâ gessere, ea, quod certè proximum est, contra invidiam et obtrectationem, quas in res ferrum et apparatus belli nihil potest, alio genere armorum defenderem; quorum ego quidem judicium magno mihi ornamento esse existimo, me scilicet eorum suffragiis eum esse præ cæteris, qui hanc patriæ meæ fortissimis liberatoribus haud pœnitendam operam navarem: quin et ipse ab ineunte adolescentia iis eram studiis incensus, quæ me ad optima quæque si minùs facienda, at certè laudanda, incitatum ferebant. His tamen diffisus adminiculis, ad divinam opem recurro; Deumque Opt. Max. donorum omnium largitorem invoco, ut quàm prosperè quamque piè nostri illi ad libertatem clarissimi duces regios fastus, et dominatum impotentem, acie fregerunt, dein memorabili tandem supplicio extinxerunt, quamque facili negotio nuper unus de multis ipsum regem veluti ab inferis resurgentem, inque illo libro post mortem edito novis argutiis, et verborum lenociniis, populi se venditantem redarguit atque summovit, tam ego feliciter tamque verè declamatoris hujus exotici petulantiam et mendacia refellam atque discutiam. Qui alienigena cùm sit, et quamvis id millies neget, grammaticus, non ea stipe contentus quam hoc nomine meretur, magnus ardelio esse maluit; non reipub. solùm immiscere se ausus, sed alienæ: cùm neque modestiam, neque judicium, neque aliud quicquam afferat, quod oporteret sanè tantum arbitrum, prætur arrogantiam et grammaticam. Et sanè hæc quæ jam latinè utcunque scripsit, si inter Anglos et nostro sermone protulisset, vix esset, credo, qui de responso laborandum esse judicaret; sed partim trita, et refutationibus jam crebris explosa, negligeret, partim tyrannica et fœda, vilissimo quovis mancipio vix ferenda, quamvis alioqui regias secutus ipse partes, aversaretur. Nunc cùm inter exteros, et nostrarum rerum penitus ignaros grandi pagina turgescat, sunt illi quidem, qui res nostras perperàm intelligunt, edocendi; hic suo more, (quandoquidem tanta maledicendi aliis libidine fertur,) suo inquam more ac modo, erit tractandus. Quod siquis miretur fortè, cur ergò tam diu intactum et ovantem, nostroque omnium silentio inflatum volitare passi simus, de aliis sanè nescio, de me audacter possum dicere, non mihi verba aut argumenta, quibus causam tuerer tam bonam, diu quærenda aut investiganda fuisse, si otium et valetudinem (quæ quidem scribendi laborem ferre possit) nactus essem. Qua cum adhuc etiam tenui admodum utar, carptim hæc cogor, et intercisis penè singulis horis, vix attingere, quæ continenti stylo atque studio persequi debuissem. Unde hoc si minùs dabitur, cives meos præstantissimos, patriæ conservatores digno laudum præconio celebrare, quorum immortalia facinora jam toto orbe claruerunt; defendere tamen, et ab hujus importuni literatoris insolentia, et professoriæ linguæ intemperiis, vindicare haud mihi difficile futurum spero. Pessimè enim vel naturâ vel legibus comparatum foret, si arguta servitus, libertas muta esset; et haberent tyranni qui pro se dicerent, non haberent qui tyrannos debellare possunt: miserum esset, si hæc ipsa ratio, quo utimur Dei munere, non multò plura ad homines conservandos, liberandos, et, quantum natura fert, inter se æquandos, quàm ad opprimendos et sub unius imperio malè perdendos, argumenta suppeditaret. Causam itaque pulcherrimam hac certâ fiduciâ læti aggrediamur; illinc fraudem, fallaciam, ignorantiam, atque barbariem; hinc lucem, veritatem, rationem, et seculorum omnium optimorum studia, atque doctrinam nobiscum stare.

Age nunc jam, satis præfati, quoniam cum criticis res est, tam culti voluminis titulum imprimis videamus quid aït; 'Defensio regia pro Carolo I. ad Car II.' Magnum sanè præstas, O quisquis es! patrem defendis ad filium; mirum ni causam obtineas. Verùm ego te falso aliàs sub nomine, nunc sub nullo latitantem, Salmasi, ad alia voco subsellia, ad alios judices, ubi tu illud euge et sophôs, quod in palæstra tua literaria captare miserè soles, fortassè non audies. Sed cur ad regem filium defensio hæc regia? non opus est tortore, confitentem habemus reum; "Sumptibus inquit regiis." O te venalem oratorem et sumptuosum! Siccine defensionem pro Carolo patre, tuâ sententiâ, rege optimo, ad Carolum filium regem pauperrimum noluisti, nisi sumptibus regiis? Sed veterator etiam haud irridiculus esse voluisti, qui regiam defensionem dixeris; non enim ampliùs tua quam vendidisti, sed legitimè jam regia defensio est; centenis nimirum Jacobæis emta, ingenti pretio ab egentissimo rege: non enim ignota loquimur; novimus qui illos aureos domum attulit tuam, qui crumenam illam tessellis vitreis variatam, novimus qui te avaras manus porrigentem vidit, in speciem quidem ut Sacellanum regis missum cum munere, re vera ut ipsum munus amplecterere; et una tantùm mercede accepta totum penè regis ærarium exinanires. Sed eccum ipsum, crepant fores, prodit histrio in proscenium.

Ut pernoscatis quid sibi Eunuchus velit.

Nam quicquid est, præter solitum cothurnatus incedit. 'Horribilis nuper nuntius aures nostras atroci vulnere, sed magìs mentes, perculit, de parricidio apud Anglos in persona regis sacrilegorum hominum nefaria conspiratione admisso.' Profectò nuntius iste horribilis aut gladium multò longiorem eo quem strinxit Petrus habuerit oportet, aut aures istæ auritissimæ fuerint, quas tam longinquo vulnere perculerit: nam aures non stolidas ne offendisse quidem potuit. Ecqua enim vobis fit injuria, ecquis vestrûm læditur, si nos hostes et perduelles nostros, sive plebeios, sive nobiles, sive reges, morte multamus? At ista mitte, Salmasi, quæ ad te nihil attinent: ego enim de te etiam horribilem habeo quem apportem nuntium; quique omnium grammaticorum et criticorum aures, modò teretes habent et doctas, atrociori vulnere si non perculerit, mirabor; de parricidio apud Hollandos in persona Aristarchi, nefariâ Salmasii audaciâ, admisso: te magnum scilicet criticum sumptibus regiis conductum, ut defensionem regiam scriberes, non solùm putidissimo exordio, præficarum funebribus nugis et næniis simillimo, nullius non fatui mentem miseratione permovisse, sed primâ statim clausulâ risum penè legentibus multiplici barbarismo concitâsse. Quid enim, quæso, est parricidium in personâ regis admittere, quid in personâ regis? quæ unquam latinitas sic locuta est? nisi aliquem nobis fortè Pseudophilippum narras, qui personam regis indutus, nescio quid parricidii apud Anglos patraverit; quod verbum verius opinione tuâ ex ore tibi excidisse puto. Tyrannus enim, quasi histrionalis quidam rex, larva tantùm et persona regis, non verus rex est. Cæterùm ob hujusmodi noxas Gallicolatinas, quibus passim scates, non tam mihi, neque enim est otium, quàm ipsis tuis grammatistis pœnas dabis; quibus ego te deridendum et vapulandum propino. Hoc multò atrocius; quod à summis magistratibus nostris de rege statutum est, id sacrilegorum hominum nefaria conspiratione admissum ais. Tune, furcifer, potentissimi nuper regni, nunc reipub. eo potentioris, acta et consulta sic nominas? quorum de factis nè rex quidem ullus ut quicquam gravius pronuntiaret, aut scriptum ederet, adduci adhuc potuit. Meritò itaque amplissimi Ordines Hollandiæ, liberatorum olim patriæ vera progenies, defensionem hanc tyrannicam, populorum omnium libertati pestilentissimam, edicto suo tenebris damnârunt; cujus et ipsum authorem omnis libera civitas suis prohibere finibus, aut ejicere, deberet: eaque præcipuè quæ tam ingratum tamque tetrum reipublicæ hostem suo stipendio alit; cujus ille reipublicæ, haud secùs atque nostræ, fundamenta ipsa atque causas oppugnat; necnon utramque unâ et eâdem operâ labefactare et subruere conatur; præstantissimosque illic libertatis vindices nostrorum sub nomine maledictis proscindit. Reputate jam vobiscum, illustrissimi fœderatorum Ordines, et cum animis vestris cogitate, quis hunc regiæ potestatis assertorem ad scribendum impulerit, quis nuper apud vos regiè se gerere incœperit, quæ consilia, qui conatus, quæ turbæ denique per Hollandiam secutæ sint, quæ nunc essent, quàm vobis parata servitus, novusque dominus erat, atque illa vestra tot annorum armis atque laboribus vindicata libertas, quàm propè extincta apud vos nunc foret, nisi opportunissima nuper temerarii juvenis morte respirâsset. Sed pergit iste noster ampullari, et mirabiles tragœdias fingere, " Quoscunque infandus hic," parricidialis nimirum barbarismi Salmasiani, " rumor attigit, haud secùs ac si fulmine afflati essent, derepente his arrectæque horrore comæ et vox faucibus hæsit." Quod nunc primitùs auditum discant physici, comas fulmine arrectas. Verùm quis hoc nescit, viles et imbelles animos, magni cujuspiam facinoris vel rumore, obstupescere; quodque prius fuerunt, tum se maximè stipites indicare. Alii " lacrymas non tenuerunt," mulierculæ credo aulicæ, aut siqui his molliores; inter quos et ipse Salmasius nova quadam metamorphôsi Salmacis factus est; et fonte hoc suo lacrymarum fictitio, et nocte parato, viriles animos emollire conatur. Moneo itaque et cavere jubeo,

" Fortiùs verò," inquit, " animati," (nam fortes puto et animosos ne nominare quidem nisi putidè potest,) tantâ " indignationis flammâ exarserunt, ut vix se caperent." Furiosos illos non flocci facimus; vera fortitudine suique compote istos minaces pellere, et in fugam vertere, consuevimus. " Nemo cèrtè non diras imprecatus est tanti sceleris authoribus." Vox tamen, ut tu modò aîebas, " faucibus hæsit;" atque hæsisset utinam in hunc usque diem, si de nostris duntaxat perfugis hoc vis intelligi, quod nos etiam pro comperto habemus, nihil illis frequentius in ore esse, quàm diras et imprecationes, omnibus bonis abominandas quidem, non tamen metuendas. De aliis credibile vix est, cum supplicii de rege sumti fama illuc pervenisset, repertum in libero præsertim populo fuisse ullum, tam ad servitutem natum, qui nos dicto læderet, aut factum nostrum crimini daret; immo potiùs omnes bonos omnia bona dixisse; quinetiam Deo gratias egisse, qui exemplum justitiæ tam illustre et excelsum edideret, quodque cæteris regibus tam salutari documento esse possit. Istos itaque " feros ac ferreos in cædem," nescio cujus, " miserabilem ac mirabilem" plorantes, cùm suo tinnulo oratore, " post regium in orbe nomen natum notumque," frigidissimo, etiam atque etiam plorare jubemus. At quis interim è ludo ferè puer, aut è cœnobio quovis fraterculus, casum hunc regis non multò disertiùs, immo latiniùs, hoc oratore regio declamitâsset? Verùm ego ineptior sim, si infantiam hujus et deliramenta hunc in modum toto volumine accuratè persequar; quod tamen libens facerem, (quoniam superbiâ et fastidio, ut ferunt, supra modum turget,) ni mole tantùm libri inconcinna atque incondita se protegeret, et veluti miles ille Terentianus post principia lateret: callido sanè consilio, ut defessus singula notando etiam acerrimus quisque, tædio priùs conficeretur, quàm omnia redargueret. Nunc ejus quoddam specimen dare hac veluti prolusione duntaxat volui; et cordatis lectoribus à principio statim degustandum hominem præbere, ut in hac paginæ unius promulside experiamur quàm lautè nos et luculenter cæteris ferculis excepturus sit; quantas ineptias atque infantias toto opere congesserit, qui tam densas, ubi minimè decuit, in ipsâ fronte collocavit. Exinde multa garrientem, et scombris concionantem, facilè prætereo; ad nostras autem res quod attinet, haud dubitamus quin ea, quæ authoritate parlamenti scripta publicè et declarata sunt, apud omnes bonos et prudentes exteros plus ponderis habitura sint, quàm unius impudentissimi homuncionis calumniæ, et mendacia; qui ab exulibus nostris, patriæ hostibus, pretio conductus, quolibet eorum dictante quibus operam suam locaverat, aut rumusculum spargente, falsissima quæque corradere, et in chartam conjicere, non dubitavit. Utque planè intelligant omnes quàm non illi religio sit, quidlibet scribere, verum an falsum, pium an impium, haud alius mihi testis adhibendus erit, quàm ipse Salmasius. Scribit is in Apparatu contra primatum Papæ, " maximas esse causas cur ecclesia redire ab episcopatu debeat ad apostolicam 'presbyterorum' institutionem; longè majus ex episcopatu introductum in ecclesiam esse malum, quàm illa schismata quæ priùs metuebantur: pestem illam, quæ ex eo ecclesias invasit, totum ecclesiæ corpus miserabili tyrannide pessundedisse; immo ipsos reges ac principes sub jugum misisse; majorem in ecclesiam utilitatem redundaturam hierarchiâ totâ extinctâ, quàm solo capite Papa." p. 169. " Posse episcopatum cum papatu tolli cum summo bono ecclesiæ; sublato episcopatu ruere ipsum papatum, super illo utpote fundatum." p. 171. " Cur removeri debeat in illis regnis, quæ jam papatui renuntiârunt, proprias habere causas. Cur ibi episcopatus retineatur se non videre; non integram videre reformationem quæ hac in parte imperfecta sit; nihil afferri posse rationis aut causæ probabilis, cur sublato papatu retineri debeat aut possit episcopatus." p. 197. Hæc et multò plura cùm ante annos quatuor scripserit, tanta nunc vanitate et impudentia est, ut parlamentum Angliæ graviter incusare hoc loco audeat, quòd episcopatum " non solùm senatu ejiciendum, sed etiam penitùs abjiciendum, censuerint." Quid? quòd ipsum etiam episcopatum suadet atque defendit, iisdem usus argumentis et rationibus, quas libro illo priore magno impetu confutaverat; "necessarios" nempe "fuisse episcopos, et omnino retinendos, ne mille pestiferæ sectæ et hereses in Anglia pullularent." O vafrum et versipellem! adeone te etiam in sacris non puduit desultorem agere, propè dixeram, ecclesiam prodere; cujus tu ideò sanctissima instituta tanto strepitu asseruisse videris, ut quoties tibi commodum esset, eo majore cum infamia ea ipsa ludificari atque subvertere posses. Neminem hoc latet, cùm regni ordines, ecclesiæ nostræ, ad exemplum cæterarum, reformandæ studio flagrantes, episcopatum funditùs tollere statuissent, primò regem intercessisse, dein bellum nobis eâ potissimùm causâ intulisse; quod ipsi tandem in perniciem vertit. I nunc, et te defensorem regium esse gloriare, qui, ut regem gnaviter defendas, susceptam à temetipso ecclesiæ causam nunc palàm prodis atque oppugnas: cujus gravissimâ quidem censurâ esses notandus. De forma autem reipub. nostræ, quoniam tu, professor triobolaris et extraneus, remotis capsulis atque scriniis tuis nugarum refertissimis, quas meliùs in ordinem redigere poteras, in aliena repub. satagere et odiosus esse mavis, sic breviter tibi, vel cuivis potiùs te prudentiori, respondeo; eam formam esse quam nostra tempora atque dissidia ferunt; non qualis optanda esset, sed qualem obstinata improborum civium discordia esse patitur. Quæ autem respublica factionibus laborat, atque armis se tuetur, si sanæ et integræ tantùm partis rationem habet, cæteros sive plebeios sive optimates præterit aut excludit, satis profectò æqua est; quamvis regem et proceres, suis ipsa malis edocta, ampliùs nolit. "Concilium" autem illud "supremum," quòd insectaris, atque etiam "concilii præsidem," næ tu ridiculus es; concilium enim illud, quod somnias, non est supremum, sed parlamenti authoritate ad certum duntaxat tempus constitutum, quadraginta virorum ex suo ferè numero, quorum quilibet, cæterorum suffragiis, præses esse potest. Semper autem hoc usitatissimum fuit, ut parlamentum, qui noster senatus est, delectos ex suorum numero pauciores, quoties visum erat, constitueret: iis unum in locum ubivis conveniendi, et veluti minoris cujusdam habendi senatûs, potestas delata est. Iisdem res sæpè gravissimæ, quo celeriùs et majori cum silentio transigerentur, commissæ atque creditæ; classis, exercitus, ærarii cura aut procuratio, quævis denique pacis aut belli munia. Hoc, sive concilium nominetur, sive quid aliud, verbo fortè novum, re antiquum est; et sine quo nulla omnino respub. rectè administrari potest. De regis autem supplicio, et rerum apud nos conversione, mitte vociferari, mitte virus illud tuum acerbitatis evomere; donec ista "quâ lege, quo jure, quo judicio" facta sint, te licèt repugnante, singulis capitibus ostendam, et pedem conferam. Si tamen instas "quo jure, quâ lege," eâ, inquam, lege quam Deus ipse et natura sanxit, ut omnia, quæ reipub. salutaria essent, legitima et justa haberentur. Sic olim sapientes tui similibus responderunt. "Leges per tot annos ratas refixisse" nos criminaris; bonasne an malas non dicis, nec si diceres audiendus esses, nam nostræ leges ole quid ad te? Utinam plures refixissent tum leges, tum leguleios; rectiùs sanè et rei christianæ et populo consuluissent Frendes quòd "hæc, Manii, terræ-filii, vix domi nobiles, vix suis noti, licere sibi crediderint." Meminisses quæ te non solùm libri sacri, sed etiam lyricus doceat.

Sic etiam habeto; eorum, quos tu vix nobiles esse aîs, alios nulli vestrarum partium vel generis nobilitate cedere; alios ex se natos per industriam atque virtutem ad veram nobilitatem iter affectare, et cum nobilissimis quibusque posse conferri; se autem malle "filios terræ" dici, modò suæ, et domi strenuè facere, quam sine terra et lare fumos vendendo, quod tu facis, homo nihili et stramineus eques, in aliena terra dominorum nutu et stipendio famem tolerare: ab ista, mihi crede, peregrinatione ad agnatos potiùs et gentiles deducendus, nisi hoc unum saperes, quòd frivolas quasdam prælectiones et nugamenta scis tantâ mercede apud exteros effutire. Reprehendis quòd magistratus nostri "colluviem omnium sectarum recipiant;" quid ni recipiant? quos ecclesiæ est è cœtu fidelium ejicere, non magistratuum è civitate pellere; siquidem in leges civiles non peccant. Primò homines, ut tutò ac liberè sine vi atque injuriis vitam agerent, convenere in civitatem; ut sanctè et religiosè, in ecclesiam; illa leges, hæc disciplinam habet suam, planè diversam: hinc toto orbe christiano per tot annos bellum ex bello seritur, quòd magistratus et ecclesia inter se officia confundunt. Quapropter et papisticam minimè toleramus; neque enim eam tam esse religionem intelligimus, quàm obtentu religionis tyrannidem pontificiam civilis potentiæ spoliis ornatam, quæ contra ipsum Christi institutum ad se rapuit. "Independentes," quales à te solo finguntur, nulli apud nos unquam visi; præter eos duntaxat qui, cùm classes et synodos supra ecclesiam quamque singularem esse non agnoscant, eas omnes velut hierarchiæ particulas quasdam, aut certè truncum ipsum, eradicandas esse tecum sentiunt. Hinc nomen Independentium apud vulgus obtinuit. Quod restat; video te id agere, ut regum omnium et monarcharum non invidiam solùm, sed etiam bellum atrocissimum, in nos concites. Olim rex Mithridates, quamvìs causâ dissimili, omnes reges in Romanos concitabat, eadem propè calumniatus; Romanis consilium esse, omnia regna subvertere, iis nulla humana neque divina obstare, à principio nihil nisi partum armis habuisse, latrones, regnorum maximè hostes: hæc Mithridates regi Arsaci: te verò in illa tua exedra infantissimè rhetoricantem quæ fiducia provexit, ut ad bellum hortando, et licèt nolis videri, "classicum canendo," ullum vel inter pueros regem commovere te posse animum induceres; isto præsertim ore tam exili et rancidulo, ut ne mures quidem Homericos, te buccinatore, bellum unquam ranunculis illaturos fuisse credam? Tantum abest ut metuam quid tu belli nobis aut periculi, homo ignavissime, apud exteros reges istâ tuâ rabidâ et insulsâ simul facundiâ conflare possis: qui ad illos, ac si "regum capita" quasi "pilas habeamus, de coronis quasi trocho ludamus, sceptra imperialia non pluris faciamus quàm bacula morionum capitata," lusoriè sanè nos defers. At tu interea, stultissimum caput, morionis ipse baculo dignissimus es, qui reges ac principes tam puerilibus argumentis ad bellum suaderi putes. Omnes deinde populos inclamas, dicto audientes tuo, sat scio, minimè futuros. Hibernorum etiam consceleratam illam ac barbaram colluviem regiis partibus in auxilium vocas. Quod unicum indicio esse potest. quàm scelestus sis et væcors, quàm omnes penè mortales impietate, audacia, et furore, superes, qui devotæ gentis fidem atque opem implorare non dubitas, cujus ab impia societate, tot civium innocentissimorum sanguine perfusa, etiam rex ipse aut abhorruit semper, aut abhorrere se simulavit. Et quam ille perfidiam, quam ille crudelitatem occultare, quantum potuit, atque ab se longè amovere, summo studio contendit, eam tu, bipedum nequissime, quo minùs ultrò atque palàm suscipias, neque Deum neque homines vereris. Agedum; Hibernis igitur fautoribus ac sociis ad defensionem regis jam te accinge. Caves imprimis, quod cauto mèhercule opus erat, nequis te Tullio fortasse aut Demostheni omnem eloquentiæ laudem præreptum ire suspicaretur; et prædicis, "oratorio more non tibi agendum videri." Næ tu haud stultè sapis; id quod non potes, non videtur tibi esse agendum; oratoriè autem ut tu ageres, quis, qui te satìs novit, unquam expectavit? qui nihil elaboratè, nihil distinctè, nihil quod sapiat, in lucem emittere aut soles aut potes; sed veluti Crispinus alter, aut Tzetzes ille græculus, modò ut multum scribas, quàm rectè, non laboras; neque si labores valeas. "Agetur," inquis, "hæc causa, toto orbe audiente, et quasi ad judicandum sedente." Id adeò nobis pergratum est, ut adversarium non cerebrosum et imperitum, qualis tu es, sed cordatum et intelligentem dari jam nobis optemus. Perorans planè tragicus es, immò Ajax ipse Lorarius: "Horum ego injustitiam, impietatem, perfidiam, crudelitatem, proclamabo cœlo et terræ, ipsosque authores convictos posteris tradam, reosque peragam." O Flosculos! Tunc igitur sine sale, sine genio, proclamator et rabula, bonis authoribus divexandis tantùm aut transcribendis natus, quicquam de tuo quod vivat producere te putas posse? quem unà cum scriptis tuis futilissimis abreptum ætas, mihi crede, proxima oblivioni mandabit. Nisi si defensio hæc regia suo fortasse responso aliquid debitura est, si neglecta jam pridem et consopita, in manus iterum sumatur. Idque ego ab illustrissimis Hollandiæ Ordinibus peterem, ut eam è fisco protinus dimissam, neque enim thesaurus est, pervagari, quò velit, sinant. Si enim qua vanitate, inscitia, falsitate, referta sit, planum omnibus fecero, quò latiùs excurrit, eò arctiùs, meâ quidem sententiâ, supprimitur. Jam nos quemadmodum "reos peragat," videamus.

DEFENSIO PRO POPULO ANGLICANO,

CONTRA

CLAUDII SALMASII DEFENSIONEM REGIAM.

CAPUT I.

Quoniam tibi, vano homini et ventoso, multum hinc forsitan superbiæ, Salmasi, multum spiritûs accessit, magnæ scilicet Britanniæ regem fidei defensorem esse, te verò regis, ego quidem et illum regi titulum, et hunc tibi jure pari ac merito concedam: cum sanè rex fidem, tu regem sic defenderis, ut causam uterque suam evertisse potiùs videatur. Quod cum passim infrà, tum hoc primo capite ostendam. Dixeras tu quidem præfationis paginâ duodecimâ "ornari pigmentis rhetoricis tam bonam et justam causam non debere: nam simpliciter rem, ut gesta est, narrare, regem defendere est." Quando igitur toto hoc capite, in quo narrationem illam simplicem futuram pollicitus eras, neque rem simpliciter, ut gesta est, narras, neque non pigmentis, quantum in eo genere consequi potes, rhetoricis ornas, profectò vel tuo judicio si standum esset, causa regia neque bona neque justa erit. Quanquam hoc cave tibi sumas quod dat nemo, posse te quicquam rhetoricè narrare; qui neque oratoris, neque historici, immò ne caussidici quidem partes narrando sustinere potes; sed quasi circulator quispiam, arte circumforanea, magnam de te in prœmio, velut in posterum diem, expectationem concitabas, non tam ut rem promissam tum demùm narrares, quàm ut pigmenta illa misera, et ampullas fuco refertas, lectoribus quàm plurimis divenderes. Nam "de facto dicturus tot novitatum monstris te circundari ac terreri sentis, ut quid primum exequaris, quid deinde, quid postremò, nescias." Hoccine est simpliciter narrare? Dicam quod res est, tot tuorum ipse mendaciorum monstris primum terreri te sentis, deinde tot nugis, tot ineptiis levissimum illud caput non "circundari" solùm, sed circumagi, "ut quid primum, quid deinde, quid postremò" dicendum ullo tempore sit, non modò nunc "nescias," sed nunquam antea non nesciveris. "Inter difficultates quæ occurrunt ad exprimendam tam incredibilis flagitii immanitatem hoc unum facile dictu suppetit, quod iterum iterumque repeti debet," nempe "solem ipsum atrocius factum nunquam adspexisse alterum." Multa sol aspexit, bone magister, quæ Bernardus non vidit. Solem autem iterum atque iterum repetas licebit, id tu quidem prudenter feceris, quod non nostra flagitia, sed defensionis tuæ frigus vehementissimè postulabit. "Regum," inquis, "origo cum sole novo cœpit." Dii te, Damasippe, deæque solstitio donent, quo te calfacias, qui ne pedem sine "sole;" nequis fortasse te umbraticum doctorem esse dicat. At hercle etiam in tenebris es, qui jus patrium à regio non distinguis: et cum reges patriæ patres nominaveris, eâ statim metaphorâ persuasisse credis, ut quicquid de patre non negaverim, id continuò de rege verum esse concedam. Pater et rex diversissima sunt. Pater nos genuit; at non rex nos, sed nos regem creavimus. Patrem natura dedit populo, regem ipse populus dedit sibi; non ergò propter regem populus, sed propter populum rex est; ferimus patrem, morosum etiam et durum, ferimus et regem; sed ne patrem quidem ferimus tyrannum. Pater si filium interficit, capite pœnas dabit: cur non item rex eadem justissima lege tenebitur, si populum, id est, filios suos, perdiderit? præsertim cùm pater, ut ne pater sit, efficere non possit, rex facilè possit, ut neque pater sit neque rex. Quod si "de facti qualitate," quod aîs, "indè" æstimandum est, tibi dico, peregrine, et rebus nostris alienissime, testis oculatus et indigena tibi dico; nos regem neque "bonum," neque "justum," neque "clementum," neque "religiosum," neque "pium," neque "pacificum;" sed hostem prope decennalem; nec parentem patriæ, sed vastatorem, "de medio sustulisse." "Solet hoc fieri," fateris, inficias enim ire non audes, "sed non à reformatis, regi reformato." Siquidem reformatus is dici potest, qui, scriptis ad papam literis, sanctissimum appellaverat patrem, qui papistis æquior semper quàm orthodoxis fuit. Talis cùm fuerit, ne suæ quidem familiæ primus à reformatis est "de medio" sublatus. Quid? ejus avia Maria nonne à reformatis exuto regno solum vertere coacta est, supplicio demùm capitis affecta, ne Scotis quidem reformatis ægrè ferentibus? immo si operam contulisse dicam, haud mentiar. In tanta autem regum "reformatorum" paucitate, nihil hujusmodi accidisse, ut eorum aliquis morte plecteretur, non est quod miremur. Licere autem regem nequam, sive tyrannum, regno pellere, vel supplicio quovis, prout meritus erit, punire, (etiam summorum sententiâ theologorum, qui ipsi reformandæ ecclesiæ authores fuere,) aude tu modò negare. Concedis quàm plurimos reges non sicca morte periisse, hunc "gladio," illum "veneno," alium squalore "carceris," aut "laqueo." Omnium tamen hoc tibi miserrimum videtur, et monstri quiddam simile, regem in judicium adduci, "causam capitis dicere coactum, condemnatum, securi percussum." Dic mihi, homo insipientissime, annon humanius, annon æquius, annon ad legis omnium civitatum accommodatius est, cujuscunque criminis reum in judicio sistere, suî defendendi copiam facere, lege condemnatum ad mortem haud immeritam ducere, itâ ut damnato vel pœnitendi, vel se colligendi, spatium detur, quàm statim ut prehensus est, indictâ causâ, pecudis in modum mactare? Quotusquisque est reorum, qui, si optio detur, non illo potiùs quàm hoc modo puniri se maluerit? Quæ ratio igitur animadvertendi in civem moderatior est habita, cur non eadem in regem quoque moderatior, et vel ipsi regi acceptior, fuisse existimanda est? Tu secretò et sine arbitris extinctum regem malebas, vel ut exempli tam boni salubritate omnis memoria careret, vel ut facti tam præclari conscientia defugisse lucem, aut leges atque ipsam justitiam minimè sibi amicam habuisse, videretur. Exaggeras deinde rem, quòd neque per tumultum aut factionem optimatium, aut rebellium furorem, sive militum sive populi; non odio, non metu, non studio dominandi, non cæco animi impetu, sed consilio et ratione, meditatum diu facinus peregerint. O meritò quidem ex te jurisconsulto grammaticum! qui ab accidentibus causæ, ut loquuntur, quæ per se nihil valent, vituperationes instituis, cum nondum docueris illud facinus in vitio an in laude ponendum sit: jam vide quàm in te facilè incurram. Si pulchrum et decorum fuit; eò magis laudandi quòd, nullis affectibus occupati, solius honestatis causâ fecerint; si arduum et grave, quòd non cæco impetu, sed consilio et ratione. Quanquam ego hæc divino potiùs instinctu gesta esse crediderim, quoties memoriâ repeto, quàm inopinato animorum ardore, quanto consensu totus exercitus, cui magna pars populi se adjunxerat, ab omnibus penè regni provinciis una voce regem ipsum suorum omnium malorum authorem ad supplicium deposcebat. Quicquid erat, sive magistrum sive populum spectes, nulli unquam excelsiore animo, et, quod etiam adversarii fatentur, sedatiore, tam egregium facinus et vel heröicis ætatibus dignum, aggressi sunt: quo non leges tantùm et judicia, dehinc mortalibus ex æquo restituta, sed ipsam justitiam nobilitârunt, séque ipsâ illustriorem dehinc, séque ipsâ majorem post hoc insigne judicium, reddidere. Jam tertiam prope hujus capitis paginam exantlavimus, nec tamen illa simplex narratio, quam promisit, usquam apparet. Queritur nos docere, "quoties rex molestè et odiosè regnat, impunè posse regno exui: ab hac," inquit, "doctrina inducti, si mille rebus meliorem regem habuissent, non ei vitam conservâssent." Spectate hominis acumen; nam istuc aveo ex te scire, quo pacto hoc sequitur, nisi tu nobis concesseris, nostro rege mille rebus meliorem molestè et odiosè regnare; unde in eum deductus es locum, ut hunc quem defendis, iis regibus qui molestè et odiosè regnant mille rebus deteriorem facias; id est tyrannorum omnium fortasse immanissimum. Macti estote reges tam strenuo defensore. Nunc narrare incipit. "Torserunt eum variis crucibus." Dic quibus. "De carcere in carcerem traduxerunt." Nec injuriâ, quippe ex tyranno hostem bello captum. "Custodiis sæpè mutatis:" ne ipsæ mutarent fidem. "Libertatis interdum spe ostensa, interdum et restitutionis per pactionem." Vide quàm non antea meditatum nobis fuerit, quam non "tempora et modos" diu captavimus regis abdicandi. Quas res ab eo tum propemodùm victore multo antè postulavimus, quæ nisi concederentur, nulla libertas, nulla salus populo speranda erat, easdem à captivo suppliciter, haud semel, immò ter et ampliùs petivimus; toties repulsam accepimus. Cum nulla de rege spes reliqua esset, fit parlamenti consultum illud nobile, nequa deinceps ad regem postulata mitterentur; non ex quo is tyrannus esse, sed ex quo insanabilis esse, cœpit. Postea tamen quidam ex senatorum numero nova sibi consilia capientes, et idoneum tempus nacti, conditiones iterum regi ferendas decernunt; pari sanè scelere atque dementia ac Romanus olim senatus, reclamante Marco Tullio et cum eo bonis omnibus, legatos decrevit ad Antonium: pari etiam eventu, nisi Deo immortali visum aliter fuisset, illos in servitutem tradere, nos in libertatem vindicare. Nam cùm rex nihilo plus quàm antea concessisset, quod ad firmam pacem et compositionem revera spectaret, illi tamen satisfactum sibi à rege esse statuunt. Pars itaque sanior, cùm se remque publicam prodi videret, fidem fortissimi et semper reipub. fidissimi exercitûs implorat. In quo mihi quidem hoc solum occurrit quod nolim dicere, nostras legiones rectiora sensisse quàm patres conscriptos: et salutem reipub. armis attulisse, quam illi suis suffragiis propè damnaverant. Multa deinde flebiliter narrat, verùm tam inscitè, ut luctum emendicare, non commovere, videatur. Dolet, quòd "eo modo, quo nullus unquam, rex supplicium capitis passus sit:" cùm sæpiùs affirmaverit, nullum unquam regem supplicium capitis omnino esse passum. Tunc, fatue, modum cum modo conferre soles, ubi factum cum facto quod conferas non habes? "Supplicium," inquit, "capitis passus est, ut latro, ut sicarius, ut parricida, ut proditor, ut tyrannus." Hoccine est regem defendere, an sententiam de rege ferre, eâ sanè quæ à nobis lata est, multò severiorem? quis te tam subitò pellexit ut nobiscum pronuntiares? Queritur "personatos carnifices regi caput amputâsse." Quid hoc homine facias? questus est suprà "de parricidio in persona regis admisso," nunc in persona carnificis admissum queritur. Quid reliqua percurram, partim falsissima, partim frivola "de pugnis et calcibus" militum gregariorum, et licentiâ "spectandi cadaveris quatuor solidis taxatâ," quæ frigidissimi literatoris inscitiam et pusillitatem animi clamitant; legentem certè neminem pilo tristiorem reddere possunt: satius mehercule fuisset Carolo filio, quemvis ex eo balatronum grege conduxisse, qui ad coronam in triviis elegidia cantant, quàm oratorem hunc, (luctificabilem dicam, an perridiculum?) deplorando patris infortunio adhibuisse; tam insipidum et insulsum, ut ne ex lacrymis quidem ejus mica salis exiguissima possit exprimi. Narrare jam desiit; et quid deinde agat, dictu sanè difficile est; adeò lutulentus et enormis fluit; nunc fremit, nunc oscitat, nullum quidlibet garriendi modum sibi statuit, vel decies eadem repetendi, quæ ne semel quidem dicta non sordescerent. Et certè nescio, an blateronis cujuspiam extemporales quælibet nugæ, quas ille uno pede stans versiculis fortè effuderit, non digniores multo sint quæ chartâ illinantur; adeò indignissimas esse reor quibus seriò respondeatur. Prætereo quòd regem "religionis protectorem" laudat, qui ecclesiæ bellum intulit, ut episcopos religionis hostes et tyrannos in ecclesia retineret. "Puritatem autem religionis" qui potuit is conservare, ab impurissimis episcoporum traditionibus et cæremoniis ipse sub jugum missus? "Sectarum" verò, quibus tu "sacrilegos suos cœtus tenendi licentiam" aîs "dari," quam ipsa Hollandia non dat, errores velim enumeres: interim nemo te magis sacrilegus, qui perpetuò maledicendi pessimam omnium licentiam tibi sumis. "Non poterant graviùs rempubl. lædere quàm ejus dominum tollendo." Disce, verna, disce, mastigia, nisi dominum tollis, tollis rempublicam: privata res est, non publica quæ dominum habet. "At pastores facinus eorum abominantes cum summa injustitia persequuntur." Pastores illos nequis fortè nesciat quales sint, breviter dicam; iidem sunt qui regi resistendum armis esse, et verbo et scriptis docuerunt; qui omnes tanquam Merozum indesinenter execrari non destiterunt, quotquot huic bello aut arma, aut pecuniam, aut vires, non suppeditâssent; quod illi non contra regem, sed contra tyrannum Saule quovis aut Achabo, immo Nerone ipso, Neroniorem susceptum esse in concionibus sacris vaticinabantur. Sublatis episcopis et sacerdotibus, quos pluralistarum et non residentium nomine insectari vehementissimè solebant, in eorum amplissima sacerdotia, hic bina, ille trina, quàm ocyssimè irruebant: unde suos greges quàm turpiter negligant pastores isti meritò egregii nemo non videt: nullus pudor, nulla numinis reverentia, dementes cupiditate et furiatos cohibere potuit, donec pessimo ecclesiæ publico eâdem ipsi infamiâ flagrarent, quam paulò antè sacerdotibus inusserant. Nunc quòd avaritia eorum nondum satiata est, quòd inquies ambitione animus turbas concire, pacem odisse, consuevit, in magistratus qui nunc sunt, id quod priùs in regem fecerant, seditiosè concionari non desinunt; regem scilicet pium crudeliter sublatum; quem modò ipsi diris omnibus devotum, omni authoritate regia spoliandum, et bello sacro persequendum, in manus parlamento, quasi divinitùs, tradiderant; sectas scilicet non extirpari, quod certè à magistratibus postulare perabsurdum est, qui avaritiam et ambitionem, quæ duæ in ecclesia hæreses perniciosissimæ sunt, ex ipsorum ordine pastorum ac tribu, nullo adhuc modo aut ratione extirpare valuerunt. Quas illi sectas apud nos insectantur, obscuras esse scio, quas ipsi sequuntur, famosas, et ecclesiæ Dei longè periculosiores; quarum principes Simon ille Magus et Diotrephes fuere. Hos tamen, nequissimi cùm sint, adeò non persequimur, ut factiosis, et res novas quotidie molientibus nimiùm indulgeamus. Offendit jam te Gallum et errabundum, quod Angli "suis molossis," quæ tua canina facundia est, "ferociores," nullam "legitimi successoris et hæredis" regni, nullam "natu minimi," nullam "reginæ Bohemiæ" rationem habuerint. Tute respondebis tibi, non ego. "Ubi reipub. forma mutatur ex monarchica in aliam, non datur successio inter differentis regiminis curatores." Apparat. de Primatu. "Minima," inquis, "regni unius pars" hæc omnia "per tria regna" effecit: et digni quidem, si hoc verum esset, quibus in cæteros imperium sit, viris in fœminas. "Isti sunt qui regimen regni antiquum in alium qui à pluribus tyrannis teneatur, mutare præsumpserunt;" rectè quidem illi et feliciter; quos tu reprehendere non potes, quin simul fœdissimè barbarus et solœcus sis, non moribus solum, sed syntaxi etiam, grammaticorum opprobrium. "Angli maculam hanc nunquam deleverint." Immò tu, licèt omnium literatorum litura ipse sis, et verè macula, Anglorum tamen famam et sempiternam gloriam nunquam valueris commaculare. Qui tanta animi magnitudine, quanta omni memoriâ vix audita est, non hostes tantùm armatos, sed hostiles intus, id est, superstitiosas vulgi opiniones eluctati atque supergressi, liberatorum cognomen posthac per omnes gentes in commune sibi pepercerunt: populariter id ausi, quod apud alias nationes herôicæ tantùm virtutis esse existimatur. "Reformati et antiqui christiani" quid hac in parte fecerint, aut facturi essent, tum respondebimus, cùm de jure tecum suo loco agetur; ne tuo vitio laboremus, qui gerrones omnes et battos loquacitate vincis. Quæris quid sis in nostra causa Jesuitis responsurus. Tuas res age, transfuga; pudeat te facinorum tuorum, quando ecclesiam tuî pudet; qui primatum papæ, et episcopos, tam jactanter modò et ferociter adortus, nunc episcoporum assecla factus es. Fateris "aliquos reformatorum," quos non nominas, (ego tamen nominabo, quoniam tu eos "Jesuitis longè pejores esse" aîs, Lutherum nempe, Zuinglium, Calvinum, Bucerum, Paræum, cum aliis multis,) docuisse, "amovendum esse" tyrannum: "quis autem sit tyrannus ad judicium sapientium et doctorum se retulisse. Isti vero qui? an sapientes, an docti, an virtute nobiles, an nobilitate illustres." Liceat, quæso, populo, qui servitutis jugum in cervicibus grave sentit, tam sapienti esse, tam docto, tamque nobili, ut sciat quid tyranno suo faciendum sit, etiamsi neque exteros, neque grammaticos sciscitatum mittat. Tyrannum autem fuisse hunc, non Angliæ solùm et Scotiæ parlamenta cùm verbis tum factis disertissimis declaraverunt, sed totus ferè utriusque regni populus assentitus est; donec episcoporum technis et fraudibus in duas postea factiones discessit. Quid si Deus, quemadmodum eos qui lucis evangelicæ participes fiant, ità eos qui decreta ejus in reges hujus mundi potentissimos exequantur, non multos sapientes aut doctos, non multos potentes, non multos nobiles esse voluit? ut per eos qui non sunt aboleret eos qui sunt; ut ne glorietur caro coram eo. Tu quis es qui oblatras? an doctus? qui spicilegia, qui lexica et glossaria ad senectutem usque trivisse potiùs videris, quàm authores bonos cum judicio aut fructu perlegisse? unde nîl præter codices, et varias lectiones, et luxatum et mendosum, crepas; doctrinæ solidioris ne guttulam quidem hausisse te ostendis. An tu sapiens? qui de minutiis minutissimis rixari et mendicorum bella gerere soles, qui nunc astronomis, nunc medicis, in sua arte credendis, imperitus ipse et rudis, convitia dicis; qui, siquis tibi voculæ unius aut literulæ in exemplari quovis ab te restitutæ gloriolam præripere conaretur, igni et aquâ, si posses, illi interdiceres? Et tamen stomacharis, et tamen ringeris, quòd omnes te grammaticum appellant. Hamondum, nuper regis hujus sacellanum imprimis dilectissimum, in libro quodam nugatorio, nebulonem appellas, quòd is te grammaticum appellavisset: idem, credo, esses ipsi regi convitium facturus, et defensionem hanc totam retractaturus, si sacellani sui de te judicium approbâsse audivisses. Jam vide quàm te Anglorum unus, quos tu "fanaticos, indoctos, obscuros, improbos," vocitare audes, contemnam et ludibrio habeam, (nam nationem ipsam Anglicanam de te quicquam publicè cogitare curculiunculo, indignissimum esset,) qui sursùm, deorsùm, quoquoversùm versatus et volutatus, nihil nisi grammaticus es: immo ac si Deo cuilibet votum ipso Midâ stultius nuncupâsses, quicquid attrectas, nisi cùm solœcismos facis, grammatica est. Quisquis igitur "de fæce illa plebis," quam tu exagitas, (illos enim verè optimates nostros, quorum sapientiam, virtutem, et nobilitatem, facta inclyta satis testantur, non sic dehonestabo, ut te illis, aut tibi illos componere velim,) quisquis, inquam, de fæce illa plebis hoc tantummodò sibi persuaserit, non esse se regibus natum, sed Deo et patriæ, multò sanè te doctior, multò sapientior, multò probior, et ad omnem vitam utilior, existimandus erit. Nam doctus ille sine literis, tu literatus sine doctrina; qui tot linguas calles, tot volumina percurris, tot scribis, et tamen pecus es.

CAPUT II.

Quod argumentum pro se "indubitatum" esse, superiore capite perorans dixerat Salmasius, "rem ità se habere ut creditur, cum omnes unanimiter idem de ea sentiant;" quod tamen is "de facto" falsissimè affirmabat, id ego nunc, de jure regio disceptaturus, potero in ipsum verissimè affirmare. Cum enim regem definiat, "cujus suprema est in regno potestas, nulli alii nisi Deo obnoxia, cui quod libet licet, qui legibus solutus est," siquidem id definiri dicendum est, quod infinitum in terris ponitur: evincam ego contrà, non meis tantùm, sed vel ipsius testimoniis, et rationibus, nullam gentem aut populum, qui quidem ullo numero sit, nam omnem penetrare barbariem necesse non est, nullam, inquam, gentem istiusmodi jura aut potestatem regi concessisse, "ut legibus solutus esset, ut quod libet liceret, ut omnes judicaret, à nemine judicaretur;" nec verò ullum, cujuscunque gentis tam servili ingenio exstitisse puto, præter unum Salmasium, qui tyrannorum immania quæque flagitia regum jura esse asseverârit. Eorum plerique apud nos, qui regi maximè favebant, ab hac tam turpi sententia semper abhorruere; quinetiam ipse, nondum pretio corruptus, his de rebus longè aliter sensisse aliis jampridem scriptis facilè deprehenditur. Adeò ut hæc non ab homine libero in libera civitate, nedum in repub. nobilissima, et Batavorum academia celeberrima, sed in ergastulo quovis aut catastra, tam servili vernilitate scripta esse videantur. Etenim, si quicquid regi libet, id jure regio licitum erit, (quod teterrimus ille Antoninus Caracalla, ab Julia noverca per incestum edoctus, non statim ausus est credere,) nemo profectò est, aut unquam fuit, qui tyrannus dici debeat. Cùm enim divina omnia atque humana jura violavit, nihilo tamen minùs rex, jure regio insons erit. Quid enim peccavit homo æquissimus? jure suo usus est in suos. Nihil rex tam horrendum, tam crudele, támque furiosum, committere in suos potest, quod præter jus regium fieri quispiam possit queri aut expostulare. Hoc "tu jus regium à jure gentium, vel potiùs naturali, originem habere" statuis, bellua? Quid enim hominem te dicam, qui in omne hominum genus adeò iniquus et inhumanus es; quique omnem gentem humanam, Deo simillimam, sic deprimere atque projicere conaris, ut quos nunc superstitio, nunc scelus aut ignavia quorundam, aut denique perfidia, tam feros atque immites dominos gentibus imposuit, eos à natura matre mitissima comparatos atque impositos esse doceas. Quâ tu nefariâ doctrinâ multò jam ferociores factos, non solùm ad proterendos omnes mortales, et posthac miseriorem in modum conculcandos, immittis, sed jure naturali, jure regio, ipsis etiam populi legibus, in populum armare, quo nihil simul stultius et sceleratius esse potest, contendis. Dignus profectò qui, contrà atque olim Dionysius, ex grammatico tyrannus ipse sis; non quo tibi in alium quemvis detur illa regia licentia malè faciendi, sed illa altera malè pereundi: quâ solâ, ut inclusus ille Capreis Tiberius, à temetipso perditus quotidie te sentias perire. Verùm jus illud regium paulò accuratiùs quale sit consideremus. "Sic oriens totus," inquis, "judicavit, sic occidens." Non reponam tibi quod Aristoteles et Marcus Cicero, authores, si qui alii, cordatissimi, ille in Politicis, hic in oratione de provinciis scripsit, gentes Asiaticas facilè servitutem pati, Judæos autem et Syros servituti natos fuisse: fateor paucos ferè libertatem velle, aut ea posse uti, solos nempe sapientes, et magnanimos; pars longè maxima justos dominos mavult, sed tamen justos; injustos et intolerabiles ferendi, neque Deus unquam universo generi humano tam infensus fuit, neque ullus unquam populus tam ab omni spe et consilio derelictus, ut necessitatem hanc atque legem, omnium durissimam, in se atque in suos liberos ultrò statueret. Profers imprimis "verba regis in Ecclesiaste sapientiâ clari." Nos itaque ad legem Dei provocamus, de rege posteriùs videbimus; cujus exinde sententiam rectiùs intelligemus. Audiatur ipse Deus, Deut. 17. "Cum ingressus fueris in terram, quam Jehova Deus dat tibi, et dices, statuam super me Regem, sicut omnes gentes quæ sunt circa me:" Quod ego omnes velim etiam atque etiam animadvertant, teste hìc ipso Deo, penes populos omnes ac nationes arbitrium semper fuisse, vel ea, quæ placeret, forma reipub. utendi, vel hanc in aliam mutandi: de Hebræis disertè hoc dicit Deus, de reliquis haud abnuit: deinde formam reipub. monarchia perfectiorem, ut sunt res humanæ, suique populi magìs ex usu Deo visam esse: cum hanc ipse formam instituerit; monarchiam non nisi serò petentibus, idque ægrè, concederet. Sin regem planè vellent, ut ostenderet Deus id se liberum populo reliquisse, ab uno an à pluribus respub. administraretur, modò justè, regi etiam futuro leges constituit, quibus cautum erat, ut "ne multiplicet sibi equos, ne uxores, ne divitias;" ut intelligeret nihil sibi in alios licere, qui nihil de se statuere extra legem potuit. Jussus itaque est "omnia legis illius præcepta," etiam suâ manu perscribere; perscripta "observare; ne efferatur animus ejus præ fratribus suis." Ex quo perspicuum est, regem æquè ac populum istis legibus astrictum fuisse. In hanc ferme sententiam scripsit Josephus, legum suæ gentis interpres idoneus, in sua repub. versatissimus, mille aliis tenebrionibus Rabbinis anteponendus. Antiquitat. lib. 4. Ἀριστοκρατία μὲν οὖν κράτιστον, &c. "Optimum est," inquit, "optimatium regimen; nec vos alium reipub. statum requiratis; satis enim est Deùm habere præsidem. Attamen si tanta vos regis cupido ceperit, plus legibus et Deo tribuatis, quàm suæ sapientiæ; prohibeatur autem, si potentior fieri studet, quàm rebus vestris expedit." Hæc et plura Josephus in istum Deuteronomii locum. Alter, Philo Judæus, gravis author, Josephi coætaneus, legis Mosaïcæ studiosissimus, in quam universam diffusa commentatione scripsit, cum in libro de creatione principis hoc caput legis interpretatur, non alio pacto regem legibus solvit, atque hostis quilibet solutus legibus dici possit, τοὺς ἐπὶ λύμῃ καὶ ζημίᾳ τῶν ὑπηκόων, &c. "qui," inquit, "ad perniciem et detrimentum populi magnam sibi acquirunt potentiam, non reges sed hostes appellandi sunt; ea facientes, quæ hostes nullâ pace reconciliandi faciunt; nam qui per speciem gubernandi faciunt injuriam, apertis hostibus pejores sunt; hos enim facile est propulsare, illorum autem malitia haud facilè detegitur." Detecti igitur, quid obstat quo minùs hostium loco habendi sint? Sic libro secundo Allegoriarum legis, "rex et tyrannus contraria sunt;" et deinde, "rex non imperat tantùm, sed paret." Vera sunt ista, dicet aliquis; regem oportet quidem leges, ut qui maximè, observare; verùm si secus fecerit, qua lege puniendus? eadem, inquam, lege qua cæteri; exceptiones enim nullas reperio. Sed nec de sacerdotibus, sed nec de infimis quidem magistratibus, puniendis lex ulla scribitur; qui omnes, cùm de iis puniendis nulla lex scripta sit, pari certè jure et ratione possent impunitatem scelerum omnium sibi vendicare; quam tamen neque eorum quisquam vendicavit, neque ullum iis arbitror idcirco esse daturum. Hactenus ex ipsa Dei lege didicimus regem legibus obtemperare debuisse; nec se præ cæteris efferre, qui etiam fratres ejus sunt. Nunc an quid aliud Ecclesiastes moneat videamus. Cap. 8. ver. 1, &c. "Mandatum regis observa; vel propter juramentum Dei, ne perturbatè à facie ejus abito, ne persistito in re mala, nam quicquid volet faciet. Ubi verbum regis, ibi dominatio; et quis dicat ei, quid facis?" Satis constat Ecclesiasten hoc in loco non synedrio magno, non senatui, sed privato cuique præcepta dare. Jubet mandata sua observare, vel propter juramentum Dei; at quis jurat regi, nisi rex vicissim in leges divinas atque patrias juratus sit? Sic Reubenitæ et Gaditæ obedientiam suam Jehosuæ pollicentur, Jos. 1. "Ut dicto audientes Mosi fuimus, ità erimus tibi, modò ut Deus tecum sit, quemadmodum fuit cum Mose." Conditionem vides expressam. Alioquin ipsum audi Ecclesiasten, cap. 9. "Verba sapientum submissa potiùs audienda esse, quàm clamorem dominantis inter stolidos." Quid porrò monet? "Ne persistito in re mala, nam quicquid volet faciet," in malos nimirum faciet authoritate legum armatus, nam leniter, aut severè agere, prout volet, potest. Nihil hìc tyrannicum sonat, nihil quod vir bonus extimescat. "Ubi verbum regis, ibi dominatio, et quis dicat ei, quid facis?" Et tamen legimus qui regi dixerit non solùm, quid fecisti, sed etiam, stultè fecisti. 1 Sam. 13. At Samuel extraordinarius. Tuum tibi regero, licèt infrà dictum pag. 49. "quid," inquis, "extraordinarium in Saule et Davide?" itidem ego, quid, inquam, in Samuele? Propheta fuit: sunt et illi hodie, qui ejus exemplo faciunt; ex voluntate enim Dei vel "expressâ" vel "tacitâ" agunt: quod etiam ipse infrà concedis, pag. 50. Prudenter igitur Ecclesiastes hòc in loco monet privatos, ne cum rege contendant: nam etiam cum divite, cum potenti quovis, ut plurimùm damnosa contentio est. Quid ergò? an optimates, an omnes reliqui magistratus, an populus universus, quoties delirare libet regi, ne hiscere quidem audebunt? an stolido, impio, furenti, bonis omnibus perniciem machinanti non obstabunt, non obviam ibunt, ne divina omnia atque humana pervertere occupet, ne rapinis, ne incendiis, ne cædibus, per omnes regni fines grassetur, ita "legibus solutus, ut quod libet liceat?" O de Cappadocis eques catastris! quem omnis libera natio (si unquam post hoc in natione libera pedem ponere audebis) aut in ultimas terras veluti portentum exportandum ejicere, aut servitutis candidatum dedere in pistrinum debebit, ea lege atque omine, ut si te inde exemerit, ipsa sub aliquo tyranno, eoque stultissimo, pro te molat. Quid enim poterit dici, aut ab aliis dictum peti, tam truculentum, aut ridiculum, quod in te non cadat? Perge modò: "Israëlitæ regem à Deo petentes eodem jure se ab eo gubernari velle dixerunt, quo omnes aliæ nationes, quæ hoc regimine uterentur. At orientis reges summo jure, et potestate non circumscripta regnabant, teste Virgilio.

—— Regem non sic Ægyptus et ingens
Lydia, nec populi Parthorum, et Medus Hydaspes Observant.——"

Primùm, quid nostra refert qualem sibi regem Israëlitæ voluerint, præsertim Deo irato, non solum quòd regem vellent ad exemplum gentium, et non suæ legis, sed planè quòd vellent regem? Deinde regem injustum, aut legibus solutum, petivisse credibile non est, qui Samuëlis filios legibus obstrictos ferre non potuerunt, et ab eorum tantùm avaritia ad regem confugerunt. Postremò, quod ex Virgilio recitas, non probat reges orientis "absoluta potestate" regnâsse; Apes enim illæ Virgilianæ, quæ vel Ægyptiis et Medis observantiores regum sunt, teste tamen eodem poëta—"Magnis agitant sub legibus ævum."—Non ergò sub regibus omni lege solutis. At vide quàm tibi minimè velim malè; cùm plerique te nebulonem esse judicent, ostendam te personam tantum nebulonis mutuam sumpsisse. In apparatu ad primatum papæ, doctores quosdam Tridentinos exemplo apium usos ais, ut monarchiam papæ probarent: ab his tu pari malitia hoc mutuum cepisti. Quod illis itaque respondisti cùm probus esses, jam factus nebulo tute respondebis tibi, tuaque tibi manu personam nebulonis detrahes. "Apium respub. est; atque ità physici appellant: Regem habent, sed innocuum; ductor est potiùs quàm tyrannus; non verberat, non vellicat, non necat apes subditas." Minimè igitur mirum, si ità observant. Istas mehercule apes malâ ave tibi tactio erat; Tridentinæ enim licèt sint, fucum te esse indicant. Aristoteles autem, rerum politicarum scriptor diligentissimus, monarchiæ genus Asiaticæ, quod et barbaricum vocat, κατα νόμον, id est, secundùm legem, fuisse affirmat. Pol. 3. Immo cum monarchiæ quinque species enumeret, quatuor secundum legem, et suffragante populo, fuisse scribit, tyrannicas autem, quòd iis tanta potestas, volente licèt populo, data erat; regnum verò laconicum maximè regnum videri, quòd non omnia penès regem erant. Quinta, quam is παμβασιλέιαν vocat, et ad quam solam id refert, quod tu regum omnium jus esse scribis, ut ad libitum regnent, ubinam gentium, aut quo tempore unquam obtinuerit, non dicit: nec aliam ob caussam fecisse mentionem ejus videtur, quàm ut absurdam, injustam, et maximè tyrannicam, esse demonstraret. Samuelem aïs, cùm eos ab eligendo rege deterreret, "jus illis regium" exposuisse. Unde haustum, à lege Dei? at illa lex jus regium, ut vidimus, longè aliud exhibuit: an ab ipso Deo per Samuëlem loquente? at improbavit, vituperavit, vitio dedit: non igitur jus regium divinitùs datum, sed morem regnandi pravissimum, superbiâ regum et dominandi libidine arreptum exposuit propheta; nec quid debebant reges, sed quid volebant facere; rationem enim regis populo indicavit, sicut antea rationem sacerdotum Eliadarum eodem verbo (quod tu p. 33, Hebraïco etiam solœcismo משפט vocas) suprà indicaverat. C. 2. "ratio sacerdotum istorum cum populo hæc erat, v. 13." impia videlicet, odiosa, et tyrannica: ratio itaque illa nequaquam jus erat, sed injuria. Sic etiam patres antiqui hunc locum exposuerunt; unus mihi erit multorum instar, Sulpitius Severus, Hieronymi æqualis, eique charus, et Augustini judicio vir doctrinâ et sapientiâ pollens. Is in historia sacra Samuelem aït dominationem regiam, et superba imperia, populo exponere. Sanè jus regium non est dominatio et superbia; sed jus atque imperium regium, teste Sallustio, conservandæ libertatis atque augendæ reipub. causâ datum, in superbiam dominationemque se convertit. Idem theologi omnes orthodoxi, idem jurisconsulti, idem rabbini plerique, ut ex Sichardo didicisse potuisti, de explicatione hujus loci sentiunt; ne rabbinorum enim quisquam jus regis absolutum isto loco tractari dixit. Ipse infrà cap. 5. pag. 106. "non Alexandrinum Clementem solùm, sed omnes hìc" quereris "errare," te unum ex omnibus rem acu tetigisse: Jam verò cujus vel impudentiæ est vel socordiæ, contra omnes, præsertim orthodoxos, mores regum ab ipso Deo damnatissimos in jus regium convertere; et honesta juris præscriptione defendere: cum jus tamen illud in rapinis, injuriis, violentiis, contumeliis, sæpiùs consistere fatearis. An quisquam sic "sui juris" unquam fuit, ut rapere, agere, prosternere, permiscere omnia sibi liceret? an Latini, quod affirmas, hæc "suo jure ab aliquo fieri unquam dixerunt?" Dixerat apud Sallustium C. Memmius tribunus plebis, in superbiam et impunita flagitia nobilitatis invectus, "impune quælibet facere, id est, regem esse;" arrisit hoc tibi, et statim in lucro ponis, nequicquam sanè, si paulum evigilaveris. An jus hic regium asseruit? annon plebis ignaviam potiùs increpuit, quæ nobiles impunè dominari sineret, eosque mores regios jam rursus pateretur, quos jure suo majores illorum cum rege ipso finibus expulerant. Marcum Tullium saltem consuluisses; is te et Sallustium, et Samuelem etiam rectiùs interpretari docuisset. Qui, pro C. Rabirio, "nemo," inquit, "nostrûm ignorat consuetudinem regiam; regum sunt hæc imperia, animadverte et dicto pare;"

aliaque hujusmodi ex poëtis ibidem recitat, quæ non jus, sed "consuetudinem regiam" vocat, eaque legere et spectare nos aït debere, non "ut delectemur solùm, sed ut cavere etiam et effugere discamus." Vides quàm te malè multaverit Sallustius, quem tyrannis inimicissimum, juris tyrannici patronum attulisse te putabas. Nutare, mihi crede, et suum sibi occasum accelerare jus regium videtur, dum ruentis in modum tenuissima quæque sic arripit, seque sustinere iis testibus atque exemplis conatur, quæ tardiùs fortasse alioqui ruiturum vehementiùs proturbant. "Summum," inquis, "jus, summa injuria est, id in regibus maximè locum habet; qui cùm summo jure utuntur, ea faciunt in quibus Samuel dicit jus regis esse positum." Miserum jus; quod tu jam ad extrema perductus, nisi per summam injuriam defendere ulteriùs non potes! Summum jus id dicitur, cùm quis formulas legum sectatur, singulis penè literis immoratur, æquitatem non servat; aut scriptum jus callidè nimis et malitiosè interpretatur, ex quo illud proverbium Cicero ortum esse aït. Cùm autem jus omne de fonte justitiæ manare certum sit, impius sis necesse est, qui "regem injustum esse, iniquum, violentem, raptorem esse, et quales esse solebant" qui pessimi erant, jus regis esse dicis, idque "prophetam populo insinuâsse." Quod enim jus summum aut remissum, scriptum aut non scriptum, ad maleficia perpetranda esse potest? Id ne tibi de aliis concedere, de rege pernegare, in mentem veniat, habeo quem tibi opponam, et puto regem, qui istiusmodi jus regium et sibi et Deo invisum esse profitetur: Psal. 49. "an consociaretur tibi solium ærumnarum, formantis molestiam per statutum." Noli igitur Deo hanc atrocissimam injuriam facere, quasi is regum pravitates et nefaria facinora jus esse regium doceret, qui etiam hoc nomine societatem cum improbis regibus se detestari docet, quòd molestiam et ærumnas omnes populo juris regii titulo creare soleant. Noli prophetam Dei falsò insimulare; quem, tu dum juris regii isto loco doctorem habere putas, non verum nobis affers Samuelem; sed, ut venefica illa, inanem umbram evocas; quamvis et illum ab inferis Samuelem non adeò mendacem fuisse credam, quin illud quod tu jus regium vocas, impotentiam potiùs tyrannicam dicturus fuisset. Jus datem sceleri legimus, tuque "licentiæ jure concessæ reges minùs bonos uti consuevisse" aïs. At jus hoc, ad perniciem humani generis abs te introductum, non esse a Deo datum probavimus; restat, ut sit à Diabolo; quod infrà clariùs liquebit, "Hæc," inquis, "licentia dat posse, si velis;" et authorem hujus juris habere Ciceronem præ te fers. Nunquam ægrè facio ut testimonia tua recitem, tuis enim ipse testibus conficere te soles. Audi igitur verba Ciceronis in 4tà Philipp. "Quæ causa justior est belli gerendi, quàm servitûtis depulsio? in qua etiamsi non sit molestus dominus, tamen est miserrimum posse si velit," posse vi scilicet; nam de jure si loqueretur, repugnantia diceret, et ex justa belli causa injustam faceret. Non est igitur jus regium quod tu describis, sed injuria, sed vis, et violentia regum. Transis ab regia licentia ad privatam: "licet privato mentiri, licet ingrato esse." Licet et regibus; quid inde efficis? licebit ergò regibus impune rapere, occidere, stuprare? Quid interest ad injuriæ gravitatem rex an latro, an aliunde hostis, populum occidat, diripiat, in servitutem agat? eodem certè jure, et hunc et illum humanæ societatis inimicum, et pestem, propulsare atque ulcisci debemus; immo regem eò justiùs, quòd is tot beneficiis et honoribus nostris auctus commissam sibi sub juramento publicam salutem prodat. Concedis postremò "leges dari à Mose, secundùm quas rex ille quandoque eligendus imperare debebat, quamvis diversas ab illo jure quod Samuel proposuit." Quod cum assertione tua dupliciter pugnat; cùm enim regem legibus omnino solutum posueris, nunc obstrictum dicis: dein jus juri contrarium ponis Mosis et Samuëlis, quod est absurdum. At "servi," inquit Propheta, "vos eritis regi." Ut servos fuisse non abnuerim; non jure tamen regio servi fuerunt, sed regum fortasse plurimorum usurpatione et injustitia. Illam enim petitionem obstinatam non jure regio, sed suo merito, in pœnam illis cessuram propheta præmonuit. At verò si regi legibus soluto quicquid libet licuerit, profectò rex longè plus quàm dominus erit, populus infra omnium servorum infimos plus quàm infimus. Servus enim vel alienigena legem Dei vindicem injuriosum in dominum habebat; populus universus, libera nimirum gens, vindicem in terris neminem, nullam legem habebit, quò læsus, afflictus, et spoliatus confugiat: à servitute regum Ægyptiorum ideo liberatus, ut uni ex fratribus suis, duriore si libeat servitute, opprimendus traderetur. Quod cùm neque divinæ legi nec rationi consentaneum sit, dubium nemini esse potest, quin propheta mores enarraverit, non jus regum, neque mores prorsus regum omnium, sed plurimorum. Descendis ad rabbinos, duosque adducis eadem, qua priùs, infelicitate: nam caput illud de rege, in quo R. Joses jus regium aiebat contineri, Deuteronomii esse, non Samuelis, manifestum est. Samuelis enim ad terrorem duntaxat populo injiciendum pertinere rectissimè quidem et contra te dixit R. Judas. Perniciosum enim est id jus nominari atque doceri, quod injustitia planè est, nisi abusivè forsitan jus nominetur. Quo etiam pertinet versus 18. "Et exclamabitis die illa propter regem vestrum, sed non exaudiet vos Jehovah;" obstinatos nimirum ista pœna manebat, qui regem nolente Deo dari sibi voluerunt. Quanquam ista verba non prohibent, quo minus et vota et quidvis aliud tentare potuerint. Si enim clamare ad Deum contra regem populo licebat, licebat proculdubio omnem etiam aliam inire rationem honestam sese à tyrannide expediendi. Quis enim, quovis malo cùm premitur, sic ad Deum clamat ut cætera omnia quæ officii sunt sui negligat, ad otiosas tantum preces devolutus? Verum utcunque sit, quid hoc ad jus regium, quid ad jus nostrum? qui regem nec invito Deo unquam petivimus, nec ipso dante accepimus, sed jure gentium usi, nec jubente Deo nec vetante, nostris legibus constituimus. Quæ cùm ità se habeant, non video quamobrem nobis laudi atque virtuti tribuendum non sit, regem abjecisse; quandoquidem Israëlitis crimini est datum regem petisse. Quod etiam res ipsa comprobavit; nos enim qui regem, cùm haberemus, deprecati sumus, tandem exauditos Deus liberavit; illos, qui cum non haberent, à Deo efflagitabant, servire jussit; donec Babylone redeuntes ad pristinum reipub. statum reversi sunt. Ludum Talmudicum deinde aperis; quin et hoc sinistro augurio tentatum. Dum enim regem non judicari cupis ostendere, ostendis ex codice Sanhedrim "regem nec judicari nec judicare;" quod cum petitione istius populi pugnat, qui ideo regem petebant, ut judicaret: id frustrà resarcire studes; intelligi nempe id de regibus Postbabylonicis debere. At ecce tibi Maimonides, qui "hanc inter reges Israëlitas et Judæos differentiam ponit: Davidis enim posteros judicare et judicari;" Israëliticis neutrum concedit. Occurris tibi, tecum enim litigas, aut cum rabbinis tuis; meam rem agis. Hoc "primis in regibus locum non habuisse," quia dictum est v. 17. "vos eritis ei servi:" consuetudine scilicet, non jure; aut si jure, pœnas petendi regis, quamvis non sub hoc fortè vel sub illo, at sub plerisque, luebant, quod nos non attingit. Tibi verò adversario opus non est, adeo semper tibi adversaris. Narras enim pro me, ut primò Aristobulus, pòst Jannæus cognomento Alexander, jus illud regium non a synedrio, juris custode et interprete, acceperint, sed paulatim sibi assumpserint, et senatu renitente usurpaverint: quorum in gratiam bella illa fabula de primoribus synedrii "à Gabriele exanimatis" adinventa est, jusque hoc magnificum, quo niti maximè videris, "regem" scilicet "non judicari," ex illa fabula plusquam anili, utpote rabbinica, conflatum esse fateris. Reges autem Hebræorum "judicari posse, atque etiam ad verbera damnari," fusè docet Sichardus ex libris rabbinicis, cui tu hæc omnia debes, et tamen obstrepere non erubescis. Quinimmo legimus ipsum Saulem cum filio Jonathane sortis judicium atque etiam capitale subiisse, suoque ipsum edicto paruisse. Uzzias quoque à sacerdotibus templo deturbatus, lepræ judicio, tanquam unus è populo, se submisit, rexque esse desiit. Quid si templo excedere, quid si magistratu abire, et seorsim habitare, noluisset, jus illud regium legibus solutum sibi asseruisset, an passuros fuisse censes Judæos et sacerdotes templum contaminari, leges violari, populum universum contagione periclitari? In leprosum ergò regem vigebunt leges, in tyrannum nihil poterunt? Ecquis tam demens aut stultus est, ut existimet, cùm rex morbosus nè populum contagione lædat, cautum atque provisum legibus sit, si rex impius, iniquus, crudelis, populum diripiat, excruciet, occidat, rempub. funditus evertat, nullum his malis longè gravioribus remedium legibus repertum esse? Verùm "exemplum ullius regis afferri non potest, qui judicium capitis subierit in jus vocatus." Ad illud Sichardus haud absurdè respondet, perinde esse, ac si quis ad hunc modum dissereret. Cæsar nunquam citatus est coram Electore; ergò si Palatinus diem Cæsari dixerit, non tenetur Cæsar in judicio respondere. Cùm tamen doceat bulla aurea Carolum 4tum se et successores suos huic cognitioni subjecisse. Quid in corrupto populi statu regibus adeò indultum fuisse miramur, ubi tot privati aut opibus suis aut gratia impunitatem vel gravissimorum scelerum assequuntur? Illud autem ἀνυπεύθυνον, id est, "à nemine pendere, nulli mortalium rationem reddere," quod tu regiæ majestatis maximè proprium esse aïs, Aristoteles Polit. 4. c. 10. maximè tyrannicum, et in libera natione minimè ferendum, esse affirmat. Tu vero Antonium tyrannum immanissimum, Romanæ reipub. eversorem, idoneum sanè authorem producis, non esse justum reposci à rege factorum suorum rationem: et tamen Herodem cædis reum ad causam dicendam in Parthos proficiscens accersivit ad se Antonius: et animadversurus etiam in regem fuisse creditur, nisi rex eum auro corrupisset. Ita ab eodem fonte profluxit regiæ potestatis Antoniana assertio, et tua "regia defensio." At non sine ratione, inquis, "nam reges ab alio non habent quòd regnant, sed soli Deo acceptum referunt." Dic sodes quinam? nam istiusmodi reges extitisse unquam, nego. Primus enim Saul, nisi populus refragante etiam Deo regem voluisset, nunquam rex fuisset; et quamvis rex renuntiatus esset Mispæ, vixit tamen peuè privatus, armentum patris secutus, donec Gilgale rex à populo secundùm creatus est. Quid David? quamvis unctus à Deo, nonne iterum unctus est ab Judæis Chebrone, deinde ab omnibus Hebræis, pacto tamen prius fœdere? 2 Sam. 5. 1 Chron. 11. Fœdus autem obligat reges, et intra certos fines continet. Sedit Salomon, inquis, "super solium Domini et cunctis placuit," 1 Paralip. 29. ergo et placuisse populo aliquid erat. Constituit Jehoiadas regem Joasum, fœdus tamen eodem tempore pepigit inter regem et populum. 2 Reg. 11. Hos reges, necnon et reliquos Davidis posteros, et à Deo et à populo constitutos fateor; cæteros omnes, ubicunque gentium, à populo tantùm constitutos esse affirmo; tu ostende constitutos esse à Deo; nisi eâ solum ratione qua omnia, cùm maxima tùm minima, à Deo fieri et constitui dicuntur. Solium itaque Davidis, peculiari quodam jure, solium Jehovæ dicitur; solium aliorum regum non alio, atque cætera omnia, Jehovæ sunt. Quod tu ex eodem capite didicisse potuisti, v. 11. 12. "tua sunt omnia in cœlo et in terra, tuum est, Jehova, regnum; divitiæ et gloria à facie tua sunt, vis et potentia, &c." Diciturque hoc toties, non ut intumescant reges, sed ut moneantur, quamvis deos se esse putent, Deum tamen supra se esse, cui debent omnia. Unde illa Essenorum et poetarum doctrina, reges "non sine Deo, et ab Jove esse," facile intelligitur; omnes enim homines à Deo itidem sumus, Deique genus. Jus igitur hoc universum Dei non tollit jus populi; quo minus omnes cæteri reges, non à Deo nominati, regnum suum soli populo acceptum referant; cui propterea rationem reddere tenentur. Quod quanquam vulgus assentari regibus solet, ipsi tamen reges sive boni, ut Homericus ille Sarpedon, sive mali, ut illi apud Lyricum tyranni, agnoscunt.

Γλαῦκε, τίη δὴ νῶι τε τιμήμεσθα μάλιςα, &c.
Glauce, cur nos maximo honore afficimur
In Lycia, omnes autem nos tanquam deos intuentur?

Ipse sibi respondet; quia virtute cæteris prælucemus: quare fortiter pugnemus, inquit, ne Lycii nobis ignaviam objiciant: qua voce et honores regios à populo acceptos, et bellicæ administrationis rationem populo reddendam esse, innuit. Mali autem reges, ut metum populo incutiant, Deum imperii regii authorem palam prædicant: tacitis autem votis nullum numen præter Fortunam venerantur. Juxta illud Horatii:

> Te Dacus asper, te profugi Scythæ,
> Regumque matres barbarorum, et > Purpurei metuunt tyranni,
> Injurioso ne pede proruas
> Stantem columnam, neu populus frequens
> Ad arma cessantes, ad arma
> Concitet, imperiumque frangat.

Si ergò reges hodie per Deum regnant, etiam populi per Deum in libertatem se vindicant, quandoquidem omnia à Deo et per Deum fiunt. Utrumque etiam æquè testatur Scriptura, et reges per eum regnare, et per eum solio dejici; cùm tamen id utrumque longè sæpius à populo fieri perspiciamus, quàm à Deo. Jus itaque populi pariter ac regis, quicquid est, à Deo est. Populus ubicunque sine Deo manifesto regem creavit, potest eodem jure suo regem rejicere. Tyrannum sanè tollere quàm constituere divinius est; plusque Dei cernitur in populo, quoties injustum abdicat regem, quàm in rege qui innocentem opprimit populum. Immo reges noxios Deo authore judicat populus: hoc enim ipso honore dilectos suos decoravit Deus, Psal. 149. ut Christum regem suum laudibus celebrantes, gentium reges, quales sub evangelio sunt omnes tyranni, "vinculis coërcerent, inque eos jus scriptum exercerent," qui jure omni scripto atque legibus solutos se esse gloriantur. Ne quis tam stolidè, ne quis tam impiè, credat tanti esse apud Deum reges, ferè mortalium ignavissimos, ut eorum nutu orbis terrarum totus pendeat et gubernetur; eorum ut gratiâ, præque illis, divinum, ut ita dicam, hominum genus eodem quo bruta et vilissima quæque animalia loco atque numero habendum sit. Agè nunc, ne nihil enim agas, M. Aurelium, quasi tyrannis faventem, in medium profers; at satius tibi fuit Marcum Aurelium non attigisse. Ille an Deum de principibus solum judicare dixerit nescio. Xiphilinus certè, quem citas, de ἀυταρχίᾳ loquitur; περὶ ἀυταρχίας ὁ Θεὸς μόνος κρίνειν δύναται. ἀυταρχίαν autem monarchiæ synonymum illic esse non assentior; eoque minùs quo sæpius præcedentia lego; nam quî cohæreat, aut quid sibi velit aliena illa sententia subitò insititia, qui legerit miretur; presertim cùm Marcus Aurelius, imperatorum optimus, non aliter cum populo egerit, ut Capitolinus tradit, quàm est actum sub civitate libera; jus autem populi quin supremum tunc fuerit nemo dubitat. Idem Thraseam, Helvidium, Catonem, Dionem, Brutum, tyrannicidas omnes, aut istam gloriam æmulantes coluisse, sibique reipublicæ formam proposuisse, in qua æquis legibus parique jure, omnia administrarentur, in primo libro de vita sua profitetur: in quarto, non se, sed legem, dominum esse. Agnovit etiam omnia senatûs populique esse: nos, inquit, adeò nihil proprium habemus, ut in vestris ædibus habitemus. Hæc Xiphilinus. Tantum abfuit ut quicquam jure regio sibi arrogaret. Moriens, filium suum regnaturum ea lege Romanis commendavit, si dignus esset: jus itaque illud regnandi absolutum atque fictitium, tanquam à Deo per manus traditum, illam denique ἀυταρχίαν præ se non tulit. "Plena" tamen "omnia Græcorum et Latinorum monumenta esse" aïs: at nusquam visa; "plena Judæorum," et tamen addis "Judæos in plerisque regiæ potestati minùs æquos fuisse:" immò Græcos et Latinos multo minùs tyrannis æquos et reperisti et reperies; multo minus Judæos, si liber ille Samuelis in quo is, 1 Sam. 10. jus regni descripserat, exstaret; quem librum doctores Hebræorum à regibus discerptum aut combustum esse tradiderunt, quo impuniùs tyrannidem in suos exercerent. Circumspice jam, numquid captare possis: occurrit tibi rex David postremò torquendus, Psal. 17. "à facie tuâ judicium meum prodeat:" ergo, inquit Barnachmoni, "nullus judicat regem nisi Deus." Et tamen similius veri videtur, Davidem hæc scripsisse, cùm à Saule vexatus, ne Jonathanis quidem judicium, quamvis jam tum unctus à Deo, detractabat. "Si est in me iniquitas, tu me affice morte," inquit, 1 Sam. 20; deinde ut quivis alius ab hominibus falso accusatus, ad judicium Dei provocat; id sequentia declarant, "tui occuli vident quæ recta sunt, cum exploraveris cor meum," &c. Quid hoc ad judicium regium, aut forense? Sanè jus regium illi maximè labefactant atque destruunt, qui fundamentis tam fallacibus niti, atque exædificari, produnt. En tritum illud tandem, et aulicorum nostratium argumentum palmarium. "Tibi soli peccavi," Psal. 51. 6. quasi verò rex David in mœrore et lacrymis pœnitentiam agens, sordidatus et squalidus in terra jacens, misericordiam à Deo suppliciter petens, quicquam de jure regio cogitaverit hæc loquutus; cùm se vix jure mancipii dignum esse arbitraretur. An omnem Dei populum, fratres suos, usque adeò præ se contempsit, ut cædibus, adulteriis, rapinis, peccare in eos non se posse censeret? absit à rege tam sancto tanta superbia, tamque fœda ignoratio vel sui vel proximi. "Tibi" igitur "soli peccavi" proculdubio intelligendum est, tibi præcipuè. Utcunque sit, profectò verba psallentis, et sententiæ affectibus plenæ, haudquaquam sunt ad jus explicandum accommodatæ, aut eò trahendæ. At "non est in jus vocatus, nec coram synedrio causam capitis dixit." Esto; quî enim potuit id resciri, quod adeò sine arbitris, et secretò peractum fuit, ut per aliquot fortasse annos (cujusmodi aulæ arcana sunt) vix unus aut alter conscius fuisse videatur, 2 Sam. 12. "Tu hoc clàm fecisti." Deinde quid si in privatis etiam puniendis cessaret synedrium? an quis inde puniendos non esse argumentabitur? Sed ratio obscura non est; ipse se condemnaverat, ver. 5. "reus capitis vir ille qui fecit hoc;" cui statim subjecit propheta, "tu vir ille es;" prophetæ etiam judicio capitis reus. Veruntamen Deus pro suo jure atque in Davidem eximiâ clementiâ, et peccato absolvit regem, et ipsâ mortis sententiâ, quam is in semetipsum pronuntiaverat, v. 13. "non es moriturus." Nunc in advocatum nescio quem sanguinarium debaccharis, et in eo totus es ut perorationem ejus refellas: de qua ipse viderit; ego quod propositum mihi est, id ago, ut quam paucissimis absolvam. Quædam tamen præterire non possum; primùm, insignes repugnantias tuas: qui p. 30. hæc habes: "Israëlitæ non deprecantur injustum regem, violentem, raptorem, et quales esse solerent qui pessimi. A p. 42. advocatum vellicas quòd Israëlitis tyrannum petisse arguerat. "An de fumo," inquis, "in flammam ire præcipites maluerunt, id est, sævitiam pessimorum tyrannorum experiri, potiùs quàm judices malos pati, quibus jam assueverant?" Illìc Hebræos maluisse aïs tyrannos quàm judices, hìc judices maluisse quàm tyrannos; et "nihil minùs quàm tyrannum voluisse." De tuo igitur respondebit tibi advocatus, juxta enim te omnis rex jure regio tyrannus est. Quod sequitur bene habet, "authoritatem in populo maximam tunc fuisse, quòd judices repudiârunt, regem optârunt." Memineris, cùm hoc ego à te reposcam. Negas "Deum iratum Israëlitis regem tanquam tyrannum aut pœnam attribuisse, sed ut rem salutarem et bonam." Quod tamen facilè refellitur. Cur enim exclamarent propter regem illum quem elegerant, nisi quòd res mala erat imperium regium; non quidem per se, sed quòd plerunque, sicut Propheta hic monet, in superbiam et dominationem se convertit. Si adhuc non satisfacio, agnosce jam tua, syngrapham agnosce tuam, et erubesce. Apparat. ad primatum, "Iratus Deus regem illis dedit, offensus eorum peccatis, quòd Deum habere regem renuissent. Ita ecclesia quasi in pœnam ejus delicti, quòd à puro Dei cultu desciverat, in unius mortalis monarchæ plusquam reginm dominatum data est." Tua igitur similitudo si sibi constat, aut dedit Deus regem Israëlitis in pœnam, et tanquam rem malam, aut dedit papam ecclesiæ in bonum, et tanquam rem bonam. Quid hoc homine levius, quid insanius? Quis huic in re minima fidem habeat, qui tantis in rebus quid asserat, et mox neget, nihil pensi habet. Affirmas, p. 29. "regem legibus solutum esse apud omnes gentes, sic Oriens judicavit, sic Occidens." At, p. 43. "omnes reges Orientis κατὰ νόμον et legitimos fuisse; immò Ægypti reges in maximis minimisque rebus legibus obstrictos," cùm initio capitis hoc te probaturum pollicitus sis, omnes reges "solutos legibus" esse, "leges dare, non accipere." Equidem non irascor tibi; aut enim insanis, aut stas à nobis. Hoc certè oppugnare est, non defendere, hoc regem est ludos facere. Sin minus, Catullianum profectò illud * in te aptissimè quadrat, sed inversum; nam quantò quis unquam optimus poëta fuit, tantò tu pessimus omnium patronus. Certè nisi stupor ille, quo advocatum esse "demersum" ais, te potiùs obcæcavit, jam tute "obrutuisse" te senties. Nunc "omnibus quoque gentium regibus leges datas fuisse" fateris; "non tamen ut iis tenerentur, judiciorum metu et pœnæ capitis." Quod nequedum ex scriptura, neque ex ullo authore fide digno, ostendisti. Tu igitur paucis accipe: leges civiles iis dare qui legibus non tenentur, stultum et ridiculum est; omnes alios punire, uni duntaxat omnium scelerum impunitatem dare, cum lex neminem excipiat, iniquissimum est. Quæ duo in sapientes legumlatores minimè cadunt, multò minùs in Deum. Ut omnes autem videant te nullo modo ex Hebræorum scriptis id probare, quod probandum hoc capite susceperas, esse ex magistris tua sponte confiteris, "qui negant alium suis majoribus regem agnoscendum fuisse præter Deum, datum autem in pœnam fuisse." Quorum ego in sententiam pedibus eo. Non decet enim, neque dignum est regem esse, nisi qui cæteris omnibus longè antecellit; ubi multi sunt æquales, ut sunt in omni civitate plurimi, imperium ex æquo atque per vices dandum esse arbitror: æquali, aut plerunque deteriori, ac sæpissime stulto, servire omnes, quis non indignissimum putet? Nec "ad commendationem regalis imperii" plus "facit," quòd Christus à regibus originem duxit, quàm facit ad pessimorum regum commendationem, Christum eos habuisse nepotem. "Rex est Messias:" agnoscimus, gaudemus, et quàm citissimè veniat oramus; dignus enim est, nec ei quisquam similis aut secundus: interim regia gubernatio commissa indignis et immerentibus, ut plerumque fieri solet, plus mali quàm boni attulisse humano generi rectè existimatur. Nec continuò sequitur omnes reges tyrannos esse. Verùm ita esto: do tibi hoc, ne me nimis tenacem putes; utere tu jam dato. "Hæc duo sequuntur," inquis, "Deus ipse rex fuerit tyrannorum dicendus, et quidem tyrannus ipse maximus." Horum alterum si non sequitur, sequitur profectò illud quod toto libro tuo semper ferè sequitur, te non scripturæ solùm, sed tibimet, perpetuò contradicere, ut qui proxima periodo suprà dixeras, "unum Deum regem esse omnium rerum, quas et ipse creavit." Creavit autem et tyrannos et dæmonas; eorum itaque rex vel tuâ ipsius sententiâ. In alterum despuimus, et blasphemum illud tibi os obturatum volumus, qui Deum affirmes tyrannum esse maximum, si tyrannorum, quod ipse sæpius dicis, rex et dominus dicatur. Sed nec rem regiam multò plus adjuvas, dum ostendis, Mosen etiam cum "summa potestate regem fuisse." Nam fuerit sanè vel quivis alius, dummodò is sit qui res nostras, quemadmodum Moses, "ad Deum referre" possit. Exod. xviii. 19. Verum neque Mosi, quamquam is Dei quasi sodalis fuit, licuit in Dei populo quicquid libuit facere. Quid enim ille? "Venit ad me hic populus," inquit, "ad consulendum Deum;" non ergo ad mandata Mosis accipienda. Tum suscipit Jethro, "esto tu pro hoc populo erga Deum, et commonefacias eos de legibus Dei." Et Moses, Deut. iv. 5. "docui vos statuta et judicia, quemadmodum præcepit mihi Deus." Unde "fidelis" dicitur "in tota domo Dei." Num. xii. Rex itaque Jehova tum populi fuit; Moses veluti interpres tantùm Jehovæ regis. Impium igitur et sacrilegum te esse oportet, qui summam hanc potestatem à Deo ad hominem injussus ausis transferre, quam ipse Moses non summam, sed vicariam tantum et intermediam sub præsenti numine, obtinuit. Accedit etiam cumulus ad improbitatem tuam, quòd Mosen hic summa potestate regem fuisse dicas; cùm in Apparatu ad primatum," p. 230. "Eum in commune cum LXX senioribus populum rexisse; et primum populi, non dominum fuisse" dixeris. Si igitur rex fuit, ut erat certè, et regum optimus, idque sicut ipse aïs, cum "potestate planè summa et regia," nec tamen dominus, neque solus populum regebat, vel te authore; necessariò sequitur, reges, quamvis summa potestate præditos, jure tamen regio atque summo, non esse dominos, neque solos populum regere debere; quantò minus ad libitum suum. Jam verò qua impudentiâ Dei mandatum ementiris, "de rege statim atque ingressi essent terram sanctam sibi constituendo." Deut. xvii. Supprimis enim veteratoriè quod præcedit, "si dixeris, statuam super me regem;" tuque memento quid à te jam reposcam; cùm dixeris, p. 42. "liberrima tunc potestate populus erat præditus." Nunc iterum fanaticus an profanus esse velis, ipse videres. "Deus," inquis, "cum tanto ante determinaverit regium regimen instituendum tanquam optimum populi illius regendi statum, quomodo hæc conciliabuntur? Propheta repugnavit, Deus sic egit cum propheta, ut quasi nollet." Videt se illaqueatum, videt se impeditum: jam attendite quanta cum malitia adversùs prophetam, impietate adversùs Deum, expedire se quærat: "cogitandum in his est," inquit, "Samuelem esse, cujus filii populum tunc judicabant; eos populos repudiabat ob corrupta judicia; Samuel igitur noluit filios suos à populo rejici; Deus ut gratificaretur prophetæ suo, innuit non valdè sibi placere, quod populus desideraret." Dic uno verbo, improbe, quod per ambages dicis; Samuel populo fucum fecit, Samueli Deus. Non advocatus ergò, sed tu "ceritus" ille et "lymphaticus" es, qui modò ut regem honores nil Deum revereris. Isne tibi Samuel videtur, qui saluti aut charitati patriæ filiorum avaritiam et ambitionem præposuerit, qui populo recta et salutaria petenti, tam callido consilio, tamque vafro, illuserit, falsa pro veris docuerit? Isne tibi Deus, qui in re tam turpi cuivis gratificaretur, aut cum populo simulatè ageret? Aut ergo jus regium non erat quod Propheta populo exposuit, aut jus illud, teste Deo et Propheta, malum, molestum, violentum, inutile, sumptuosum reipub. erat; aut denique, quod nefas est dicere, et Deus et Propheta populo verba dare voluerunt. Passim enim testatur Deus valdè sibi displicuisse quòd regem petîssent. ver. 7. "Non te sed me spreverunt ne regnem super ipsos, secundùm illa facta quibus dereliquerunt me, et coluerunt Deos alienos:" acsi species quædam idololatriæ videretur regem petere, qui adorari se, et honores propè divinos tribui sibi postulat. Sanè, qui supra omnes leges terrenum sibi dominum imponit, propè est ut sibi Deum statuat alienum; Deum utique haud sæpe rationabilem, sed profligata sæpius ratione brutum, et belluinum. Sic 1 Sam. x. 19. "Vos sprevistis Deum vestrum, qui ipse servat vos ab omnibus malis et angustiis vestris, cùm dixistis ei, regem præpones nobis:" et cap. xii. 12. "Vos regem petistis, cùm Jehova sit rex vester:" et ver. 17. "Videte malum vestrum magnum esse coram Jehova, petendo vobis regem." Et contemptim Hosea de rege, xiii. 10, 11. "Ubi rex tuus, ubinam est? servet te jam in civitatibus tuis. Ubi vindices tui? quoniam dixisti, da mihi regem et proceres: dedi tibi regem in ira mea." Hinc Gedeon ille heros rege major, "Non dominabor in vos, neque filius meus in vos dominabitur, sed dominabitur in vos Jehova," Jud. viii. planè ac si simul docuisset, non hominis esse dominari in homines, sed solius Dei. Hinc Hebræorum rempublicam, in qua Deus principatum solus tenuit, θεοκρατίαν vocat Josephus, contra Apionem grammaticum Ægyptium, et maledicum tui similem. Populus denique resipiscens, apud Isaiam, xxvi. 13. calamitosum hoc sibi fuisse queritur, quòd alios præter Deum dominos habuerat. Indicio sunt hæc omnia regem, irato Deo, Israëlitis fuisse datum. In historia tyranni Abimelechi quis est cui non risum moveas? de quo dicitur, cùm is partim saxo à muliere, partim armigeri gladio, interfectus fuerit, "reddidit Deus malum Abimelechi. Hæc," inquis, "historia potentissimè adstruit Deum solum regum judicem esse et vindicem:" immo tyrannorum, nebulonum, nothorum, si hoc valebit: quicunque per fas aut nefas tyrannidem occupaverit, is jus regium statim in populum adeptus erit, pœnas effugit; confestim arma magistratui de manibus fluent, mussare deinceps populus non audebit. Verùm quid si magnus aliquis latro hoc modò in bello periisset, an Deus ergò solus latronum vindex? Quid si carnificis manu lege damnatus, an ideo minùs illi Deus malum reddidisset? Ne judices quidem eorum unquam legisti lege postulatos; tamen "in optimatum statu vel principem, si quid committat, posse ac debere judicari," ultrò fateris, p. 47. cur non item tyrannus in regno? quia Deus reddidit malum Abimelechi. At reddidit quoque mulier illa, reddidit etiam armiger, in quos ille ambos jus regium habere præ se tulit. Quid si reddidisset magistratus, annon is idcircò Dei gladium gerit, ut malum malis reddat? Ab hoc "potentissimo" de morte Abimelechi argumento ad verborum contumelias more suo se convertit; nil nisi "cœnum et lutum" ore funditat; cùm eorum, quæ promisit se probaturum, nihil vel ex sacris libris, vel ex rabbinicis, probaverit. Nam neque regem legibus solutum esse, nec cur puniri, si delinquat, solus mortalium non debeat, quicquam ostendit. Immo suis ipse testibus se induit, et sententiam suæ contrariam esse veriorem suomet ipse opere demonstrat. Cùmque argumentis parùm proficiat, criminationibus atrocissimis omnium in nos odium excitare conatur, quasi rege optimo et innocentissimo crudeliter sublato. "An Solomon," inquit, "melior rex Carolo primo fuit?" Sunt, ut verum fatear, qui patrem ejus Jacobum cum Solomone comparare non dubitàrunt, et natalibus quidem anteferre. Solomon Davidis filius; is primò Saulis musicus erat; Jacobus Darlii comitis filius, qui Davidem musicum, reginæ uxoris thalamos nocte ingressum, cum ostio pessulum obdidisse deprehendit, haud multò pòst interfecit, ut narrat Buchananus. Natalibus ergò illustrior Jacobus, et secundus Solomon sæpe dictus, quamvis Davidis musici filius an fuerit dubium sit. At Carolum conferre cum Solomone quî tibi in mentem venire potuerit non video. Quem enim tu Carolum tot laudibus tollis, ejus pervicaciam, avaritiam, crudelitatem, et sævum in omnes pios atque bonos dominatum, ejus bella, incendia, rapinas, et miserorum civium cædes innumeras, dum hæc scribo, Carolus ipse filius in illa publicæ pœnitentiæ sedecula apud Scotos coram populo confitetur atque deplorat: immò tuum illud regium jus ejurat. Verùm si parallelis tantopere delectaris, Carolum cum Solomone conferamus. Solomon à meritissimo "fratris" supplicio "regnum auspicatus est:" Carolus à patris funere; non dico à nece, quamvis indicia veneni omnia in corpore patris mortui conspecta sint; ista enim suspicio in Bucchinghamio constitit; quem tamen Carolus, et regis interfectorem et sui patris, non solùm in comitiis omni culpa exemit, sed, ne omninò res ea senatûs cognitioni subjiceretur, comitia dissolvit. Solomon "gravissimis tributis populum pressit:" ut ille in templum Dei et ædificia publica impendit, Carolus in luxum. Solomon à plurimis uxoribus ad idolorum cultum pellectus est, hic ab una. Pellectus in fraudem Solomon, pellexisse alios non legitur; hic alios, non solum uberrimis corruptæ ecclesiæ præmiis pellexit, sed etiam edictis et canonibus ecclesiasticis coëgit, ut invisa reformatis omnibus altaria statuerent, et pictos in pariete crucifixos altaribus imminentes adorarent. At non est ideo "Solomon à populo capitis damnatus." Nec inde, inquam, sequitur damnari à populo non debuisse; multa enim incidere potuerunt, cur id tum expedire populo non videretur. Populus certè quid sui juris esset haud multo pòst et verbis et factis patefecit: cùm Solomonis filium decem tribus expulerunt; et nisi maturè se in fugam conjecisset, etiam lapidibus regem tantummodò minacem obruturos fuisse credibile est.

CAPUT III.

Cum satis jam disputatum atque conclusum sit, reges Mosaïcos, ex præscripto Dei, omnibus obstrictos legibus pariter cum populo fuisse, nullas legum exceptiones perscriptas inveniri, ut reges "quod vellent, impunè possent," aut ut "à populo puniri ne possint; Deum" proinde "vindictam de his tribunali suo reservâsse" falsissimum esse, sine authore, sine ratione dictum, videamus an id suadeat evangelium, quod dissuasit lex, non imperavit: videamus an evangelium, divinum illud libertatis præconium, nos in servitutem addicat regibus et tyrannis, quorum ab impotenti imperio etiam servitutis cujusdam magistra lex vetus populum Dei liberavit. Primum argumentum ducis à persona Christi, quem quis nescit non privati solùm, sed etiam servi personam ideo sumpsisse, ut nos liberi essemus. Neque hoc de interna tantùm libertate intelligendum est, non de civili; quàm enim aliena sunt ista quæ Maria, mater Christi, ejus in aventu cecinit, "superbos dissipavit cogitatione cordis ipsorum, detraxat dynastas è thronis, humiles evexit," si adventus ejus tyrannos potius in solio stabiliret, Christianos omnes eorum sævissimo imperio subjiceret. Ipse sub tyrannis nascendo, serviendo, patiendo, omnem honestam libertatem nobis acquisivit: ut posse servitutem, si necesse est, æquo animo pati, sic posse ad libertatem honestè aspirare non abstulit Christus, sed majorem in modum dedit. Hinc Paulus, 1 Cor. vii. non de evangelica solùm, sed de civili libertate, sic statuit: "Servus vocatus es? ne sit tibi curæ; sin autem potes liber fieri, potiùs utere; pretio empti estis, ne estote servi hominum." Frustra igitur ab exemplo Christi ad servitutem nos hortaris, qui suæ servitutis pretio libertatem nobis etiam civilem confirmavit. Et formam quidem servi nostra vice suscepit, animum verò liberatoris nunquam non retinuit: unde jus regium quid sit, longè aliter docuisse ostendam, atque tu doces; qui non regii, sed tyrannici juris, idque in republica novus professor, siqua gens tyrannum sive hæreditarium, sive adventitium, sive fortuitum, sortita erit, eam non solùm necessitate, sed etiam religione, servam esse statuis. Tuis autem, ut soleo, in te utar testimoniis. Interrogavit Petrum Christus, cùm ab eo coactores quidam Galilæi didrachma exigebant, Mat. xvii. à quibus acciperent reges terræ tributa, sive censum, à filiis suis, an ab alienis? respondet ei Petrus, ab alienis. Ergò, inquit Christus, "liberi sunt filii; sed ne offendamus illos, da iis pro me et pro te." Variè hic locus interpretes exercet, cuinam persolverentur hæc didrachma, alii sacerdotibus in sanctuarium, alii Cæsari: ego quidem Herodi persoluta, interverso sanctuarii reditu, sentio fuisse. Varia enim ab Herode et filiis ejus exacta tributa, ab Agrippa tandem remissa, narrat Josephus. Hoc autem tributum per se exiguum, multis aliis adjunctum, grave erat: gravia autem fuerint oportet de quibus hic Christus loquitur, alioqui, in republica etiam, pauperes capite censi fuerunt. Hinc itaque Christus Herodis injustitiam arguendi, cujus sub ditione erat, occasionem cepit. Qui, cum cæteri reges terræ (siquidem patriæ parentes dici se cupiant) non filiis, id est, civibus suis, sed alienis, bello nempe subactis, graviora tributa imperare soleant, hic contra non alienos, sed filios opprimeret. Utcunque sit, sive filios hìc, cives regum proprios, sive filios Dei, id est, fideles et in universum Christianos intelligi concedas, ut intelligit Augustinus, certissimum est, si filius fuit Petrus, et proinde liber, nos etiam authore Christo liberos esse: vel ut cives, vel ut Christianos: non esse ergò juris regii à filiis et liberis tributa graviora exigere. Testatur enim Christus persolvisse se, non quod deberet, sed ne illos offendendo qui exigebant negotium sibi privatus exhiberet: cum officium ac munus longissimè diversum in illo vitæ suæ curriculo explendum sibi esset. Dum igitur negat Christus jus regium esse, graviora vectigalia liberis imponere, certè spoliare, diripere, occidere, excruciare proprios cives, et præsertim Christianos, jus esse regium multò evidentiùs negat. Hunc in modum de jure regio cum et aliàs disputâsse videatur, venire in suspicionem quibusdam cœpit, non se tyrannorum licentiam pro jure regio habere. Non enim de nihilo erat, quòd Pharisæi interrogatione hujusmodi animum ejus tentarent, quòd de jure regio percontaturi, eum neminem curare, non respicere personam hominum, dixerint; neque de nihilo, quòd is proposita sibi istiusmodi questione irasceretur, Mat. xxii. An te quispiam si insidiosè aggredi, si loquentem captare vellet, si elicere ex te quod fraudi futurum tibi sit, de jure regio sub rege interrogaret? an tu cuipiam de istoc interroganti irascerere? non opinor. Vel hinc ergò perspicias, non id eum de jure regio sensisse quod regibus gratum erat. Idem ex responso ejus apertissimè colligitur, quo ille percontatores amandare à se potiùs quàm docere videtur. Poscit numisma censûs; "Cujus," inquit, "imago ista est? Cæsaris. Reddite ergo Cæsari quæ sunt Cæsaris, quæ Dei sunt Deò." Immo quæ populi sunt populo reddenda esse quis nescit? Reddite omnibus quod debetis, inquit Paulus, Rom. xiii. non ergò Cæsari omnia. Libertas nostra non Cæsaris, verùm ab ipso Deo natale nobis donum est; eam Cæsari cuivus reddere, quam ab eo non accepimus, turpissimum esset, et humana origine indignissimum. Si enim os hominis et vultum aspiciens interrogaret quisquam, cujus ista imago esset, annon facilè quivis responderet Dei esse? Cùm igitur Dei simus, id est, verè liberi, ob eamque causam soli Deo reddendi, profectò Cæsari nos, id est, homini, et præsertim injusto, improbo, tyranno, in servitutem tradere, sine piaculo, et quidem maximo sacrilegio non possumus. Interim quæ Cæsaris sint, quæ Dei, in medio relinquit. Quòd si idem erat hoc numisma, quod didrachmum illud Deo pendi solitum, ut certè postea sub Vespasiano fuit, tum sanè controversiam non minuit Christus, sed implicavit: cùm impossibile sit Deo et Cæsari idem simul reddere. At enim ostendit quæ Cæsaris essent; numisma nempe illud Cæsaris imagine signatum. Quid igitur inde lucraris præter denarium vel Cæsari vel tibi? Aut enim Cæsari Christus præter denarium illud nihil dedit, cætera omnia nobis asseruit, aut si quicquid pecuniæ Cæsaris nomine inscriptum esset, id Cæsari dedit, contrarius jam sibi, nostra ferè omnia Cæsari dabit, qui duo modò didrachma regibus non se ex debito persolvere, et suo et Petri nomine professus est. Ratio denique infirma est quâ niteris; non enim principis effigiem habet moneta, ut principis esse, sed ut probam se esse, moneat; atque se principis nomine insignitam ne quis audeat adulterare. Sin autem ad jus regium inscriptio tantum valeat, reges profectò nostras omnium facultates, uti essent suæ, sola nominis inscriptione statim perficerent; aut si nostra omnia jam sua sunt, quod tuum dogma est, non idcirco Cæsari numisma illud reddendum erat, quia Cæsaris nomen aut imaginem prætulit, sed quia Cæsaris jam antea jure erat, nulla licèt imagine signatum. Ex quo manifestum est, Christum hoc in loco non tam nos officii nostri erga reges aut Cæsares ita perplexè atque ambiguè admonere voluisse, quàm Pharisæos hypocritas improbitatis et militiæ arguere. Quid? rursus cum ei nuntiarent Pharisæi Herodem ejus vitæ insidias parare, an humile aut demissum ab eo responsum, tyranno reddendum, tulerunt? Immo "ite," inquit, "et dicite vulpi illi;" innuens reges non jure regio, sed vulpino, civibus suis insidiari. Atqui "sub tyranno supplicium mortis subire sustinuit." Enimverò quî potuit nisi sub tyranno? "supplicium sub tyranno passus est;" ergò ad injustissima quævis juris regii testis et assertor: egregius tu quidem officiorum ratiocinator es. Verùm Christus quamvis nostri liberandi, non sub jugum mittendi, causâ servum se fecerit, tamen ad hunc modum se gessit; nec juri quicquam regio præter æquum et bonum concessit. Nunc ad præcepta ejus hac de re aliquando veniamus. Zebedæi filios maximam in regno Christi, quod mox in terris futurum somniabant, dignitatem affectantes, sic Christus corripuit, ut omnes simul Christianos commonefaceret, quale jus magistratûs et imperii civilis apud eos constitui voluerit. "Scitis," inquit, "principes gentium in eas dominari, et magnatus authoritatem exercere in eas, verùm non ita erit inter vos. Sed quicunque volet inter vos magnus fieri, esto vester minister; et quicunque volet inter vos primus esse, esto vester servus." Hæc tu nisi mente captus tecum facere credidisses? hisne te argumentis vincere, ut reges nostros rerum dominos existimemus? Tales in bello hostes nobis contingant, qui in castra hostium (quanquam et armatos vincere sat scimus) uti tu soles, cæci atque inermes tanquam in suos incidant: ita semper, quod tibi maximè adversatur, id demens, veluti firmissimum causæ tuæ subsidium, comparare consuevisti. Petebant Israëlitæ regem, "ut habebant omnes istæ gentes:" dissuasit Deus multis verbis, quæ Christus hic summatim complexus est, "scitis principes gentium in eas dominari:" petentibus tamen iis dedit regem Deus, quamvis iratus: Christus, ne peteret omnino Christianus populus more gentium dominaturum, adhibita cautione antevertit; "inter vos non ita erit." Quid hoc clariùs dici potuit? non erit inter vos ista regum superba dominatio, tametsi specioso titulo euergetæ et benefici vocentur; sed qui magnus inter vos fieri vult, (quis autem principe major?) "esto vester minister:" et qui primus sive "princeps, (Luc. xxii.) esto vester servus." Non erravit itaque Advocatus ille quem insectaris, sed authorem habuit Christum, si regem Christianum populi ministrum esse dixit, uti est certè omnis bonus magistratus. Rex autem inter Christianos aut omninò non erit, aut erit servus omnium; si planè vult esse dominus, esse simul Christianus non potest. Quin et Moses, legis quodammodo servilis institutor, non populo tamen superbè dominabatur, sed onus ipse populi ferebat; ferebat in sinu populum, ut nutricius lactantem; Num. xi. Nutricius autem servus est. Plato non dominos, sed servatores et adjutores, populi appellandos esse magistratus docuit; populum non servos, sed altores, magistratuum, ut qui alimenta et stipendia magistratibus etiam regibus præbeant. Eosdem Aristoteles custodes et ministros legum vocat, Plato et ministros et servos. Ministros Dei Apostolus quidem appellat, quod tamen nequaquam obstat quò minùs sint et legum et populi; tam leges enim quàm magistratus propter populum sunt. Et tamen hanc tu "Fanaticorum Angliæ Molossorum opinionem" esse clamitas. Molossos esse Anglos certè non putarem, nisi quòd tu illos, hybrida, latratu tàm degeneri oblatras; Lupi, si diis placet, Sancti Dominus: Lupus nimirum sanctus queritur Molossos esse fanaticos. Germanus olim, cujus ille Lupus Trecassinus collega fuit, incesto apud nos regi Vortigerno authoritate sua regnum abrogavit. Sanctus itaque Lupus talem te Lupi non sancti, sed famelici cujuspiam et latrunculi, dominum, illo apud Martialem viperarum domino viliorem, aspernatur: qui et latrantem ipse domi, ut ferunt, Lyciscam habes, quæ tibi miserè dominatur; cujus partim impulsu etiam scripsisse hæc diceris; unde mirum non est velle te regiam dominationem aliis obtrudere, qui fœmineum ipse domi dominatum ferre tam serviliter assuevisti. Sis itaque Lupi Dominus, sit Lupa tuî domina, sis Lupus ipse, sis Lycanthropus, molossis mehercùlè Anglicanis ludibrium debes. Verùm lupos venari nunc non est otium; sylvis itaque egressi, in viam regiam redeamus. Qui contra omnem in ecclesia primatum nuper scripsisti, nunc "Petrum Apostolicæ coronæ principem appellas." Quis tibi authoritate tam fluxa homunculo fidem habeat? Quid Petrus? "subjecti estote omni humanæ ordinationi propter Dominum, sive regi ut supereminenti, sive præsidibus, ut qui per eum mittantur, ad ultionem quidem facinorosorum, laudem verò benefacientium; quoniam ita est voluntas Dei." Scripsit hæc Petrus non solùm privatis, sed etiam advenis per Minorem ferè Asiam dispersis, atque dispalatis; qui, in iis ubi degebant locis, nullius juris præterquam hospitalis capaces erant. An tu incolas, liberos, nobiles, indigenarum conventus, comitia, parlamenta idem in sua patria, quod sparsos et peregrinos in aliena, decere putas? an idem privatos decere in sua, quod senatores et magistratus, sine quibus ne reges quidem esse possunt? fac tamen indigenas fuisse, fac non privatos, sed senatum ipsum Romanum, cui hæc scripta sunt. Quid inde assequeris? cùm nullum præceptum cui ratio aliqua adjuncta est, quenquam ultra illam præcepti rationem obligare aut soleat aut possit. "Estote subjecti, ὑποτάγητε, id est, si vim verbi spectes, subordinati, seu legitimè subjecti, ἡ γὰρ τάξις νόμος, inquit Aristoteles; lex est ordo. "Subjecti estote propter Dominum." Quamobrem? quia cùm rex, tum præses, constituitur à Deo ad ultionem facinorosorum, laudem benefacientium. "Quoniam ita voluntas est Dei." Videlicet ut talibus obsequamur, quales hic describuntur; de aliis nullum hìc verbum. Vides quam optimè hujus præcepti constet ratio; addit, v. 16. "ut liberi," non ergò ut mancipia. Quid si versa vice ad crucem et perniciem bonorum, ad impunitatem et laudem et præmia facinorosorum, regnent? an in perpetuum subjecti erimus non privati solùm, sed primores, sed magistratus omnes, ipse denique senatus? Annon humana ordinatio dicitur? cur ergò potestas humana, ad constituendum quod hominibus bonum et salubre est, valebit, ad tollendum quod iisdem malum et exitiosum est, non valebit? Atqui rex ille, cui subjecti esse jubentur, erat Romæ ea tempestate Nero tyrannus; ergò tyrannis etiam subjecti esse debemus. At, inquam, et dubium hoc est, Nero an Claudius tunc temporis rerum potiretur, et illi qui subjecti esse jubentur, advenæ, dispersi, privati, non consules, non prætores, non senatus Romanus, erant. Nunc Paulum adeamus (quoniam tu quod nobis de regibus licere non vis, id tibi de Apostolis licere autumas, ut principatum Petro modò des, modo eripias): Paulus hæc ad Romanos, c. xiii. "omnis anima potestatibus supereminentibus subjecta esto; non est enim potestas nisi à Deo, quæ autem sunt potestates à Deo sunt ordinatæ:" Romanis hæc scribit, non, ut Petrus, advenis, dispersis, sed privatis tamen potissimum et plebeiis; ita etiam scribit, ut totam reipub. administrandæ rationem, originem, finem, luculentissimè doceat. Quò magis obedientiæ quoque nostræ vera ac distincta ratio, ab omni servitute disjuncta, eluceret. "Omnis anima," hoc est, quisque homo, "subjectus esto." Quid sibi Apostolus proponat hoc capite satis explanavit Chrysostomus, ποιεῖ τοῦτο δεικνὺς, &c. "facit hoc," inquit, "ut ostendat Christum leges suas non ad hoc induxisse, ut communem politiam everteret, sed ut in melius statueret." Non ergò ut Neronem, aut tyrannum quemvis alium supra omnem legem et pœnam constituendo, crudelissimum unius imperium in omnes mortales constabiliret. "Utque simul doceret superflua et inutilia bella non esse suscipienda," non ergò bella damnat contra tyrannum, hostem patriæ intestinum, atque adeò periculosissimum, suscepta. "Pervulgatus tunc erat hominum sermo traducens Apostolos tanquam seditiosos, et novatores, quasi omnia ad evertendum leges communes et facerent et dicerent; his nunc ora obstruit." Non ergò tyrannorum defensiones conscripserunt Apostoli, quod tu facis, sed ea fecerunt, ea docuerunt, quæ suspecta omnibus tyrannis defensione apud illos potiùs, et interpretatione quadam, egebant. Propositum Apostolo quid fuerit ex Chrysostomo vidimus; nunc verba scrutemur. "Omnis anima potestatibus supereminentibus subjecta esto;" quæ tamen istæ sint non statuit: non enim jura atque instituta omnium nationum abolere, unius libidini omnia permittere, in animo erat. Certè optimus quisque imperator authoritatem legum et senatûs authoritate sua longè superiorem semper agnovit. Idem apud omnes nationes non barbaras jus semper sanctissimum fuit. Unde Pindarus apud Herodotum, νόμον πάντων βασιλέα, legem omnium regem esse, dixit; Orpheus in hymnis non mortalium solum, sed immortalium etiam, regem appellat;

Reddit rationem. Αὐτὸς γὰρ μόνος ζώων οἴηκα κρατύνει, "Lex enim sola viventium gubernaculum tenet." Plato in legibus τὸ κρατεῖν ἐν τῇ πόλει, id quod in civitate plurimum debet posse, legem esse aït. In epistolis eam maximè rempub. laudat, ubi lex, et domina et rex hominum, non homines tyranni legum sunt. Eadem Aristotelis sententia in Politicis, eadem Ciceronis in Legibus, ita leges præesse magistratibus, ut magistratus præsunt populo. Cùm itaque sapientissimorum virorum judicio, prudentissimarum civitatum institutis, lex semper potestas summa atque suprema habita sit, nec evangelii doctrina cum ratione aut cum jure gentium pugnet, is utique potestatibus supereminentibus verissimè subjectus erit, qui legibus, et magistratibus juxta leges rempub. gubernantibus, ex animo paret. Non ergò solùm populo subjectionem hanc, sed regibus etiam, præcipit; qui supra leges nequaquam sunt. "Non est enim potestas nisi à Deo; id est, nulla reipub. forma, nulla homines regendi legitima ratio. Antiquissimæ etiam leges ad authorem Deum olim referebantur; est enim lex, ut Cicero in Philipp. 12. nihil aliud nisi recta et à numine deorum tracta ratio, imperans honesta, prohibens contraria. A Deo igitur est magistratuum institutio, ut eorum administratione gens humana sub legibus viveret: hanc autem vel illam administrationis formam, hos vel illos magistratus, eligendi optio proculdubio penès liberas hominum nationes semper fuit. Hinc Petrus et regem et presides ἀνθρωπίνην κτίσιν, humanam creationem, vocat; et Hosea c. 8. "constituunt reges, at non ex me; præficiunt principes quos non agnosco." In ista enim sola Hebræorum repub. ubi Deum variis modis consulere poterant, de regis nominatione ad Deum referri ex lege oportebat: cæteræ gentes mandatum à Deo nullum istiusmodi accepimus. Aliquando aut ipsa regiminis forma, si vitiosa sit, aut illi qui potestatem obtinent, et ab hominibus, et à diabolo, sunt. Luc. 4. "Tibi dabo potestatem hanc omnem, nam mihi tradita est, et cui volo do illam." Hinc princeps hujus mundi dicitur, et Apocalyp. 13. dedit Bestiæ Draco potentiam suam, et thronum suum, et potestatem magnam. Propterea necesse est hic intelligi non potestates quascunque, sed legitimas, prout etiam infra describuntur; necesse est intelligi potestates ipsas, non semper eos qui imperium obtinent. Hinc dilucidè Chrysostomus, "Quid ais?" inquit; "omnis ergò princeps à Deo constitutus est? non dico: non enim de quovis principe, sed de ipsa re, loquitur Apostolus; non dicit, non est princeps nisi à Deo, sed non est potestas." Hæc Chrysostomus. "Quæ autem potestates sunt, à Deo sunt ordinatæ." Legitimas ergò vult hic intelligi Apostolus; malum enim et vitium, cùm ataxia sit, non est ut possit ordinari, et esse simul vitiosum. Hoc enim duo simul contraria ponit, taxin et ataxian. "Quæ autem sunt," ita interpretaris ac si diceretur, "quæ nunc sunt;" quo faciliùs probare possis etiam Neroni, qui, ut opinaris, tunc "imperavit," Romanos obtemperare debuisse; nostra sanè bona venia: quàm enim voles de Anglicana repub. malè sentias, in ea tamen Anglos acquiescere debere, quoniam "nunc est," et "à Deo ordinatur," ut Neronis olim imperium, necesse habebis concedere. Neque enim Nero minùs quàm Tiberius "artibus matris imperium nihil ad se pertinens" occupaverat, ne legitimè partum fuisse respondeas. Quò sceleratior et doctrinæ retractator ipse tuæ, Romanos potestati quæ tunc fuit subjectos esse vis, Anglos potestati quæ nunc est subjectos esse non vis. Verùm nullæ in hoc orbe terrarum res duæ magis è regione adversæ sibi sunt, quàm tu nequissimus nequissimo semper ferè adversus es tibi. Quid autem facies miser? acumine hoc tuo regem adolescentem planè perdidisti; ab ipsa enim tua sententia extorquebo ut fatearis, hanc potestatem in Anglia, quæ nunc est, à Deo ordinatam esse; atque omnes proinde Anglos intra ejusdem reipublicæ fines eidem potestati subjectos esse debere. Attendite igitur, critici, et manus abstinete; Salmasii nova hæc emendatio est, in epistola ad Romanos; non quæ sunt potestates, "sed quæ nunc existunt" reddi debere adinvenit; ut Neroni tyranno tunc scilicet imperanti subjectos esse omnes oportuisse demonstraret. At ô bone, ληκύθιον ἀπώλεσας: ut regem modò, ita nunc interpretamentum hoc tam bellum, perdidisti. Quam tu epistolam sub Nerone scriptam esse aïs, sub Claudio scripta est, principe simplici, et non malo: hoc viri docti certissimis argumentis compertum habent; quinquennium etiam Neronis laudatissimum fuit, unde argumentum hoc toties inculcatum, quod multis in ore est, multis imposuit, tyranno parendum esse, eò quòd Paulus hortatus est Romanos ut Neroni essent subjecti, callidum indocti cujuspiam commentum esse reperitur. "Qui obsistit potestati," scilicet legitimæ, "Dei ordinationi obsistit." Astringit etiam reges præceptum hoc, qui legibus et senatui obsistunt. At verò qui potestati vitiosæ, aut potestatis non vitiosæ corruptori et eversori, obsistit, an is Dei ordinationi obsistit? sanus, credo, non dixeris. Tollit omnem dubitationem sequens versiculus, de legitima tantùm potestate Apostolum hic loqui. Definiendo enim explicat, nequis errare, et opiniones hinc stolidas aucupari, possit, qui sint magistratus potestatis hujus ministri, et quam ob causam subjectos esse nos hortetur; "Magistratus non sunt timori bonis operibus, sed malis; boni à potestate hac laudem adipiscentur; magistratus minister est Dei nostro bono datus; non frustra gladium gerit, vindex ad iram ei qui malum facit." Quis negat, quis recusat, nisi improbus, quin hujusmodi potestati aut potestatis administro libens se subjiciat? non solùm ad vitandam "iram" et offensionem, aut pœnæ metu, sed etiam "propter conscientiam." Sine magistratibus enim et civili gubernatione, nulla respublica, nulla societas humana, nulla vita, esse potest. Quæ autem potestas, qui magistratus, contraria his facit, neque illa, neque hic, à Deo propriè ordinatus est. Unde neque tali vel potestati, vel magistratui, subjectio debetur aut præcipitur, neque nos prudenter obsistere prohibemur: non enim potestati, non magistratui, obsistemus, qui hic optimè depingitur, sed prædoni, sed tyranno, sed hosti; qui si magistratus tamen dicendus erit, eò duntaxat quòd habet potestatem, quòd ad pœnam nostram ordinari à Deo videri potest, etiam diabolus hoc modo magistratus erit. Sanè unius rei una vera definitio est: si ergò Paulus hic magistratum definit, quod quidem accuratè facit, eadem definitione, iisdem verbis tyrannum, rem maximè contrariam, definire non potuit. Unde quem ipse magistratum definivit atque descripsit, ei duntaxat subjectos nos esse voluisse, non ejus contrario tyranno, certissimè colligitur. "Propter hoc tributa solvitis;" rationem adjungit ad præceptum; unde Chrysostomus, "Cur," inquit, "vectigalia regi damus? annon tanquam nobis prospicienti, curæ ac tuitionis mercedem solventes? atqui nihil illi solvissemus, nisi ab initio utilem nobis talem esse præfecturam cognovissemus." Quapropter illud repetam quod suprà dixi; quandoquidem subjectio hæc non simpliciter, sed cum adjuncta ratione, à nobis requiritur, illa profectò ratio quæ adjungitur, subjectionis nostræ vera norma erit: Cum ista ratione non subjecti, rebelles; sine ista ratione subjecti, servi erimus et socordes. "At Angli," inquis, "nihil minùs quàm liberi, quia mali, quia flagitiosi." Nolo ego Gallorum vitia commemorare, quamvis sub regibus sint; neque Anglorum nimis excusare; dico tamen illa esse flagitia, quæ sub regibus, tanquam in Ægypto didicerunt; neque dum in deserto; licèt Dei sub imperio, dediscere statim potuerunt. Spes est tamen de plerisque bona; ut ne sanctissimos hic optimosque viros et veritatis studiosissimos collaudare incipiam; quorum apud nos non minorem credo esse numerum, quàm ubi tu maximum esse existimas. At "jugum Anglis durum imponitur." Quid si illis, qui jugum cæteris civibus imponere studebant? quid si suo deinde merito subactis? nam cæteri puto non molestè ferunt, exhausto civilibus bellis ærario, sumptibus propriis suam se tolerare libertatem. Relabitur jam ad rabbinos nugivendos. Regem legibus astrictum esse negat, ex iis tamen probat "læsæ majestatis reum esse posse, si jus suum patiatur imminui:"

astrictus itaque et non astrictus, reus et non reus rex, erit: adeò frequenter enim solet repugnare sibi, ut ipsa repugnantia huic homini germana atque gemella esse videatur. Atqui Deus, inquis, multa regna Nebuchadnezzari in servitutem dedit. Fateor ad certum tempus dedisse, Jer. 27. 7. Anglos in servitutem Carolo Stuarto ad semihorulam dedisse ostende; permisisse non negaverim, dedisse nunquam audivi. Aut si Deus in servitutem dat populum, quoties tyrannus plus populo potest, cur non idem liberare dicendus erit, quoties plus potest populus tyranno? an is Deo tyrannidem suam, nos Deo libertatem nostram, acceptam non feremus? Non est malum in civitate quod Deus non immittat, Amos 3. famem, pestilentiam, seditionem, hostem; ecquod nam horum civitas ab se non totis viribus amolietur? faciet profectò, si possit, quamvis ab ipso Deo immissa hæc esse sciat; nisi è cœlo ipse secùs jusserit, Cur non tyrannos pariter amovebit, si plus polleat? an ejus unius impotentiam ad commune malum esse magis à Deo credemus, quàm potentiam totius civitatis ad commune bonum? Absit à civitatibus, absit ab omni cœtu hominum ingenuorum, doctrinæ tam stupidæ, tamque pestiferæ, labes, quæ vitam omnem civilem funditus delet, gentem humanam universam, propter unum atque alterum tyrannum, ad quadrupedum propè conditionem detrudit: cum illi supra omnem legem excelsi par in utrunque genus et pecudum et hominum jus atque imperium obtinebunt. Mitto jam stulta illa dilemmata, in quibus et te jactes, nescio quem fingis, "potestatem illam supereminentem de populo velle intelligere;" tametsi affirmare non dubito omnem magistratûs authoritatem à populo proficisci. Hinc Cicero pro Flacco, "Illi nostri sapientissimi et sanctissimi majores, quæ scisceret plebs, quæ populus juberet, juberi vetarique voluerunt." Hinc Lucius Crassus, orator eximius, et senatûs eo tempore princeps, cujus tum causam agebat ad populum. "Nolite," inquit, "sinere nos cuiquam servire, nisi vobis universis, quibus et possumus et debemus." Quamvis enim senatus populum regeret, populus tamen illam moderandi et regendi sui potestatem senatui tradiderat. Unde majestatem populo Romano frequentiùs quàm regibus olim attributam legimus. Idem Marcus Tullius pro Plancio; "Est enim conditio liberorum populorum, præcipueque hujus principis populi et omnium gentium domini, posse suffragiis vel dare vel detrahere quod velit cuique; nostrum est ferre modicè populi voluntates: honores si magni non putemus, non servire populo; sin eos expetamus, non defatigari supplicando." Egone ut regem populi servum dicere metuam, cùm senatus Romanus, tot regum dominus, servum se populi professus sit? Vera sunt hæc, inquies, in populari statu; nondum enim lex regia potestatem populi in Augustum, et successores ejus, transtulerat. Hem tibi ergò Tiberium illum, quem tu "tyrannum, plus vice simplici," fuisse aïs, ut revera fuit; is tamen dominus, etiam post legem illam regiam, appellatus à quodam, ut tradit Suetonius, denuntiavit ne se ampliùs contumeliæ causâ nominaret. Audisne? tyrannus iste dominus dici contumeliæ sibi duxit. Idem in senatu, "Dixi et nunc, et sæpe aliàs, patres conscripti, bonum et salutarem principem, quem vos tanta et tam libera potestate instruxistis, senatui servire debere, et universis civibus sæpe, et plerunque etiam singulis; neque id dixisse me pœnitet; et bonos et æquos et faventes vos habui dominos, et adhuc habeo." Nec simulata hæc ab eo si dixeris, ut erat simulandi callidissimus, quicquam proficies; quis enim id videri se cupit, quod esse non debet? Hinc ille mos non Neroni solùm, quod scribit Tacitus, sed cæteris etiam imperatoribus fuit, populum in circo adorandi. De quo Claudianus, VI. Cons. Honorii.

> O quantum populo secreti numinis addit
> Imperii præsens species, quantamque rependit
> Majestas alterna vicem, cum regia circi
> Connexum gradibus veneratur purpura vulgus,
> Consensuque cavæ sublatus in æthera vallis
> Plebis adoratæ reboat fragor.——"

Qua adoratione quid aliud imperatores Romani, nisi universam plebem, etiam post legem regiam, suos esse dominos fatebantur? Atque illud est, quod initio statim suspicatus sum, te glossariis pervolutandis, et tricis quibusdam laboriosis magnificè divulgandis, operam potiùs dedisse, quàm bonis authoribus attentè et studiosè perlegendis; qui veterum scriptorum sapientia ne leviter quidem imbutus, rem præstantissimorum opinionibus philosophorum, et prudentissimorum in republica principum, dictis celebratissimam, novam esse prorsus, et "enthusiastarum" tantummodò "deliriis" somniatam, censes. I nunc, Martinum illum sutorem, et Gulielmum Pellionem, quos adeò despicis, ignorantiæ collegas et mystagogos tibi sume: quanquam erudire te poterunt illi, et illos tibi gryphos dissolvere stolidissimos, "An in democratia serviat populus, cùm serviat rex in monarchia; utrùm totus an pars ejus?" Ita illi, cum tibi Œdipi vice fuerint, tu illis Sphinx in malam rem præceps abeas licebit; alioquin fatuitatum tuarum et ænigmatum finem nullum fore video. Rogas, "Cùm reges Apostolus nominat, an de populo eos intelligemus?" Pro regibus quidem orandum esse Paulus docet, 1 Tim. ii. 2. at priùs pro populo orandum esse docuerat, "v. 1. Sunt tamen et de regibus, et de populo nonnulli, pro quibus orare etiam vetamur. Pro quo non orem, eùmne ex lege non puniam? quid vetat? Atqui "cum hæc scriberet Paulus, imperabant vel pessimi;" hoc etiam falsum est, scriptam enim sub Claudio et hanc epistolam fuisse certissimis argumentis evincit Ludovicus Capellus. De Nerone cùm mentionem facit Paulus, non regem, sed "leonem," id est belluam immanem, vocat, cujus ex ore ereptum se gaudet, 2 Tim. iv. Pro regibus itaque, non pro belluis, "orandum, ut vitam tranquillam et quietam transigamus, cum pietate" tamen "omni et honestate." Vides non tam regum hìc quàm tranquillitatis, pietatis, honestatis, etiam rationem esse habendam. Quis autem populus non se suosque liberos tuendo (contra tyrannum an contra hostem nihil interest) vitam "sollicitam, inquietam," bellicosam, honestam, agere, quàm sub hoste vel tyranno, non solùm æquè sollicitam et inquietam, sed turpem etiam, servilem, et inhonestam. Teipsum testem adhibebo, non quo tanti sis, sed ut perspiciant omnes quàm sis duplex, et fraudulentus, et mancipium regis mercenarium.

"Quis," inquis, "non perferre mallet in repub. aristocratica ex optimatum æmulatione dissensiones oriri solitas, quàm ex uno monarcha, tyrannico more imperare consueto, certam miseriam ac perniciem? Populus Romanus prætulit statum illum reipub. quantumlibet discordiis agitatæ jugo Cæsarum intolerabili. Populus, qui vidandæ seditionis causâ monarchicum statum præoptavit, ubi expertus est levius esse malum quod vitare voluit, ad priora sæpe redire expetit." Hæc et plura tua verba sunt in illa de episcopis dissertatione, sub Walonis Messalini adscititio nomine edita, p. 412. contra Petavium Loiolitam, cùm ipse magis Loiolita sis, et eo de grege pessimus. Quid hac de re Scriptura sacra statuerit, et vidimus et omni diligentia investigâsse non pœnitet: unde quid senserint patres antiqui per tot ingentia volumina exquirere pretium fortasse operæ non erit. Si quid enim afferunt, quod Scriptura non exhibuit, eorum authoritatem, quantacunque sit, meritò repudiamus. Quod autem ex Irenæo profers, "reges Dei jussu constitui aptos his qui in illo tempore ab iis reguntur," cum Scriptura pugnat evidentissimè. Cùm enim judices ad regendum populum suum aptiores regibus esse palàm significâsset Deus, id tamen totum voluntati atque arbitrio populi permisit, ut aptiorem sibi sub optimatibus formam reipub. deteriore sub regibus, si vellent, permutarent. Legimus etiam sæpe regem malum bono populo datum, et contra, regem bonum populo malo. Virorum itaque sapientissimorum est perspicere quid populo aptissimum et utilissimum sit: constat enim neque omni populo, neque eidem semper, eundem reipub. statum convenire, sed vel hunc vel illum, prout civium virtus et industria nunc augescit, nunc minuitur. Qui tamen potestatem adimit populo eligendi sibi quam velit reipub. formam, adimit profectò id in quo civilis libertas tota ferè consistit. Citas deinde Justinum Martyrem, Antoninis imperatorum optimis obsequium deferentem; quisnam iis tam egregiis et moderatis non detulisset? "At quantò, inquis, nos hodie pejores Christiani? tulerunt illi principem diversæ religionis." Privati scilicet, et viribus longè inferiores. "Nunc sanè pontificii regem non ferrent reformatum," nec "reformati pontificium." Facis tu quidem prudenter, ut ostendas te nec pontificium esse, nec reformatum; facis etiam liberaliter; ultrò enim largiris quod nunc non petivimus, omnes hodie Christianos in hoc planè consentire, quod tu solus insigni audacia atque scelere oppugnas, patrum etiam quos laudas dissimillimus; illi enim pro Christianis, ad profanos reges, defensionis conscribebant, tu pro rege pontificio atque deterrimo contra Christianos et Reformatos. Multa deinde ex Athenagora, multa ex Tertulliano, futiliter depromis, quæ ab ipsis Apostolis multò clariùs et explanatiùs dicta jam sunt. Tertullianus autem longissimè à te dissentit, qui regem vis esse dominum: quod tu aut nescivisti, aut nequiter dissimulâsti. Is enim christianus ad imperatorem ethnicum in Apologetico ausus est scribere, non oportere imperatorem appellari dominum. "Augustus," inquit, "imperii formator, ne dominum quidem dici se volebat, hoc enim Dei est cognomen: dicam planè imperatorem dominum; sed quando non cogor ut dominum Dei vice dicam: cæterùm liber sum illi, Dominus meus Deus unus est," &c.; et ibidem "qui pater patriæ est, quomodo dominus est?" Gratulare nunc tibi de Tertulliano, quem sanè præstabat missum fecisse. "At parricidas appellat qui Domitianum interfecerunt." Rectè appellat; uxoris enim et famulorum insidiis, à Parthenio, et Stephano interceptarum pecuniarum reo, est interfectus. Quod si senatus populusque Romanus hostem judicatum, ut Neronem priùs judicabant, et ad supplicium quærebant, more majorum punivissent, eos parricidas appellaturum fuisse censes? immo si appellâsset, dignus ipse supplicio fuisset; uti tu furcâ jam dignus es. Origeni responsum idem quadrabit quod Irenæo. Athanasius reges terræ ad humana tribunalia vocare nefarium esse dicit. Quis hoc dixit Athanasio? verbum enim Dei nullum hìc audio. Credam itaque ego imperatoribus potiùs et regibus, de se falsum hoc esse fatentibus, quàm Athanasio. Adfers deinde Ambrosium ex proconsule et catechumeno episcopum, verba illa Davidis, "tibi soli peccavi," imperitè, ne dicam assentatoriè, interpretantem. Volebat is omnes alios imperatori subjectos esse, ut imperatorem ipse subjiceret sibi. Quàm enim superbè, et fastu plusquàm pontificio, Theodosium imperatorem Mediolani tractaverit, cœdis Thessalonicensis reum ipse judicaverit, ingressu ecclesiæ prohibuerit, quàm se deinde novitium et rudem evangelicæ doctrinæ ostenderit, omnibus notum est. Imperatorem ad pedes ejus provolutum excedere salutatorio jussit; sacris tandem restitutum, et postquam obtulisset, altari adstantem his vocibus extra cancellos exegit. "O imperator, interiora loca tantùm sacerdotibus sunt attributa, quæ cæteris contingere non licet." Doctorne hic evangelii, an Judaïcorum pontifex rituum fuit? Hic tamen (quæ omnium ferè ecclesiasticorum artes sunt) imperatorem cæteris dominum imposuit, ut imperatoris ipse dominus esset. His itaque verbis Theodosium tanquam sibi subjectum repulit; "Coæqualium hominum es imperator et conservorum; unus enim omnium dominus rex et Creator." Bellè profectò; quam veritatem calliditas et assentatio episcoporum obscuravit, eam iracundia unius, et ut molliùs dicam, zelus ineruditus, protulit in lucem. Ambrosii imperitiæ tuam subjungis ignorantiam aut hæresin, qui disertè negas "sub veteri fœdere remissionem peccatorum per sanguinem Christi locum tunc habuisse, cum David Deo confitebatur ei soli se peccavisse." p. 68. Orthodoxi, non nisi per sanguinem agni mactati ab initio mundi, peccata unquam remissa fuisse credunt; te novum hæreticum cujusnam discipulus sis nescio; certè summi Theologi discipulus ille, quem exagitas, à vero non aberravit, cum dixit potuisse quemvis è populo pari jure cum Davide Deum his verbis inclamâsse, "tibi soli peccavi." Augustinum deinde ostentas; clericos Hipponenses nescio quos producis; nam Augustini quæ sunt abs te allata nobis non obsunt. Quidni enim fateamur cum propheta Daniële, Deum tempora mutare, regna dare, et regna auferre, per homines tamen. Si regnum Deus solus Carolo dedit, idem Carolo abstulit, optimatibus et populo dedit. Si ea de causa præstandam Carolo obedientiam fuisse dicis, eandem nunc magistratibus nostris præstandam esse dicas necesse est. Nam Deum et nostris etiam magistratibus candem dedisse potestatem, quam dat malis regibus "ad castiganda populi peccata," ipse concedis; nostros itaque à Deo pariter constitutos removere à magistratu nemo, vel tuo judicio, nisi Deus potest. Atque ita, uti soles, tuum tibi ipse mucronem in temet vertis, tuus tibi ipse sicarius es; neque injuriâ, cum eò improbitatis et impudentiæ processeris, eò stuporis et insaniæ, ut quos digito violandos non esse tot argumentis probas, eosdem omnium suorum bello persequendos esse idem affirmes. Ismaëlem, Godoliæ præfecti interfectorem, ab Hieronymo parricidam esse nominatum aïs, et meritò; præsidem enim Judææ, virum bonum, sine ulla causa interemit. Idem Hieronymus in Ecclesiasten, præceptum illud Solomonis, "Os regis observa," cum præcepto Pauli concordare dixit; et laudandus quidem, quòd locum istum cæteris sui temporis moderatiùs exposuit. "Ad inferiora tempora post Augustinum non descendes, ut doctorum sententiam exquiras." Ut omnes tamen intelligant faciliùs mentiri te posse quàm tacere, si quos adhuc haberes tuæ sententiæ fautores, post unam statim periodum non temperas tibi, quò minùs ad Hispalensem Isidorum, Gregorium Turonensem Ottonem, Frinsingensem etiam in mediam barbariem, descendas. Quorum authoritas quàm nullius apud nos pretii sit si modò scivisses, non huc eorum obscurum testimonium per mendacium adduxisses. Vultis scire cur ad hæc tempora descendere non audet, cur abdit se, cur subitò evanescit? dicam: quot sunt Ecclesiæ Reformatæ præstantissimi doctores, tot videt acerrimos sibi adversarios fore. Faciat modò periculum, sentiet quàm facilè reluctantem, omnes in unum vires conferentem, Lutheris, Zuingliis, Calvinis, Buceris, Martyribus, Paræis, in aciem eductis fundam atque obruam. Leidenses etiam tuos tibi opponam, quorum academia, quorum respub. florentissima, libertatis olim domicilium, isti denique literarum humaniorum fontes atque rivi, servilem illam æruginem tuam, et innatam barbariem, eluere non potuerunt. Qui cùm theologum orthodoxum habeas neminem tibi faventem, quem tuo commodo nominare possis, omnium præsidio reformatorum nudatus, confugere ad Sorbonam non erubescis: quod tu collegium doctrinæ pontificiæ addictissimum nullius apud orthodoxos authoritatis esse non ignoras. Sorbonæ igitur absorbendum tam sceleratum tyrannidis propugnatorem tradimus; tam vile mancipium nostrum esse nolumus; qui "populum universum regi ignavissimo parem esse" negat. Frustra id in papam deonerare atque transferre contendis, quod omnes liberæ nationes, omnis religio, omnes orthodoxi, sibi sumunt, in se suscipiunt. Papa quidem cum episcopis suis, dum tenuis et nullarum virium erat, tuæ hujus fœdissimæ doctrinæ author primus extitit; iis demùm artibus magnas opes, magnamque potentiam, paulatim adeptus, tyrannorum ipse maximus evasit. Quos tamen omnes sibi firmissimè devinxit, cùm populis, quorum animos jamdiu superstitione oppressos tenuerat, suaderet, non posse regibus quamlibet pessimis, nisi se fidelitatis sacramentum solvente, imperium abrogari. Verùm tu scriptores orthodoxos devitas, et quæ communis et notissima ipsorum sententia est, eam à papa introductam esse causatus, veritatem in invidiam rapere conaris. Quod nisi astutè faceres, appareret te neque papanum esse neque reformatum, sed nescio quem semibarbarum Edomæum Herodianum, qui tyrannum quemque immanissimum, tanquam Messiam cœlo demissum, colas atque adores. "Demonstrâsse te" hoc dicis "ex doctrina patrum, primorum quatuor sæculorum, quæ sola evangelica et christiana censeri debet." Periit huic homini pudor; quàm multa sunt ab illis dicta atque scripta, quæ Christus et Apostoli neque docuerunt neque approbârunt? quàm multa in quibus reformati omnes à patribus dissentiunt? Quid autem ex patribus demonstravisti? "reges etiam malos à Deo constitui." Fac esse constitutos, ut omnia etiam mala quodammodo à Deo constituuntur: "eos proinde Deum solum habere judicem, supra leges esse, nulla lege scripta, non scripta, naturali, neque divina, posse reos fieri à subditis, neque apud subditos suos." Quare? certè nulla lex vetat, nulla reges excipit: ratio, et jus, et fas omne, animadverti in omnes qui peccant indiscriminatim jubet. Neque tu legem ullam scriptam, non scriptam, naturalem, aut divinam, protulisti quæ vetaret. Cur ergò non in reges quoque animadvertendum? "quia sunt etiam mali à Deo constituti." Nebulonem te magis an bardum et caudicem esse dicam? nequissimus sis oportet, qui doctrinam perniciosissimam in vulgus disseminare audeas, stupidissimus, qui ratione tam stolida maximè nitaris. Dixit Deus, Isaiæ 54. "Ego creavi interfectorem ad perdendum;" ergò interfector supra leges est; excute hæc, et pervolve quantum voles, parem utrobique consequentiam invenies. Nam et papa etiam eodem modo, quo tyrannus, à Deo est constitutus, et ecclesiæ in pœnam datus, quod supra ex scriptis etiam tuis ostendimus; tamen "quia in fastigium potestatis non ferendum, tyrannidi non absimilis, primatum suum evexit, cùm eum, tum episcopos, meliori jure tollendos esse" affirmas "quàm fuere constituti." Wal. Mes. p. 412. Papam et episcopos, quamvis ab irato Deo constitutos, ex ecclesia tollendos esse aïs, quia sunt tyranni; tyrannos ex repub. tollendos esse negas quia sunt ab irato Deo constituti. Ineptè prorsus et absurdè: cùm enim papa ipsam conscientiam, quæ sola regnum ejus est, invito quoquam lædere non possit, cum, qui revera tyrannus esse non potest, quasi tyrannum gravissimum tollendum esse clamas; tyrannum autem verum, qui vitam et facultates nostras omnes in potestate sua habet, et sine quo papa in ecclesia tyrannus esse nequit, eum in repub. omnino ferendum esse contendis. Hæc tua sibi invicem collata tam imperitum te tamque puerilem sive falsi sive veri argutatorem produnt, ut levitas tua, inscitia, temeritas, incogitantia, neminem posthac latere queat. At ratio subest altera, "rerum vices inversæ viderentur," quippe in melius; actum enim esset de rebus humanis, si quæ res pessimo loco sunt, in eodem semper starent: in melius inquam; authoritas enim regia ad populum rediret, ab cujus voluntate atque suffragiis profecta primò, atque in unum ex suo numero derivata erat: potestas ab eo qui injuriam intulit, ad eum qui injuriam est passus, æquissima lege transiret; cùm tertius nemo inter homines idoneus esse possit, alienigenam enim judicare quis ferret? omnes æquè homines legibus tenerentur, quo nihil justius esse potest: deus mortalis nemo esset. Quem qui inter homines constituit, non minùs in rempub. scelestus est, quàm in ecclesiam. Tuis iterum in te armis utar. "Maximam hæresin esse" aïs "qua creditur unum hominem in loco Christi sedere: duæ hæ notæ antichristum signant, infallibilitas in spiritualibus, et omnipotentia in temporalibus," Apparat. ad Primat. p. 171. An reges infallibiles? Cur ergò omnipotentes? aut si hoc sunt, cur minùs exitiales rebus civilibus quàm papa spiritualibus? An verò Deus res civiles prorsus non curat? si non curat, certè nos curare non prohibet; si curat, eandem in republica reformationem atque in ecclesia vult fieri; præsertim si infallibilitatem et omnipotentiam attributam homini easdem malorum omnium utrinque causas esse exploratum sit. Non enim in negotiis civilibus eam patientiam præcepit, ut sævissimum quemlibet tyrannum respublica ferret, ecclesia non ferret; immò contrarium potiùs præcepit: et ecclesiæ quidem nulla arma præter patientiam, innocentiam, preces, et disciplinam evangelicam, reliquit; reipublicæ et magistratibus simul omnibus non patientiam, sed leges et gladium, injuriarum et violentiæ vindicem, in manus tradidit. Unde hujus hominis perversum et præposterum ingenium aut mirari subit aut ridere; qui in ecclesia Helvidius est et Thraseas et planè tyrannicida; in republica commune omnium tyrannorum mancipium et satelles. Cujus sententia si locum habeat, non nos solùm rebellavimus, qui regem, sed reformati etiam omnes, qui papam dominum invitis regibus, rejecerunt. Jamdiu autem est quòd suis ipse telis concisus jacet. Sic enim homo est, modò manus adversarii ne desit, ipse in se tela abundè suppeditat: nec quisquam ad refutandum se, aut irridendum, commodiores ansas ministrat. Defessus etiam cædendo citius quis abscedat, quàm hic terga præbendo.

CAPUT IV.

Magnam à regibus iniisse te gratiam, omnes principes et terrarum dominos demeruisse, defensione hac regia te fortè putas, Salmasi, cùm illi, si bona sua, remque suam, ex veritate potius quàm ex adulationibus tuis vellent æstimare, neminem te pejus odisse, neminem à se longiùs abigere atque arcere, debeant. Dum enim regiam potestatem supra leges in immensum extollis, admones eàdem operâ omnes ferè populos servitutis suæ nec opinatæ; eoque vehementiùs impellis ut veternum illum, quo se esse liberos inaniter somniabant, repentè excutiant; moniti abs te, quod non putabant, servos se esse regum. Eoque minùs tolerandum sibi esse regium imperium existimabunt, quò magis tu iis persuasum reddideris tam infinitam potestatem non sua patientiâ crevisse, sed ab initio talem atque tantam ipso jure regio natam fuisse. Ita te, tuamque hanc defensionem, sive populo persuaseris, sive non persuaseris, omnibus posthac regibus funestam, exitialem, et execrabilem, fore necesse erit. Si enim populo persuaseris, jus regium omnipotens esse, regnum amplius non feret; si non persuaseris, non feret reges, dominationem tuam injustam pro jure usurpantes. Me si audiant, quibus integrum hoc est, seque circumscribi legibus patiantur, pro incerto, imbecillo, violento, imperio quod nunc habent, curarum atque formidinum pleno, firmissimum, pacatissimum, ac diuturnum, sibi conservabunt. Consilium hoc sibi, suisque regnis, adeò salutiferum si propter authorem contempserint, sciant non tam esse meum, quàm regis olim sapientissimi. Lycurgus enim Spartanorum rex, antiqua regum stirpe oriundus, cùm propinquos videret suos Argis et Messenæ rerum potitos, regnum quemque suum in tyrannidem convertisse, sibique pariter suisque civitatibus exitio fuisse, ut patriæ simul saluti consuleret, et dignitatem in familia sua regiam quàm diutissimè conservaret, consortem imperii senatum, et ephororum potestatem in ipsum regem quasi censoriam, firmamentum regno suo, indixit. Quo facto regnum suis nepotibus firmissimum in multa secula transmisit. Sive, ut alii volunt, Theopompi, qui centum ampliùs annis post Lycurgum Lacedæmone regnabat, ea moderatio fuit, ut popularem ephororum potestatem superiorem quam suam constitueret, eoque facto gloriatus est stabilivisse se regnum, multoque majus ac diuturnius filiis reliquisse; exemplum profectò haud ignobile hodierni reges ad imitandum habuerint, eundem etiam consilii tutissimi authorem egregium. Majorem enim legibus dominum, ut perferrent homines hominem omnes unum, nulla lex unquam sanxit; ne potuit quidem sancire. Quæ enim lex leges omnes evèrtit, ipsa lex esse non potest. Cùm itaque eversorem te, et parricidam legum omnium, rejiciant ab se leges, exemplis redintegrare certamen, hoc capite, conaris. Faciamus itaque periculum in exemplis: sæpe enim, quod leges tacent, et tacendo tantùm innuunt, id exempla evidentiùs docent. Ab Judæis auspicabimur, voluntatis divinæ consultissimis; "postea ad Christianos" tecum "descendemus." Initium autem altiùs petitum ab eo tempore faciemus, quo Israëlitæ, regibus quocunque modo subjecti, jugum illud servile cervicibus dejecerunt. Rex Moabitarum Eglon Israëlitas bello subegerat; sedem imperii inter ipsos Hierichunte posuerat: numinis contemptor non erat, facta enim Dei mentione, è solio surrexit: servierant Israëlitæ Egloni annos duodeviginti; non ut hosti, sed ut suo regi, munus miserant. Hunc tamen dum publicè munerantur ut regem suum, interficiunt per insidias ut hostem. Verùm Ehudes, qui interfecit, Dei monitu id fecisse creditur. Quid factum hujusmodi commendare magis potuit? Ad honesta enim quæque et laudabilia hortari solet Deus, non ad injusta, infida, truculenta. Expressum autem Dei mandatum habuisse nusquam legimus, "clamârunt filii Israëlis ad Jehovam;" clamavimus et nos: excitavit iis Jehova servatorem; excitavit et nobis. Ille ex vicino domesticus, ex hoste rex, factus erat; noster ex rege hostis: non ergo rex erat; nam neque civis ullo modo esse potest, qui reipublicæ est hostis; nequé consul habebatur Antonius, neque Nero imperator, ex quo uterque hostis à senatu est judicatus. Quod Cicero quarta Philippica de Antonio clarissimè docet: "Si consul Antonius, Brutus hostis; si conservator reipublicæ Brutus, hostis Antonius. Quis illum consulem, nisi latrones, putant?" Pari ego jure, quis tyrannum, inquam, regem, nisi hostes patriæ, putant? Fuerit itaque Eglon externus, fuerit noster domesticus necne, quandoquidem uterque hostis et tyrannus, parum refert. Si illum Ehudes jure trucidavit, nos nostrum supplicio jure affecimus. Quin et heros ille Sampson, incusantibus etiam popularibus suis, (Jud. 15.) "An nesciebas Phelisthæos dominium habere in nos?" suis tamen dominis bellum solus intulit, neque unum sed multos simul patriæ suæ tyrannos, sive Dei, sive propriæ virtutis instinctu, occidit; conceptis priùs ad Deum precibus ut auxilio sibi esset. Non impium ergò sed pium Sampsoni visum est, dominos, patriæ tyrannos occidere; cum tamen pars major civium servitutem non detrectaret. At David, rex et propheta, noluit Saulem interimere "unctum Dei." Non quicquid noluit David, continuò nos obligat ut nolimus; noluit David privatus; id statim nolle synedrium, parlamentum, totum populum, necesse erit? noluit inimicum dolo occidere, nolet ergò magistratus noxium lege punire? noluit regem occidere, timebit ergò senatus tyrannum plectere? religio erat illi unctum Dei interficere, an ergò religio erit populo unctum suum capitis damnare? præsertim qui unctionem illam, vel sacram vel civilem, totus cruore civium delibutus, tam longa hostilitate aboleverat? Equidem reges, vel quos Deus per prophetas unxit, vel quos ad certum opus, sicuti olim Cyrum, nominatim destinavit, Isa. 44. unctos Domini agnosco; cæteros vel populi, vel militum, vel factionis tantummodò suæ, unctos esse arbitror. Verum ut concedam tibi omnes reges esse unctos Domini; esse tamen idcirco supra leges, non esse ob scelera quæcunque puniendos, nunquam evinces. Quid enim? et sibi et privatis quibusdam interdixit David, ne extenderent manus suas in unctum Domini. At regibus interdixit ipse Dominus, Psal. 105. ne attingerent unctos suos, id est, populum suum. Unctionem sui populi prætulit unctioni, siqua erat, regum. An ergò fideles punire, si quid contra leges commiserint, non licebit? Unctum Domini sacerdotem, Abiatharem, prope erat ut rex Solomon morte multaret; neque illi, quòd unctos Domini esset, pepercit, sed quòd patris fuerat amicus. Si ergò summum sacerdotem, summum eundem in plerisque magistratum, unctio illa Domini, et sacra et civilis, eximere supplicio non potuit, cur unctio tantum civilis tyrannum eximeret? At "Saul quoque tyrannus erat, et morte dignus;" esto: non inde enim sequetur, dignum aut idoneum fuisse Davidem, qui sine populi authoritate, aut magistratuum jussu, Saulem regem quocunque in loco interficeret. Itane verò Saul tyrannus erat? Utinam diceres; quinimmo dicis; cùm tamen suprà dixeris, cap. 2. pag. 32. "Tyrannum non fuisse, sed bonum et electum." Ecquid causæ est nunc cur in foro quadruplator aut falsarius quispiam stigmate notetur, tu eadem careas ignominiæ nota? cùm meliori profectò fide sycophantari soleant illi, quàm tu scribere, et res vel maximi momenti tractare. Saul igitur, si id ex usu est tuo, bonus erat rex; sin id minus tibi expedit, repentè non rex bonus, sed tyrannus erit; quod certè mirum non est; dum enim potentiæ tyrannicæ tam impudenter lenocinaris, quid aliud facis quàm ex bonis regibus tyrannos omnes. At verò David, quamvis regem socerum multis de causis, quæ ad nos nihil attinent, interimere nollet, sui tamen tuendi causâ copias comparare, Saulis urbes vel occupare vel insidere, non dubitavit; et Cheilam oppidum contra Saulem etiam præsidio tenuisset, nisi oppidanos erga se malè animatos cognovisset. Quid si Saul, urbe obsessa, scalis muro admotis, primus ascendere voluisset, an censes Davidem arma protinus abjecturum, suos omnes uncto hosti proditurum fuisse? non existimo. Quidni enim fecisset quod nos fecimus, qui, rationum suarum necessitate coactus, Phelisthæis patriæ hostibus operam prolixè suam pollicitus, id fecit contra Saulem, quod nos in nostrum tyrannum credo nunquam fecissemus? Pudet me, et jam diu pertæsum est, mendaciorum tuorum; "Inimicis potiùs parcendum quàm amicis," Anglorum esse dogma fingis; "seque regi suo parcere non debuisse, quia amicus erat." Quis unquam hoc prius audivit, quàm à te confictum esset, hominum mendacissime? Verùm ignoscimus: deerat nempe huic capiti præstantissimum illud et tritissimum orationis tuæ pigmentum, jam quintò, et ante finem libri decies, ex loculis tuis et myrotheciis expromendum, "molossis suis ferociores." Non tam Angli suis molossis ferociores sunt, quàm tu cane quovis rabido jejunior, qui ad illam, quam toties evomuisti, cramben duris ilibus identidem redire sustines. David denique Amalechitam interfici jussit, Saulis, ut simulavit ipse, interfectorem; nulla hic neque facti neque personarum similitudo. Quòd nisi David ad Phelisthæos defecisse, et pars eorum exercitûs fuisse visus, eò diligentiùs omnem à se suspicionem maturandæ regi necis amovere studuit, non erat, meo quidem judicio, cur virum illum tam malè exciperet, qui moribundum jam regem, et ægrè morientem, opportuno vulnere se confecisse nuntiavit. Quod idem factum in Domitiano, qui Epaphroditum similiter capite damnavit, eò quòd Neronem in adipiscenda morte adjuvisset, ab omnibus reprehenditur. Nova deinde audacia quem tyrannum modò dixeras, et "malo spiritu agitatum," hunc non jam satis habes unctum Domini, sed "Christum Domini" vocare; adeò tibi vile Christi nomen videtur, ut illo tam sancto nomine vel dæmoniacum tyrannum impertire non metuas. Venio nunc ad exemplum illud, in quo, qui jus populi jure regis antiquius esse non videt, cæcus sit oportet. Mortuo Solomone, populus de constituendo ejus filio Sechemi comitia habebat; profectus est eò Roboamus candidatus, ne regnum tanquam hæreditatem adire, ne populum liberum tanquam paternos boves possidere, videretur: proponit populus conditiones regni futuri; ad deliberandum rex triduum sibi dari postulat; consulit seniores; nihil illi de jure regio, sed ut populum obsequio et pollicitationibus conciliet sibi, suadent, penès quem erat, vel illum creare regem vel præterire. Consulit deinde æquales suos, secum à pueris educatos; illi, Salmasiano quodam senio perciti, nil præter jus regium intonare, scuticas et scorpiones ut minitetur hortari. Horum ex consilio respondit Roboamus populo. Videns itaque totus Israël regem "non auscultâsse sibi," suam protinus libertatem et populare jus liberis palàm vocibus testatur. "Quæ nobis portio cum Davide? ad tentoria tua, Israël; jam ipse videris de domo tua, David." Missum deinde à rege Adoramum lapidibus obruerunt; exemplum fortasse aliquod etiam in regem edituri, nisi maxima celeritate se in fugam contulisset. Parat ingentem exercitum, quo in suam ditionem Israëlitas redigeret: prohibet Deus; "ne ascendite," inquit, "ne pugnate contra fratres vestros, filios Israëlis, nam à me facta est res ista." Adverte jam animum; populus antea regem volebat, displicuit id Deo; eorum tamen juri noluit intercedere: nunc populus Roboamum non vult regem, id Deus non solùm penès populum esse sinit, sed regem eo nomine bella moventem vetat ac reprimit: nec ideo rebelles, sed nihilo minùs fratres, eos qui desciverant appellandos esse docet. Collige te nunc jam; sunt omnes, inquis, reges à Deo, ergo populus vel tyrannis resistere non debet. Vicissim ego, sunt, inquam, populi conventus, comitia, studia, suffragia, plebiscita pariter à Deo, teste hîc ipso; ergò et rex itidem resistere non debet populo, authore etiam eodem Deo. Quàm enim certum est, esse hodie reges à Deo, quàmque hoc valet ad imperandam populo obedientiam, tam est certam esse à Deo etiam hodie libera populi concilia, tamque hoc valet vel ad cogendos in ordinem reges, vel ad rejiciendos; neque magis propterea bellum populo inferre debebunt, quàm debuit Roboamus. Quæris cur ergò non defecerint Israëlitæ à Solomone? quis præter te tam stulta interrogaret, cùm defecisse constet impunè à tyranno? In tia quædam lapsus est Solomon; non idcirco statim tyrannus: sua vitia magnis virtutibus, magnis de repub. meritis, compensabat: fac tyrannum fuisse; sæpe est ut populus nolit tyrannum tollere, sæpe est ut non possit: satis est sustulisse cùm potuerit. At "factum Jeroboami semper improbatum fuit, et apostasia ejus detestata, successores ejus pro rebellibus semper habiti." Apostasiam ejus non à Roboamo, sed à vero cultu Dei, reprehensam sæpiùs lego; et successores quidem ejus sæpe reprobos, rebelles nusquam, dictos memini. "Si quid fiat," inquis, "juri et legibus contrarium, ex eo jus fieri non potest." Quid quæso tum fiet juri regio? Sic tuus ipse perpetuò refutatores. "Quotidie," inquis, "adulteria, homicidia, furta, impunè committuntur." An nescis nunc te tibi respondere quærenti cur toties tyrannis impunè fuerit? "Rebelles fuerunt isti reges, prophetæ tamen populum ab eorum subjectione non abducebant." Cur ergò, sceleste, et pseudopropheta, populum Anglicanum à suis magistratibus, tuo sint licèt judicio rebelles, abducere conaris? "Allegat," inquis, "Anglicani latrocinii factio, se ad id scelus, quod tam nefariè suscepit, nescio qua voce cœlitùs missa impulsos fuisse." Primùm delirâsse te cum hæc scriberes planè video, neque mentis neque latinitatis compotem satis fuisse: deinde Anglos hoc unquam allegâsse, de innumeris mendaciis et figmentis tuis est unum. Sed pergo exemplis tecum agere; Libna, urbs validissima, ab Joramo rege defecit, quia dereliquerat Deum; defecit ergò rex, non urbs illa, neque defectione ista notatur; sed si adjectam rationem spectes, approbari potiùs videtur. "In exemplum trahi non debent hujusmodi defectiones." Cur ergò tanta vaniloquentiâ pollicitus es, exemplis te nobiscum toto hoc capite decertaturum, cùm exempla ipse nulla præter meras negationes, quarum nulla vis est ad probandum, afferre possis: nos quæ certa et solida attulimus, negas in exemplum trahi debere? Quis te hoc modo disputantem non explodat? Provocâsti nos exemplis; exempla protulimus; quid tu ad hæc? tergiversaris, et diverticula quæris; pregredior itaque. Jehu regem à propheta jussus occidit, etiam Achaziam suum regem legitimum occidendum curavit. Si noluisset Deus tyrannum interimi à cive, si impium hoc, si mali exempli fuisset, cur jussit fieri? si jussit, certè licitum, laudabile, præclarum fuit. Non tamen tyrannum perimi, quia Deus jussit, idcirco bonum erat et licitum, sed quia bonum et licitum erat, idcirco Deus jussit. Jam septem annos regnantem Athaliam Jehoiada sacerdos regno pellere et trucidare non est veritus. "At regnum," inquis, "non sibi debitum sumpserat." Annon Tiberius multò postea "imperium ad se nihil pertinens?" illi tamen, et id genus tyrannis aliis, ex doctrina Christi obediendum esse suprà affirmabas: ridiculum planè esset, si potestatem regiam non ritè adeptum interficere liceret, pessimè gerentem non liceret. At per leges regnare non potuit utpote fœmina, "constitues autem supra te regem," non reginam. Hoc si sic abibit, constitues, inquam, super te regem, non tyrannum. Pares ergò jam sumus. Amaziam regem ignavum et idololatrum non conjurati quidam, sed principes et populus, quod verisimilius est, morte affecerunt: nam fugientem Hierosolymis, et adjutum à nemine, Lachisum usque persecuti sunt. Hoc consilium iniisse dicuntur "ex quo is Deum" deseruerat, neque ullam ab Azaria filio de morte patris quæstionem habitam fuisse legimus. Multum rursus nugaris ex rabbinis, ut regem Judaicum supra synedrium constituas; ipsa regis verba Zedechiæ non attendis, Jer. 38. "Non is est rex, qui possit contra vos quicquam." Sic principes alloquitur; fassus se planè suo senatu inferiorem; "Fortasse," inquis, "nihil negare illis ausus metu seditionis." At tuum illud "fortasse" quanti quæso est, cujus asseveratio firmissima non est pili? quid enim te levius, quid inconstantius, quid instabilius? quoties te varium et versicolorem, quoties tibimet discordem, dissidentem à temetipso, et discrepantem, offendimus? Rursus comparationes instituis Caroli cum bonis Judææ regibus. Davidem imprimis quasi contemnendum aliquem nominas; "Sume tibi Davidem," inquis, "adulterii simul et homicidii reum; nihil tale in Carolo. Solomon ejus filius qui sapiens audiit vulgò." Quis non indignetur maximorum et sanctissimorum virorum nomina ab impurissimo nebulone et vappa hunc in modum jactari? Tune Carolum cum Davide, regem et prophetam religiosissimum cum superstitioso et Christianæ doctrinæ vix initiato, sapientissimum cum stolido, fortissimum cum imbelli, justissimum cum iniquissimo, conferre sustinuisti? castimoniam tu ejus et continentiam laudes, quem cum Duce Bucchingamio flagitiis omnibus coopertum novimus? secretiora ejus et recessus perscrutari quid attinet, qui in theatro medias mulieres petulanter amplecti, et suaviari, qui virginum et matronarum papillas, ne dicam cætera, pertractare in propatulo, consueverat? Te porrò moneo, Pseudoplutarche, ut istiusmodi parallelis ineptissimis dehinc supersedeas, ne ego quæ tacerem alioqui libens de Carolo, necesse habeam enuntiare. Contra tyrannos quid tentatum à populo aut peractum fuerit, et quo jure, per ea tempora quibus ipse Deus Hebræorum rempub. suo nutu ac verbo quasi præsens regebat, hactenus liquet. Quæ sequuntur ætates non nos sua authoritate ducunt, sed, ad majorum suorum normam et rationem omnia dirigentes, imitatione sua nostram tantummodò confirmant. Cùm itaque Deus post captivitatem Babylonicam nullum iis de repub. mandatum dedisset novum, quamvis regia soboles extincta non esset, ad antiquam et Mosaïcam reipub. formam reverterunt. Antiocho Syriæ regi, cui erant vectigales, ejusque præsidibus, quòd is vetita imperaret, per Maccabæos pontifices restiterunt; seque armis in libertatem vindicârunt; dignissimo deinde cuique principatum dederunt: donec Hyrcanus Simonis Judæ Maccabæi fratris filius, expilato Davidis sepulcro, militem externum alere, et regiam quandam potestatem adjicere sacerdotio, cœpit; unde filius ejus Aristobulus diadema sibi primus imposuit. Nihil in eum populus quamvis tyrannum movit aut molitus est; neque mirum, annum tantummodò regnantem. Ipse etiam morbo gravissimo correptus, et suorum facinorum pœnitentiâ ductus, mortem sibi optare non destitit, donec inter ea vota expiravit. Ejus frater Alexander proximus regnabat. "Contra hunc," aïs, "neminem insurrexisse," tyrannus cùm esset. O te securè mendacem, si periisset Josephus, restaret tantum Josippus tuus, ex quo pharisæorum quædam nullius usus apophthegmata depromis. Res itaque sic se habet; Alexander, cùm et domi et militiæ rempub. malè administraret, quamvis magna Pisidarum et Cilicum manu conductitia se tutaretur, populum tamen cohibere non potuit, quin ipsum etiam sacrificantem, utpote indignum eo munere, thyrsis palmeis et citreis penè obrueret; exinde per sexennium gentis ferè totius gravi bello petitus est; in quo Judæorum multa millia cum occidisset, et pacis tandem cupidus interrogaret eos quid vellent à se fieri, responderunt uno ore omnes, ut moreretur; vix etiam mortuo se veniam daturos. Hanc historiam, tibi incommodissimam, quoquo modo avertere ut posses, fraudi tuæ turpissimæ pharisaïcas quasdam sententiolas obtendisti; cùm exemplum hoc aut omnino prætermisisse, aut rem, sicuti gesta erat, fideliter narrâsse, debuisses, nisi veterator et lucifugus mendaciis longè plus quàm causæ confideres. Quinetiam Pharisæi illi octingenti, quos in crucem tolli jussit, ex eorum numero erant, qui contra ipsum arma ceperant: quique omnes cùm cæteris una voce testati sunt, se regem morte affecturos fuisse, si bello victus in suam potestatem venisset. Post maritum Alexandrum Alexandra regnum capessit, sicut olim Athalia, non legitimè, nam regnare fœminam leges non siuebant, quod ipse modò fassus es, sed partim vi, (extraneorum enim exercitum ducebat,) partim gratiâ; nam Pharisæos, qui apud vulgus plurimum poterant, sibi conciliaverat hac lege, ut nomen imperii penès illam, imperium ipsum penès illos, foret. Haud aliter atque apud nos nuper Scoti presbyteri nomen Regis Carolo concesserunt, ea mercede ut regnum sibi reservare possent. Post Alexandræ obitum, Hyrcanus et Aristobulus ejus filii de regno contendunt; hic, viribus et industria potior, fratrem natu majorem regno pellit. Pompeio deinde in Syriam à Mithridatico bello divertente, Judæi nactos se jam æquissimum libertatis suæ arbitrum Pompeium rati, legationem pro se mittunt; fratribus utrisque regibus renuntiant; ad servitutem se ab iis adductos queruntur; Pompeius Aristobulum regno privavit; Hyrcano pontificatum reliquit, et principatum more patrio legitimum; exinde pontifex et ethnarcha dictus est. Iterum sub Archelao Herodis filio Judæi, missis ad Augustum Cæsarem quinquaginta legatis, et Herodem mortuum et Archeläum graviter accusârunt; regnum huic pro sua virili parte abrogarunt, Cæsarem orant ut populum Judaïcum sine regibus esse permitteret. Quorum Cæsar precibus aliquantum permotus, non regem eum, sed ethnarcham duntaxat, constituit. Ejus anno decimo, rursus eum populus per legatos ad Cæsarem tyrannidis accusat; quibus Cæsar benignè auditis, Romam accersitum, et judicio damnatum, Viennam in exilium misit. Jam mihi velim respondeas; qui suos reges accusatos, qui damnatos, qui punitos volebant, annon ipsi, si potestas facta, si optio data sibi esset, annon ipsi, inquam, judicio damnâssent, ipsi supplicio affecissent? Jam in Romanos præsides, avarè et crudeliter provinciam administrantes, populum et primores etiam sæpiùs arma sumpsisse non negas; causas more tuo stultissimas affingis, "nondum jugo erant assueti;" sub Alexandro scilicet, Herode, ejusque filiis. At C. Cæsari, et Petronio "bellum inferre" noluerunt. Prudenter illi quidem, non poterant. Vis ipsorum audire verba? πολεμεῖν μὲν οὐ βουλόμενοι διὰ τὸ μηδ' ἂν δύνασθαι. Quod ipsi fatentur imbecillitatis esse suæ, hoc tu hypocrita ad religionem refers. Magno dein molimine prorsus nihil agis, dum ex patribus probas, quod et antea tamen pari oscitatione feceras, pro regibus orandum esse. Nam pro bonis quis negat? pro malis quoad spes est; pro latronibus etiam et pro hostibus; non ut agros depopulentur, aut nos occisione occidant, sed ut resipiscant. Oramus pro utrisque; illos tamen legibus, hos armis, vindicare quis vetat? "Liturgias Ægyptiacas" nîl moror; sacerdos autem ille qui orabat, uti aïs, ut "Commodus patri succederet," meo quidem judicio non orabat, sed Romano imperio pessima imprecatus est. "Fidem," aïs, "fregisse nos, de authoritate et majestate regis conservanda solenni conventione non semel interpositam." Expecto te fusiùs ista de re infrà, illic te rursus conveniam. Redis ad patrum commentationes, de quibus hoc summatim accipe; Quicquid illi dixerint, neque ex libris sacris, aut ratione aliqua satis idonea confirmaverint, perinde mihi erit, ac si quis alius è vulgo dixisset. Primum adfers Tertullianum, scriptorem haud orthodoxum, multis erroribus notatum, ut si tecum sentiret, pro nihilo tamen hoc esset. Quid autem ille?

damnat tumultus, damnat rebelliones; damnamus et nos, neque hinc statim de jure omni populorum, de privilegiis, et snatûs consultis, de potestate magistratuum omnium cæterorum præterquam unius regis, præjudicatum esse volumus: loquuntur isti de seditionibus temere conflatis, et multitudinis insania, non de magistratibus, non de senatu, aut parlamento ad legitima arma populum contra tyrannos convocante. Unde Ambrosius quem citas, "Non repugnare, flere, gemere, hæc sunt munimenta sacerdotis; et quis est qui potest vel unus vel inter paucos dicere imperatori, Lex tua mihi non probatur? non permittitur hoc dicere sacerdotibus; permittetur laïcis?" Vides jam planè de quibus hic loquatur de sacerdotibus, de laïcis privatis, non de magistratibus: vides quàm infirma tamen et præposterâ ratione usus, dissentioni inter laïcos et sacerdotes, de legibus etiam civilibus, postmodùm futuræ facem prætulit. Sed quoniam primorum Christianorum exemplis urgeri nos maximè, et redargui, putas, quòd illi omnibus modis vexati "bellum in Cæsares non moverent," ostendam primò non potuisse, deinde quoties poterant movisse, postremò etiamsi cùm possent non movissent, non esse tamen cæteroqui dignos, quorum ex vita et moribus, tantis in rebus, exempla sumamus. Primùm ignorare hoc nemo potest, ex quo Romana respublica nulla fuit, omnes imperii vires rerumque summam ad unum Cæsarem rediisse; omnes legiones sub uno Cæsare stipendia meruisse: adeò ut senatus ad unum omnis, totus ordo equester, plebs universa, si novis rebus studuisset, poterant se quidem internecioni objecisse, ad libertatem tamen recuperandam nihil prorsus effecissent; nam imperatorem si fortè sustulissent, imperium tamen mansisset. Jam verò Christiani, innumeri licèt, at sparsi, inermes, plebeii et plerunque infimi, quid potuerunt? quantam eorum multitudinem una legio in officio facilè continuisset? Quod magni sæpe duces cum interitu suo, et veteranorum exercituum deletione, incassum tentârunt, isti è plebecula ferè homuli posse se ad exitum perducere sperarent? cùm annis à Christo nato prope trecentis, ante Constantinum plùs minùs viginti, imperante Diocletiano, sola Thebæa legio Christiana esset; eoque ipso nomine à reliquo exercitu in Gallia, ad Octodurum oppidum, cæsa est. "Cum Cassio, cum Albino, cum Nigro" non conjurârunt: idne illis gratiæ vult apponi Tertullianus, quòd sanguinem pro infidelibus non profuderunt? Constat igitur Christianos ab imperatorum imperio liberare se non potuisse: cum aliis conjurare non Christianis nequaquam sibi expedivisse, quamdiu imperatores ethnici regnabant. Bellum autem tyrannis postea intulisse Christianos aut armis se defendisse, aut tyrannorum facta nefaria sæpe ultos esse, nunc ostendam. Primus omnium Constantinus, jam Christianus, consortem imperii Licinium, Orientalibus Christianis gravem, bello sustulit; quo facto illud simul declaravit, posse à magistratu in magistratum animadverti; cùm is Licinium pari jure secum regnantem, subditorum ejus causâ, supplicio affecerit, nec Deo soli pœnam reliquerit: poterat enim Licinius Constantinum, si Constantinus populum sibi attributum iis modis oppressisset, eodem supplicio affecisse. Postquam igitur à Deo ad homines redacta res est, quod Licinio Constantinus erat, cur non idem Carolo senatus? Constantinum enim milites, senatum jura constituerunt regibus parem, immo superiorem. Constantio imperatori Ariano Byzantini, quoad poterant, armis restiterunt; missum cum militibus Hermogenem, ad pellendum ecclesia Paulum orthodoxum episcopum, facto impetu repulerunt, et incensis ædibus, quo se receperat, semiustum et laniatum interfecerunt. Constans fratri Constantio bellum minatur, ni Paulo et Athanasio episcopis sedes suas restituat; videsne ut istos sanctissimos patres, de episcopatu cùm agitur, bellum fraternum in regem suum concitare non puduit? Haud multò pòst Christiani milites, qui tunc temporis quos volebant imperatores creabant, Constantem Constantini filium, dissolutè et superbè regnantem, interfecerunt, translato ad Magnentium imperio. Quid? qui Julianum nondum apostatam, sed pium et strenuum, invito Constantio imperatore suo, imperatorem salutârunt, annon ex illis Christianis fuerunt, quos tu exemplo nobis proponis? Quod factum Constantius cum suis literis ad populum recitatis acriter prohiberet, clamârunt omnes, fecisse se ut provincialis, et miles, et reipublicæ authoritas, decreverat. Iidem bellum Constantio indixerunt, et, quantum in se erat, imperio ac vita spoliârunt. Quid Antiocheni, homines apprimè Christiani? orârunt, credo, pro Juliano jam apostata, quem palàm adire, et convitiis proscindere, solebant, cujus barbam illudentes promissam, funes ex ea conficere jubebant. Cujus morte audita, supplicationes, epulas, et lætitiam, publicè indixerunt, ejus pro vita et incolumitate preces fudisse censes? Quid? quòd eundem etiam à Christiano commilitone interfectum esse ferunt. Sozomenus certè scriptor ecclesiasticus non negat; immo, siquis ita fecisset, laudat. οὐ γὰρ ἀπεικός τινα τῶν τότε ϛρατευομενων, &c. "Non est mirum," inquit, "aliquem ex militibus hoc secum cogitâsse; non Græcos solùm, sed omnes homines ad hanc usque ætatem tyrannicidas laudare solitos esse, qui pro omnium libertate mortem oppetere non dubitant; nec temere quis hunc militem reprehendat, Dei et religionis causâ tam strenuum." Hæc Sozomenus, ejusdem ætatis scriptor, vir bonus et sanctus; ex quo, quid reliqui ea tempestate viri boni hac de re senserint, facilè perspicimus. Ipse Ambrosius ab imperatore Valentiniano minore jussus urbe Mediolano excedete, parere noluit, sed circumseptus armato populo se, atque basilicam suam, contra regios præfectos armis defendit; et summæ potestati resistere, contra quàm docuit ipse, est ausus. Constantinopoli haud semel, propter exilium Chrysostomi, contra Arcadium imperatorem seditio maxima commota est. In tyrannos igitur quid antiqui Christiani fecerint, non milites solum, sed populus, sed ipsi patres, vel resistendo, vel gerendo bellum, vel concitando, usque ad Augustini tempora, quoniam tibi ulteriùs progredi non libet, breviter exposui. Valentinianum enim Placidiæ filium interfectum à Maximo patricio, ob stuprum uxori ejus illatum, taceo: Avitum etiam imperatorem, dimissis militibus suis, luxuria diffluentem à senatu Romano confestim exutum imperio non memoro: quia annos aliquot post Augustinum obitum ista acciderunt. Verùm dono tibi hoc omne, tu nihil horum exposuisse me finge, paruerint per omnia suis regibus veteres Christiani, quicquam contra tyrannos ne fecerint, aut fecisse voluerint, non esse tamen eos quorum authoritate niti debeamus, aut à quibus exempla petere salutariter possimus; quod superest, nunc docebo. Jamdiu ante Constantinum populus Christianus multum de primæva illa sanctimonia et sinceritate cum doctrinæ tum morum deperdiderat. Postquam immensis opibus ditata ab eo ecclesia honores, dominatum, et potentiam civilem, adamare cœpit, statim omnia in præceps ruere. Primò luxus et segnities, errorum deinde omnium et vitiorum caterva, veluti solutis aliunde carceribus, in ecclesiam immigravit; hinc invidentia, odium, discordia, passim redundabat; tandem haud mitius inter se charissimo religionis vinculo fratres quàm hostes acerrimi dissidebant; nullus pudor, nulla officii ratio, restabat; milites, et copiarum præfecti, quoties ipsis visum erat, nunc imperatores novos creabant, nunc bonos pariter ac malos necabant. Quid Vetranniones et Maximos, quid Eugenios, à militibus ad imperium subitò evectos, quid Gratianum optimum principem, quid Valentinianum minorem non pessimum, occisos ab iis, commemorem? Militum hæc quidem facinora et castrensium, sed tamen Christianorum illius ætatis, quam tu maximè evangelicam et imitandam esse aïs. Jam ergò de ecclesiasticis pauca accipe: pastores et episcopi, et nonnunquam illi, quos admiramur, patres, sui quisque gregis ductores, de episcopatu non secus quàm de tyrannide certabant: nunc per urbem, nunc in ipsa ecclesia, ad ipsum altare, sacerdotes et laici promiscuè digladiabantur; cædes faciebant, strages utrinque magnas nonnunquam ediderunt. Damasi et Ursicini, qui cum Ambrosio floruerunt, potest meminisse. Longum esset Byzantinos, Antiochenos, et Alexandrinos, illos tumultus, sub Cyrillo præsertim, quem tu laudas obedientiæ prædicatorem, duce ac patre; occiso pœne à monachis, in illo urbico prælio, Oreste Theodosii præfecto. Jam tua quis vel impudentia vel supinitate non obstupescat? "Usque ad Augustinum," inquis, "et infra ejus ætatem, nulla cujusquam privati aut præfecti, aut plurium conjuratorum extat in historiis mentio, qui regem suum necaverint, aut contra eum armis pugnârint:" nominavi ego ex historiis notissimis et privatos, et proceres, qui non malos tantùm, sed vel optimos reges, sua manu trucidaverint; totos Christianorum exercitus, multos cum iis episcopos, qui contra suos imperatores pugnaverint. Adfers patres, obedientiam erga regem, multis verbis aut suadentes aut ostentantes; adfero ego partim eosdem, partim alios patres haud paucioribus factis obedientiam, etiam licitis in rebus, detrectantes, armis se contra imperatorem defendentes, alios præsidibus ejus vim et vulnera inferentes, alios, episcopatûs competitores, civilibus præliis inter se dimicantes; scilicet de episcopatu Christianos cum Christianis, cives cum civibus, confligere fas erat, de libertate, de liberis et conjugibus, de vita, cum tyranno, nefas. Quem non pœniteat hujusmodi patrum? Augustinum inducis "de potestate domini in servos, et regis in subditos" idem pronuntiantem; respondeo, ista si dicat Augustinus, ea dicere, quæ neque Christus, neque ejus Apostoli, unquam dixerunt; cùm eorum tamen sola authoritate rem alioqui apertissimè falsam commendare videatur. Quæ supersunt hujus capitis tres vel quatuor paginæ, aut mera esse mendacia, aut oscitationes identidem repetitas, ex iis quæ à nobis responsa jam sunt, per se quisque deprehendet. Nam ad papam quod attinet, in quem multa gratìs peroras, facilè te patior ad ravim usque declamitare. Quod tamen ad captandos rerum imperitos tam prolixè adstruis, "regibus, sive justis sive tyrannis, subjectum fuisse omnem Christianum, donec potestas papæ regali major agnosci cœpta est, et subjectos sacramento fidelitatis liberavit," id esse falsissimum plurimis exemplis "et usque ad Augustinum, et infra ejus ætatem," prolatis demonstravimus. Sed neque illud, quod postremò dicis, "Zachariam pontificem Gallos juramento fidelitatis absolvisse," multò verius esse videtur. Negat Franciscus Hotomanus, et Gallus, et jurisconsultus, et vir doctissimus, in Francogallia sua, cap. 13. abdicatum authoritate papæ Chilpericum, aut regnum Pipino delatum; sed in magno gentis concilio pro sua pristina authoritate transactum fuisse id omne negotium, ex annalibus Francorum vetustissimis probat. Solvi deinde illo sacramento Gallos omnino opus fuisse, negant ipsa Gallorum monumenta, negat ipse papa Zacharias. Monumentis enim Francorum traditur, teste non solùm Hotomano, sed Girardo historiarum illius gentis notissimo scriptore, veteres Francos ut eligendi, sic abdicandi, si videretur, suos reges jus sibi omne antiquitus reservâsse; neque aliud sacramentum regibus, quos creabant, dicere consuevisse, quàm se illis hoc pacto fidem et officium præstituros, si vicissim illi, quod eodem tempore jurati etiam spondent, præstiterint. Si ergò reges, rempublicam sibi commissam malè gerendo, fidem jusjurandi fregerint priores, nîl opus est papâ, ipsi suâ perfidiâ populum sacramento solverunt. Papa denique Zacharias, quam tu authoritatem sibi aïs arrogâsse, eam in epistola illa ad Francos abs te citata ipse sibi derogavit, populo attribuit. Nam "si princeps populo, cujus beneficio regnum possidet, obnoxius est, si plebs regem constituit, et destituere potest," quæ ipsius verba sunt papæ, verisimile non est voluisse Francos de antiquo jure suo, ullo postmodùm jurejurando, præjudicium facere; aut unquam ita sese obstrinxisse, quin semper sibi liceret, quod majoribus suis licuit, reges bonos quidem colere, malos amovere; nec eam præstare fidem tyrannis, quam bonis regibus dare sese arbitrati sunt. Tali obstrictum juramento populum, vel tyrannus ex rege factus, vel ignavia corruptus, suo ipse perjurio solvit, solvit ipsa justitia, solvit naturæ lex ipsa: unde pontifex quod solveret, etiam ipsius pontificis judicio nihil prorsus erat.

CAPUT V.

Quanquam in ea sum opinione, Salmasi, semperque fui, legem Dei cùm lege naturæ optimè consentire, adeòque, si satis ostendi quid divina lege sit de regibus statutum, quid à populo Dei factum et Judaïco et Christiano, ostendisse me, eodem tempore eademque opera, quid legi naturali maximè consentaneum sit; tamen quia "confutari nos lege naturæ validissimè nunc posse" arbitraris, quod supervacuum esse modò existimabam, id nunc ultrò necessarium fatebor; ut contra te hoc capite planum faciam, nihil congruentius naturæ etiam legibus esse, quàm tyrannos plecti. Id nisi evincam, non recuso quin, Dei quoque legibus puniri non posse, è vestigio tibi concedam. Non est consilium de natura jam, deque origine civilis vitæ, longam orationem contexere; istud enim argumentum viri disertissimi cum Græci, tum Latini, copiosè pertractàrunt; ipse et brevitati, quantum licet, studeo, et huic rei do operam, ut non tam ego, qui labori huic parcissem libens, sed tute te redarguas, teque subvertas. Ab eo igitur quod ipse ponis incipiam, et disputationis hujus futuræ fundamenta jaciam. "Lex," inquis, "naturæ est ratio omnium hominum mentibus insita, bonum respiciens universorum populorum, quatenus homines inter se societate gaudent. Bonum illud commune non potest procurare, nisi etiam, ut sunt quos regi necesse est, disponat quoque qui regere debeant." Ne scilicet, ut quisque fortior est, debiliorem opprimat; atque ita quos mutua salus ac defensio unum in locum congregaverat, vis atque injuria distrahat, et ad vitam agrestem redire cogat. Estne hoc quod volebas, etsi verbosiùs? "Ex ipsorum" itaque "numero qui in unum convenêre, deligi" ais "oportuisse quosdam sapientia aut fortitudine cæteris præstantes, qui vel vi vel persuadendo malè morigeros in officio continerent; sæpe unum id præstare potuisse, cujus excellens sit virtus et prudentia; interdum plures, qui mutuis consiliis id faciant. Cæterùm cum unus omnia providere et administrare non possit, necesse est ut consilia cum pluribus participet, et in societatem regiminis alios admittat. Ita sive ad unum revocetur imperium, sive ad universum redeat populum, quia nec omnes simul rempub. gubernare possunt, nec unus omnia, ideo revera penès plures semper regimen consistit." Et infrà. "Ipsa autem regendi ratio, sive per plures, sive per pauciores, sive per unum, dispensetur, æquè naturalis est, cum ex naturæ ejusdem principiis descendat, quæ non patitur ita unius singularitatem gubernare, ut non alios socios imperandi habeat." Hæc cùm ex Aristotelis tertiò politicorum decerpsisse potueram, malui abs te decerpta transcribere, quæ tu Aristoteli, ut ignem Jovi Prometheus, ad eversionem monarcharum, et perniciem ipsius tuam, surripuisti. Jam enim prolatam à temetipso naturæ legem excute quantum voles; nullum juri regio, prout tu jus illud explicas, in natura locum, nullum ejus vestigium, prorsus invenies. "Lex," inquis, "naturæ, cum disponeret qui regere alios deberent, universorum populorum bonum respexit." Non igitur unius, non monarchæ. Est itaque rex propter populum: populus ergò rege potior et superior; superior cum sit et potior populus, nullum jus regis existere potest, quo populum is affligat, aut in servitute habeat, inferior superiorem. Jus malè faciendi cùm sit regi nullum, manet jus populi naturâ supremum; ut quo jure homines consilia et vires mutuæ defensionis gratiâ, ante reges creatos, primò consociavere; quo jure ad communem omnium salutem, pacem, libertatem, conservandam unum vel plures cæteris præfecerunt, eodem jure, quos propter virtutem et prudentiam cæteris præposuerant, possent eosdem aut quoscunque alios rempub. malè gerentes, propter ignaviam, stultitiam, improbitatem, perfidiam, vel coërcere vel abdicare: cùm natura non unius vel paucorum imperium, sed universorum salutem, respexerit semper et respiciat. Jam verò populus quosnam delegit? "sapientia" inquis "aut fortitudine cæteris præstantes," nempe qui naturâ maximè regno idonei visi sunt, "cujus excellens virtus, et prudentia præstare id" muneris "potuit." Jus igitur successionis naturâ nullum, nullus naturâ rex, nisi qui sapientia et fortitudine cæteris omnibus præcellit: cæteri vel vi, vel factione, contra naturam reges sunt, cum servi potiùs esse deberent. Dat enim natura sapientissimo cuique in minùs sapientes imperium, non viro malo in bonos, non stolido in sapientes: his igitur imperium qui abrogant, omnino convenienter naturæ faciunt. Cui fini sapientissimum quemque natura constituat regem, ex temetipso audi; ut vel naturæ vel legibus "malè morigeros in officio contineat." Continere autem in officio potestne is alios, officium qui negligit, aut nescit, aut pervertit, ipse suum? Cedò jam quodvis naturæ præceptum, quo jubeamur instituta naturæ sapientissima in rebus publicis et civilibus non observare, non curare, pro nihilo habere, cùm ipsa in rebus naturalibus et inanimatis, ne suo fine frustretur, sæpissimè res magnas atque miras efficere soleat. Ostende ullam vel naturæ vel naturalis justitiæ regulam, qua oporteat reos minores puniri, reges et malorum omnium principes impunitos esse, immò inter maxima flagitia coli, adorari, et Deo proximos haberi. Concedis "ipsam regendi rationem, sive per plures, sive per pauciores, sive per unum, dispensetur, æque naturalem esse." Non est ergò rex vel optimatibus vel populi magistratibus naturâ sanctior, quos cùm punire posse ac debere, si peccant, suprà sis largitus, idem de regibus, eidem fini ac bono constitutis, fateare necesse est. "Non" enim "patitur natura," inquis, "ita unius singularitatem gubernare, ut non alios socios imperandi habeat." Minimè ergò patitur monarcham, minimè unum ita imperare, ut cæteros omnes sui unius imperii servos habeat. Socios autem imperandi qui tribuis regi, "penès quos semper regimen consistat" das eidem collegas, et æquales; addis qui punire, addis qui abdicare possint. Ita, uti semper facis, dum potestatem regiam non jam exauges, sed tantummodò naturâ constituis, aboles: adeò ut nihil putem inauspicatius accidere regibus potuisse, quàm te defensorem. O infelicem ac miserum! quæ te mentis caligo in hanc impulit fraudem, ut latentem antehac diu, et quasi personatum, improbitatem atque inscitiam tuam nunc tanto conatu insciens nudares ipse, et omnibus patefaceres: tuoquemet opprobrio operam ipse tuam locares, tuo ipse ludibrio tam gnaviter inservires? Quæ te ira numinis quasve pœnas luentem, in lucem et ora hominum evocavit, ut tanto apparàtu causam teterrimam impudentissimè simul et stolidissimè defenderes, atque ita defendendo invitus, perque inscitiam, proderes? Quis te pejùs perditum vellet, quis miseriorem? cui jam sola imprudentia, sola væcordia, saluti esse potest, ne sis miserrimus, si tyrannos, quorum causam suscepisti, imperita ac stulta defensione tantò magis invisos ac detestabiles omnibus, contrà quàm sperabas, reddideris, quanto iis majorem malefaciendi et impunè dominandi licentiam de industria attribueris; eoque plures eorundem hostes inconsultò excitaveris. Sed redeo ad tua tecum dissidia. Cùm tantum in te scelus admiseris, ut tyrannidem naturâ fundare studeas, præ cæteris gubernandi rationibus monarchiam primò laudandam tibi esse vidisti; id, uti soles, incœptare sine repugnantia nequis. Cum enim modò dixeras, "Ipsam regendi rationem, sive per plures, sive per pauciores, sive per unum, æque naturalem esse," statim "eam, quæ per unum exercetur, ex his tribus, magis naturalem esse" aïs, immò qui etiam recèns dixeras, "non patitur natura unius singularitatem gubernantis." Jam tyrannorum necem objice cui voles, qui et monarchas omnes, et monarchiam ipsam, tua fatuitate jugulâsti. Verùm quæ sit melior administrandi rempub. ratio, per unum an per plures, non est nunc disserendi locus. Et monarchiam quidem multi celebres viri laudârunt, si tamen is, qui solus regnat, vir omnium optimus, et regno dignissimus, sit; id nisi contingat, nihil monarchiâ proclivius in eam tyrannidem, quæ pessima est, labitur. Jam quòd ad unius "exemplar Dei expressam esse" dicis, quis potentiam divinæ similem in terris obtinere dignus est, nisi qui, cæterorum omnium longè præstantissimus, etiam bonitate ac sapientia est Deo simillimus; is autem solus, mea quidem sententia, expectatus ille Dei filius est. Quòd regnum in familiam rursus contrudis, ut patrifamilias regem assimiles, pater certè suæ familiæ regnum meretur, quam omnem vel generavit, vel alit: in rege nihil est hujusmodi, sed planè contrà sunt omnia. Animalia deinde nobis gregalia, imprimis "aves," et in iis "apes," siquidem te physiologo aves istæ sunt, imitandas proponis. "Apes regem habent." Tridentinæ scilicet, annon meministi? cæterarum, te teste, "respub. est." Verum tu desine de apibus fatuari; musarum sunt, oderunt te scarabæum, et, ut vides, redarguunt. "Coturnices sub ortygometra." Istos onocrotalis tuis tende laqueos; nos tam stolido aucupio non capimur. Atqui jam tua res agitur, non nostra. "Gallus gallinaceus," inquis, "tam maribus quàm fœminis imperitat." Quî potest hoc fieri? Cum tu ipse gallus, et, ut ferunt, vel nimiùm gallinaceus, non tuæ gallinæ, sed illa tibi imperitet, et in te regnum exerceat: si gallinaceus ergò plurium fœminarum rex est, tu gallinæ mancipium tuæ, non gallinaceum te, sed stercorarium quendam esse gallum, oportet. Pro libris certè nemo te majora edit sterquilinia, et gallicinio tuo stercoreo omnes obtundis; hoc unicum galli gallinacei habes. Jam ego multa hordei grana daturum me tibi promitto, si, totum hoc vertendo sterquilinium tuum, vel unam mihi gemmam ostenderis. Sed quid ego tibi hordeum? qui non hordeum, ut Æsopicus ille, simplex et frugi gallus, sed aurum, ut Plautinus ille nequam, scalpturiendo quæsîsti; quamvis exitu adhuc dispari; tu enim centum Jacobæos aureos inde reperisti, cum Euclionis fuste potiùs, quo misellus ille Plautinus, obtruncari dignior sis. Sed pergendum est. "Eadem utilitatis et incolumitatis omnium ratio naturalis postulat, ut qui semel ad gubernandum constitutus est, conservetur." Quis negat, quatenus ejus conservatio cum incolumitate omnium consistit? ad perniciem autem omnium conservari unum, quis non videt alienissimum à natura esse? At "malum etiam regem conservari, immo pessimum" omnino vis, "eò quod non tantum mali civitati procurat malè gubernando, quantum creatur cladium ex seditionibus, quæ ad eum tollendum suscitantur." Quid hoc ad jus regum naturale? An, si natura me monet, ut latronibus diripiendum me permittam, ut captum me totis facultatibus redimam potiùs, quàm ut dimicare de vita cogar; latronum tu inde jus naturale constitues? Suadet natura populo, ut tyrannorum violentiæ nonnunquam cedat, cedat temporibus; tu ista populi necessitate ac patientia jus etiam naturale tyrannorum fundabis? Quod illa jus populo sui conservandi causâ dedit, tu illam tyranno, perdendi populi causâ, jus idem dedisse affirmabis? Docet natura, ex duobus malis eligendum esse minus; et quàndiu necesse est tolerandum: an tu hinc tyranno, utpote minori fortasse interdum malo, jus impunè malefaciendi exoriri naturale statues? Recordare saltem ea, quæ jam pridem ipse de episcopis contra Loiolitam scripsisti, à me suprà tertio capite recitata his planè contraria; Illic "seditiones, dissentiones, discordias optimatium et populi, longè levius esse malum," affirmas, "quàm sub uno monarcha tyranno certam miseriam ac perniciem." Et vera tu quidem affirmabas; nondum enim insaniebas, nondum Carolinis Jacobæis delinitus et deauratus in morbum regium incideras. Diceram fortasse, nisi is esses qui es, pudeat te tandem prævaricationis tuæ turpissimæ; tibi verò dirumpi facilius est quàm erubescere, qui, ut rem faceres, pudorem jamdiu amisisti. Annon ipse memineras Romanos florentissimam et gloriosissimam rempub. post exactos reges habuisse? potuit fieri ut Batavorum obliviscere? quorum respub. Hispaniarum rege pulso post bella diutina, feliciter tamen gesta, libertatem fortiter et gloriosè consequuta est, teque grammaticastrum equitem stipendio alit suo, non ut juventus Batavica te prævaricatore et sophista tam nihil sapere discat, ut ad servitutem Hispanicam redire mallet, quàm paternæ libertatis ac gloriæ hæres esse; istam doctrinæ pestem ad Riphæos ultimos, et glacialem oceanum, quò te in malam rem abire par est, tecum auferas licebit: Exemplo denique sunt Angli, qui Carolum tyrannum bello captum, et insanabilem, obtruncârunt. At "insulam beatam sub regibus, et luxu affluentem, discordiis deformârunt." Immo luxu penè perditam, quò tolerantior servitutis esset, extinctis deinde legibus, et mancipata religione, servientem liberarunt. En autem Epicteti cum Simplicio editorem, Stoïcum gravissimum, cui "luxu affluens insula" beata esse videtur! Ex porticu Zenonis nunquam tale, sat scio, documentum prodiit. Quid refert, an te doctore quicquid libet regibus licebit, tibi ipsi non licebit lupi domino ex lupanari tuo, tanquam ex novo quodam lyceo, quamcunque libet emittere philosophiam? Sed resume nunc quam suscepisti personam. "Nunquam sub ullo rege tantum cruoris haustum est, tot familiæ desolatæ;" Hoc totum Carolo imputandum est, non Anglis; qui exercitum Hibernicorum priùs in nos paraverat, omnes Hibernos conjurare contra Anglos suo ipse diplomate jusserat; per illos ducena circiter millia Anglorum una in provincia Ultonia occiderat; de reliquis nihil dico: binos exercitus in exitium parlamenti Anglicani urbisque Londini sollicitaverat; multa alia hostiliter fecerat, priusquam à populo aut magistratibus, tuendæ reipub. causâ, vel unus miles conscriptus esset. Quæ doctrina, quæ lex, quæ unquam religio, sic homines instituit, ut otio consulendum, ut pecuniæ, ut sanguini, ut vitæ, potiùs parcendum esse ducerent, quàm hosti obviàm eundum? Nam externo an intestino, quid interest? cum interitus reipub. sive ab hoc, sive ab illo, funestus æquè et acerbus impendeat. Vidit totus Israël non posse se sine multo sanguine Levitæ uxorem stupro enectam ulcisci; an igitur quiescendum sibi esse duxit, an bello civili, quamvis truculentissimo, supersedendum? an unam igitur muliérculam mori inultam est passus? Certè si natura nos docet quamvis pessimi regis dominatum potiùs pati, quàm, in recuperanda libertate, plurimorum civium salutem in discrimen adducere, doceret eadem non regem solùm perferre, quem tamen solum perferendum esse contendis, sed optimatium, sed paucorum, quoque potentiam; latronum etiam nonnunquam et servorum rebellantium multitudinem. Non Fulvius aut Rupilius ad bellum servile post cæsos exercitus prætorios, non Crassus in Spartacum post deleta consularium castra, non Pompeius ad piraticum bellum, exiisset. Romani vel servis, vel piratis, ne tot civium sanguis effunderetur, hortante scilicet natura, succubuissent. "Hunc" itaque "sensum," aut hujusmodi ullum "gentibus impressisse naturam" nusquam ostendis: et tamen non desinis malè ominari, et vindictam divinam, quam in te augurem tuique similes avertat Deus, nobis denuntiare; qui nomine tantùm regem, re hostem acerbissimum, debito supplicio ulti sumus; et innumerabilem bonorum civium cædem authoris pœnâ expiavimus. Nunc magis naturalem esse monarchiam ex eo probari ais, quod "plures nationes et nunc et olim regium statum receperint, quàm optimatem et popularem." Respondeo primùm neque Deo neque natura suadente id factum esse; Deus, nisi invitus, populum suum sub regio imperio esse noluit; natura quid suadeat et recta ratio, non ex pluribus, sed ex prudentissimis nationibus, optimè perspicitur. Græci, Romani, Itali, Carthaginienses, multique alii, suopte ingenio, vel optimatium vel populi imperium regio prætulerunt; atque hæ quidem nationes cæterarum omnium instar sunt. Hinc Sulpitius Severus, "regium nomen cunctis ferè liberis gentibus semper invisum" fuisse, tradit. Verùm ista non jam huc pertinent, nec quæ sequuntur multa, inani futilitate à te sæpius repetita: ad illud festino, ut quod rationibus firmavi, id exemplis nunc ostendam, esse vel maximè secundùm naturam, tyrannos quoquo modo puniri; id omnes gentes, magistrâ ipsâ naturâ, sæpiùs fecisse; ex quo impudentia tua prædicanda, et turpissima mentiendi licentia, omnibus innotescere dehinc poterit. Primos omnium inducis Ægyptios; et certè quis te per omnia Ægyptizare non videat? "Apud hos," inquis, "nusquam mentio extat ullius regis à populo per seditiones occisi, nullum bellum illatum, aut quicquam factum à populo, quo è solio dejiceretur?" Quid ergò? Osiris rex Ægyptiorum fortasse primus, annon à fratre Typhone, et viginti quinque aliis conjuratis, interemptus est? quos et magna pars populi secuta magnum cum Iside et Oro, regis conjuge et filio, prælium commisit? Prætereo Sesostrin à fratre per insidias penè oppressum; Chemmin etiam et Cephrenem, quibus populus meritò infensus, quos vivos non poterat, mortuos se discerpturum minatus est. Qui reges optimos obtruncare sunt ausi, eosne putas, naturæ lumine aut religione aliqua retentos, à pessimis regibus manus abstinuisse? qui reges mortuos, et tum demùm innocuos, sepulchro eruituros se minitabantur, ubi etiam pauperculi cujusque corpus inviolatum esse solet, vivosne illi et nocentissimos propter naturæ legem punire, si modò viribus valerent, vererentur? Affirmares hæc, scio, quamlibet absurda; at enim ego, ne affirmare audeas, elinguem te reddam. Scito igitur, multis ante Cephrenem sæculis, regnâsse apud Ægyptos Ammosin; et tyrannum, ut qui maximè, fuisse; eum Ægyptii æquo animo pertulerunt. Lætaris; hoc enim est quod vis. At reliqua audi, vir optime et veracissime; Diodori enim verba sunt quæ recito; μέχρι μέν τινος ἐκαρτέρυν οὐ δυνάμενοι, &c. tolerabant aliquandiu oppressi, quia resistere potentioribus nullo modo poterant. Quamprimùm verò Actisanes, Æthiopum rex, bellum gerere cum eo cœpit, nacti occasionem plerique defecerunt, eoque facilè subacto, Ægyptus regno Æthiopum accessit. Vides hìc Ægyptios, quamprimùm poterant, arma contra tyrannum tulisse, copias cum externo rege conjunxisse, ut regem suum ejusque posteros regno privarent, bonum et moderatum regem, qualis erat Actisanes, maluisse externum, quàm tyrannum domesticum. Iidem Ægyptii, consensu omnium maximo, Apriem tyrannum suum, conductitiis copiis præsidentem, duce Amasi, prælio victum strangulârunt; Amasi viro nobili regnum dederunt. Hoc etiam adverte; Amasis captum regem ad tempus in ipsa regia honestè asservabat: incusante demùm populo, injustè eum facere qui suum et ipsorum hostem aleret, tradidit populo regem; qui eum prædicto supplicio affecit. Hæc Herodotus et Diodorus. Quid amplius tibi quæris? ecquam tyrannum censes non maluisse vitam securi quàm laqueo finire? Postea sub Persarum imperium "redacti Ægyptii fideles," inquis, "exstitere;" quod falsissimum est; in fide enim Persarum nunquam permansere; sed quarto post anno quàm subacti à Cambyse fuerant, rebellârunt. Domiti deinde à Xerxe, haud multò pòst ab ejus filio Artaxerxe defecerunt, regem Inarum quendam sibi adsciverunt. Quo occiso iterum fidem mutant, et, constituto rege Tacho, Artaxerxi Mnemoni bellum indicunt. Sed, neque suo regi fideliores, ablatum patri regnum filio Nectanebo tradunt: donec tandem ab Artaxerxe Ocho in ditionem Persarum rediguntur. Sub Macedonum etiam imperio, quantum in se erat, tyrannos coërcendos esse factis indicârunt; statuas et imagines Ptolemæi Physconis dejecerunt, ipsum mercenario exercitu præpollentem interficere nequiverunt. Alexander, ejus filius, ob cædem matris concursu populi in exilium agitur: filium item ejus Alexandrum, insolentiùs dominantem, Alexandrinus populus vi abreptum ex regia in gymnasio publico interfecit: Ptolemæum denique Auleten ob multa flagitia regno expulit. Hæc tam nota cùm non possit nescire vir doctus, non debuerit qui hæc docere profiteatur, qui fidem tantis in rebus haberi sibi postulet; quis non pudendum et indignissimum esse dicat, hunc, vel tam rudem et indoctum, tanta cum infamia bonarum literarum, pro doctissimo circumferre se tumidum, et stipendia regum et civitatum ambire, vel tam improbum et mendacem, non insigni aliqua ignominia notatum, ex omnium communitate et consortio tum doctorum tum bonorum exterminari. Postquam Ægyptum lustravimus; ad Æthiopes jam proximos visamus. Regem à Deo electum, ut credunt, quasi Deum quendam adorant: quoties tamen eum sacerdotus damnant, ipse mortem sibi consciscit. Sic enim, Diodoro teste, omnes alios maleficos puniunt; non ipsi morte afficiunt, sed ipsos reos lictore misso mori jubent. Ad Assyrios deinde et Medos et Persas, regum observantissimos, accedis: "jus illic regium summa cum licentia quidlibet faciendi conjunctum fuisse" contra omnium historicorum fidem affirmas. Narrat imprimis Daniel ut regem Nebuchadnezzarem, plus nimio superbientem, homines à se depulerint, et ad bestias ablegaverint. Jus eorum non regium, sed Medorum et Persarum, id est populi jus, appellatur; quod cùm irrevocabile esset, reges etiam obligavit. Darius itaque Medus eripere manibus satraparum Danielem, quanquam id maximè agebat, non potuit. "Populi," inquis, "nefas esse tum credebant regem repudiare, quòd illo jure abuteretur." Inter ipsa tamen hæc verba adeò miserè obtorpes, ut dum istorum populorum obedientiam et modestiam laudas, ereptum Sardanapalo regnum ab Arbace tua sponte commemores. Eripuit autem is non solus, sed partim à sacerdotibus juris peritissimis, partim à populo, adjutus, atque hoc præsertim nomine eripuit, quòd is jure regio, non ad crudelitatem, sed ad luxuriam tantummodò et mollitiem, abuteretur. Percurre Herodotum, Ctesiam, Diodorum, intelliges omninò contrà esse quàm dicis, "à subditis ut plurimùm ea regna destructa fuisse, non ab externis:" Assyrios reges à Medis, Medos à Persis, utrisque tum subditis, sublatos fuisse. "Cyrum" ipse "rebellâsse, et arreptas tyrannides in diversis imperii locis" fateris. Hoccine est jus regium apud Medos et Persas, et observantiam eorum in reges, quod instituisti, asserere? Quæ te Anticyra tam delirum sanare potest? "Persarum reges quali jure regnàrint ex Herodoto," inquis, "liquet." Cambyses, cùm sororem in matrimonio habere cuperet, judices regios consulit, delectos "ex populo viros," legum interpretes, ad quos omnia referri solebant. Quid illi? negant se invenire legem, quæ jubeat fratrem secum in matrimonium sororem jungere; aliam tamen invenisse, qua liceat Persarum regi facere quæ libeat. Primùm si rex omnia pro suo jure poterat, quid alio legum interprete quàm ipso rege opus erat? supervacanei isti judices ubivis potiùs quàm in regia mansissent. Deinde si regi Persarum quidvis licuit, incredibile est id adeò nescivisse Cambysem, dominationis cupidissimum, ut quid licitum esset judices illos percontaretur. Quid ergò? vel "gratificari" volentes "regi," ut fateris ipse, vel à tyranno sibi metuentes, ut aït Herodotus, facilem quandam se reperisse legem simulant, palpum regi obtrudentes: quod in judicibus et legum peritis, hac etiam ætate, novum non est. At verò "Artabanus Persa dixit ad Themistoclem, nullam legem apud Persas esse meliorem illâ quâ sancitum fuerat, regem esse honorandum et adorandum." Præclaram tu quidem legem de adoratione regum introducis, etiam à patribus antiquis damnatam; præclarum etiam legis commendatorem Artabanum, qui ipse haud multò postea sua manu Xerxem regem suum trucidavit. Probos regem defensores regicidas nobis adfers: suspicor te regibus insidias quasdam moliri. Claudianum citas poëtam, Persarum obedientiæ testem. At ego te ad res eorum gestas et annales revoco, defectionibus Persarum, Medorum, Bactrianorum, Babyloniorum, etiam cædibus regum, refertissimos. Proximus tibi author est Otanes Persa, ipse etiam Smerdis interfector sui regis, qui cum odio potestatis regiæ, injurias et facinora regum exponat, violationes legum, cædes indemnatorum, stupra, adulteria, hoc tu jus regium vis appellari, et Samuelis iterum calumniandi in mentem tibi venit. De Homero, qui reges esse ab Jove cecinit, supra respondi: Philippo regi, jus regium interpretanti, tam credam quàm Carolo. Ex Diogenis deinde Pythagoræi fragmento quædam producis, at quali is de rege dicat taces. Accipe igitur quo ille usus est exordio; ad quod referri quæ sequuntur cuncta debent. Βασιλεὺς κ' ἔιη ὁ δικαιότατος, &c. "Rex ille fuerit, qui justissimus est, justissimus autem, qui maximè legitimus;" nam sine justitia nullus "rex esse poterit, neque justitia sine lege." Hæc cum jure tuo regio è regione pugnant. Eadem abs te recitatus Ecphantas philosophatur. Δεῖ δὲ και τον εἰς ἀυτὰν καταςάντα, &c. "oportet qui regnum suscipit purissimum et lucidissimum naturà esse:" et infra, ὁ κατ' ἀρετὰν ἐξάρχων, &c. "ille qui imperat secundùm virtutem, nominatur rex, et est." Quem tu igitur regem vocas, Pythagoreorum judicio rex non est. Jam tu vicissim Platonem audi in epistola octava, ἀρχὴ γιγνέσθω ὑπεύθυνος βασιλική, &c.; "sit regia potestas reddendæ rationi obnoxia; leges dominentur et aliis civibus et ipsis etiam regibus, si quid præter leges fecerint." Addo Aristotelem Polit. 3. ἐν μέν τοι ὁμοίοις και ἴσοις οὔτε συμφέρον ἐστίν, &c. "inter similes et æquales neque utile est neque justum, esse unum omnium dominum, neque ubi leges non sunt, neque ut ipse lex sit, neque ubi sunt leges; neque bonum bonorum, neque non bonum non bonorum dominum esse." Et lib. quinto, "Quem populus non vult, statim is non rex, sed tyrannus est," c. 10. Hem tibi etiam Xenophontem in Hierone, ἀντὶ τοῦ τιμωρεῖν αἱ πόλεις ἀυτοῖς, &c. "tantum abest ut tyrannorum necem civitates ulciscantur, ut magnis honoribus afficiant eum, qui tyrannum interfecerit, imagines etiam tyrannicidarum in templis statuunt." Testem occulatum adjiciam Marcum Tullium pro Milone. "Græci homines deorum honores tribuunt iis viris qui tyrannos necaverunt: quæ ego vidi Athenis, quæ aliis in urbibus Græciæ, quas res divinas talibus institutas viris, quos cantus, quæ carmina? prope ad immortalitatem, et religionem, et memoriam consecrantur." Polybius denique, author gravissimus, Historiarum 6to. τότε δὲ ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις ἑπόμενοι, &c. "cum principes," inquit, "cupiditatibus obsequi cœperunt, tum de regno facta est tyrannis, et conspiratio in caput dominantium inibatur; cujus quidem authores erant non deterrimi civium, sed generosissimi quique et maximi animi." Longè plura cùm mihi suppeterent, hæc pauca delibavi: obruor enim copiâ. A philosophis ad poëtas jam provocas; eò te libentissimè sequimur. "Potestatem nullis legibus, nullis judiciis, obnoxiam in Græcia reges obtinuisse vel unus," inquis, "Æschylus potest docere; qui in tragœdia, Supplices, regem Argivorum ἄκριτον πρύτανιν vocat, non judicabilem rectorem." Verum tu scito, (præcipitem enim te et nullius judicii esse, quocunque te vertis, eò magis perspicio,) scito, inquam, non quid poëta, sed quis apud poëtam quidque dicat, spectandum esse: variæ enim personæ inducuntur, nunc bonæ, nunc malæ, nunc sapientes, nunc simplices, non semper quid poëtæ videatur, sed quid cuique maximè conveniat, loquentes. Danai filiæ quinquaginta, ex Ægypto profugæ, ad Argivorum regem supplices pervenerant; orant uti se contra vim Ægyptiorum, classe insequentium, defendat; respondet rex non posse se, nisi rem priùs cum populo communicet.

> Ἀστῶν δὲ πᾶσι τοῖσδε κοινώσας πέρι.

Mulieres peregrinæ et supplices, incerta populi suffragia veritæ, regem denuò blandiùs compellant.

> Σύ τοι πόλις, σὺ δὲ τὸ δήμιον, > Πρύτανις ἄκριτος ὤν.
> "Tu instar urbis es et populi, prætor injudicatus."

Rursus rex,

> Εἶπον δὲ καὶ πρὶν, ὀυκ ἄνευ δήμου τάδε
> Πράξαιμ' ἂν οὐδέπερ κρατῶν.
> "Dixi antea, non sine populo hæc faciam, ne si possem quidem."

De re itaque tota ad populum refert,

> Ἐγὼ δὲ λάους συγκαλῶν ἐγχωρίους
> Πείσω τὸ κοινόν.

> Θαρσεῖτε παῖδες, ευ τὰ τῶν ἐγχωρίων
> Δήμου δέδοκται παντελῆ ψηφίσματα.
> "Bono estote animo filiæ, benè decreverunt
> "Indigenarum, in conventu populari, perfectissima suffragia."

Hæc nisi protulissem, quàm temere statuisset sciolus iste de jure regio apud Græcos ex ore mulierum, et peregrinarum, et supplicum; cùm et ipse rex, et ipsa res gesta, longè aliud nos doceat. Idem etiam docet Euripidis Orestes, qui, mortuo patre, Argivorum ipse rex, ob cædem matris à populo in judicium vocatus, ipse causam dixit, et suffragiis populi capite damnatus est. Athenis regiam potestatem legibus obnoxiam fuisse testatur idem Euripides etiam in Supplicibus, ubi hæc Theseus Athenarum rex—

> Ἑνὸς πρὸς ἀνδρὸς, ἀλλ' ἐλευθέρα πόλις,
> Δῆμος δ' ἀνάσσει—
> "non regitur
> "Ab uno viro, sed est libera hæc civitas,
> "Populus autem regnat—"

Sic ejus filius Demophoon, rex item Atheniensium, apud eundem poëtam in Heraclidis.

> Οὐ γὰρ τυραννίδ' ὥστε βαρβάρων ἔχω,
> Ἀλλ' ἢν δίκαια δρῶ, δίκαια πείσομαι.
> "Non enim iis tyrannicè tanquam barbaris impero, > "Sed si facio justa quæ sunt, justa mihi rependentur."

Non aliud Thebis jus regium antiquitùs fuisse testatur Sophocles in Œdipo tyranno, unde et Tiresias et Creon Ædipo ferociter responsant, ille

> οὐ γάρ τι σοὶ ζῶ δοῦλος
> "Non servus tibi sum."

Hic, Κἀμοὶ πόλεως μέτεστι τῆς, δ' οὐ σοὶ μόνῳ.
"Est et mihi jus in hac civitate non tibi solùm."

Et Æmon Creonti in Antigone.

> Πόλις γὰρ ὀυκ ἔσθ', ἥτις ἀνδρὸς ἔσθ' ἑνός.

Jam verò Lacedæmoniorum reges in judicium sæpe adductos, et interdum morte multatos, nemo ignorat. Atque hæc quidem antiquum in Græcia jus regium quale fuerit satis declarant. Ad Romanos veniamus. Tu ad illud imprimis recurris non Sallustianum, sed C. Memmii apud Sallustium, "impunè quidvis facere:" cui suprà responsum est. Sallustius ipse disertis verbis author est, "Romano imperium legitimum, nomen imperii regium, habuisse:" quod cum "se in dominationem convertit," ut nôsti, expulerunt. Sic M. Tullius in Pisonem, "ego consulem esse putem, qui senatum esse in repub. non putavit? et sine eo consilio consulem numerem, sine quo Romæ ne reges quidem esse potuerunt?" Audin' regem Romæ sine senatu nihil fuisse? "At Romulus, ut libitum, Romanis imperitaverat, ut aït Tacitus." Nondum enim fundata legibus, colluvies potiùs convenarum quàm respub. erat: omnes olim mortales sine legibus vivebant, cùm respublicæ nondum essent. Post Romulum autem, authore Livio, etsi regem omnes volebant, libertatis dulcedine nondum experta, "Populo tamen summa potestas permissa est, ut non plus darent juris quàm detinerent; jus illud" à Cæsaribus "vi ademptum fuisse" idem aït. Servius Tullius dolo primùm, quasi Tarquinii Prisci vicarius, regnabat; postea verò ad populum ipse retulit, "vellent juberentne se regnare;" tandem ut aït Tacitus, "sanctor legum fuit, queis etiam reges obtemperarent." Fecissetne hanc sibi et posteris injuriam, si supra leges priùs fuisse jus regium sensisset? Ultimus illorum regum Tarquinius Superbus "morem de omnibus senatum consulendi primus solvit;" ob hæc et alia flagitia populus L. Tarquinio regi imperium abrogavit; exulemque esse cum conjuge ac liberis jussit. Hæc ferè ex Livio et Cicerone; quibus alios juris regii apud Romanos haud tu interpretes attuleris meliores. Ad dictaturam quod attinet, temporaria tantùm fuit, nunquam adhibita ni difficillimis reipub. temporibus, et intra sex menses deponenda. Jus autem imperatorum quod vocas, non jus illud, sed vis, planè erat; imperium nullo jure prætorquàm armis partum. At "Tacitus," inquis "qui sub imperio floruit," ista scripsit. "Principi summum rerum arbitrium dii dederunt, subditis obsequii gloria relicta est." Nec dicis quo loco; tibi conscius nimirum insigniter lectoribus imposuisse; quod mihi quidem statim suboluit, quamvis locum illum non statim reperi. Non enim Taciti hæc verba sunt, scriptoris boni, et tyrannis adversissimi, sed apud Tacitum M. Terentii cujusdam equitis Romani, qui capitis reus, inter alia, quæ metu mortis ab eo dicta sunt, sic Tiberium adulatur, annalium 6to. "Tibi summum rerum judicium dii dederunt, nobis obsequii gloria relicta est." Hanc tu quasi Taciti sententiam profers, qui sententias tibi commodas non ex pistrina solùm, aut tonstrina, sed ex ipsa carnificina, oblatas non respueres: ita omnia vel ostentationis causâ, vel imbecillitatis conscientiâ, undecunque corradis. Tacitum ipsum si legere maluisses, quàm alicubi decerptum negligentiùs transcribere, docuisset te is, jus illud imperatorum unde ortum sit. "Post Actiacam victoriam, verso civitatis statu, nihil usquam prisci aut integri moris; omnes exuta æqualitate jussa principis aspectare;" docuisset idem, annalium 3tio, unde tuum omne jus regium; "Postquam exui æqualitas, et pro modestia ac pudore ambitio et vis incedebat, provenêre dominationes; multosque apud populos æternùm mansere." Idem ex Dione poteras didicisse, si innata levitas et inconstantia tua quicquam te altius percipere pateretur. Narrat enim is l. 53. abs te citato, ut partim armis, partim dolo et simulatione Octaviani Cæsaris, effectum sit, ut imperatores legibus soluti essent; dum enim pro concione pollicetur se principatu abiturum, legibus et imperiis etiam aliorum obtemperaturum, per causam belli in provinciis suis gerendi, retentis apud se semper legionibus, dum simulatè renuit imperium, sensim invasit. Non est hoc legibus ritè solutum esse, sed legum vincula, quod gladiator ille Spartacus potuit, vi solvere; nomen deinde principis aut imperatoris et αὐτοκράτορος sibi arrogare, quasi Deus aut natura lex omnes et homines et leges illi subjecisset. Vis altiùs paulò juris Cæsarei originem cognoscere? Marcus Antonius, jussu Cæsaris, qui, armis in rempublicam nefariè sumptis, tum plurimum poterat, consul factus, cùm Lupercalia Romæ celebrarentur, ex composito, ut videbatur, diadema capiti Cæsaris cum gemitu et plangore populi imposuit: ascribi deinde jussit in fastis ad Lupercalia, C. Cæsari Antonium consulem, jussu populi, regnum detulisse. Qua de re Cicero in secunda Philippica; "Ideone L. Tarquinius exactus, Spurius Cassius, Sp. Melius, M. Manlius necati, ut multis post sæculis à M. Antonio, quod fas non est, rex Romæ constitueretur?" Tu verò omni malo cruciatu atque infamia sempiterna etiam ipso Antonio dignior es; quanquam tu hinc noli superbire, non enim te, hominem despicatissimum, ulla re alia quàm scelere cum Antonio conferendum putem, qui, in hisce tuis Lupercalibus nefandis, non uni tantùm, sed omnibus tyrannis, diadema cunctis legibus solutum, nullâ solvendum, imponere studuisti. Certè si ipsorum Cæsarum oraculo credendum est, sic enim appellant Christiani imperatores Theodosius et Valens edictum suum, cod. l. 1. tit. 14. de authoritate juris imperatorum pendet authoritas. Majestas ergò regnantis, vel ipsorum Cæsarum sive judicio sive oraculo, submittenda legibus est, de quibus pendet. Hinc, adulta jam potestate imperatoria, ad Trajanum Plinius in Panegyrico; "Diversa sunt naturâ dominatio et principatus. Trajanus regnum ipsum arcet ac summovet, sedemque obtinet principis, ne sit domino locus." Et infrà, "omnia, quæ de aliis principibus à me dicta sunt, eò pertinent ut ostendam, quàm longa consuetudine corruptos, depravatosque, mores principatûs parens noster reformet, et corrigat." Quod depravatos principatûs mores Plinius, id tene pudet jus regium perpetuò vocitare? Verùm hactenùs de jure regio apud Romanos breviter. Quid illi in tyrannos suos, sive reges, sive imperatores, fecerint, vulgò notum est. Tarquinium expulerunt. Sed "quomodo," inquis, "expulerunt; an in jus vocarunt? nequaquam; portas venienti clauserunt." Ridiculum caput! quidni clauderent advolanti cum parte copiarum? quid refert exulare jussus fuerit an mori, modò pœnas dedisse constat? Ca. Cæsarem tyrannum excellentissimi ejus ætatis viri in senatu interfecerunt; id factum M. Tullius et ipse vir optimus, et pater patriæ publicè dictus, miris laudibus, cùm alibi passim, tum in 2da Philippica, celebravit. Pauca recitabo. "Omnes boni, quantum in ipsis fuit, Cæsarem occiderunt; aliis consilium, aliis animus, aliis occasio, defuit, voluntas nemini." Et infrà. "Quæ enim res unquam, proh sancte Jupiter, non modò in hac urbe, sed in omnibus terris est gesta major, quæ gloriosior, quæ commendatior hominum memoriæ sempiternæ? in hujus me consilii societatem, tanquam in equum Trojanum, includi cum principibus non recuso." Illud Senecæ tragici et ad Græcos referri potest, et ad Romanos:

> ——Victima haud ulla amplior
> Potest, magisque opima mectari Jovi,
> Quàm rex iniquus.——

Nam si ad Herculem spectes, cujus hæc sententia inducitur, quid senserint illa ætate Græcorum summi viri ostendit: si ad poëtam, qui sub Nerone floruit (et sensum ferè suum poëtæ personis optimis affingere solent) significabat et quid ipse, et quid omnes viri boni, ætate etiam Neronis, faciendum tyranno censuerint; quamque pium, quamque diis gratum, esse duxerint tyrannicidium. Sic optimi quique Romanorum, quantum in se erat, Domitianum occiderunt. Palàm hoc profitetur Plinius secundus in illo ad Trajanum imperatorem Panegyrico. "Juvabat illidere solo superbissimos vultus, instare ferro, sævire securibus, ut si singulos ictus sanguis dolorque sequeretur: nemo tam temperans gaudii, quin instar ultionis videretur cernere lace-

ros artus, truncata membra, postremò truces horrendasque imagines abjectas excoctasque flammis." Et deinde, "non satis amant bonos principes, qui malos satis non oderint." Tum inter flagitia Domitiani ponit, quòd is Epaphroditum, Neronis utcunque interfectorem, trucidaverit. "An excidit dolori nostro modò vindicatus Nero, permitteret credo famam vitamque ejus carpi, qui mortem ulciscebatur?" Planè quasi sceleri proximum esse judicaret, non interfecisse Neronem, scelus gravissimum vindicâsse interfectum. Ex his manifestum est, Romanorum præstantissimos quosque viros non solum tyrannos quoquo modo, quoties poterant, occidisse, sed factum illud, ut Græci olim, in maxima laude posuisse: vivum enim tyrannum quoties judicare non poterant viribus inferiores, mortuum tamen et judicabant, et lege Valeria damnabant. Valerius enim Publicola, Junii Bruti collega, cum videret non posse stipatos suis militibus tyrannos ad judicium perduci, legem tulit, qua indemnatum quovis modo occidere liceret; deinde facti rationem reddere. Hinc C. Caligulam, quem Cassius ferro, omnes votis interfecerunt; Valerius Asiaticus, vir consularis, cùm non adesset, ad milites tamen ob necem ejus tumultuantes exclamat, "utinam ego interfecissem;" senatus eodem tempore abolendam Cæsarum memoriam, ac diruenda templa, censuit; tantum abfuit ut Cassio irasceretur; Claudium, à militibus imperatorem mox salutatum vetant per tribunum plebis principatum capescere; vis autem militum vicit. Neronem senatus hostem judicavit, et, ut puniretur more majorum quærebat; id genus pœnæ erat, ut nudi cervix insereretur furcæ, corpus virgis ad necem cæderetur. Vide quantò mitiùs et moderatiùs Angli cum tyranno egerint suo, qui multorum judicio plus ipso Nerone sanguinis fundendi author fuerat. Sic Domitianum mortuum senatus damnavit; quod potuit, imagines ejus coràm detrahi, et solo affligi, jussit. Commodus à suis interfectus, non vindicatus à senatu aut populo, sed hostis judicatus est, qui etiam cadaver ejus ad supplicium quærebant. Ea de re senatusconsultum extat apud Lampridium; "Hosti patriæ honores detrahantur, parricida trahatur, in spoliario lanietur, hostis deorum, carnifex senatûs unco trahatur," &c. Iidem Didium Julianum imperatorem frequentissimo senatu capitis damnârunt; et, misso tribuno, occidi in palatio jusserunt. Iidem Maximino imperium abrogârunt, hostemque judicârunt. Juvat ipsum senatusconsultum ex Capitolino recitare. "Consul retulit; Patres Conscripti, de Maximinis quid placet?" responsum est, "hostes, hostes; qui eos occiderit, præmium merebitur." Vis scire populus Romanus et provinciæ Maximino imperatori an senatui paruerint? audi eundem Capitolinum. "Literas mittit senatus" ad omnes provincias, ut communi saluti libertatique subveniant; quæ auditæ sunt ab omnibus. Ubique amici, administratores, duces, tribuni, milites, Maximini interfecti sunt: paucæ civitates fidem hosti publico servaverunt. Eadem tradit Herodianus. Quid plura de Romanis? Jam apud finitimas nationes quale jus regum illa ætate fuerit videamus. Apud Gallos rex eorum Ambiorix "sua ejusmodi esse imperia" fatetur, "ut non minus haberet in se juris multitudo, quàm ipse in multitudinem." Judicabatur ergò non minùs quam judicabat. Rex item Vercingetorix proditionis insimulatus est à suis; tradit hæc Cæsar, bellum Gallicum scribens. Nec "Germanorum regibus infinita aut libera potestas" erat; "de minoribus rebus principes consultant, de majoribus omnes. Rex aut princeps auditur authoritate suadendi magis quàm jubendi potestate; si displicuit sententia, fremitu aspernantur." Hæc Tacitus. Tu verò, quod inauditum prorsus esse modò exclamabas, nunc sæpiùs factum concedis, "quinquaginta" nimirum "Scotorum reges aut expulsos, aut incarceratos, aut necatos, quosdam etiam in publico capitali supplicio affectos." Quod in ipsa Britannia factitatum est, cur tu, tyrannorum vespillo, infandum, inauditum, esse tanta ejulatione vociferaris? Pergis Judæorum et Christianorum erga tyrannos suos religionem extollere, et mendacia ex mendaciis serere, quæ jam toties refutavimus. Modò Assyriorum et Persarum obedientiam latè prædicabas, nunc eorum rebelliones enumeras; et quos nunquam rebellâsse paulò ante dixeras, nunc cur iidem toties rebellaverint multas causas affers. Ad narrationem deinde sumpti de rege supplicii, tamdiu intermissam, revertis, ut, si tunc fortè satìs sedulò ineptus et ridiculus non eras, nunc esses. "Per aulæ suæ membra ductum" narras. Quid per aulæ membra intelligas scire gestio. Romanorum calamitates ex regno in rempub. verso recenses, in quo te tibimet turpissimè mentiri suprà ostendimus. Qui ad Loiolitam, "seditiones tantùm sub optimatibus et populo, certam sub tyranno perniciem esse," demonstrabas, nunc, hominum vanissime et corruptissime, "ob reges olim ejectos seditionum illa mala tanquam supplicia illos hausisse" audes dicere? scilicet quia centum Jacobæis donavit te postea rex Carolus, idcirco reges expulsos luent Romani. At malè cessit Julii Cæsaris interfectoribus. Sanè si cui unquam tyranno, huic parcitum vellem; quamvis enim regnum in repub. violentiùs invadebat, erat tamen regno fortasse dignissimus: nec ideo quenquam magis putem interfecti Cæsaris pœnas pependisse, quàm deleti Catilinæ Caium Antonium Ciceronis collegam: quo postea de aliis criminibus damnato, ut inquit Cicero pro Flacco, "sepulchrum Catilinæ floribus ornatum est." Fautores enim Catilinæ tunc exultabant, "justa Catilinæ tum facta esse dictitabant," ad invidiam cæteris conflandam, qui Catilinam sustulerant. Hæ sunt improborum artes, quibus viros præstantissimos à supplicio tyrannorum, et puniendis etiam sæpe facinorosissimis, deterreant. Dicerem ego contrà, quod facile esset, quoties bene cessit et prosperè tyrannorum interfectoribus, si quid certi de eventu rerum colligere quis posset. Objectas, quòd "regem hæreditarium Angli non illo affecerint supplicio, quo tyranni solent mactari, sed eo, quo latrones et proditionis rei." Primùm hæreditas ad maleficiorum impunitatem quid conferat nescio: conferre quicquam ut credat sapiens, fieri vix potest. Quod tu deinde ad "immanitatem" refers, in eo lenitas potiùs Anglorum, et moderatio, prædicanda erat; qui, cùm tyrannum esse omnes in patriam impietates, latrocinia, proditiones, perduelliones, in se complectatur, satis habebant supplicium haud gravius de tyranno sumere, quàm de simplici latrone quovis, aut proditore vulgari, sumere solebant. Speras "exorituros esse aliquos Harmodios et Thrasybulos, qui, nostrorum cæde, tyranni manibus parentent." At tu citiùs animum despondebis, et vitam de dignam, omnibus bonis execrandus, antè suspendio finieris, quàm Harmodios Harmodiorum sanguine litantes tyranno videas. Tibi enim illud accidere verisimillimum est, deque te tam scelerato quis augurari rectiùs possit: alterum est impossibile. Tyrannorum triginta mentionem facis qui sub Gallieno rebellârunt. Quid si tyrannus tyrannum oppugnat, an omnes ergò qui oppugnant tyrannum, aut tollunt, tyranni erunt ipsi? haud tu id persuaseris, mancipium equestre; neque is qui author tibi est, Trebellius Pollio, historicorum propè ignobilissimus. "Si qui hostes," inquis, "à senatu judicati sunt, factio id fecit, non jus." Nobis in memoriam revocas quid fecit imperatores; factio nempe, et vis, et, ut planiùs dicam, furor Antonii, non jus, fecit, ut contra senatum populumque Romanum ipsi priùs rebellarent. "Dedit," inquis, "pœnas Galba, qui contra Neronem insurrexit." Dic etiam quas pœnas dedit Vespasianus, qui contra Vitellium. "Tantum," inquis, "abfuit Carolus à Nerone, quantum isti laniones Anglicani à senatoribus illius temporis Romanis." Trifurcifer, à quo laudari vituperium est, vituperari laus magna: paucis modò periodis interpositis, hac ipsa de re scribens, "senatum sub imperatoribus togatorum mancipiorum consessum fuisse" aïebas, nunc eundem "senatum" aïs "consessum regum fuisse:" hoc si ita est, quid obstat quin reges, te authore, togata mancipia sint? Beatos hoc laudatore reges! quo inter homines nihil nequius, inter quadrupedes nihil amentius: nisi si hoc illi peculiare dicam esse, quòd nemo literatiùs rudit. Senatum Angliæ Neroni vis esse similiorem quàm senatui Romano: cogit me cacoëthes hoc tuum ineptissimas conglutinandi similitudines, ut corrigam te; et quàm similis Neroni fuerit Carolus, ostendam. "Nero," inquis, "matrem suam" ferro "necavit." Carolus et patrem et regem veneno; nam, ut alia omittam indicia, qui ducem veneficii reum legibus eripuit, fieri non potuit quin ipse reus quoque fuerit. Nero multa millia Christianorum occidit, Carolus multo plura. Non defuerunt, teste Suetonio, qui Neronem mortuum laudarent, qui desiderarent, qui per longum tempus, "vernis æstivisque floribus tumulum ejus ornarent," ejus inimicis omnia mala ominarentur: non desunt qui Carolum eadem insaniâ desiderent, et summis laudibus extollant, quorum tu, patibularis eques, chorum ducis. "Milites Angli molossis suis ferociores novum et inauditum tribunal instituerunt." En acutissimum Salmasii sive symbolum sive adagium, jam sexies inculcatum, "Molossis suis ferociores;" adeste rhetores, vosque ludimagistri, delibate, si sapitis, flosculum hunc elegantissimum, qui tam Salmasio in deliciis est; codicillis vestris et capsulis mandate copiosissimi hominis pigmentum, ne intereat. Adeone etiam verba tua consumpsit rabies, ut, cuculi in modum, eadem identidem occinere cogaris? Quid hoc monstri esse dicam? Rabies, ut fabulantur, vertit Hecubam in canem, te S[ti] Lupi dominum vertit in cuculum. Jam novas exordiris repugnantias: supra p. 113. affirmaveras "Principem legibus solutum esse, non cogentibus" solùm, sed "dirigentibus, nullas esse omninò quibus teneatur;" nunc dicturum te aïs "infrà de regum differentia, quatenus potestate, alii minore, alii majore, in regnando fuerunt." Vis probare, "reges non potuisse judicari, nec damnari à subjectis suis argumento," ut ipse aïs, "firmissimo," revera stolidissimo; "nihil," inquis, "aliud inter judices et reges discrimen fuit: atqui Judæi judicum tædio odioque adducti reges postulabant." An quia judices illos magistratum malè gerentes judicare et damnare poterant, ideone putas tædio odioque eorum adductos postulâsse reges, quos jura omnia violantes punire, aut in ordinem cogere, non poterant? quis, excepto te uno, tam fatuè ratiocinari solet? Aliud igitur quiddam erat cur regem peterent, quàm ut haberent dominum legibus superiorem; de quo nunc divinare nihil attinet: quicquid erat, haud prudenti consilio factum et Deus et propheta ejus testatus est. Iterum rabbinis tuis, ex quibus probâsse te suprà asserebas regem Judæorum non judicari, nunc litem acerrimam intendis, quòd regem et judicari et verberari posse tradiderint: quod idem planè est acsi faterere ementitum te tunc esse, quod ex rabbinis probâsse dixeras. Eo demùm descendis ut de numero equilium Solomonis, quot "is equorum præsepia habuerit," oblitus regiæ defensionis, controversias putidulas concites. Tandem ab agasone ad equitem redis aretalogum et tautologum, vel potiùs ad id monstri quod priùs eras, cuculum rabiosum. Quereris enim "postremis" hisce "sæculis disciplinæ vigorem laxatum, regulam corruptam;" quòd uni scilicet tyranno, cunctis legibus soluto, disciplinam omnem laxare, mores omnium corrumpere, impunè non liceat. Hanc doctrinam "Brunistas inter reformatos" introduxisse aïs. Ita Lutherus, Calvinus, Zuinglius, Bucerus, et Orthodoxorum quotquot celeberrimi theologi fuere, tuo judicio Brunistæ sunt. Quo æquiore animo tua maledicta perferunt Angli, cùm in ecclesiæ doctores præstantissimos, totamque adeò ecclesiam reformatam, iisdem propè contumeliis debacchari te audiant.

CAPUT VI.

Post legem Dei et naturæ agitatam abs te frustra, et pessimè tractatam, unde nihil præter ignorantiæ simul et improbitatis ignominiam retulisti, quid deinde, in hac causa regia, præter nugas agere possis, non video. Cùm autem omnibus et bonis et doctis viris huic etiam causæ nobilissimæ abunde me satisfecisse sperem, etiamsi hoc loco finem respondendi facerem, tamen ne interea videar aliis varietatem potiùs et acumen tuum, quàm immodicam loquacitatem, defugisse, quò voles usque progrediar: eâ tamen brevitate, ut facilè appareat, me his omnibus perfunctum, si minùs quæ dignitas, at saltem quæ necessitas, causæ requirebat, nunc hominum quorumvis expectationi, vel etiam curiositati, morem gerere. "Hinc alius," inquis, "et major argumentorum mihi surget ordo." An major eo argumentorum ordine quem lex Dei et naturæ suppeditabat? Fer opem, Lucina; parturit Mons Salmasius; non de nihilo nupsit uxori; fœtum aliquem ingentem exspectate, mortales. "Si is, qui rex est ac dicitur, postulari posset apud aliam potestatem, eam omnino regiâ majorem esse oporteret; quæ autem major statuetur, hanc verò regiam dici, et esse, necesse esset. Sic enim definienda potestas regia: quæ summa est in repub. et singularis, et supra quam nulla alia agnoscitur." O murem verè montanum et ridiculum! Succurrite, grammatici, grammatico laboranti; actum est non de lege Dei aut naturæ, sed de glossario. Quid si sic responderem tibi? cedant nomina rebus, non est nostrûm nomini cavere, qui rem sustulimus; curent id alii quibus cordi sunt reges; nos nostra utimur libertate: responsum sanè haud iniquum auferres. Verùm ut me per omnia ex æquo et bono tecum agere intelligas, non ex mea solùm, sed ex optimorum olim et prudentissimorum virorum sententia, respondebo, qui et nomen et potestatem regiam cum potestate legum et populi majore posse optimè consistere judicârunt. Lycurgus imprimis, vir sapientia clarissimus, cùm vellet maximè potestati regiæ consulere, ut author est Plato, nullam aliam ejus conservandæ rationem invenire potuit, quàm ut senatûs et ephororum, id est, populi potestatem regiâ majorem in sua patria constitueret. Idem sensit Theseus Euripidæus, qui cùm Athenarum rex esset, populo tamen Atheniensi in libertatem cum magna sua gloria vindicato, et potestatem popularem extulit supra regiam, et regnum nihilo secius in illa civitate suis posteris reliquit. Unde Euripides in Supplicibus ita loquentem inducit.

'Ελευθερώσας τήνδ' ἰσόψηφον πόλιν.

"Populum constitui ipsum in monarchiam, Liberans hanc urbem æquale jus suffragii habentem."

Et rursus ad præconem Thebanum.

Πρῶτον μὲν ἤρξω τοῦ λόγȣ ψευδῶς, ξένε,
Ζητῶν τύραννον ἐνθάδ', οὐ γὰρ ἄρχεται
'Ενὸς πρὸς ἀνδρὸς, ἀλλ' ἐλευθέρα πόλις,
Δῆμος δ' ἀνάσσει.——

"Primùm incœpisti orationem falsò, hospes,
Quærens tyrannum hìc, non enim regitur
Ab uno viro, sed est libera hæc civitas,

Hæc ille; cùm tamen rex in illa civitate et esset, et dictus esset. Testis est etiam divinus Plato in epistola octava, "Induxit Lycurgus senatum et ephororum potestatem, τῆς βασιλικῆς ἀρχῆς σωτήριον, potestati regiæ maximè salutarem, quæ hac ratione per tot sæcula magna cum laude conservata est; postquam lex domina rex facta est hominum." Lex autem rex esse non potest, nisi sit qui in regem quoque, si usus venerit, lege possit agere. Sic temperatam potestatem regiam Siciliensibus commendat, ἐλευθερία γιγνέσθω μετὰ βασιλικῆς ἀρχῆς, &c. "sit libertas cum regia potestate; sit regia potestas ὑπεύθυνος reddendæ rationi obnoxia; dominetur lex etiam regibus, siquid præter legem fecerint." Aristoteles denique, Politicorum tertio, "In repub. Spartanorum videtur," inquit, "regnum esse maximè, eorum regnorum quæ sunt secundùm legem:" omnes autem regni species secundùm legem fuisse aït, præter unam, quam vocat παμβασιλείαν, neque talem usquam extitisse meminit. Tale itaque regnum maximè omnium propriè et dici et esse regnum sensit Aristoteles, quale apud Spartanos fuit; talem proinde regem non minùs propriè et dici et esse regem, ubi tamen populus supra regem erat, negare non potuit. Cùm tot tantique authores et nomen et rem regiam sua fide salvam regi præstiterent, etiam ubi populus penès se summam potestatem, tametsi exercere non solet, tamen, quoties opus est, obtinet, noli tam angusto animo summæ rerum grammaticalium, hoc est vocabulorum, sic timere, ut potiùs quàm glossarii tui ratio turbetur, aut detrimenti quid capiat, prodere libertatem omnium, et rempub. velis. Scito etiam dehinc, nomina rebus servire, non res nominibus; ita plus sapies, nec "in infinitum," quod metuis, "ibis. Frustrà ergò Seneca tria illa genera statuum ita describit." Frustretur Seneca, nos liberi simus; et nisi fallor, non ii sumus quos flores Senecæ in servitutem reducant. Seneca autem, si summam in uno potestatem esse dicit, "populi," tamen "eam" dicit "esse," commissam videlicet regi ad salutem omnium, non ad perniciem; nec mancipio, sed usu duntaxat, à populo datam. "Non jam ergò per Deum reges regnant, sed per populum." Quasi verò Deus non ita regat populum, ut cui Deus vult, regnum tradat populus; cum in ipsis institutionibus imperator Justinianus palàm agnoscat, exinde Cæsares regnâsse, ex quo "lege regia populus iis et in eos omne imperium suum, et potestatem, concessit." Sed quousque ista recoquemus, quæ jam toties refutavimus? Rursùs, quod ingenium tuum importunum et agreste, mores odiosissimos indicat, in nostra repub. quæ ad te nihil pertinet, alienigena et peregrinus curiosum te infers. Accede igitur, ut te tanto ardelione dignum est, cum insigni solœcismo. "Quicquid," inquis, "illi perditi homines dicunt, ad populum decipiendum pertinent." O scelerate! hoccine erat, quòd diminutus capite grammaticus in nostram rempub. te ingerere cupiebas, ut solœcismis nos tuis et barbarismis oppleres? Verùm tu dic, populum quo modo decepimus? "Forma regiminis quam introduxere non popularis est, sed militaris." Ista scilicet grex ille perfugarum mercedulâ conductum jussit te scribere: non tibi igitur, qui ea blatis, quorum nihil intelligis, sed iis qui te pretio conduxerunt, respondebitur. Quis "ordinem. procerum è parlamento ejecit? an populus?" Immo populus; eoque facto servitutis jugum à cervicibus suis haud ferendum dejecit. Ipsi milites, à quibus hoc factum dicis, non exteri, sed cives, et magna pars populi fuere; idque cætero ferè consentiente populo et cupiente, nec sine parlamenti etiam authoritate, fecerunt. "An populus," inquis, "plebeium ordinem domûs inferioris mutilavit, alios fugando, &c." Populus inquam; quod enim senatûs pars potior, id est sanior, fecit, in quo vera populi potestas residebat, quid ni id populum fecisse dicam? Quid si servire, quid si venum rempub. dare, in senatu plures maluerint, annon id impedire, et libertatem retinere, si in manu est sua, paucioribus licebit? "At duces hoc fecerunt cum militibus suis." Habenda igitur gratia est ducibus, quòd operas et tabernarios Londinenses, qui paulò antè, veluti fæx illa Clodiana, ipsam curiam obsederant, ferocientes repulerint, reipub. non defuerint. Tune idcirco jus parlamenti primarium ac proprium, ut libertati imprimis populi sive pace sive bello prospiciat, "militarem dominationem" appellabis? Verùm hoc à perduellibus dici, qui tibi ista dictârunt, non est mirum; sic enim perditissima olim Antoniorum factio senatum Romanum, contra hostes patriæ ad saga euntem, "Castra Pompeii" appellare solebat. Jam verò fortissimo nostri exercitûs ductori Cromuello, quòd is amicorum læto agmine stipatus, non sine favore populi secundo, votis etiam bonorum omnium prosequentibus, in bellum Hibernicum Deo gratissimum proficisceretur, invidisse tuos gaudeo; auditis enim postea tot ejus victoriis, jam arbitror eos livore contabuisse. Multa præterea, quæ de Romanis militibus prolixè nugaris: quod sequitur à veritate remotissimum esse quis non videt? "Populi," inquis, "potestas esse desinit, ubi regis esse incipit." Quo tandem jure? cùm satis constet, omnes ferè ubique gentium reges sub certis conditionibus traditum sibi regnum à populo accipere: quibus si rex non steterit, cur illa potestas, quæ fiduciaria tantùm fuit, ad populum redire non debeat, tam à rege quàm à consule, vel ab alio quovis magistratu, tu velim doceas: nam quòd "salutem reipub. id" aïs "postulare," ineptias dicis; cùm salutis ratio eadem omninò sit, sive à rege, sive ab optimatibus, sive à triumviris, imperio sibi tradito perperam utentibus, "potestas illa ad populum revertatur;" posse autem à magistratibus quibuscunque, prœterquam à rege solo, ad populum reverti ipse concedis. Sanè si neque regi, neque ullis magistratibus, imperium in se populus mentis compos dederit, nisi tantummodò communis omnium salutis causâ, nihil potest obstare quo minùs, ob causas planè contrarias, ne interitus omnium sequatur, haud secus regi quàm aliis magistratibus, quod dedit imperium adimere possit: quid quòd uni etiam faciliùs quàm pluribus ademerit? et potestatem in se plusquam fiduciariam cuiquam mortalium tradere summæ esset insaniæ: neque credibile est ullum ab orbe terrarum condito populum, qui quidem suæ spontis esset, adeò miserè desipuisse, ut vel omnem prorsus potestatem ab se alienaret, aut suis magistratibus concreditam, sine causis gravissimis, ad se revocaret. Quod si discordiæ, si bella intestina, indè oriantur, regium certè jus nullum indè oritur illius potestatis per vim retinendæ, quam populus suam sibi vendicat. Ex quo efficitur, quod ad prudentiam populi, non ad jus regis, referendum est, quodque nos non negamus, "rectorem non facilè mutandum esse:" nunquam ergò aut nulla prorsus de causa, nullo modo sequitur: neque tu adhuc quicquam allegâsti, neque jus ullum regis exprompsisti, quo minùs liceat consentienti populo regem haud idoneum regno privare; siquidem id, quod etiam in Gallia tua sæpiùs factum est, sine tumultu ac civili bello fieri possit. Cùm itaque salus populi suprema lex sit, non salus tyranni, ac proinde populo in tyrannum, non tyranno in populum, prodesse debeat, tu, qui tam sanctam legem, tam augustam, tuis præstigiis pervertere es ausus, qui legem inter homines supremam, et populo maximè salutarem, ad tyrannorum duntaxat impunitatem valere voluisti, tu inquam scito, quandoquidem Angli "enthusiastæ, et enthei, et vates," toties tibi sumus, me vate scito, Deum tibi atque homines tanti piaculi ultores imminere: quanquam universum genus humanum subjicere tyrannis, id est, quantum in te fuit, ad bestias damnare, hoc ipsum scelus tam immane qua partim in te ultio est, suis te furiis quocunque fugis terrarum, atque oberras, vel citiùs vel seriùs insequetur; et pejore etiam eâ, quam nunc insanis, insaniâ agitabit. Venio nunc ad alterum argumentum tuum, prioris haud dissimile; si populo resumere liceret potestatem suam, "nihil tum esset discriminis inter popularem et regalem statum, nisi quòd in hoc singuli rectores constituuntur, in illo plures:" quid si nihil aliud interesset, numquid indè respub. detrimenti caperet? Ecce autem aliæ differentiæ à temetipso allatæ, "temporis" nimirum "et successionis; cùm populares magistratus annui ferè sint," reges, nisi quid committant, perpetui; et in eadem plerunque familia. Differant ergò inter se aut non differant, de istis enim minutiis nihil laboro, in hoc certè conveniunt, quod utrobique populus, quoties id interest reipub., potest quam alteri potestatem, salutis publicæ causâ, tradiderat, eam ad se rursus nec injuriâ, eandem ob causam, revocare. "At lege regia Romæ sic appellata, de qua in institutis, populus Romanus principi, et in eum, omne imperium suum et potestatem concessit." Nempe vi Cæsarum coactus, qui honesto legis titulo suam tantummodo violentiam sanxerunt; de quo suprà, id quod ipsi jurisconsulti in hunc locum non dissimulant. Quod igitur legitimè, et volente populo, concessum non est, id revocabile quin sit non dubitamus. Veruntamen rationi maximè consentaneum est, populum Romanum non aliam potestatem transtulisse in principem, atque priùs concesserat suis magistratibus; id est imperium legitimum et revocabile, non tyrannicum et absurdum; quocirca et consularem et tribunitiam potestatem Cæsares recepêre; dictatoriam nemo post Julium; populum in circo adorare etiam solebant, ut ex Tacito Claudiano suprà meminimus. Verùm ut "multi olim privati se in servitutem alteri vendiderunt, sic potest populus universus." O equitem ergastularium et mangonem, patriæ etiam tuæ æternum opprobrium! quem servitutis tam fœdum procuratorem ac lenonem publicum etiam servitia infima cujusvis catastræ abhorrere atque conspuere deberent! Sanè si populus hunc in modum se regibus mancipâsset, posset et reges eundem populum alteri cuivis domino mancipare, aut pretio addicere; et tamen constat regem ne patrimonium quidem coronæ posse alienare. Qui igitur coronæ, quod aïunt, et patrimonii regii, usum fructum solùm à populo concessum habet, is populi ipsius manceps erit? Non si pertusis auribus utrisque perforatus eques, non si gypsatis pedibus cursitares, tam esses omnium servorum vilissimus, quam nunc es, hujus tam pudendæ author sententiæ. Perge pœnas tuorum scelerum invitus, quod nunc facis, de temetipso sumere. Multa postremò de jure belli balbutis, quæ hìc locum non habent; nam neque Carolus nos bello vicit, et majores ejus, etsi maximè vicissent, isti tamen juri sæpiùs renuntiaverant; nec verò tam unquam victi fuimus, ut nos in eorum nomen, illi in nostras leges, non vicissim jurarent; quas cùm Carolus insigniter violâsset, vel olim victorem, vel nunc regem perjurum, priùs ab ipso lacessiti armis debellavimus: ex tua autem sententia "quod armis quæritur, transit in ejus dominium qui acquisivit." Sis itaque deinceps hac in parte quàm voles verbosus, sis, quod in Solino dudùm fuisti, exercitator Plinianus, blateronum omnium verbosissimus, quicquid exinde argutaris, quicquid turbas, quicquid rabbinicaris, quicquid rauces, ad finem usque hujus capitis, id totum non jam pro rege devicto, sed pro nobis divina ope victoribus, contra regem desudare te scias.

CAPUT VII.

Propter duo incommoda sanè maxima, et pro tuo pondere gravissima, potestatem populi esse regiâ majorem proximo capite negâsti: quippe, si concederes, quærendum regi aliud nomen esset, translato in populum regis vocabulo; et partitiones quædam politicæ conturbarentur: quorum alterum vocabularii dispendium foret, alterum tuorum crux politicorum. Ad ea sic à nobis responsum est, ut primum salutis et libertatis nostræ, deinde etiam nomenclaturæ tuæ et politices, habita nonnulla ratio esset. Nunc "aliis rationibus evincendum esse" aïs, "regem à sibi subjectis judicari non posse, quarum hæc erit maximè potens et valida, quòd rex parem in suo regno non habeat." Quid aïs? non habet rex in suo regno parem? quid ergò illi duodecim vetustissimi Franciæ pares? an fabulæ sunt et nugæ? an frustra et ad ludibrium sic nominati? Cave istam viris Galliæ principibus contumeliam dixeris. An quia inter se pares? quasi verò nobilitatis totius Gallicæ duodenos tantùm inter se pares esse, aut dicendos idcirco Franciæ pares, existimandum sit. Quod nisi revera sint regis Franciæ pares, quòd cum eo rempub. pari jure atque consilio administret, vide ne in Franciæ regno potiùs quàm in nostra repub. quod unicum tua interest, glossario illudatur. Age verò, fac planum, non esse regi in regno suo parem. "Quia," inquis, "populus Romanus post reges exactos, duos constituit consules, non unum; ut si unus peccaret, coërceri à collega posset." Vix fingi quicquam potuit ineptius: cur igitur unus duntaxat consulum fasces apud se habuit, non uterque, si ad alterutrum coërcendum alter datus erat? quid si etiam uterque contra rempub. conjurâsset, an meliore loco res fuisset, quàm si collegam alteri nullum dedissent? Constat autem et ambos consules, et magistratus omnes, obtemperare senatui semper debuisse, quoties id è repub. esse patribus et plebi visum est. Hujus rei Marcum Tullium in oratione pro Sestio locupletissimum testem habeo: à quo simul brevissimam Romanæ civitatis descriptionem accipe; quam is et "sapientissimè constitutam," et omnes bonos cives nosse eam oportere, dicebat, quod idem et nos dicimus. "Majores nostri, cùm regum potestatem non tulissent, ita magistratus annuos creaverunt, ut consilium senatûs reipub. præponerent sempiternum: deligerentur autem in id consilium ab universo populo; aditusque in illum summum ordinem omnium civium industriæ ac virtuti pateret: senatum reipub. custodem, præsidem, propugnatorem, collocaverunt: hujus ordinis authoritate uti magistratus, et quasi ministros gravissimi consilii esse, voluerunt." Exemplo illustri esse poterunt Decemviri; qui cùm potestate consulari et summa præditi essent, eos tamen omnes simul, etiam renitentes, patrum authoritas in ordinem coëgit; consules etiam nonnullos, antequam magistratum deposuerant, hostes judicatos et contra eos sumpta arma esse legimus: hostilia enim facientem, esse consulem nemo putabat. Sic bellum contra Antonium consulem senatûs authoritate est gestum: in quo victus pœnas capitis dedisset, nisi Octavianus Cæsar, regnum affectans, evertendæ reipub. consilium cum eo iniisset. Jam quòd "hoc proprium esse" aïs "majestatis regalis, ut imperium penès unicum sit," haud minùs lubricum est, et à te quidem ipso statim refellitur: "Judices," enim "Hebræorum et singuli, et toto vitæ spatio, imperium obtinebant; scriptura quoque reges eos vocat; et tamen à synedrio magno" judicabantur. Ita fit, dum dixisse omnia vis videri, ut nihil ferè nisi pugnantia loquaris. Quæro deinde qualem tu formam regiminis esse dicas, cùm Romanum imperium duo simul tresve imperatores habuerunt; an imperatores tibi, id est reges, an optimates, an triumviri, videntur fuisse? An verò dices Romanum imperium sub Antonio et Vero, sub Diocletiano et Maximiano, sub Constantino et Licinio, non unum imperium fuisse? Jam ista tua "statuum tria genera" tuismet ipsius argutiis periclitantur, si reges isti non fuere: si fuere, non est ergò proprium imperii regii. ut penès unicum sit. "Alter," inquis, "horum si deliquat, potest alter de eo referre ad populum vel ad senatum, ut accusetur et condemnetur." Annon ergò judicat vel populus vel senatus ad quos alter ille refert? Si quid igitur ipse tribuis tibi, collegâ opus non erat ad judicandum collegam. Heu te defensorem, nisi execrabilis potiùs esses, planè miserandum! undiquaque ictibus adeò opportunum, ut si fortè per lusum destinare quis vellet quovis te loco punctim ferire, vix esse credo ubi temere possit aberrare. "Ridiculum" esse statuis, "regem in se judices dare velle, à quibus capite damnaretur." Atqui ego non ridiculum, sed optimum, tibi oppono imperatorem Trajanum; qui præfectum prætorio Saburanum, cùm ei insigne potestatis, uti mos erat, pugionem daret, crebrò sic monuit: "Accipe hunc gladium pro me, si rectè agam, sin aliter, in me magis, quòd moderatorem omnium vel errare minùs fas sit." Hæc Dion et Aurelius Victor. Vides ut judicem in se statuerit imperator egregius quamvis non parem. Hoc idem Tiberius per simulationem et vaniloquentiam fortasse dixisset; Trajanum autem virum optimum et sanctissimum non id ex animo dixisse quod verum, quod jus et fas, esse sentiebat, scelestus penè sit qui arbitretur. Quanto justiùs ergò senatui, cùm viribus superior potuerit non parere, planè ex officii ratione paruit; et jure superiorem est fassus. De quo Plinius in panegyrico. "Senatus ut susciperes quartum consulatum et rogavit et jussit; imperii hoc verbum, non adulationis esse, obsequio tuo crede:" et paulò pòst, "hæc nempe intentio tua, ut libertatem revoces ac reducas." Quod Trajanus de se, idem senatus de Trajano sensit, suamque authoritatem revera esse supremam; nam qui imperatorem jubere potuit, potuit eundem et judicare. Sic Marcus Aurelius imperator, cùm præfectus Syriæ Cassius regnum ei eripere conaretur, obtulit se in judicium vel senatui vel populo Romano; paratus regno cedere, siquidem iis ita videretur. Jam verò quis rectiùs aut meliùs de jure regio existimare et statuere queat, quàm ex ore ipso regum optimorum. Profectò, jure naturali, rex quisque bonus vel senatum vel populum habet sibi semper et parem et superiorem: Tyrannus autem cùm natura infimus omnium sit, nemo non illi par atque superior existimandus est, quicunque viribus plus valet. Quemadmodum enim à vi olim ad leges, duce naturâ, deventum est, ita, ubi leges pro nihilo habentur, necessariò, eâdem etiam duce, ad vim est redeundum. "Hoc sentire," inquit Cicero pro Sestio, "prudentiæ est; facere, fortitudinis; et sentire verò et facere, perfectæ cumulatæque virtutis." Maneat hoc igitur in natura, nullis parasitorum artibus concutiendum, rege sive bono, sive malo, vel senatum vel populum esse superiorem. Quod et ipse confiteris, cùm potestatem regiam à populo in regem transiisse dicis. Quam enim regi potestatem dedit, eam naturâ, ac virtute quadam, vel ut ita dicam virtualiter, etiam cum alteri dederit, tamen in se habet: Quæ enim causæ naturales isto modo per eminentiam quandam quidvis efficiunt, plus semper suæ retinent virtutis quàm impertiunt; nec impertiendo se exhauriunt. Vides, quò propiùs ad naturam accedimus, eò evidentiùs potestatem populi supra regiam eminere. Illud etiam constat, populum, modò id ei liberum sit, potestatem regi suam simpliciter et mancipio nunquam dare, neque naturâ posse dare; sed tantum salutis et libertatis publicæ causâ, quam cùm rex procurare destiterit, intelligitur populum nihil dedisse; quia certo fini tantummodò dedit, monente ipsa natura; quem finem si neque natura, neque populus assequitur, non erit magis ratum quod dedit, quàm pactum quodvis aut fœdus irritum. His rationibus firmissimè probatur superiorem rege esse populum; unde argumentum hoc tuum, "maximè potens et validum, non posse regem judicari, quia parem in suo regno non habet, nec superiorem," diluitur. Id enim assumis, quod nullo modo concedimus. "In populari statu," inquis, "magistratus, à populo positus, ab eodem ob crimen plecti potest; in statu aristocratico optimates, ab iis quos habent collegas; sed pro monstro est, ut rex in regno suo cogatur causam capitis dicere." Quid nunc aliud concludis, quàm miserrimos esse omnium et stultissimos, qui regem sibi constituunt? Sed quamobrem, quæso, non poterit populus tam regem punire reum, quàm popularem magistratum, aut optimates? An putas omnes populos, qui sub regibus vivunt, amore servitutis usque eò deperiisse, ut, liberi cùm essent, servire maluerint, seque omnes, seque totos, in unius dominium viri sæpe mali sæpe stulti ita tradere, ut contra dominum, si sors ferat, immanissimum, nullum in legibus, nullum in natura ipsa, præsidium salutis, aut perfugium, sibi reliquerint? Cur ergò regibus primò regnum ineuntibus conditiones ferunt; cur leges etiam dant regnandi? an ut sperni se eò magis atque irrideri paterentur? adeone populum universum se abjicere, se deserere, sibi deesse, spem omnem in uno homine, eoque ferè vanissimo, collocare? Cur item jurant reges nihil se contra legem facturos? ut discant nempe miseri mortales, suo maximo malo, solis licere regibus impunè pejerare. Id quod hæc tua nefanda consectaria demonstrant. "Si rex qui eligitur, aliqua vel cum sacramento promiserit, quæ nisi promisisset, fortasse nec sumptus esset, si stare nolit conventis, à populo judicari non potest. Immò si subditis suis juraverit in electione, se secundùm leges regni justitiam administraturum, et nisi id faciat, eos sacramento fidelitatis fore solutos, et facto ipso abiturum esse potestate, à Deo non ab hominibus pœna in fallentem exposcenda est." Descripsi hæc, non ob elegantiam, sunt enim incultissima; nec quòd amplius refutationis indigeant, etenim ipsa se refutant, se explodunt, se damnant apertissima falsitate sua, atque turpitudine; sed eò feci, ut ob merita tua egregia commendarem te regibus: qui inter officia aulæ tam multa aliquem dignitatis locum, aut munus idoneum tibi, prospiciant: cum enim alii sint à rationibus, alii à poculis, alii à voluptatibus, tu iis commodissimè sanè eris à perjuriis; tu regiæ non elegantiæ, nam inscitus nimiùm es, sed perfidiæ, summus arbiter eris. Verùm ut summam in te stultitiam summa improbitate conjunctam esse omnes fateantur, expendamus paulo accuratiùs præclara illa, quæ proximè affirmâsti: "Rex," inquis, "etsi subditis juraverit in electione, se secundum leges regnaturum," et ni faciat, "eos sacramento fidelitatis solutos fore, et se facto ipso abiturum potestate," abdicari tamen aut puniri ab iis non poterit. Quî minùs, quæso, rex quàm popularis magistratus? quia in eo regimine populus non omnem transfundit potestatem suam ad magistratum. An hic igitur in regem? cui regnum in se non diutius tradunt, quàm id benè gesserit. Tam itaque rex, juratus in leges, reus abjici aut puniri poterit, quàm popularis magistratus. Nam argumento illo pancratico omnis in regem translatæ potestatis ampliùs uti non potes, quod tuis ipse machinis imprudens arietâsti. Cognoscite nunc "aliam potentissimam et invictam ejus rationem cur subditi regem "judicare nequeant "quia legibus solutus est, quia leges solus rex omnes fert;" quæ cum falsissima esse jam toties probaverim, hæc etiam invicta tua ratio cum priore ad nihilum recidit. Cæterùm rex ob delicta quævis privata, utpote stuprum, adulterium, et similia, si raro plectitur, non tam justitia quàm æquitate id fit, ne plus turbarum ex morte regis, et rerum mutatione, populo eveniat, quàm boni ex uno atque altero vindicato. Ex quo verò omnibus gravis et intolerandus esse incipit, tum quidem, quoquo possunt modo, judicatum vel injudicatum omnes nationes tyrannum occidere fas esse semper credidere. Unde Marcus Tullius in secunda Philippica de Cæsaris interfectoribus. "Hi primi cum gladiis non in regnum appetentem, sed in regnantem, impetum fecerunt: quod cum ipsum factum per se præclarum atque divinum est, tum est positum ad imitandum." Quàm hujus tu dissimilis! "Homicidium, adulterium, injuria, non hæc crimina regia sunt, sed privata." Euge, parasite, lenones jam omnes et propudia aulica hac voce demeruisti; O quàm lepidè simul et parasitaris, et eâdem operâ lenocinaris! "Rex adulter benè potest regnare, et homicida, ideoque vitâ privari non debet, quia cum vita regno quoque exueretur; at nunquam hoc fuit probatum legibus divinis aut humanis, ut duplex vindicta de uno crimine sumeretur." Os impurum et infame! eadem ratione nec populares magistratus, nec optimates, ne duplici pœna afficerentur, ne judex quidem, aut senator, flagitiosus pœnas capite ullas persolvere debebit; cum vita enim et ipsi suo magistratu privarentur. Ut potestatem, sic majestatem etiam, populo adimere et in regem conferre studes; vicariam si vis et translatitiam, primariam certè non potes, uti nec potestatem. "Crimen," inquis, "majestatis non potest committere rex adversùs populum suum; potest autem populus adversus regem." Et tamen rex propter populum duntaxat rex est, non populus propter regem. Populus igitur universus, aut pars major, plus semper rege debet posse: negas, et calculos ponis, "plus potest quàm singuli, bini, terni, deni, centeni, milleni, decies milleni." Esto. "Plus quàm dimidia pars populi." Non repugno. "Quid si alterius dimidiæ pars altera accedat, annon adhuc plus poterit?" Minimè. Progredere; quid aufers abacum, peritissime logista, an progressionem arithmeticam non calles? Vertit rationes, et "annon rex cum optimatibus plus potestatis habeat," quærit; iterum nego, Vertumne, si pro optimatibus proceres intelligas; quoniam accidere potest, ut nemo inter eos optimatis nomine sit dignus: fit etiam sæpiùs, ut multò plures de plebe sint, qui virtute et sapientia proceres antecellant; quibus cùm pars populi major vel potior accedit, eos universi populi instar esse haud verear dicere. "At si plus quàm universi non potest, ergò rex erit tantùm singulorum, non omnium universim sumptorum:" rectè; nisi ipsi voluerint. Rationes jam subducito; comperies te imperitè supputando sortem perdidisse. "Dicunt Angli penès populum jus majestatis ex origine et natura residere, hoc verò est omnium statuum eversionem inducere." Etiamne aristocratiæ, et democratiæ? Credibile sanè narras: quid si etiam gynæcocratiæ, sub quo statu ferunt te domi propemodùm vapulare, annon bearent te Angli, O perpusilli homo animi? sed hoc frustra speraveris; æquissimè enim est comparatum, ut qui tyrannidem foris imponere omnibus cupias, ipse domi tuæ servitutem servias turpissimam, et minimè virilem. "Doceamus te oportet," inquis, "quid nomine populi intelligi velimus." Permulta sunt, quæ te doceri potiùs oporteret; nam quæ te propiùs attingunt, videris ea penitùs nescire, et præter literulas nihil unquam didicisse, ne percipere quidem potuisse. Hoc tamen scire te putas, nos populi nomine plebem solùm intelligere quòd "optimatum consessum abrogavimus." At illud est ipsum, quod demonstrat nos populi vocabulo omnes ordinis cujuscunque cives comprehendere; qui unam tantummodo populi curiam supremam stabilivimus, in qua etiam proceres, ut pars populi, non pro sese quidem solis, ut antea, sed pro iis municipiis, à quibus electi fuerint, suffragia ferendi legitimum jus habent. Inveheris deinde in plebem, "cæcam" eam et "brutam, regendi artem non habere; nil plebe ventosius, vanius, levius, mobilius:" Conveniunt in te optimè hæc omnia; et de infima quidem plebe sunt etiam vera, de media non item; quo ex numero prudentissimi ferè sunt viri, et rerum peritissimi: cæteros hinc luxus et opulentia, inde egestas et inopia, à virtute et civilis prudentiæ studio plerunque avertit. "Plures" nunc esse "modos" asseris "regum constituendorum, qui nihil populo debent hoc nomine," et imprimis illi, "qui regnum habent hæreditarium." At verò servæ sint istæ nationes oportet, et ad servitutem natæ, quæ talem agnoscant dominum, cui se sine assensu suo hæreditate obvenisse credant: pro civibus certè, aut ingenuis et liberis, haberi non possunt; nec rempub. habere ullam censendæ; quinimmò inter facultates, et possessiones quasi heri sui, et herilis filii, numerandæ sunt: nam quod ad jus dominii, quid distent à servitiis et pecoribus non video. Secundò, "qui armis sibi regnum fecit, populum," inquis, "non potest authorem agnoscere imperii prolati vel usurpati." At nobis non de victore, sed de subacto rege, sermo nunc est; quid victor possit aliàs disputabimus; tu hoc age. Quod autem regi jus patrisfamilias antiquum toties attribuis, ut inde "absolutæ potestatis in regibus exemplum" petas, dissimillimum id esse jam sæpiùs ostendi: Aristoteles etiam ille, quem crepas, vel initio politicorum, si legisses, idem te docuisset: ubi aït malè eos judicare, qui inter patrem familias et regem parum interesse existimant; "regnum enim à familia, non numero solùm, sed specie differre." Postquam enim pagi in oppida et urbes crevere, evanuit paulatim jus illud regale familiæ, et agnosci desitum est. Hinc scribit Diodorus, l. 1. regna antiquitùs dari non regum filiis, sed iis quorum maxima in populum beneficia extiterunt. Et Justinus, "Principio rerum, gentium nationumque imperium penès reges erat; quos ad fastigium hujus majestatis, non ambitio popularis, sed spectata inter bonos moderatio, provehebat." Unde perspicuum est, in ipso gentium principio, imperium paternum et hæreditarium virtuti et populari statim juri cessisse. Quæ origo imperii regii et ratio et causa maximè naturalis est. Ob eam enim ipsam causam primò homines in unum convenere, non ut unus omnes insultaret, sed ut, quocunque alterum lædente, ne lex deesset, neve judex inter homines, quo læsus aut defendatur aut saltem vindicetur. Dispersos olim homines et dispalatos disertus aliquis, et sapiens, ad vitam civilem traduxit: tu "hoc maximè consilio," inquis, "ut in congregatos imperium haberet." Nimbrotum fortasse intelligis, qui tyrannorum primus fuisse dicitur: vel hæc tua solius malitia est, quæ in illos olim magnos et excelsi animi viros cadere non potuit; tuum solius commentum, à nemine, quod sciam, ante te traditum; cum utilitatem et salutem generis humani, non sua commoda, suumque dominatum, respexisse illos primos urbium conditores antiquorum omnium monumentis proditum sit. Unum prætereire non possum, quo tu veluti emblemate quodam exornare credo cætera hujus capitis voluisti: si "consulem," inquis, in judicium venire oportuisset, priusquam magistratu abîsset, dictator ad hoc creandus fuisset," cum initio dixeris, "ideo collegam ei fuisse datum." Sic tua semper inter se congruunt, et quid de quaque re dicas, quidve scribas, quàm nullius momenti sit, paginis ferè singulis declarant. "Sub antiquis regibus Anglosaxonicis plebem," aïs, "ad comitia regni nunquam vocari solitam esse." Si quis nostrorum hoc affirmâsset, possem eum haud multo negotio erroris arguere; tua ista peregrina affirmatione res nostras hallucinante minùs moveor. Et de communi regum jure quæ habuisti hæc ferè sunt. Reliqua multa, nam et sæpissimè devius esse soles, prætermitto, vel quæ fundamento nituntur nullo, vel quæ extra causam posita sunt: non enim id operam do, ut tibi par esse loquacitate videar.

CAPUT VIII.

Si de communi regum jure, Salmasi, quæ sentires, ea sine contumelia cujusquam protulisses, quamvis in hac rerum apud Anglos mutatione, tamen, cùm libertate scribendi uterere tuâ, neque erat cur quisquam Anglorum tibi succenseret, neque in asserenda, quam tueris, sententia minus effecisses. Nam si hoc et Mosis et Christi præceptum est, "omnes regibus suis tam bonis quàm malis subjici, sive Hispanos, sive Gallos, sive Italos, sive Germanos, sive Anglos, sive Scotos," quod suprà (p. 127.) affirmabas, quid attinebat te, exterum et ignotum, jura nostra balbutire, eaque velle nobis è cathedra quasi schedulas tuas, et miscellanea, prælegere, quæ utcunque legibus divinis debere cedere multis antea verbis docueras. Nunc satis constat non tam tuopte ingenio ad causam regiam adjecisse te animum, quàm partim pretio, pro ejus, qui te conduxit, copia maximo, partim spe præmii cujusdam majoris, conductum fuisse, ut Anglos vicinorum nemini molestos, rerum tantummodò suarum arbitros, libello infami lacerares. Hoc nisi esset, quenquamne tantâ credibile est impudentiâ esse aut insaniâ, ut longinquus et extraneus immergere se gratìs in res nostras, ad partes etiam se adjungere, non dubitaret? Nam quid tua, malum, refert, quid rerum Angli inter se gerant? Quid tibi vis, Ole, quid tibi quæris? nihilne domi habes quod ad te pertinet? Utinam eadem haberes, quæ habuit ille notissimus in epigrammate Olus; et fortasse habes; dignus profectò es. An uxor tua stimulatrix illa, quæ ut in gratiam exulis Caroli hæc scriberes, etiam currentem incitâsse fertur, ampliores fortè in Anglia professiones, et honoraria nescio quæ, redeunte Carolo, ominata tibi est? At scitote, fœmina virque, non esse locum in Anglia neque lupo neque lupi domino. Unde mirum non est te toties in molossos nostros tantam rabiem effudisse. Quin redis ad illustres illos in Gallia titulos tuos, et imprimis ad famelicum illum lupi dominatum, deinde ad consistorium illud regis Christianissimi sacrum; nimis longo intervallo consiliarius peregrè abes à patria. Verùm illa, quod planè video, neque te desiderat neque consilia tua; ne cùm redires quidem paucis ab hinc annis, et culinam cardinalitiam olfacere et sectari cœpisses: sapit mehercule, sapit, teque oberrare semivirum Gallum cum uxore viro, et refertissimis inaniarum scriniis, facilè sinit; donec stipem sive equiti grammatistæ, sive illustri Hippocritico, satìs largam alicubi gentium inveneris; si cui fert animus regi vel civitati, doctorem erraticum et venalem mercede maxima liceri. Sed eccum tibi licitatorem; vendibilis necne sis, et quanti, jam statim videbimus. "Pertendunt," inquis, "parricidæ, regni Anglicani statum mixtum esse, non merè regium." Pertendit idem sub Edvardo 6to Smithus noster, jurisconsultus idem bonus, et politicus, quem fuisse parricidam non dices, ejus libri ferè initio, quem de repub. Anglicana scripsit; neque id de nostra solùm, sed de omni penè repub. idque ex Aristotelis sententia verum esse affirmat; neque aliter ullam rempub. stare posse. At enim, quasi piaculum esse crederes quicquam dicere sine repugnantiis, ad priores illas et jam tritissimas fœdè revolveris. "Nullam gentem" aïs "esse, nec fuisse unquam, quæ regis appellatione non intellexerit eam potestatem quæ solo Deo minor est, quæque solum Deum judicem haberet;" et tamen paulo post fateris, "nomen regis datum vel olim fuisse ejusmodi potestatibus et magistratibus, qui plenum et liberum jus non haberent, sed à populi nutu dependens," ut "suffetes Carthaginiensium, judices Hebræorum, reges Lacedæmoniorum," et postremo "Arragonensium." Satisne bellè tibi constas? Tum quinque monarchiæ species ex Aristotele recenses, quarum una tantùm jus illud obtinuit, quod tu regibus commune omnibus esse dicis. De qua haud semel jam dictum est, nullum ejus exemplum vel ab Aristotele allatum, vel usquam extitisse: quatuor reliquas, et legitimas, et legibus fuisse minores, dilucidè ostendit. Primum horum erat regnum Laconicum, et maximè quidem, ejus sententiâ, regnum eorum quatuor quæ legitima erant. Secundum erat barbaricum, hoc solo diuturnum quia legitimum, et volente populo: nolente autem, omnis rex continuò non erit rex sed tyrannus, si invito populo regnum retinuerit, eodem teste Aristotele, l. 5. Idem de tertia regum specie dicendum est, quos ille æsymnetas vocat, electos à populo, et ad certum plerunque tempus, certasque causas, quales ferè apud Romanos fuere dictatores. Quarta species eorum est, qui heroïcis temporibus regnabant, quibus ob egregia merita regnum ultro à populo delatum erat, sed legitimum tamen; neque verò hi nisi volente populo regnum tenebant, nec alia re magìs differre has quatuor regni species à tyrannide aït, quàm quòd illic volente, hîc invito, populo regnetur. Quinta denique regni species, quæ παμβασιλεία dicitur, et est cum summa potestate, quale tu jus regum omnium esse vis, à philosopho planè damnatur, ut neque utile, neque justum, neque naturale, nisi sit ut populus ferre possit istiusmodi regnum, iisque deferat qui virtute aliis omnibus longè præluceant. Hæc, 3tio politicorum, cuivis obvia sunt. Verùm tu, credo, ut vel semel ingeniosus et floridus esse viderere, "has quinque monarchiæ species quinque zonis" mundi assimilare gestiebas; "Inter duo extrema potentia regalis tres aliæ species interpositæ magis temperatæ videntur, ut inter zonas torridam et frigidam, quæ mediæ jacent." Festivum caput! quàm pulchras nobis similitudines semper concinnas! Tu igitur, quò regnum "absolutæ potestatis" ipse damnas, ad zonam frigidam hinc ocyùs amolire; quæ post adventum illic tuum plus duplo frigebit: nos interim à te novo Archimede sphæram illam, quam describis, mirabilem expectamus, in qua duæ sint extremæ zonæ, una torrida, altera frigida, tres mediæ temperatæ. "Reges," inquis, "Lacedæmoniorum in vincula conjici fas erat, morte multari fas non erat." Quare? an quia damnatum capite Agidem lictores et peregrini milites, rei novitate perculsi, regem ducere ad mortem non esse fas existimabant? Et populus quidem Spartanus ejus mortem ægrè tulit, non quòd rex capitali supplicio affectus fuerit, sed quòd bonus, et popularis, factione divitum judicio illo circumventus esset. Sic itaque Plutarchus, "primus rex Agis ab ephoris est morte multatus;" quibus verbis non quid fas, sed quid factum sit, tantummodò narrat. Nam qui regem in jus ducere, vel etiam in vincula possunt, illos non posse eundem supplicio ultimo afficere, puerile est credere. Accingeris jam tandem ad jus regum Anglicorum. "Rex," inquis, "in Anglia unus semper fuit." Hoc eo dicis, quia modò dixeras, "rex non est nisi unus sit et unicus." Quid si ita est, aliquot sanè quos credebam Angliæ reges fuisse, non erant: nam ut multos omittam Saxonicorum, qui consortes imperii vel filios vel fratres habuere, constat Henricum 2dum è stirpe Normanica cum filio regnâsse. "Ostendant," inquis, "aliquod regnum sub unius imperio, cui non potestas absoluta adjuncta fuerit, in quibusdam tamen magis remissa, in aliis magis intenta." Ostende tu potestatem absolutam remissam, asine; annon absoluta est summa? Quomodo ergò summa et remissa simul erit? quoscunque fateberis reges cum remissa potestate esse, eos non esse cum absoluta facilè vincam; inferiores proinde esse populo naturâ libero, qui et suus ipse legislator est, et potestatem regiam vel intendere, vel remittere, potest. Britannia an tota olim regibus paruerit, incertum: verisimilius est, prout tempora ferebant, nunc hanc, nunc illam, reipub. formam adhibuisse. Hinc Tacitus, "Britanni olim regibus parebant, nunc per principes factionibus et studiis trahuntur." Deserti à Romanis, XL circiter annos sine regibus fuere: "regnum" itaque "perpetuum," quod affirmas, antiquitùs non fuit; fuisse autem hæreditarium præcisè nego; quod et regum series, et mos creandi, eorum demonstrat: disertis enim verbis petuntur populi suffragia. Postquam enim rex consuetum juramentum dedit, accedens archiepiscopus ad quatuor partes exstructi suggesti, toties rogat populum universum his verbis, "Consentire vultis de habendo ipsum regem?" planè ac si Romano more dixisset, Vultis, jubetis, hunc regnare? quod opus non foret, si regnum jure esse hæreditarium; verùm apud reges usurpatio pro jure sæpissimè obtinet. Tu Caroli bello toties victi jus regium jure belli fundare adniteris: Gulielmus scilicet cognomento "Conquæstor" nos subjugavit. At sciunt qui in nostra historia peregrini non sunt, Anglorum opes uno illo prælio Hastingensi non adeò attritas fuisse, quin bellum facilè instaurare potuissent. Sed regem accipere, quàm victorem et tyrannum pati, malebant. Dant itaque jusjurandum Gulielmo, se fidem ei servaturos: dat pariter Gulielmus juramentum illis, admotus altari, se omnia, quæ per est bonum regem, iis esse vicissim præstiturum. Cum falleret fidem, et rursus Angli arma caperent, diffisus ipse suis viribus, juravit denuò, tactis Evangeliis, antiquas se leges Angliæ observaturum. Si postea igitur Anglos miserè afflixit, non id jure belli, sed jure perjurii, fecit. Certum est, præterea, jam multis ab hinc sæculis victos et victores in unam gentem coaluisse; ut jus illud belli, si quod unquam fuit, antiquari jamdiu necesse sit. Ipsius verba morientis, quæ ex libro Cadomensi fide dignissimo descripta reddimus, omnem dubitationem tollunt. "Neminem," inquit, "Anglici regni constituo hæredem." Qua voce jus illud belli, simulque illud hæreditarium, cum ipso mortuo Gulielmo conclamatum atque sepultum est. Video nunc aliquam te in aula dignitatem, quod prædixi fore, esse adeptum; summus nimirum aulicæ astutiæ quæstor regius et procurator es factus. Unde hoc quod sequitur videris ex officio scribere, vir magnifice. "Siquis prædecessorum regum factionibus procerum, vel seditionibus plebis, coactus, aliquid de suo jure remiserit, id non potest successori obesse, quin id iterum sibi vindicet." Rectè mones: itaque si quo tempore majores nostri aliquid de jure suo per ignaviam amisere, an id oberit nobis, eorum posteris? Pro se illi quidem servitutem spondere, si vellent, pro nobis certè non poterant; quibus idem semper jus erit nosmet liberandi, quod illis erat in servitutem se cuilibet tradendi. Miraris "quid faciat," ut "rex Britanniæ hodie debeat haberi pro magistratu tantum regni, qui autem alia regna in Christianitate obtinent, plena et libera potestate polleant." De Scotia remitto te ad Buchananum, de Gallia etiam tua, ubi hospes esse videris, ad Francogalliam Hotomani, et Girardum Franciæ historicum, de cæteris ad alios, quorum nulli quod sciam independentes erant: ex quibus de jure regio longè alia poteras didicisse, quàm quæ doces. Cùm jure belli tyrannidem regibus Angliæ asserere nequiveris, facis jam periculum in jure parasitico. Edicunt reges se regnare "Dei gratiâ:" quid si Deos se esse edixissent? te, credo, flaminem facilè erant habituri: sic pontifex Cantuariensis "Dei providentia" archiepiscopari præ se tulit. Tune ista fatuitate papam non vis esse regem in ecclesia, ut regem constituere plusquam papam in repub. possis? At in regni statutis appellatur "rex dominus noster." Mirus tu quidem statutorum nostrorum nomenculator repentè evasisti; nescis tamen multos dici dominos qui non sunt; nescis quàm iniquum sit ex titulis honorariis, ne dicam adulatoriis, de jure et veritate rerum statuere. Eodem refer quod "parlamentum regis" dicitur: nam et frænum regis vocatur; adeoque non magis rex parlamenti est dominus, quam equus est sui dominus fræni. At "cur non regis parlamentum, cum ab eo convocetur." Dicam tibi, quia convocatur etiam senatus à consule, neque proptcrea dominus illius concilii erat. Quòd itaque rex parlamentum convocat, id facit pro officio suo ac munere, quod à populo accepit, ut etiam, quos convocat, eos de arduis regni negotiis consuleret, non de suis: aut siqua dici sua possunt, de iis postremo semper loco agi solitum erat; ad arbitrium etiam parlamenti, non suum. Nec verò ignorant, quorum id interest scire, parlamentum sive vocatum, sive non vocatum, bis intra vertentem annum antiquitùs ex lege potuisse convenire. At "regis etiam leges nuncupantur." Sunt istæ quidem ad regem phaleræ; rex autem Angliæ legem ferre per se potest nullam; neque enim ad leges ferendas, sed ad custodiendas à populo latas, constitutus erat. Tuque hìc fateris "congregari" idcirco "parlamentum, ut leges conderet." Quapropter et lex terræ vocatur, et lex populi: unde Ethelstanus rex in præfatione legum, ubi omnes alloquitur, "vobis," inquit, "lege vestrà" omnia largitus sum: et in formula juramenti, quo reges Angliæ antequam crearentur obstringere se solebant, sic populus à rege stipulatur. "Concedis justas leges quas vulgus elegerit?" respondet rex, "Concedo." Erras etiam totâ Angliâ, "qui regem, quo tempore parlamentum non habetur, plenè planèque totum regni statum regio jure gubernare" aïs. Nam neque de bello, neque de pace, quod magni sit momenti, quicquam decernere, ne in jure quidem dicundo curiarum decretis intercedere potest. Jurant itaque judices nihil se in judiciis exercendis nisi ex lege facturos, etiamsi rex ipse dicto, aut mandato, vel etiam literis proprio annulo obsignatis, aliter imperaret. Hinc sæpius in nostro jure rex "infans" dicitur; nec sua jura aut dignitates, nisi pueri aut pupilli in modum, possidere. Spec. Just. c. 4. sect. 22. Hinc etiam illud apud nos crebrò dici solitum, "rex non potest facere injuriam." Quod tu hoc modo sceleratè interpretaris, "non est injuria quam facit rex, quia in eo non punitur." Admirabilem hominis impudentiam et improbitatem vel hoc solo interpretamento quis non perspiciat? "Capitis est imperare," inquis, "non membrorum; rex parlamenti caput est." Siccine nugarere, si cor tibi saperet? erras iterum (sed quis finis errorum est tuorum?) in quo regis consiliarios à parlamenti ordinibus non distinguis; nam neque illos quidem omnes, horum verò nullos reliquis non probatos, eligere debebat rex; in plebeium autem ordinem ut quenquam eligeret, id sibi ne sumebat quidem unquam. Quibus id muneris populus delegabat, per municipia singuli suffragiis omnium eligebantur; notissima loquor, eoque brevior sum. "Falsum" autem "esse" aïs, "quod sanctæ independentiæ cultores asserunt, parlamentum à populo fuisse institutum." Video jam quid sit cur papatum tanto impetu evertere contendas: alium ipse papatum in alvo, quod aïunt, gestas: quid enim aliud uxor uxoris, lupus ex lupa gravidus, nisi aut portentum, aut papatum aliquem novum, parturire te oportebat? certè papa germanus quasi jam esses, sanctos et sanctas pro arbitrio facis; reges etiam omni peccato absolvis, et, quasi strato jam hoste, ejus exuviis opimum te ornas. Verùm, quia papa nondum per te planè cecidit, dum libri illius tui "de primatu," secunda et tertia, et fortasse quarta et quinta, pars prodierit, qui multos mortales tædio priùs enecabit, quàm tu papam eo libro subegeris, sit satis interea, quæso, ad antipapatum saltem aliquem posse ascendere; est altera, quam tu, præter illam independentiam abs te irrisam, sanctorum in numerum seriò retulisti, tyrannis regia: sanctæ ergò tyrannidis regiæ tu pontifex eris maximus; et nequid desit tibi ad papales titulos, "servus etiam servorum" eris, non Dei, sed aulæ; quoniam illa Chenaani maledictio adhæsisse tibi ad præcordia videtur. "Bestiam" appellas "populum." Quid interim es ipse? Non enim sacrum illud consistorium, neque sanctus ille lupus, te dominum suum aut populo exemerit aut vulgo; neque effecerit, quin, sicuti es, teterrima ipse bestia sis. Certè libri sacri prophetici magnorum regum monarchiam et dominationem immanis bestiæ nomine ac specie adumbrare solent. "Sub regibus ante Gulielmum," inquis, "nulla parlamenti mentio exstat." De vocabulo Gallicano altercari non libet: res semper fuit: et Saxonicis temporibus "Concilium Sapientum" vocari solitum concedis. Sapientes autem tam sunt plebis quàm procerum ex numero. At "in statuto Mertonensi, vigesimo Hen. tertii, comitum et baronum tantum fit mentio." Ita te semper nomina decipiunt, qui tantùm in nominibus ætatem omnem contrivisti; nobis enim satis constat, et Quinque-portuum curatores, et decuriones urbicos, nonnunquam et mercatores, illo sæculo baronum nomine appellatos fuisse; neque dubium omnino est, quin parlamenti quosque senatores, quantumvis plebeios, ætas illa jure multò potiore barones nuncupaverit: nam et anno ejusdem regis 52 tam nobiles, quàm plebeios, fuisse convocatos, Marlbrigii statutum, sicut et reliqua fere statuta omnia, disertis verbis testantur: quos etiam plebeios comitatuum magnates Edouardus tertius in præfatione Statuti Stapli, quam perdoctè pro me recitas, vocavit; eos nimirum "qui de singulis civitatibus pro toto comitatu venerant;" qui quidem plebeium ordinem constituebant, neque erant proceres, aut esse poterant: Tradit etiam liber statutis illis vetustior, qui inscribitur, "Modus habendi parlamenta," licere regi cum plebe sola parlamentum habere, legesque ferre, quamvis comites et episcopi non adsint; non itidem licere regi cum comitibus et episcopis, si plebs non aderit. Hujus rei ratio quoque adjicitur; quia cum nondum comites aut episcopi constituti essent, reges cum populo tamen parlamenta et concilia peragebant: deinde comites pro se tantùm veniunt; plebeii pro suo quisque municipio. Ex quo iste ordo universi populi nomine adesse intelligitur; eoque nomine et potiorem, et nobiliorem, ordine patricio, omnique ex parte anteponendum esse. Sed "judicandi potestas," inquis, "penès domum plebeiam nunquam fuit." Neque penès regem Angliæ fuit unquam: illud tamen memineris, principio omnem potestatem à populo fluxisse, et etiamnum proficisci. Quod et Marcus Tullius de lege agraria pulcherrimè ostendit. "Cum omnes potestates, imperia, curationes, ab universo populo proficisci convenit, tum eas profectò maximè, quæ constituuntur ad populi fructum aliquem, et commodum; in quo et universi deligant, quem populo maximè consulturum putent, et unusquisque studio et suffragio suo viam sibi ad bene-ficium impetrandum munire possit." Vides parlamentorum veram originem, illis Saxonicis archivis longè vetustiorem. Dum in hac luce veritatis et sapientiæ versari licebit, frustra nobis obscuriorum ætatum tenebras offundere conaris. Quod non eò dici à me quisquam existimet, quasi ego de authoritate et prudentia majorum nostrorum detrahi quicquam velim; qui in legibus bonis ferendis plus sanè præstiterunt, quàm vel illa sæcula, vel illorum ingenium et cultus, tulisse videatur: et quamvis leges raró non bonas irrogarent, ignorantiæ tamen, et imbecillitatis humanæ, sibi conscii, hoc veluti fundamentum legum omnium posteris tradi voluerunt, quod et nostri jurisperiti omnes agnoscunt, ut si qua lex aut consuetudo legi divinæ aut naturali, aut rationi denique, repugnaret, ea ne pro lege sancitâ habeatur. Unde tu, etiamsi edictum fortasse aliquod aut statutum in jure nostro, quo regi tyrannica potestas attribuatur, invenire posses, id, cùm et divinæ voluntati, et naturæ, et rationi, contrarium sit, intelligito, ex generali et primaria ista lege nostra quam attuli, rescindi apud nos, et ratum non esse; verùm tu jus nullum tale regium apud nos invenies. Cum enim judicandi potestas primitùs in ipso populo fuisse constet, Anglos autem eam ab se in regem nulla lege regia unquam transtulisse, (neminem enim judicare aut solet aut potest rex Angliæ, nisi per leges provisas jam et approbatas: Fleta l. 1. c. 17.) sequitur eandem adhuc integram atque totam in populo sitam esse; nam parium domui aut nunquam traditam, aut recuperari jure posse, non negabis. At, "regis est," inquis, "de vico municipium," de eo "civitatem facere; ergò illos creat qui constituunt domum inferiorem." At inquam, oppida et municipia regibus antiquiora sunt; etiam in agris populus est populus. Jam Anglicismis tuis magnopere delectamur; Countie Court, The Turn, Hundreda; mira nempe docilitate centenos Jacobæos tuos Anglicè numerare didicisti.

Longam deinde de comitibus et baronibus dissertationem subtexis; ut ostendas regem esse eorum omnium creatorem, quod facilè concedimus, eoque nomine regibus plerunque serviebant; ideoque ne gentis liberæ deinceps judices essent rectè providimus. "Potestatem convocandi parlamentum quoties libet, et quando vult dissolvendi, ex omni temporis memoria penès regem esse" affirmas. Tibine igitur, balatroni mercenario et peregrino, perfugarum dictata exscribenti, an disertis legum nostrarum verbis, fides habenda sit, infrà videbimus. "At," inquis, "reges Angliæ parlamento majus imperium habuisse alio argumento probatur, eoque invincibili; regis potestas perpetua est et ordinaria, quæ per se sine parlamento regnum administrat; parlamenti extraordinaria est authoritas, et ad certas tantùm res, nec sine rege quicquam validi statuere idonea." Ubinam dicamus vim magnam latere hujus argumenti? an in "ordinaria et perpetua?" Atqui minores multi magistratus habent potestatem ordinariam et perpetuam, quos irenarchas vocamus; an summam ergò habent? Suprà etiam dixi potestatem regi idcirco traditam à populo fuisse, ut videret authoritate sibi commissa ne quid contra legem fiat; utque leges custodiret nostras, non ut nobis imponeret suas: regis proinde potestatem, nisi in regni curiis et per eas, esse nullam: immo populi potius ordinaria est omnis, qui per duodecim viros de omnibus judicat. Atque hinc est quòd interrogatus in curia reus, "Cui te permittis judicandum?" respondet semper ex more atque lege, "Deo et populo," non Deo et regi, aut regis vicario. Parlamenti autem authoritas, quæ, re et veritate, summa populi potestas in illum senatum collata est, si extraordinaria est dicenda, id tantùm propter ejus eminentiam dicitur; alioqui, ut notum est, ipsi ordines appellantur, non extra ordinem ergò; et si non actu, quod aïunt, virtute tamen, perpetuum habent in omnes curias et potestates ordinarias jus atque authoritatem; idque sine rege. Offendunt nunc limatulas, opinor, aures tuas nostrorum barbaræ locutiones: cujus ego, si vacaret, aut operæ pretium esset, tot barbarismos hoc uno libro notare possem, quot, si pro merito lueres, profectò omnes puerorum ferulas in te frangi oporteret, nec tot aureos tibi dari, quot illi quondam pessimo poëtæ; colaphos longè plures. "Prodigium esse" aïs, "omnibus portenti sopinionum monstrosius, quòd fanatici personam regis à potestate ejus sejungant." Equidem dicta singulorum non præstitero: personam autem si pro homine vis dici, separari à potestate ejus nec absurdè posse Chrysostomus, haud fanaticus, docere te potuit; qui præceptum Apostoli de potestatibus ita explanat, ut potestatem ibi et rem, non hominem, intelligi asserat. Quidni dicam regem, qui contra leges quid facit, id agere ut privatum vel tyrannum, non ut regem legitima potestate præditum? Tu si uno in homine posse plures esse personas, easque ab ipso homine sensu et cogitatione separabiles, non intelligis, et sensûs communis et latinitatis planè expers es. Sed hoc eò dicis, ut reges peccato omni absolvas, utque erepto papæ primatu indutum te esse existimemus: "Rex," inquis, "non posse peccare intelligitur, quia peccatum ejus pœna non consequitur." Quisquis ergò non punitur, non peccat; non furtum, sed pœna, facit furem; Salmasius grammaticus non facit solœcismos, quia manum ferulæ subduxit: post eversum à te papam sint isti sanè pontificatûs tui canones, vel certè indulgentiæ tuæ, sive sanctæ tyrannidis, sive sanctæ servitutis, pontifex dici mavis. Congesta extremo capite maledicta tua in "Anglicanæ reipub. et ecclesiæ statum" prætereo: hoc enim habent tui similes, homo contemptissime; ut quidque plurima dignum est laude, id solent per calumniam maximè vituperare. Sed de jure regio apud nos, seu potiùs de jure populi in regem, ne quid temere affirmâsse videar, proferre ex ipsis monumentis non gravabor, quamvis pauca quidem de multis, ea tamen quibus liquidò satis constabit, Anglos ex lege et instituto, et more etiam majorum suorum, regem nuper judicavisse. Post Romanorum ex insula discessum, sui juris Britanni circiter annos 40, sine regibus fuere; quos primos creârunt, eorum nonnullos supplicio affecere. Britannos eo nomine Gildas, contrà quàm tu facis, reprehendit, non quòd reges necavere, sed quòd injudicatos, vel ut ejus verbis utar, "non pro veri examinatione." Vortigernus ob incestas cum filia nuptias, teste Nennio historicorum nostrorum post Gildam antiquissimo, damnatur "à beato Germano, et omni concilio Britonum," ejusque filio Guorthemiro regnum traditur. Haud multò hæc post Augustini obitum gesta sunt: unde vanitas tua facilè redarguitur, qui suprà asseruisti, primum omnium papam, et nominatim Zachariam, docuisse, judicari reges posse. Circa annum Christi 600, Morcantius, qui tunc temporis in Cambria regnabat, propter cædem patrui ab Oudoceo Landaviæ episcopo in exilium damnatur; quanquam is exilii sententiam, latifundiis quibusdam ecclesiæ donatis, redemit. Ad Saxones jam veniamus; quorum jura cum reperientur, facta prætermittam. Saxones Germanis oriundos memineris; qui nec infinitam aut liberam potestatem regibus dedere, et de rebus majoribus consultare omnes solebant; ex quibus intelligere est, parlamentum, si solum nomen excipias, etiam apud Saxonum majores summa authoritate viguisse. Et ab iis quidem concilium sapientum passim nominatur; ipsis Ethelberti temporibus, quem "decreta, judiciorum juxta exempla Romanorum, cum concilio sapientum constituisse" memorat Beda; sic Edwinus Northanymbrorum, Inas occidentalium Saxonum, rex, "habito cum sapientibus et senioribus concilio," novas leges promulgavit; alias Aluredus edidit "ex concilio" item "prudentissimorum; atque iis," inquit, "omnibus placuit edici earum observationes." His atque aliis multis hujusmodi locis luce clarius est, delectos etiam ex plebe conciliis maximis interfuisse; nisi siquis proceres solos sapientes esse arbitratur. Extat etiam apud nos perantiquus legum liber, cui titulus "Speculum Justiciariorum," in quo traditur primos Saxones, post Britanniam subactam, cùm reges crearent, ab iis jusjurandum exigere consuevisse, se, ut quemvis alium è populo, legibus ac judiciis subjectos fore, cap. 1. sect. 2. Ibidem ait jus esse et æquum ut rex suos in parlamento habeat pares, qui de injuriis, quas vel rex vel regina fecerit, cognoscerent; regnante Aluredo sancitum legibus fuisse, ut singulis annis parlamentum bis Londini, vel eo sæpiùs, si opus esset, haberetur. Quæ lex cùm pessimo juris neglectu in desuetudinem abiisset, duabus sub Edouardo 3[tio] sanctionibus renovata est. In alio etiam antiquo manuscripto, qui "Modus Parlamenti" inscribitur, hæc legimus; si rex parlamentum priùs dimiserit, quàm ea omnia transigantur quorum causâ concilium indictum erat, perjurii reus erit; et juramentum illud, quod regnum initurus dederat, violâsse censebitur. Quomodo enim, quod juratus est, justas leges concedit, quas populus elegerit, si earum eligendi facultatem petenti populo non dat, vel rariùs parlamentum convocando, vel citiùs dimittendo, quàm res populi ferunt? Jus autem illud jurandum, quo rex Angliæ se obligat, nostri jurisperiti pro sanctissima lege semper habuere. Quod autem maximis reipub. periculis remedium inveniri potest (qui solus convocandi parlamenti finis erat) si conventus ille magnus et augustissimus ad regis libitum stultissimi sæpè et pervicacissimi dissolvetur? Posse à parlamento abesse, proculdubiò minus est, quàm parlamentum dissolvere: at rex per leges nostras, illo Modorum libro traditas, abesse à parlamento, nisi planè ægrotaret, neque potuit, neque debuit: et ne tum quidem nisi inspecto ejus corpore à duodecim regni paribus, qui de adversa regis valetudine testimonium perhibere in senatu possent: solentne servi cum domino sic agere? Contrà verò plebeius ordo, sine quo parlamentum haberi non potest, etiam à rege convocatus potuit non adesse, et secessione facta, de repub. malè gesta cum rege expostulare: quod et prædictus liber testatur. Verùm, quod caput est, inter leges Edouardi regis vulgò Confessoris, una est eximia, quæ de regis officio tractat; cui rex officio si desit, "nomen regis in eo non constabit." Hoc quid esset, ne non satis intelligeretur, Chilperici Francorum regis exemplum subnectit, cui idcircò regnum à populo abrogatum erat. Puniri autem malum regem ex legis hujus sententia oportere, significabat ille S. Edouardi gladius, cui nomen Curtana erat, quem in regum creatione et pompa gestare comes palatii solebat; "in signum," inquit noster Matthæus Paris, "quòd et regem, si oberret, habeat de jure potestatem cohibendi:" gladio autem nemo ferè nisi capite punitur. Hanc legem, cum aliis boni illius Edouardi, Gulielmus ipse conquæstor, anno regni quarto, ratam habuit: et frequentissimo Anglorum concilio prope Verulamium religiosissimè juratus confirmavit: quo facto non solùm jus omne belli, si quod in nos habuit, ipse extinxit, sed etiam hujus legis judicio atque sententiæ se subjecit. Ejus etiam filius Henricus cum in omnes Edouardi leges, tùm in hanc quoque, juravit; atque iis duntaxat conditionibus, vivente adhuc fratre Roberto natu majore, in regem est electus. Jurârunt eadem omnes deinceps reges, antequam insignia regni acciperent. Hinc celebris ille et antiquus noster jurisconsultus Bractonus, l. 1. c. 8. "Non est rex, ubi dominatur voluntas, et non lex." Et l. 3. c. 9. "rex est dum benè regit; tyrannus, dum populum sibi creditum violenta opprimit dominatione." Et ibidem, "exercere debet potestatem juris, ut vicarius et minister Dei: potestas autem injuriæ diaboli est, non Dei: cum declinat ad injuriam rex, diaboli minister est." Eadem ferme habet vetustus alter jurisconsultus, libri illius author qui Fleta inscribitur, memor nempe uterque et legis illius Edvardinæ, verè quidem regiæ, et regulæ illius in jure nostro primariæ, à me suprà dictæ, qua nihil Dei legibus et rationi contrarium haberi pro lege potest; uti nec tyrannus pro rege, nec minister diaboli pro ministro Dei. Cum itaque lex maximè ratio recta sit, siquidem regi, siquidem Dei ministro, obediendum est; eadem prorsùs et ratione et lege, tyranno et diaboli ministro erit resistendum. Et quoniam de nomine sæpius quàm de re ambigitur, tradunt iidem, regem Angliæ, etiamsi nomen regis nondum perdiderit, judicari tamen, ut quilibet è vulgo, et posse et debere. Bracton. l. 1. c. 8. Fleta, l. 1. c. 17. "non debet esse rege major quisquam in exhibitione juris; minimus autem esse debet in judicio suscipiendo, si peccat," alii legunt, "si petat." Judicari igitur cùm debeat rex noster, sive tyranni sub nomine, sive regis, quos habeat item judices legitimos dictu difficile non debet esse. Eosdem consulere authores haud pejus erit. Bracton. l. 2. c. 16. Fleta. l. 1. c. 17. "In populo regendo rex habet superiores, legem, per quam factus est rex, et curiam suam, videlicet comites et barones: comites dicuntur quasi socii regis, et qui habet socium, habet magistrum; et ideo si rex fuerit sine fræno, id est sine lege, debent ei frænum ponere." Baronum autem nomine plebeium ordinem comprehendi suprà ostendimus; quin et pares etiam parlamenti eosdem fuisse dictos, libri legum nostrarum antiqui passim tradunt: et imprimis liber ille, cui titulus Parlamenti Modus; "Eligentur" inquit "de omnibus regni paribus 25," quorum erunt "quinque milites, quinque cives," id est urbium delegati, "quinque municipes: et duo milites pro comitatu majorem vocem habent in concedendo et contradicendo quàm major comes Angliæ;" et meritò quidem; illi enim pro tota aliqua provincia aut municipio suffragia ferunt, isti pro se quisque duntaxat. Comites autem illos "codicillares," quos vocas, et "rescriptitios," cum feudales jam nulli sint, ad judicandum regem a quo creabantur minimè omnium idoneos esse, quis non videt? Cùm itaque jus nostrum sit, ut est in illo speculo antiquo, regem habere pares, qui in parlamento cognoscant et judicent, "si quid rex in aliquem populi sui peccaverit," si notissimum sit licere apud nos cuivis e populo in minoribus quibusque curiis injuriarum actionem regi intendere; quantò justius est, quantoque magis necessarium, si rex in universos peccaverit, ut habeat qui eum non refrænare solum et coërcere, sed judicare et punire, possint. Pessimè enim et ridiculè institutam esse eam necesse est rempub. in qua de minimis regum injuriis etiam privato cuivis cautum sit, de maximis nihil in commune provisum, nihil de salute omnium, quo minùs liceat ei universos sine lege perdere, qui ne unum quidem lædere per legem poterat. Comites autem esse regis judices, cum ostensum sit neque decere neque expedire, sequitur judicium illud totum ad plebeium ordinem, qui et pares regni, et barones, et populi totius potestate sibi delegata præditi sunt, jure optimo pertinere. Cùm enim, (ut in nostro jure scriptum est, quod suprà attuli,) plebs sola cum rege sine comitibus aut episcopis parlamentum constituat, quia rex cum sola plebe, etiam ante comites aut episcopos natos, parlamenta peragere solebat, eadem prorsus ratione plebs sola supremam et sine rege, et regem ipsum judicandi, potestatem habebit, quòd etiam ante ullum regem creatum, ipsa universi populi nomine concilia et parlamenta peragere, judicare, ferre leges, ipsa reges creare, solita erat; non ut populo dominarentur, sed ut rem populi administrarent. Quem si rex contra injuriis afficere, et servitute opprimere, conatus fuerit, ex ipsa legis nostræ sententia nomen regis in eo non constat, rex non est; quòd si rex non sit, quid est quod ei pares ampliùs quæramus? Tyrannum enim jam re ipsa ab omnibus bonis judicatum nulli non satis pares atque idonei sunt, qui supplicio mactandum esse pro tribunali judicent. Hæc cum ita sint, tot testimoniis, tot legibus prolatis, abundè hoc demùm, quod erat propositum, evicisse arbitror, cum judicare regem penès plebem jure optimo sit, cumque plebs regem de repub. deque ecclesia, sine spe ulla sanitatis, pessimè meritum supplicio ultimo affecerit, rectè atque ordine, exque repub. suaque fide, dignitate, legibus denique patriis, fecisse. Neque possum hìc non gratulari mihi de majoribus nostris, qui non minore prudentia ac libertate, quàm Romani olim, aut Græcorum præstantissimi, hanc rempub. instituerunt; neque poterunt illi, siquid nostrarum rerum sentiunt, non sibi etiam gratulari de posteris suis; qui tam sapientèr institutam, tanta libertate fundatam, ab impotenti regis dominatione, cùm redacti penè in servitutem essent, tam fortiter, tamque prudenter, vindicàrunt.

CAPUT IX.

Satis jam arbitror palàm esse, regem Angliæ etiam Anglorum legibus judicari posse; suos habere judices legitimos; quod erat probandum. Quid tu porrò? (nam quæ tu repetis, ad ea non repetam mea:) "ex rebus nunc ipsis propter quas comitia indici solent, proclive," inquis, "est ostendere regem esse supra parlamentum." Sit sanè proclive quantum voles, in quo præcipitem te dari jam statim senties. "Parlamentum," inquis, "congregari solet ad majoris momenti negotia, in quibus regni salus et populi versatur." Si rex parlamentum convocat ad procurandas res populi, non suas, neque id nisi assensu eorum atque arbitrio quos convocat, quid aliud est, obsecro, nisi minister populi et procurator? cùm, sine suffragiis eorum quos populus mittit, ne tantillum quidem, neque de aliis, neque de seipso, decernere possit. Quod etiam argumento est, officium esse regis, toties parlamentum convocare, quoties populus id petit: quandoquidem et res populi, non regis, iis comitiis tractantur, idque populi arbitrio. Quamvis enim regis quoque assensus honoris causà peti soleret, quem in rebus minoris momenti ad privatorum duntaxat commoda spectantibus poterat non præbere, poterat pro illa formula dicere, "rex deliberabit," de iis tamen, quæ ad salutem omnium communem et libertatem pertinebant, prorsus abnuere nullo modo poterat; cum id et contra juramentum regium esset, quo veluti lege firmissima tenebatur, et contra præcipuum Magnæ Chartæ articulum, c. 29. "Non negabimus, non differemus, cuiquam jus aut justitiam." Non negabit rex justitiam, negabit ergò justas leges? non cuiquam, an ergò omnibus? ne in curia quidem ulla minori, an ergo in senatu supremo? an verò rex ullus tantum sibi arrogabit, ut quid justum sit, quid utile, se unum universo populo scire melius existimet? Cùm "ad hoc creatus et electus sit, ut justitiam faciat universis," Bracton. l. 3. c. 9. per eas nimirum leges "quas vulgus" elegerit. Unde illud in archivis nostris 7. H. 4. Rot. Parl. num. 59. "non est ulla regis prærogativa, quæ ex justitia et æquitate quicquam derogat." Et reges olim acta parlamenti confirmare recusantes, Char-tam videlicet Magnam et hujusmodi alia, majores nostri sæpenumerò armis coëgere; neque propterea minùs valere illas leges, aut minùs legitimas esse, jurisperiti nostri statuunt: quandoquidem assensum rex iis decretis coactus præbuit, quibus jure atque sponte assentiri debebat. Tu dum contendis aliarum etiam gentium reges in potestate vel synedrii vel senatûs, vel concilii sui æquè fuisse, non nos in servitutem asseris, sed eas in libertatem: in quo idem facere pergis, quod ab initio fecisti, quodque faciunt pragmaticorum stultissimi, ut incauti seipsos in lite sæpius contra veniant. At nos scilicet fatemur "regem, ubicunque absit, in parlamento tamen censeri præsentem vi potestatis: ergò quodcunque illic agitur à rege ipso actum intelligi." Tum quasi bolum aliquem nactus esses aut mercedulam, illorum recordatione Caroleorum delinitus, "accipimus," inquis, "quod dant:" accipe igitur, quo dignus es, magnum malum; non enim damus, quod sperabas, inde sequi "curiam illam non alia potiri potestate quàm à rege delegata." Si enim dicitur, potestas regis, quæcunque ea sit, à parlamento abesse non potest, an suprema continuò dicitur? annon potiùs transferri in parlamentum potestas regia videtur, utque minor majore contineri? sanè si parlamentum potest, nolente et invito rege, acta ejus et privilegia quibusvis data revocare atque rescindere, si ipsius regis prærogativas, prout videtur, circumscribere, si proventus ejus annuos et impensas aulæ, si famulitium ipsum, si totam denique rem domesticam regis moderari, si vel intimos ejus consiliarios atque amicos amovere, vel etiam è sinu abripere ad supplicium, potest, si cuivis denique de plebe à rege ad parlamentum quacunque de re provocatio est lege data, non itidem a parlamento ad regem, quæ omnia et posse fieri, et fuisse sæpiùs facta, cùm monumenta publica, tum legum nostrarum consultissimi testantur, neminem esse arbitror, modò mens ei sana sit, qui parlamentum supra regem esse non fateatur. Nam in interregno etiam parlamentum viget; et quod historiis nostris testatissimum est, nulla hæreditatis ratione habita, sæpe, quem sibi visum est, suffragiis liberrimis regem creavit. Ut summatim dicam quod res est, parlamentum est supremum gentis concilium, ad hoc ipsum à populo planè libero constitutum, et potestate plena instructum, ut de summis rebus in commune consulat; rex ideo erat creatus, ut de consilio et sententia illorum ordinum consulta omnia exequenda curaret. Quod cum parlamentum ipsum edicto nuper suo publicè declararet, neque enim pro æquitate sua recusabat vel externis gentibus actionum suarum rationem ultrò ac sponte reddere, ecce tibi, è gurgustio nullius homo authoritatis, aut fidei, aut rei, Burgundus iste Verna, qui summum Angliæ senatum, jus patrium atque suum scripto asserentem, "detestandæ et horribilis imposturæ" insimulat. Patriam mehercule tuam pudebit, verbero, se tantæ impudentiæ homuncionem genuisse. Sed habes fortasse quæ salutariter monitos nos velis; agedum, auscultamus. "Quas," inquis, "leges sancire potest parlamentum, in quo nec præsulum ordo comparet?" Tunc ergo, furiose, præsules ex ecclesia extirpatum ibas, ut in parlamenta induceres? O hominem impium, et Satanæ tradendum, quem neque ecclesia non ejicere hypocritam et atheum, neque ulla respub. recipere communem libertatis pestem atque labem, deberet; qui etiam, quod nequit ex Evangelio, id ex Aristotele et Halicarnassæo, deinde ex statutis papisticis pravissimorum temporum, probare adnititur, regem Angliæ caput esse Anglicanæ ecclesiæ, ut episcopos, compransores suos et necessarios nuper factos, quos ipse Deus exturbavit, novos iterum prædones et tyrannos, pro virili sua parte, sanctæ Dei ecclesiæ imponat; quorum universum ordinem, tanquam religioni Christianæ perniciosissimum, eradicandum esse stirpitùs, editis antea libris clamosè contenderat. Quis unquam apostata, non dico à sua, quæ nulla certa est, sed à Christiana doctrina, quam ipse asseruerat, defectione tam fœda atque nefaria descivit? "Episcopis de medio sublatis, qui sub rege, et ex ejus arbitrio de causis ecclesiæ cognoscebant," quæris "ad quos redibit ea cognitio." O perditissime, verere tandem vel conscientiam tuam; memineris dum licet; nisi si hoc serò nimis te moneo, memineris quàm non impunè tibi erit, quàm inexpiabile demùm sit, sanctum Dei spiritum sic illudere. Subsiste aliquando, et pone aliquem furori modum, ne te accensa ira numinis repentè corripiat; qui Christi gregem, unctosque Dei minimè tangendos, iis hostibus et sævissimis tyrannis obterendos iterum et persultandos tradere cupis, à quibus elata modò et mirifica Dei manus eos liberavit: tuque ipse, nescio eorumne ad fructum ullum, an ad perniciem et obdurationem tuam, liberandos esse docuisti. Quòd si jus nullum dominandi in ecclesiam est episcopis, certè multo minùs est regibus; quicquid hominum statuta edicunt. Sciunt enim, qui labris aliquanto plusquam primoribus evangelium gustârunt, ecclesiæ gubernationem divinam esse totam ac spiritualem, non civilem. "In secularibus" autem, quòd aïs "supremam jurisdictionem habuisse regem Angliæ," id falsum esse jura nostra ubertim declarant. Curias omnes ubi judicia exercentur, non rex, sed parlamenti authoritas, vel constituit, vel tollit; in quibus tamen minimo cuivis è plebe licebat regem in jus vocare; neque raró judices contra regem pronuntiare solebant; id si rex vel interdicto, vel mandato, vel scriptis literis, impedire conaretur, ex juramento et lege non parebant judices, sed ejusmodi mandata rejiciebant, et pro nihilo habebant: non poterat rex quenquam in vincula conjicere, aut ullius bona in publicum addicere; poterat neminem supplicio punire, nisi in aliquam curiam priùs citatum, ubi non rex sed consueti judices sententias tulere; idque sæpe, ut suprà dixi, contra regem. Hinc noster Bractonus, l. 3. c. 9. "regia potestas juris est, non injuriæ; et nihil aliud potest rex, nisi id solùm quod de jure potest." Aliud tibi suggerunt causidici tui, qui nuper solum verterunt; ex statutis nempe quibusdam haud antiquis sub Edvardo 4to, Henrico 7timo, Edvardo 6to, promulgatis: neque viderunt, quamcunque regi potestatem statuta illa concedunt, eam à parlamento concessam esse omnem et quasi precariam; quam et eadem authoritas poterat revocare. Cur sic passus es nasuto tibi imponi, ut quo maximè argumento regis potestatem ex decretis parlamenti pendere demonstratur, eo absolutam esse et supremam probare te crederes? Nam et monumenta nostra sanctiora testantur, reges nostros non hæreditati, non armis, non successioni, sed populo, suam omnem potestatem debere. Talis potestas regia Henrico quarto, talis ante eum Richardo secundo, à plebeio ordine concessa legitur; Rot. Parlament. 1 Hen. 4. num, 108. haud secùs atque rex aliquis præsidibus suis præfecturas et provincias edicto et diplomate solet concedere. Id nempe literis publicis consignari disertè jussit communium domus, "concessisse se regi Richardo, ut tali bonâ libertate" frueretur, "qualem ante eum reges Angliæ habuere;" qua cum rex ille "contra fidem sacramenti sui" ad eversionem legum abuteretur, ab iisdem orbatus regno est. Iidem etiam, quod et eadem rotula testatur, in parlamento edicunt, se, prudentia et moderatione Henrici 4ti confisos, "velle ac jubere ut in eadem magna libertate regia sit, quam ejus progenitores obtinuere." Illa autem nisi fiduciaria planè fuisset, quemadmodum hæc fuit, necesse est profectò et parlamenti illius ordines, qui concederent quod suum non erat, ineptos ac vanos, et reges illos qui, quod suum jam erat, concessum ab aliis vellent accipere, et sibi et posteris injurios nimis fuisse: quorum utrumvis credibile non est. "Tertia pars," inquis, "regiæ potestatis versatur circa militiam; hanc partem reges Angliæ sine pari et æmulo tractârunt." Neque hoc verius quàm cætera quæ perfugarum fide scripsisti. Primum enim pacis et belli arbitrium penès magnum regni senatum semper fuisse, et historiæ passim nostræ, et exterorum, quotquot res nostras paulò accuratiùs attigere, testantur. Sancti etiam Edvardi leges, in quas jurare nostri reges tenebantur, certissimam fidem faciunt, capite de heretochiis, "fuisse quasdam potestates per provincias et singulos comitatus regni constitutas, qui heretoches vocabantur, latinè ductores exercitûs," qui provincialibus copiis præerant, non "ad honorem coronæ" solùm, sed "ad utilitatem regni." Isti vero eligebantur "per commune concilium, et per singulos comitatus in pleno conventu populari, sicut et vicecomites eligi debent." Ex quo facilè perspicitur, et copias regni et copiarum ductores in potestate populi, non regis, et antiquitus fuisse, et esse oportere: illamque legem æquissimam nostro in regno haud minus valuisse, quàm olim in populari Romanorum statu valebat. De qua et M. Tullium audire non abs re fuerit. Philipp. 10. "Omnes legiones, omnes copiæ quæ ubique sunt, Populi R. sunt. Neque enim legiones, quæ Antonium consulem reliquerunt, Antonii potiùs quàm reipub. fuisse dicuntur." Sancti autem Edouardi legem illam, cum aliis illius legibus Gulielmus ille conquæstor dictus, populo sic volente ac jubente, juratus confirmavit; sed et hanc insuper adjecit, c. 56. "Omnes civitates, burgos, castella, singulis noctibus ita custodiri, prout vicecomes, et aldermanni, cæterique præpositi per commune concilium ad utilitatem regni, meliùs providebunt;" et lege 62, "ideo castella, burgi, civitates ædificatæ sunt ad tutionem gentium et populorum regni, idcirco et observari debent cum omni libertate, integritate, et ratione." Quid ergo? custodientur arces et oppida in pace contra fures et maleficos non nisi per commune concilium ejusdem loci, non custodientur in maximo belli metu contra hostes sive externos sive intestinos, per commune concilium totius gentis? sanè illud nisi concedatur, neque "libertas," neque "integritas," nec "ratio" denique, in iis custodiendis ulla esse poterit; neque earum rerum quicquam assequemur, quarum causâ fundari primùm urbes et arces lex ipsa dicit. Majores certè nostri quidvis potiùs regi quàm sua arma et oppidorum præsidia tradere solebant; idem esse rati ac si libertatem ipsi suam ferocitati regum et impotentiæ proditum irent. Cujus rei exempla in historiis nostris uberrima cum sint, et jam notissima, inserere huic loco supervacaneum esset. At "protectionem rex debet subditis; quomodo eos protegere poterit, nisi arma virosque habeat in sua potestate?" At, inquam, habebat hæc omnia ad utilitatem regni, ut dictum est, non ad civium interitum et regni disperditionem: quod, et Henrici 3tii temporibus, prudenter Leonardus quidam vir doctus, in episcoporum conventu, respondit Rustando papæ nuntio et regis procuratori: "omnes ecclesiæ sunt domini papæ, ut omnia principis esse dicimus, ad tuitionem, non ad fruitionem vel proprietatem," quod aïunt; ad defensionem, "non ad dispersionem:" eadem et prædictæ legis Edouardi sententia erat; quid est hoc aliud nisi potestate fiduciaria; non absoluta? qualem cum imperator bellicus ferè habeat, id est delegatam, non planè propriam, non eò segniùs populum, à quo eligitur, sive domi sive militiæ defendere solet. Frustra autem parlamenta, et impari sane congressu de legibus sancti Edouardi et libertate olim cum regibus contendissent, si penès regem solum arma esse oportere existimâssent; nam et leges quamlibet iniquas ipse dare si voluisset, frustra se "chartâ" quantumvis "magnâ" contra ferrum defendissent. "At quid proderit," inquis, "parlamento militiæ magisterium habere, cùm ne teruncium quidem ad eam sustinendam queat, nolente rege, de populo cogere." Ne sit ea tibi cura: primùm enim hoc falsò ponis, parlamenti ordines "non posse sine rege tributa populo imponere," à quo et ipsi missi sunt, et cujus causam suscipiunt. Deinde non potest te fugere, tam sedulum de alienis rebus percontatorem, sua sponte populum, vasis aureis atque argenteis conflatis, magnam vim pecuniæ in hoc bellum contra regem impendisse. Amplissimos exinde regum nostrorum annuos reditus recenses: nîl nisi "millies quingenties quadragies" crepas; "ex patrimonio regis maximas largitiones" fieri solitas ab iis "regibus, qui liberalitatis laudibus emicuerunt," avidus audieras: hac te illecebra, veluti Balaamum illum infamem, proditores patriæ ad suam causam perduxere; ut Dei populo maledicere, et divinis judiciis obstrepere, auderes. Stulte; quid tandem regi injusto ac violento tam immensæ opes profuere? Quid etiam tibi? ad quem nihil prorsus eorum, quæ spe ingenti devoraveras, pervenisse audio, præter unam illam crumenulam, vitreis globulis vermiculatam, et centenis aureolis confertam. Cape istam, Balaame, quam adamâsti, iniquitatis mercedem, ac fruere. Pergis enim desipere; "Erectio standardi," id est "vexilli, ad regem solum pertinet." Quapropter? quia Tune verò nescis, grammatice, hoc idem cujusvis imperatoris bellici munus esse? At "aït Aristoteles, necesse est regi præsidium adsistere, quo leges tueri possit; ergò oportet regem plus armis posse quàm populum universum." Tales hic homo consequentias torquere solet, quales Ocnus funes apud inferos; quæ nulli sunt usui, nisi ut comedantur ab asinis: aliud enim est præsidium à populo datum, aliud armorum omnium potestas, quam Aristoteles hoc ipso, quem protulisti, loco à regibus abjudicat. Oportet, inquit, habeat rex tantum circa se manum armatorum, "quanta singulis vel compluribus fortior sit, populo verò minor; εἶναι δὲ τοσαύτην ἰσχὺν ὥστε ἑκάστου μὲν καὶ ἑνὸς καὶ συμπλειόνων κρείττω, τοῦ δὲ πλήθους ἥττω. Polit. l. 3. c. 11. Alioqui sanè, sub specie tuendi, possit statim et populum et leges sibi subjicere. Hoc autem rex et tyrannus interest; rex à senatu, et populo volente ac libente, quid satis est præsidii circa se habet contra hostes et seditiosos: tyrannus, invito senatu ac populo, vel hostium, vel perditorum civium, præsidium sibi quàm maximum comparare studet, contra senatum ipsum et populum. Concessit itaque parlamentum regi, ut alia omnia, sic standardi erectionem;" non ut infesta patriæ signa inferret, sed ut populum contra eos defenderet, quos parlamentum hostes judicat; si secus fuisset, ipse hostis judicandus erat; cum juxta ipsam sancti Edouardi, vel, quod sanctius est, ipsam naturæ legem, nomen regis perdiderit. Unde in prædicta Philippica, "amittit is omne exercitûs et imperii jus, qui eo imperio et exercitu rempub. oppugnat." Neque licebat regi "feudales" illos "equites" ad "bellum" evocare, quod parlamenti authoritas non decrevisset; id quod ex statutis pluribus manifestum est. Idem de vectigalibus et censu navali censendum; quem imperare civibus sine senatusconsulto rex non potuit: atque ita gravissimi legum nostrarum interpretes, annis abhinc plus minus duodecim, tum cùm adhuc firmissimum erat regium imperium, publicè statuerunt. Sic diu ante eos Fortescutius, Henrici 6ti cancellarius, juris nostri consultissimus; rex Angliæ, inquit, neque leges mutare potest, neque tributa, nolente populo, imponere. Sed nec probaverit quisquam ullis testimoniis antiquorum "regni Angliæ statum merè" esse "regalem. Habet rex," inquit Bractonus, "jurisdictionem super omnes." Id est in curia; ubi regis quidem nomine, nostris autem legibus, jus redditur. "Omnis sub rege est;" id est singuli: atque ita se explicat ipse Bractonus locis à me suprà citatis. Ad ea quæ restant, ubi eundem volvis lapidem, in quo vales ipsum, credo, Sisyphum delassare, ex suprà dictis abunde respondetur. De cætero, si quando parlamenta suum regibus bonis obsequium amplissimis verbis citra assentationem et servitutem detulere, id, quasi eodem modo tyrannis delatum esset, intelligi, aut populo fraudi esse, non debet; neque enim justo obsequio libertas imminuitur. Quod autem ex Edvardo Coco et aliis citas, "Angliæ regnum absolutum est imperium," id est si ad ullum regem externum, aut Cæsarem, respicias; vel, ut Cambdenus aït, "quia in imperii clientela non est:" alioqui adjicit uterque imperium hoc consistere non "ex rege" solo, sed "ex corpore politico." Unde Fortescutius, de laud. legum Angl. c. 9. "rex," inquit, "Angliæ" populum gubernat "non mera potestate regia, sed politica: populus enim iis legibus gubernatur, quas" ipse fert. Externos hoc etiam scriptores non latebat. Hinc Philippus Cominæus, author gravissimus, commentariorum quinto; "inter omnia orbis terræ regna, quorum ego notitiam habeo, non est, meâ quidem sententiâ, ubi publicum moderatiùs tractetur, neque ubi regi minus liceat in populum, quàm in Anglia." Postremò "ridiculum est," inquis, "argumentum, quod afferunt, regna ante reges fuisse, quasi dicas lucem ante solem extitisse." At nos, ô bone vir, non regna, sed populum, ante reges fuisse dicimus. Quem interim te magis ridiculum dicam, qui lucem ante solem extitisse, quasi ridiculum, negas. Ita dum in alienis curiosus esse vis, elementa dedidicisti. Miraris denique, "eos qui regem in comitiis regni viderunt solio sedentem, sub aureo et serico cœlo, potuisse in dubium vocare, utrùm penès regem an penès parlamentum majestas sit." Incredulos profectò homines narras, quos tam lucidum argumentum, è cœlo ipso petitum, nihil movit. Quod tu cœlum aureum homo stoïcus adeò es religiosè et unicè contemplatus, ut et cœli Mosaïci et Aristotelici oblitus esse penitus videare: cum in illo "lucem ante solem exstitisse" negaveris, in hoc tres zonas temperatas esse suprà docueris. Quot zonas in illo regis aureo et serico cœlo observaveris, nescio: hoc scio, te zonam unam, centum stellis aureis bene temperatam, ex illa tua cœlesti contemplatione abstulisse.

CAPUT X.

Cum hæc omnis controversia de jure, sive generatim regio, sive separatim regis Angliæ, obstinatis partium contentionibus, quàm ipsâ rei naturâ difficilior facta sit, spero, qui studium veritatis factionibus anteponunt, iis ea me ex lege Dei, jureque gentium, ex institutis denique patriis, copiosè attulisse, quæ regem Angliæ judicari posse, atque etiam capite puniri, indubitatum reliquerint. Cùm cæteris, quorum animos aut superstitio occupavit, aut mentis aciem anticipata regii splendoris admiratio ità perstrinxit, ut nihil in virtute ac libertate vera illustre ac splendidum videre possint, sive ratione et argumentis agamus, sive exemplis, frustra contendimus. Tu verò, Salmasi, ut reliqua omnia, ita hoc etiam absurdè admodum facere videris, qui cùm omnes independentes omnibus probris onerare non desinas, regem ipsum quem defendis, maximè omnium independentem fuisse statuis: neque "regnum populo, sed generi, debuisse: deinde quem "capitis causam dicere coactum" initio graviter dolebas, eum nunc "inauditum periisse" quereris. At verò totam causæ dictionem ejus, fide summa Gallicè editam, inspicere si libet, persuasum tibi aliud fortasse erit. Carolo certè cùm per aliquot dies continuos amplissima loquendi facta copia esset, non ille quidem est eâ usus ad objecta sibi crimina diluendum, sed ad judicium illud, ac ju-dices, omninò rejiciendum. Qui autem reus aut tacet, aut aliena semper respondet, eum non est injuria, si manifestus criminum sit, vel inauditum condemnari. Carolum si "mortem" aïs "planè egisse vitæ respondentem," assentior: si dicis piè et sanctè et "securè" vitam finiisse, scito aviam ejus Mariam, infamem fœminam, pari in speciem pietate, sanctitate, constantia, in pegmate occubuisse: ne animi præsentiæ, quæ in morte quibusvis è vulgo maleficis permagna sæpè est, nimium tribuas: sæpè desperatio aut obfirmatus animus fortitudinis quandam speciem et quasi personam induit; sæpè stupor tranquillitatis: videri se bonos, intrepidos, innocentes, interdum et sanctos, pessimi quique non minùs in morte quàm in vita cupiunt; inque ipsa scelerum suorum capitali pœna solent ultimam simulationis suæ et fraudum, quàm possunt speciocissimè, pompam ducere; et, veluti poëtæ aut histriones deterrimi, plausum in ipso exitu ambitiosissimè captare. Nunc "ad istam quæstionem pervenisse te" aïs, "quâ tractandum est, quinam fuerint illius regiæ condemnationis præcipui authores." Cùm de te potiùs inquirendum sit, quomodo tu, homo exterus, et Gallicanus erro, ad quæstionem de rebus nostris, tibi jam alienis, habendam perveneris? quo pretio emptus? verum de eo satis constat. Te verò percontantem de rebus nostris quis demùm docuit? ipsi nimirum perfugæ, & perduelles patriæ, qui te hominem vanissimum nacti, mercede ad maledicendum facilè adduxerunt. Data deinde tibi est aliqua aut furibundi cujuspiam sacellani semipapistæ, aut servientis aulici, de statu rerum scriptiuncula; eam ut latinè verteres negotium tibi dabatur: hinc istæ narrationes confectæ, quas, si videtur, paulum excutiamus. "In hanc condemnationem non centena-millesima pars populi consensit." Quid ergò cæteri, qui sese nolentibus tantum facinus fieri sunt passi? an stipites, an trunci hominum, an fortè quales illi in scena Virgiliana,

Non enim veros tu quidem Britannos, sed pictos nescio quos, vel etiam acupictos, videris mihi velle dicere. Cùm itaque incredibile sit gentem bellicosam à tam paucis, iisque infimis de plebe sua, sub jugum mitti, quod in narratione tua primum occurrit, id esse falsissimum apparet. "Ordo ecclesiasticus erat ab ipso senatu ejectus." Eò miserior itaque tua est insania, necdum enim te sentis insanire, qui eos è parlamento quereris ejectos, quos tute ex ecclesia ejiciendos esse, libro longissimo scribis? "Senatûs alter ordo qui in proceribus consistebat, ducibus, comitibus, vicecomitibus, statione sua dejectus est." Et meritò, à nullo enim municipio missi pro se tantùm sedebant, nihil juris in populum habebant, juri tamen ejus et libertati, suo quodam instituto, refragari in plerisque consueverant; erant à rege constituti, ejus comites, et famuli, et quasi umbræ, quo amoto, ipsi necesse est ad plebem, unde orti sunt, redigerentur. "Una et deterrima portio parlamenti potestatem sibi vindicare non debuit reges judicandi." At plebeius ordo, quod te suprà docui, non solùm parlamenti pars erat potissima, etiam sub regibus, sed per se ipse parlamentum omnibus numeris absolutum et legitimum, etiam sine comitibus, nedum ecclesiasticis, constituebat. Atqui "ne tota quidem hæc ipsa pars ad sententiam de regis capite ferendam admissa est." Pars illa nempe non admissa, quem verbo regem, re hostem toties judicaverat, ad eum animis atque consiliis palàm defecerat. Parlamenti ordines Anglicani cum iis qui à Scotiæ itidem parlamento missi erant legati, idibus Januarii 1645, rescripserant regi, dolosas inducias et habenda secum Londini colloquia petenti, non posse se eum in urbem admittere, donec is de bello civili tribus jam regnis ejus opera excitato, de cædibus tot civium ejus jussu factis reipub. satisfecisset; deque pace firma atque sincera iis conditionibus cavisset, quas ei utriusque regni parlamenta et tulerant sæpiùs, et latura essent: ipse è contrario postulata eorum æquissima jam septies humillimè oblata, responsionibus aut surdis repudiaverat, aut ambiguis eluserat. Ordines tandem post tot annorum patientiam ut ne fraudulentus rex, quam debellare rempub. in acie non valebat, eam in vinculis per dilationes everteret, et jucundissimum ex nostris dissidiis fructum capiens, de victoribus etiam suis restituris hostis insperatum sibi triumphum ageret, decernunt, se regis deinceps rationem non habituros, nullas se ei postulationes ampliùs esse missuros, aut ab eo accepturos: post hæc tamen decreta reperti sunt ex ipso ordinum numero, qui invectissimi exercitûs odio, cujus maximis rebus gestis invidebant, quemque, post ingentia merita, dimittere cum ignominia cupiebant, et ministris aliquot seditiosis, quibus miserè serviebant, morem gerentes, opportunum sibi tempus nacti, cum eorum multi, quos à se longè dissentire sciebant, ad sedandos presbyterianorum gliscentes jam tumultus, missi ab ipso ordine, in provinciis abessent, mira levitate, ne dicam perfidia, decernunt, inveteratum hostem, verbotenùs duntaxat regem, nulla penè ab eo satisfactione priùs accepta, aut cautione facta, ad urbem esse reducendum; in summam dignitatem atque imperium æquè esse restituendum, ac si de repub. præclarè meritus esset. Ita religioni, libertati, fœderi denique illi à se toties jactato regem præponebant. Quid illi interea qui integri tam pestifera agitari consilia videbant? An ideo deesse patriæ, saluti suorum non prospicere debuerant, eo quod istius mali contagio in ipsorum ordinem penetraverat? At quis istos exclusit malè sanos? "Exercitus," inquis, "Anglicanos," id est, non externorum, sed fortissimorum et fidissimorum civium; quorum tribuni plerique senatores ipsi erant, quos illi boni exclusi patria ipsa excludendos, et in Hiberniam procul ablegandos esse censuerant; dum Scotia interim dubia jam fide quatuor Angliæ provincias suis finibus proximas magnis copiis insidebant, firmissima earum regionum oppida præsidiis tenebant, regem ipsum in custodia habebant: dum ipsi etiam factiones suorum atque tumultus, parlamento plusquam minaces, et in urbe et in agris passim fovebant, qui tumultus paulò pòst in bellum non civile solùm, sed et Scoticum illud erupere. Quòd si privatis etiam consiliis aut armis subvenire reipublicæ laudatissimum semper fuit, non est certè cur exercitus reprehendi possit, qui parlamenti authoritate ad urbem accersitus imperata fecit; et regiorum factionem atque tumultum ipsi curiæ sæpiùs minitantem facilè compescuit. In id autem discrimen adducta res erat, ut aut nos ab illis, aut illos à nobis opprimi necesse esset. Stabant ab illis Londinensium plerique institores atque opifices, et ministrorum factiosissimi quique; à nobis exercitus magna fide, modestia, virtute cognitus. Per hos cum retinere libertatem, rempub., salutem liceret, an hæc omnia per ignaviam et stultitiam prodenda fuisse censes? Debellati regiarum partium duces arma quidem inviti, animum hostilem non deposuerant: omnibus belli renovandi occasionibus intenti ad urbem se receperant. Cum his, quamvis inimicissimis, quamvis sanguinem eorum avidè sitientibus, presbyteriani, postquam non permitti sibi in omnes tam civilem quàm ecclesiasticam dominationem viderunt, clandestina consilia, et prioribus tum dictis tum factis indignissima consociare cœperant: eoque acerbitatis processere, ut mallent se regi denuò mancipare, quàm fratres suos in partem illam libertatis, quam et ipsi suo sub sanguine acquisiverant, admittere; mallent tyrannum tot civium cruore perfusum, ira in superstites, et concepta jam ultione ardentem rursus experiri dominum, quàm fratres, et amicissimos æquo jure ferre sibi pares. Soli independentes qui vocantur, et ad ultimum sibi constare, et sua uti victoria sciebant: qui ex rege hostem se fecerat, eum ex hoste regem esse amplius, sapienter, meo quidem judicio, nolebant: neque pacem idcircò non volebant, sed involutum pacis nomine aut bellum novum, aut æternam servitutem prudentes metuebant. Exercitum autem nostrum quo fusiùs infamare possis, narrationem quandam rerum nostrarum inconditam et strigosam exordiris: in qua tametsi multa falsa, multa frivola reperio, multa abs te vitio data, quæ laudi ducenda essent, huic tamen alteram ex adverso narrationem opponere nihil arbitror attinere. Rationibus enim hìc non narrationibus certatur; atque illis utrobique, non his fides habebitur. Et sanè sunt ejusmodi res istæ, ut nisi justa historia dici pro dignitate nequeant. Melius itaque puto, quod de Carthagine Sallustius, silere tantis de rebus, quàm parùm dicere. Neque committam ut non solùm virorum illustrium, sed Dei præcipuè maximi laudes, in hac rerum seri mirabili sæpissimè iterandas, tuis hoc libro intexam opprobriis. Ea igitur duntaxat, quæ argumenti habere speciem videntur, pro more decerpam. "Anglos et Scotos" quòd aïs "solenni conventione promisisse, se regis majestatem conservaturos," omittis quibus id conditionibus promisere; si salva nimirum religione et libertate id fieri posset: quibus utrisque ad extremum usque spiritum iniquus adeò et insidiosus rex iste erat, ut, vivente illo, et religionem periclitaturam, et libertatem interituram esse, facilè appareret. Sed redis jam ad illos regii supplicii authores. "Si res ipsa ponderibus suis et momentis rectè æstimetur, exitus facti nefandi ita independentibus imputari debet, ut principii et progressûs gloriam presbyteriani sibi possent vindicare." Audite, presbyteriani, ecquid nunc juvat, ecquid confert ad innocentiæ et fidelitatis opinionem vestræ, quòd à rege puniendo abhorrere tantopere videremini? Vos isto regis actore verbosissimo, accusatore vestro, "plusquam dimidium itineris confecistis;" vos "ad quartum actum et ultra in dramate hoc desultando frigultientes spectati estis:" vos "meritò regis occisi crimine notari debetis; ut qui viam ad ipsum occidendum muniistis;" vos "nefariam illam securim cervicibus ejus inflixistis, non alii." Væ vobis imprimis, si unquam stirps Caroli regnum posthac in Anglos recuperabit: in vos, mihi credite, cudetur hæc faba. Sed Deo vota persolvite, fratres diligite liberatores vestros, qui illam calamitatem atque certam perniciem ab invitis etiam vobis hactenus prohibuere. Postulamini vos item, quòd "aliquot annos antè per varias petitiones jus regis imminuere moliti estis, quòd voces contumeliosas regi illis ipsis libellis quos nomine senatûs regi porrexistis, insertas publicastis;" videlicet "in illa declaratione dominorum et communium, Maii 26, 1642, apertè quid sensistis de regis authoritate aliquot perduellionem spirantibus et insanis positionibus fassi estis. Hullæ oppidi portas Hothamus, tali mandato à senatu accepto, venienti regi occlusit;" vos "quid rex pati posset, hoc primo rebellionis experimento cognoscere concupivistis." Quid hoc dici potuit accommodatiùs ad conciliandos inter se Anglorum animos, atque à rege penitus abalienandos? cum intelligere hinc possint, si rex revertatur, se non solùm regis mortem, sed etiam petitiones quondam suas, et frequentissimi parlamenti acta de liturgia et episcopis abolendis, de triennali parlamento, et quæcunque summo populi consensu ac plausu sancita sunt, tanquam seditiosas atque "insanas presbyterianorum positiones" luituros. Sed repentè mutat animum homo levissimus; et quod modò "rem ipsam rectè æstimanti" sibi videbatur solis presbyterianis deberi, id nunc "rem" eandem "ab alto revolventi" independentibus totum deberi videtur. Modò presbyterianos "vi aperta atque armis contra regem grassatos esse," eumque ab iis "bello victum, captum, in carcerem conjectum" affirmabat, nunc omnem "hanc rebellionis doctrinam" independentium esse scribit. O hominis fidem et constantiam! quid aliam jam opus est narrationem comparare contra tuam, quæ ipsa sibi tam turpiter decoxit? Verùm de te siquis dubitat, albusne an ater homo sis, tua legat quæ sequuntur. "Tempus est," inquis, "pandere unde et quando proruperit inimica regibus secta: belli isti sanè puritani sub regno Elisabethæ prodire tenebris Orci, et ecclesiam inde turbare primùm cœperunt, immo rempub. ipsam: non enim sunt minores reipub. pestes quàm ecclesiæ." Nunc te verè Balaamum vox ipsa sonat; ubi enim virus omne acerbitatis evomere cupiebas, ibi insciens atque invitus benedixisti. Hoc enim tota Anglia notissimum est, si qui ad exemplum ecclesiarum vel Gallicarum vel Germanicarum, aut quasque reformatiores esse judicabant, puriorem cultûs divini rationem sequi studebant, quam penè omnem episcopi nostri cæremoniis et superstitionibus contaminaverant, si qui tandem pietate erga Deum, aut vitæ integritate cæteris præstabant, eos ab episcoporum fautoribus puritanos fuisse nominatos. Hi sunt quorum doctrinam regibus inimicam esse clamitas; neque hi solùm, nam "plerique reformatorum," inquis, "qui in alios disciplinæ ejus articulos non jurarunt, hunc tamen unum videntur approbasse, qui regiæ adversatur dominationi." Ita independentes, dum gravissimè insectaris, laudas; qui eos ab integerrima Christianorum familia deducis; et quam doctrinam independentium esse propriam ubique asseris, eam nunc "reformatorum plerosque approbasse" confiteris; eò usque demùm audaciæ, impietatis, apostasiæ provectus es, ut etiam episcopos, quos tanquam pestes et Antichristos ex ecclesia radicitùs evellendos, atque exterminandos esse nuper docuisti, eos nunc "à rege tuendos fuisse" affirmas, ne quid "sacramento" scilicet "inaugurationis derogatum iret." Nihil est ulterius jam sceleris aut infamiæ quò possis procedere, quàm, quod solum superest, ut reformatam, quam polluis, religionem quamprimùm ejures. Quòd autem nos aïs "omnes sectas et hæreses tolerare," id noli accusare; quandiu te impium, qui Christianorum sanctissimos, et plerosque etiam reformatos tibi adversos "è tenebris Orci prodire" audes dicere, te vanum, mendacem, et conductitium calumniatorem, te denique apostatam ecclesia tamen toleret. Tuas autem exinde sycophantias, quibus magnam reliqui capitis partem insumis, et quæ monstrosa dogmata independentibus, ad cumulandam iis invidiam, affingis, quidni omittam? cùm neque ad causam hanc regiam omninò pertineant, et ea ferè sint quæ risum potius aut contemptum cujusvis quàm refutationem mereantur.

CAPUT XI.

AD undecimum hoc caput videre mihi, Salmasi, quamvis nullo cum pudore, cum aliqua tamen conscientia futilitatis tuæ accedere. Cùm enim hoc loco perquirendum tibi proposueris "qua authoritate" pronuntiatum de rege fuerit, subjungis, quod à te nemo expectabat; "frustra id quæri;" scilicet "quæstioni huic vix locum reliquit qualitas hominum qui id fecere." Cùm igitur, quàm es importunitatis et impudentiæ in hac causa suscipienda compertus, tam sis nunc etiam loquacitatis tibi conscius, eò à me brevius responsum feres. Quærenti jam tibi "qua authoritate" ordo plebeius vel judicavit ipse regem, vel aliis id judicium delegavit, respondeo suprema: supremam quemadmodum habuerit, docebunt te ea quæ tunc à me dicta sunt, cùm te suprà hac ipsa de re graviter ineptientem redarguerem. Quòd si tibi saltem crederes, posse te ullo tempore quod satis est dicere, non eadem toties cantare odiosissimè soleres. Aliis autem delegare suam judicandi potestatem ordo plebeius eadem sanè ratione potuit, qua tu regem, qui et ipse omnem potestatem à populo accepit, eandem aliis delegare potuisse dicis. Unde in illa solenni conventione, quam nobis objecisti, cùm Angliæ tum Scotiæ summi ordines religiosè profitentur ac spondent, ea se supplicia de perduellibus esse sumpturos, "quibus utriusque gentis potestas judiciaria suprema, aut qui ab ea delegatam potestatem accepturi erant," plectendos judicarent. Audis hic utriusque gentis senatum una voce testantem se posse suam authoritatem judiciariam, quam "supremam" ipsi vocant, aliis delegare: vanam ergò et frivolam de ista potestatis delegatione controversiam moves. At "cum his," inquis, "judicibus è domo inferiori selectis juncti etiam judices fuere ex cohortibus militaribus sumpti; nunquam autem militum fuit civem judicare." Paucissimis te retundam; non enim de cive nunc, sed de hoste memineris nos loqui: quem si imperator bellicus cum tribunis militaribus suis, bello captum, et è vestigio, si ita videretur, occidendum, pro tribunali judicare voluerit, an quicquam præter jus belli aut morem censebitur fecisse? qui autem hostis reipublicæ, et bello captus est, ne pro cive quidem is, nedum pro rege in ea repub. haberi potest. Hanc ipsa lex regis Eduardi sacrosancta sententiam tulit; quæ negat malum regem aut esse regem, aut oportere regis nomine appellari. Ad illud autem quod aïs non "integram" plebis domum, sed "mancam et mutilam de regis capite judicasse," sic habeto; eorum, qui regem plectendum esse censebant, longè majorem fuisse numerum, quàm qui res quascunque in parlamento transigere, etiam per absentiam cæterorum, ex lege debebant: qui cum suo vitio atque culpa abessent (defectio enim animorum ad communem hostem pessima absentia erat) nullam iis, qui in fide permanserant, afferre moram conservandæ reipub. poterant; quam vacillantem, et ad servitutem atque interitum prope redactam, populus universus eorum fidei, prudentiæ, fortitudini, primò commiserat. Atque illi quidem strenuè rem gessere; exulcerati regis impotentiæ, furori, insidiis sese objecere; omnium libertati atque saluti suam posthabuere; omnia antehac parlamenta, omnes majores suos prudentia, magnanimitate, constantia supergressi. Hos tamen populi magna pars, quamvis omnem illis fidem, operam, atque auxilium pollicita, ingratis animis in ipso cursu deseruit. Pars hæc servitutem et pacem cum ignavia atque luxuria ullis conditionibus volebat: pars altera tamen libertatem poscebat, pacem non nisi firmam atque honestam. Quid hìc ageret senatus? partem hanc sanam, et sibi et patriæ fidelem defenderet, an desertricem illam sequeretur? Scio quid agere oportuisse dices? non enim Eurylochus, sed Elpenor es, id est vile animal Circæum, porcus immundus, turpissima servitute etiam sub fœmina assuetus; unde nullum gustum virtutis et, quæ ex ea nascitur, libertatis habes; omnes esse servos cupis, quòd nihil in tuo pectore generosum aut liberum sentis, nihil non ignobile atque servile aut loqueris aut spiras. Injicis porrò scrupulum quòd "et Scotiæ rex erat, de quo statuimus," quasi idcirco in Anglia impune quidvis illi facere liceret. Ut hoc caput denique præ cæteris elumbe atque aridum aliquo saltem facetè dicto queas concludere, "duæ," inquis, "sunt voculæ iisdem ac totidem elementis constantes, solo literarum situ differentes, sed immane quantum significatione differentes, Vis, et Jus." Minimè profectò mirum est, te trium literarum hominem tam scitam ex tribus literis argutiolam exculpere potuisse; hoc magis mirandum est quod toto libro asseris, duas res tam inter se cæteroqui "differentes," in regibus unum atque idem esse. Quæ enim vis est unquam à regibus facta, quam non jus regium tu esse affirmasti? Hæc sunt quæ novem paginis bene longis responsione digna animadvertere potui; cætera sunt ea, quæ aut identidem repetita haud semel refutavimus, aut ad hanc causam disceptandam nullum habent momentum. Itaque solito nunc brevior si sum, id non meæ diligentiæ, quam in hoc summo tædio languescere non patior, sed tuæ loquacitati, rerum et rationum tam cassæ atque inani, imputandum erit.

CAPUT XII.

VELLEM equidem, Salmasi, ne cui fortè videar in regem Carolum, suo fato atque supplicio defunctum, iniquior esse aut acerbior, ut totum hunc de "criminibus ejus" locum, quod et tibi et tuis consultius fuisset, silentio præteriisses. Nunc verò quoniam id magis placuit, ut de iis præfidenter et verbosè diceres, faciam profectò ut intelligas, nihil à te fieri incogitantiùs potuisse, quàm ut deterrimam causæ tuæ partem, nempe ejus crimina, ad extremum refricanda et accuratiùs inquirenda reservares; quæ, cùm vera et atrocissima ostendero fuisse, et ejus memoriam omnibus bonis ingratam atque invisam, et tui defensoris odium quàm maximum in animis legentium novissimè relinquant. "Duæ," inquis, "partes ejus accusationis fieri possunt; una in reprehensione vitæ versatur, altera in delictis quæ tanquam rex potuit committere. Et vitam quidem ejus inter convivia, et ludos, et fœminarum greges dilapsam facilè tacebo: quid enim habet luxus dignum memoratu? Aut quid hæc ad nos, si tantùm privatus fecisset? postquam voluit rex esse, ut nec sibi vivere, ita ne peccare quidem sibi solùm potuit." Primùm enim exemplo suis vehementissimè nocuit; secundo loco, quod temporis libidinibus et rebus ludicris impendit, quod erat plurimum, id totum reipub., quam susceperat gubernandam, subduxit; postremò immensas opes, innumerabilem pecuniam non suam, sed publicam luxu domestico dilapidavit. Itaque domi rex malus primùm esse cœpit. Verùm ad ea potiùs crimina "quæ malè regnando commisisse arguitur" transeamus. Hìc doles "tyrannum" eum, "proditorem," et "homicidam" fuisse judicatum. Id non injuria factum demonstrabitur. Tyrannum autem prius, non ex vulgi opinione, sed ex Aristotelis et doctorum omnium judicio definiamus. Tyrannus est qui suam duntaxat, non populi utilitatem spectat. Ita Aristoteles ethicorum decimo, et alibi, ita alii plerique. Suane commoda an populi spectarit Carolus, pauca hæc de multis, quæ tantummodò perstringam, testimonio erunt. Cum aulæ sumptibus patrimonium et proventus regii non sufficerent, imponit gravissima populo tributa; iisque absumptis, nova excogitavit; non ut rempub. vel augeret, vel ornaret, vel defenderet, sed ut populi non unius opes vel unam in domum congerendas inferret, vel una in domo dissiparet. Hunc in modum sine lege cum pervolaret omnia, quod unicum sciebat sibi fræno fore, parlamentum aut funditus abolere, aut convocatum haud sæpius quàm id suis rationibus conduceret, sibi soli reddere obnoxium conatus est. Quo fræno sibi detracto, aliud ipse populo frænum injecit: Germanos equites, pedites Hibernos per urbes, perque oppida quasi in præsidiis, cùm bellum esset nullum, collocandos curavit: parumne tibi adhuc tyrannus videtur? In quo etiam, ut in aliis multis rebus, quod suprà per occasionem abs te datam ostendi (quanquam tu Carolum Neroni crudelissimo conferri indignaris) Neroni perquàm similis erat: nam et senatum ille è repub. se sublaturum persæpe erat minatus. Interea conscientiis religiosorum hominum supra modum gravis, ad cæremonias quasdam et superstitiosos cultus, quos è medio papismo in ecclesiam reduxerat, omnes adigebat; renuentes aut exilio aut carcere multabat; Scotos bis eam ob causam bello adortus est. Huc usque simplici saltem vice nomen tyranni commeruisse videatur. Nunc cur adjectum in accusatione proditoris nomen fuerit exponam. Cum huic parlamento sæpiùs pollicitis, edictis, execrationibus confirmasset, se nihil contra rempub. moliri, eodem ipso tempore aut papistarum delectus in Hibernia habebat, aut legatis ad regem Daniæ clanculùm missis, arma, equos, auxilium disertè contra parlamentum petebat, aut exercitum nunc Anglorum nunc Scotorum pretio sollicitabat; illis urbem Londinum diripiendam, his quatuor provincias Aquilonares Scotorum ditioni adjungendas promisit, si sibi ad parlamentum quoquo modo tollendum commodare suam operam vellent. Cùm hæc non succederent, cuidam Dillonio perduelli dat secretiora ad Hibernos mandata, quibus juberentur omnes Anglos ejus insulæ colonos repentè armis adoriri. Hæc ferè proditionum ejus monumenta sunt, non vanis rumoribus collecta, sed ipsis literis ipsius manu subscriptis atque signatis comperta. Homicidam denique fuisse, cujus acceptis mandatis Hiberni arma ceperint, ad quinquies centena millia Anglorum in summa pace nihil tale metuentium exquisitis cruciatibus occiderint, qui etiam tantum reliquis duobus regnis bellum civile conflarit, neminem puto negaturum. Addo enim quod in illo Vectensi colloquio hujus belli et culpam et crimen rex palàm in se suscepit, eoque omni parlamentum notissima confessione sua liberavit. Habes nunc breviter quamobrem rex Carolus et tyrannus et proditor et homicida judicatus fuerit. At "cur non prius," inquis, neque in illo "solenni fœdere," neque postea cùm deditiius esset, vel "à presbyterianis" vel "ab independentibus" sic judicatus est, sed potiùs, "ut regem decuit accipi, omni reverentia est exceptus?" Vel hoc solo argumento persuaderi cuivis intelligenti queat, non nisi serò tandem, et postquam omnia sustinuerant, omnia tentaverant, omnia perpessi erant, deliberatum ordinibus fuisse regem abjicere. Tu id solus malitiosè nimis in invidiam rapis, quod summam eorum patientiam, æquanimitatem, moderationem, fastusque regii tolerantiam nimis fortasse longam apud omnes bonos testabitur. At "mense Augusto qui præcessit ejus supplicium, domus communium, quæ sola jam tum regnabat et independentibus erat obnoxia, scripsit literas ad Scotos, quibus testabatur, nunquam sibi in animo fuisse mutare statum, qui huc usque in Anglia obtinuerat sub rege, domo dominorum et communium." Vide jam quàm non doctrinæ independentium abrogatio regis attribuenda sit. Qui suam dissimulare doctrinam non solent, etiam potiti rerum profitentur "nunquam sibi in animo fuisse statum regni mutare." Quod si id postmodùm in mentem venit, quod in animo non fuit, cur non licebat quod rectius, et è repub. magis esse videbatur, id potissimum sequi? præsertim cùm Carolus neque exorari, neque flecti ullo modo potuerit, ut justissimis eorum postulatis, quæque semper eadem ab initio obtulerant, assentiretur. Quas initio de religione, quas de jure suo sententias perversissimas tuebatur, nobisque adeò calamitosas, in iisdem permanebat: ab illo Carolo nihil mutatus, qui et pace et bello tanta nobis omnibus mala intulerat. Siquid est assensus, id et invitè facere, et quamprimùm sui juris foret, pro nihilo se habiturum haud obscuris indiciis significabat: idem apertè filius, abducta secum per eos dies classis parte, scripto, idem ipse per literas ad suos quosdam in urbe declarabat. Interea cum Hibernis Anglorum hostibus immanissimis, reclamante parlamento, fœdis conditionibus occultè pacem coagmentaverat, Anglos ad repetita inutiliter colloquia et pacem quoties invitabat, toties contra eos omni studio bellum coquebat. Hic illi quibus concredita respub. erat, quò se verterent? an commissam sibi nostram omnium salutem in manus hosti acerbissimo traderent? An alterum belli propè interneciui septennium, nequid pejus ominemur, gerendum nobis iterum, et exantlandum relinquerent? Deus meliorem illis mentem injecit, ut prioribus de rege non movendo cogitationibus, non enim ad decreta pervenerant, rempub., religionem, libertatem ex ipso illo fœdere solenni anteponerent; quæ quidem stante rege constare non posse, tardiùs illi quidem quàm oportuit, sed aliquando tamen viderunt. Sanè parlamento nunquam non liberum atque integrum esse debet, ex re nata quàm optimè reipub. consulere; neque ita se prioribus addicere sententiis, ut religio sit in posterum, etiamsi Deus dederit, vel sibi, vel reipub. plus sapere. At "Scoti non idem sentiunt, quinimo ad filium Carolum scribentes, sacratissimum regem appellant parentem ejus, et sacerrimum facinus quo necatus est." Cave plura de Scotis, quos non novisti; nos novimus, cum eundem regem "sacerrimum," et homicidam et proditorem; facinus quo tyrannus necaretur, "sacratissimum" appellarent. Nunc regi quam dicam scripsimus, quasi parùm commodè scriptam cavillaris, et "quid opus fuerit ad elogium illud tyranni addere proditoris et homicidæ titulos," quæris: "cùm tyranni appellatio omnia mala comprehendat:" tum quis tyrannus sit grammaticè et glossematicè etiam doces. Aufer nugas istas, literator, quas una Aristotelis definitio modò allata nullo negotio difflabit; quæque te doctorem docebit nomen tyranni, quoniam tua nihil interest præter nomina intelligere, posse citra proditionem et homicidium stare. Atqui "leges Anglicanæ non dicunt proditionis crimen regem incurrere si procuraverit seditionem contra se vel populum suum." Neque dicunt, inquam, parlamentum læsæ majestatis reum esse, si malum regem tollat, aut unquam fuisse, cum sæpius olim sustulerit: posse autem regem suam majestatem lædere atque minuere, immò amittere, clara voce testantur. Quod enim in illa lege sancti Edouardi legitur, "nomen regis perdere," nihil aliud est quàm regio munere ac dignitate privari; quod accidit Chilperico Franciæ regi, cujus exemplum illustrandæ rei causa eodem loco lex ipsa ponit. Committi autem summam perduellionem tam in regnum, quàm in regem, non est apud nos jurisperitus qui inficias ire possit. Provoco ad ipsum, quem profers Glanvillanum. "Siquis aliquid fecerit in mortem regis, vel seditionem regni, crimen proditionis esse." Sic illa machinatio, qua papistæ quidem parlamenti curiam cum ipsis ordinibus uno ictu pulveris nitrati in auras disjicere parabant, non in regem solum, sed in parlamentum et regnum, ab ipso Jacobo et utraque ordinum domo "summa proditio" judicata est. Quid plura attinet in re tam evidenti, quæ tamen facilè possem, statuta nostra allegare? cùm ridiculum planè sit et ratione ipsa abhorrens, committi perduellionem in regem posse, in populum non posse, propter quem et cujus gratia, cujus, ut ita dicam, bona venia, rex est id quod est. Frustra igitur tot statuta nostra deblateras, frustra in vetustis legum Anglicarum libris exerces te atque volutas; ad quas vel ratas vel irritas habendas parlamenti authoritas semper valuit; cujus etiam solius est, quid sit perduellio, quid læsa majestas, interpretari: quam majestatem nunquam sic à populo in regem transiisse, ut non multo celsior atque angustior in parlamento conspiciatur, jam sæpiùs ostendi. Te verò vappam et circulatorem Gallum jura nostra interpretantem quis ferat? Vos verò Anglorum perfugæ, tot episcopi, doctores, jurisconsulti, qui literaturam omnem et eruditionem vobiscum ex Anglia aufugisse prædicatis, adeone ex vestrûm numero nullus causam regiam atque suam defendere satis strenuè satisque latinè sciebat, gentibusque exteris dijudicandam exponere, ut cerebrosus iste et crumenipeta Gallus mercede accersendus in partes necessariò esset, qui regis inopis. tot doctorum et sacerdotum infantia stipati, patrocinium susciperet? magna, mihi credite, infamia etiam hoc nomine apud exteras nationes flagrabitis; et meritò vos utique cecidisse causa omnes existimabunt, quam ne verbis quidem, nedum armis aut virtute sustinere valuistis. Sed ad te redeo, vir bone, dicendi perite, si tute modò ad te rediisti; nam sternentem te tam prope finem et de "morte" voluntaria nescio quid abs re somniantem offendo; tum statim negas "cadere in regem suæ mentis compotem, ut populum seditionibus distrahat, exercitus suos hostibus debellandos tradat, ut factiones contra se suscitet." Quæ omnia cum et alii multi reges, et Carolus ipse fecerit, dubitare non potes, præsertim Stoïcus, quin ut omnes improbi, sic omnes quoque tyranni prorsùs insaniant. Flaccum audi.

> Quem mala stultitia, et quæcunque inscitia veri
> Cœcum agit, insanum Chrysippi porticus et grex
> Autumat, hæc populos, hæc magnos formula reges, > Excepto sapiente, tenet.— —

Si igitur insani cujuspiam facti crimen à rege Carolo amovere cupis, debebis improbitatem ab eo priùs amovere quàm insaniam. At enim "rex non potuit proditionem in eos committere, qui vassalli ipsius et subjecti fuere." Primùm, cùm æquè atque ulla gens hominum liberi simus, nullum barbarum morem fraudi nobis esse patiemur: fac deinde "vassalos" fuisse nos regis, ne sic quidem tyrannum perferre dominum tenemur. Omnis ea subjectio, ut ipsæ leges nostræ loquuntur, "honesto et utili" definita est. Leg. Hen. 1. c. 55. Fidem cùm esse "mutuam," jurisconsulti omnes tradunt, si dominus "ligeam," quod aïunt, "defensionem" præstiterit: sin è contrario nimiùm sævus fuerit, aut atrocem aliquam injuriam intulerit, "dissolvi et penitùs extingui omnem homagii connexionem." Hæc ipsa Bractoni verba et Fletæ sunt. Unde vassallum est ubi lex ipsa in dominum armat; eumque singulari certamine à vassalo, si acciderit, interimendum tradit. Idem si universæ civitati aut nationi in tyrannum non licuerit, deterior liberorum hominum conditio quàm servorum erit. Nunc Caroli homicidia aliorum regum partim homicidiis, partim justè factis excusare contendis. De laniena Hiberniensi "remittis lectorem ad opus illud regium Iconis Basilicæ;" et ego te remitto ad Iconoclastem. "Captam Rupellam," proditos Rupellenses, "ostentatam potiùs quàm datam opem," imputari Carolo non vis: imputetur necne meritò, non habeo dicere; satis superque ab eo peccatum est domi, ne externa persequi curem: omnes interim ecclesias protestantium, quotquot ullo tempore se contra leges religionis hostes armis defenderunt, eodem nomine rebellionis damnas. Quam contumeliam ab alumno suo sibi illatam quanti intersit ad disciplinam ecclesiasticam, suamque tuendam integritatem, non negligere, secum ipsi cogitent: nos etiam Anglos ea expeditione proditos acerbè tulimus. Qui enim regnum Angliæ in tyrannidem convertere diu meditatus erat, non, nisi extincto priùs militari civium robore ac flore, cogitata perficere se posse arbitrabatur. Aliud erat crimen regis quod ex jurejurando à regibus regnum capessentibus dari solito verba quædam ejus jussu erasa fuerint, antequam jurasset. O facinus indignum et execrandum! impium qui fecit, quid dicam qui defendit? nam quæ potuit, per Deum immortalem, quæ perfidia, aut juris violatio esse major? quid illi sanctius post sacratissima religionis mysteria illo jurejurando esse debuit? Quis quæso sceleratior, isne qui in legem peccat, an qui, secum legem ipsam ut peccare faciat, dat operam? aut denique ipsam legem tollit, ne peccasse videatur? Agedum, jus hoc religiosissimè jurandum rex iste violavit; sed ne palàm tamen violasse videretur, turpissimo quodam adulterio per dolum corrupit; et ne pejerasse diceretur, jus ipsum jurandum in perjurium vertit. Quid aliud potuit sperari, nisi injustissimè, versutissimè, atque infelicissimè regnaturum esse eum, qui ab injuria tam detestanda auspicatus regnum est; jusque illud primum adulterare auderet, quod solum impedimento sibi fore, ne jura omnia perverteret, putabat. At enim "sacramentum" illud, sic enim defendis, "non magis obligare reges potest, quàm leges; legibus autem se devinciri velle præ se ferunt, et secundùm eas vivere, cùm tamen re vera iis soluti sint." Quemquamne tam sacrilego tamque incesto ore esse, ut sacramentum religiosissimum, tactis Evangeliis datum, quasi per se leviculum, solvi sine causa posse asserat? Te verò, scelus atque portentum, ipse Carolus redarguit; qui cùm sacramentum illud non esse per se leve quidpiam existimaret, idcircò ejus religionem aut subterfugere, aut fallacia quavis eludere satius duxit, quàm apertè violare; et corruptor jusjurandi hujus et falsarius esse maluit, quàm manifestè perjurus. At verò "jurat quidem rex populo suo, ut populus vicissim regi, sed populus jurat regi fidelitatem, non populo rex." Lepidum sanè hominis commentum! annon qui juratus promittit atque spondet, se quidpiam fideliter præstiturum, fidem suam iis obligat, qui jusjurandum ab eo exigunt? Rex sanè omnis quoad præstanda ea quæ promittit, et "fidelitatem," et "obsequium," et "obedientiam populo" jurat. Hîc ad Gulielmum Conquæstorem recurris, qui ipse, non quod sibi collibitum erat, sed quod populus ab eo et magnates postulabant, id omne haud semel jurare est coactus se præstiturum. Quòd si multi reges "coronam" solenni ritu non "accipiunt," et proinde non jurant, et tamen regnant, idem de populo responderi potest; cujus pars magna fidelitatem nunquam juravit. Si rex ob eam causam solutus erit, erit et populus. Quæ autem pars populi jurabat, non regi solùm, sed regno et legibus jurabat, à quibus rex factus est, et quidem eatenus tantùm regi, quoad is leges observaret, "quas vulgus," id est, communitas sive plebeius ordo "elegerit." Stultior enim sit, qui legum nostrarum loquelam ad puriorem semper latinitatem exigere velit. Hanc clausulam, "quis vulgus elegerit," Carolus, antequam coronam acciperet, ex formula juramenti regii eradendam curavit. At, inquis, "sine regis assensu nullas leges vulgus elegerit;" eoque nomine duo statuta citas, unum anni xxxvii. Hen. 6. c. xv. alterum "decimo-tertio" Edouardi iv. c. viii. Tantum autem abest, quo minùs eorum alterutrum in libro statutorum usquam appareat, ut annis abs te citatis, neque rex iste neque ille ullum omninò statutum promulgaverit. Tu fidem jam perfugarum, statuta tibi dictantium, elusus querere; dum alii tuam admirantur impudentiam simul et vanitatem, quem non pudebat iis in libris versatissimum videri velle, quos inspexisse nunquam, ne vidisse quidem tam facilè argueris. Clausulam autem istam jusjurandi, quam tu perfricti oris balatro "commentitiam" audes dicere, "regis," inquis, "defensores fieri posse aïunt," ut in aliquot antiquis exemplaribus extiterit, "sed in desuetudinem abiise, quòd commodam significationem non haberet. Verùm ob id ipsum majores nostri illam clausulam in hoc regis jurejurando posuere, ut significationem tyrannidi semper non commodam haberet. In desuetudinem autem si abierat, quod tamen falsissimum est, quis neget multò meliori jure revocandam fuisse? frustra, si te audiam: quippe "in regibus" mos ille "jurandi, qui hodie receptus est, cæremonialis est tantùm." Atqui rex, cùm episcopos aboleri oportuit, per illud jusjurandum non licere sibi causatus est. Atque ita sacramentum illud sanctissimum, quoties ex usu est regis, vel solidum quiddam et firmum erit, vel inane tantùm et "cæremoniale." Quod ego vos obtestor, Angli, etiam atque etiam animadvertatis: et qualem estis regem habituri, si redierit, vobiscum reputetis: non enim in mentem venisset unquam huic grammatico sceleroso et extraneo de jure regis

Anglorum velle scribere, aut posse, nisi Carolus ille extorris, disciplina patria imbutus, unaque illi monitores ejus profligatissimi, quid hac de re scribi vellent omni studio suggessissent. Dictabant huic illi, "totum parlamentum proditionis in regem insimulari posse," vel ob hoc solum, quòd "sine assensu regis declaravit omnes esse proditores qui arma contra parlamentum Angliæ sumpserunt; vassallum scilicet regis esse parlamentum;" jusjurandum verò regium "cæremoniale tantùm" esse, quidni "vassallum" etiam? Ita neque legum ulla sanctitas, neque sacramenti ulla fides, aut religio, quicquam valebit ad cohibendam à vita atque fortunis vestrûm omnium vel libidinem effrænati regis, vel ultionem exacerbati: qui ita institutus à pueritia est, ut leges et religionem, ipsam denique fidem vassallari sibi, et servire suis libitis arbitretur debere. Quantò præstabilius esset, vobisque dignius, si opes, si libertatem, si pacem, si imperium vultis, à virtute, industria, prudentia, fortitudine vestra indubitanter petere hæc omnia, quàm sub regio dominatu incassùm sperare? Certè qui sine rege ac domino parari hæc posse non putant, dici non potest, quàm abjectè, quàm non honestè, non dico quàm indignè, de se ipsi statuant: quid enim aliud nisi se inertes, imbecillos, mentis inopes atque consilii, corpore atque animo ad servitium natos, fatentur esse? Et servitus quidem omnis homini ingenuo turpis est; vobis autem post libertatem Deo vindice, vestroque marte recuperatam, post tot fortia facinora, et exemplum in regem potentissimum tam memorabile editum, velle rursus ad servitutem, etiam præter fatum, redire, non modò turpissimum, sed et impium erit, et sceleratum: parque vestrum scelus illorum sceleri erit, qui, servitutis olim Ægyptiacæ desiderio capti, multis tandem cladibus ac variis divinitùs absumpti, liberatori Deo pœnas tam servilis animi dedere. Quid tu interim, servitutis conciliator? "Potuit," inquis, "rex proditionis et delictorum aliorum gratiam facere; quod satis evincit legibus eum solutum fuisse." Proditionis quidem, non quæ in regnum, sed quæ in se commissa erat, poterat rex, ut quivis alius, gratiam facere: poterat et quorundam aliorum fortasse maleficiorum, quanquam non id semper: an ideò qui maleficum servandi nonnunquam jus quoddam habet, idem continuò omnes bonos perdendi jus ullum habebit? Citatus in curiam, eamque inferiorem, respondere non tenetur, nisi per procuratorem, rex, uti nec de populo quidem ullus; an ideo in parlamentum citatus ab universis non veniet? non ipse respondebit? "Conari" nos, aïs, "Batavorum exemplo factum nostrum tueri," atque hinc, stipendio scilicet metuens, quo te Batavi lu~m atque pestem alunt, ne Anglos infamando etiam Batavos altores tuos infamasse videaris, demonstrare cupis quàm "dissimile sit quod hi et quod illi fecerunt." Quam ego collationem tuam, quanquam in ea quædam sunt falsissima, alia, ne salario fortasse tuo non satis litares, palpum olent, omittam. Negant enim Angli opus sibi esse, ut exterorum quorumvis exemplo facta sua tueantur. Habent leges, quas secuti sunt, patrias, hac in parte, sicubi terrarum aliæ sunt, optimas: habent quos imitentur, majores suos, viros fortissimos, qui immoderatis regum imperiis nunquam cessere; multos eorum intolerantiùs se gerentes per supplicium necavere. In libertate sunt nati, sibi sufficiunt, quas volunt leges possunt sibi ferre; unam præ cæteris colunt antiquissimam, à natura ipsa latam, quæ omnes leges, jus omne atque imperium civile, non ad regum libidinem, sed ad bonorum maximè civium salutem refert. Jam præter quisquilias et rudera superiorum capitum restare nihil video; quorum quidem acervum cum satis magnum in fine congesseris, nescio quid aliud tibi volueris, nisi hujus tuæ fabricæ ruinam quasi præsagire. Tandem aliquando post immensam loquacitatem rivos claudis; "Deum testatus, te hanc causam tuendam suscepisse, non tantùm quia rogatus, sed quia meliorem nullam te potuisse defendere, conscientia tibi suggessit." Rogatus tu in res nostras tibi alienissimas, nobis non rogantibus, te interponas? Tu populi Anglicani summos magistratus pro authoritate proque imperio sibi commisso quod suum munus est in sua ditione agentes, nulla injuria lacessitus (neque enim natum te esse sciebant) indignissimis verborum comtumeliis laceres, libroque infami edito proscindas? A quo autem rogatus? An ab uxore, credo, quæ jus regium, ut perhibent, in te exercet; quæque tibi, quoties libet, ut illa Fulvia, cujus, ex epigrammate obscœno, centones modò consuisti (p. 320.) "aut" scribe "aut pugnemus" aït: unde tu, ne signa canerent, scribere malebas. An rogatus fortasse à Carolo minore, et perditissimo illo peregrinantium aulicorum grege, quasi alter Balaamus ab altero Balacco rege accersitus, ut jacentem regis causam, et malè pugnando amissam maledicendo erigere dignarere? Sic sanè fieri potuit; nisi quod hoc ferè interfuit; ille enim vir sagax asino insidens loculuteio ad execrandum venit; tu asinus loquacissimus insessus à fœmina, et senatis, quos vulneraveras, episcoporum capitibus obsitus, apocalypticæ illius bestiæ parvam quandam imaginem exprimere videris. Sed ferunt pœnituisse te hujus libri, pòst paulò quàm scripsisses. Benè profectò habet; tuam itaque ut testere omnibus pœnitentiam, nihil tibi priùs faciendum erit, quàm ut pro libro tam longo unam tantummodò literam adhuc longam ex te facias. Sic enim pœnituit Iscarioten illum Judam, cui similis es; idque novit puer Carolus, qui crumenam idcircò tibi, insigne illud Judæ proditoris, dono misit, quòd primùm audierat, et postmodùm sciebat, te apostatam esse et diabolum. Judas ille Christum prodidit, tu Christi ecclesiam; episcopos Antichristos esse docueras, ad eos defecisti: quos Inferis damnaveras, eorum causam suscepisti: Christus omnes homines liberavit, tu omnes ad servitutem redigere conatus es: ne dubita, postquàm in Deum, in ecclesiam, in omne genus hominum tam impius fuisti, quin te etiam idem exitus maneat, ut desperatione magis quam pœnitentia ductus, tuique pertæsus, ab infelici tandem arbore pendens, sicut et par ille tuus olim, medius crepes; illamque malefidam et fallacem conscientiam, bonorum et sanctorum insectatricem, ad destinatas tibi quandoque supplicii sedes præmittas. Hactenus, quod initio institueram ut meorum civium facta egregia contra insanam et lividissimam furentis sophistæ rabiem, et domi et foris defenderem, jusque populi commune ab injusto regum dominatu assererem, non id quidem regum odio, sed tyrannorum, Deo bene-juvante videor jam mihi absolvisse: neque ullum sine responso vel argumentum, vel exemplum, vel testimonium ab adversario allatum sciens prætermisi, quod quidem firmitatis in se quidquam, aut probationis vim ullam habere videretur; in alteram fortasse partem culpæ propior, quòd sæpiusculè ineptiis quoque ejus, et argutiis tritissimis, quasi argumentis, respondendo, id iis tribuisse videar, quo dignæ non erant. Unum restat, et fortasse maximum, ut vos quoque, ô cives, adversarium hunc vestrum ipsi refutetis; quod nulla alia ratione video posse fieri, nisi omnium maledicta vestris optimè factis exuperare perpetuò contendatis. Vota vestra et preces ardentissimas Deus, cum servitutis haud uno generè oppressi, ad eum confugistis, benignè exaudiit. Quæ duo in vita hominum mala sanè maxima sunt, et virtuti damnosissima, tyrannis et superstitio, iis vos gentium primos gloriosè liberavit; eam animi magnitudinem vobis injecit, ut devictum armis vestris et dedititium regem judicio inclyto judicare, et condemnatum punire, primi mortalium non dubitaretis. Post hoc facinus tam illustre, nihil humile aut angustum, nihil non magnum atque excelsum et cogitare et facere debebitis. Quam laudem ut assequamini, hac sola incedendum est via, si ut hostes bello domuistis, ita ambitionem, avaritiam, opes, et secundarum rerum corruptelas, quæ subigunt cæteras gentes hominum, ostenderitis posse vos etiam inermes media in pace omnium mortalium fortissimè debellare: si, quam in repellenda servitute fortitudinem præstitistis, eam in libertate conservanda justitiam, temperantiam, moderationem præstiteritis. His solis argumentis et testimoniis evincere potestis, non esse vos illos, quos hic probris insequitur, "Perduelles, latrones, sicarios, parricidas, fanaticos;" non vos ambitionis aut alieni invadendi studio, non seditione, aut pravis ullis cupiditatibus, non amentia aut furore percitos, regem trucidasse, sed amore libertatis, religionis, justitiæ, honestatis, patriæ denique charitate accensos, tyrannum puniisse. Sin autem, quod, bone Deus, ne unquam siveris, aliter in animum induxeritis, si in bello fortes, in pace turpes eritis, qui manifestum sensistis numen vobis tam propitium, hostibus tam grave, neque exemplo tam insigni et memorando ante oculos posito, Deum vereri, et justitiam colere didiceritis; quod ad me attinet, concedam sanè et fatebor, neque enim potero negare, ea omnia, quæ nunc maledici et mendaces de vobis pessimè aut loquuntur aut sentiunt, vera esse: vosque multò iratiorem brevi tempore experturi estis Deum, quàm aut infensum inimici vestri, aut vos benignum et faventem et paternum, præ cæteris omnibus terrarum orbis gentibus hodiernis, experti estis.

DEFENSIO SECUNDA PRO POPULO ANGLICANO.

CONTRA

INFAMEM LIBELLUM ANONYMUM,

CUI TITULUS,

REGII SANGUINIS CLAMOR AD CŒLUM, ADVERSUS PARRICIDAS ANGLICANOS.

[FIRST PUBLISHED 1654.]

Quod in omni vita hominum, omnique genere officii est primum, ut grati semper erga Deum, ejusque memores beneficiorum simus, tum præsertim, si qua supra spem votumque evenerint, uti, ob ea, singulares atque solennes gratias quamprimùm referamus, id mihi nunc in ipso limine orationis tribus potissimùm de causis video esse faciendum. Primum iis me natum temporibus patriæ, quibus civium virtus eximia, et supergressa omnes majorum laudes magnitudo animi atque constantia, obtestata prius Deum, eundemque sequuta manifestissimum ducem, editis post orbem conditum exemplis factisque fortissimis, et gravi dominatione rempublicam, et indignissima servitute religionem liberavit. Deinde, cùm extitissent subitò multi, qui, ut est ferè ingenium vulgi, egregiè facta odiosè criminarentur, unusque, præ cæteris, literatorio fastu, et concepta de se gregalium suorum opinione inflatus ac fidens, conscripto in nos libro admodum infami, tyrannorum omnium patrocinium nefariè suscepisset, me potiùs quàm alium quemvis, neque tanti nominis adversario, neque tantis rebus dicendis visum imparem, ab ipsis patriæ liberatoribus has partes accepisse communi omnium consensu ultrò delatas, ut causam et populi Anglicani, et ipsius adeò libertatis, siquis unquam alius, publicè defenderem. Postremò, in re tam ardua et expectationis plena, neque civium meorum de me sive spem, sive judicium illud fefellisse, neque exterorum quamplurimis cùm doctis viris, tum rerum peritis non satisfecisse; adversarium verò, quamvis audacissimum, ita profligasse, ut animo simul et existimatione fracta cederet; triennioque toto, quo postea vixit, multa licèt minatus ac fremens, nullam tamen ampliùs molestiam nobis exhiberet, nisi quòd vilissimorum quorundam hominum obscuram operam subsidio sibi corrogaret, et laudatores nescio quos ineptos atque immodicos, ad inopinatam ac recentem infamiam, siquo modo posset, sarciendam subornaret; quod statim patebit. Hæc ego divinitus mihi accidisse bona, et magna quidem ratus, appositissima denique non modò ad persolvendas numini ex debito gratias, sed ad auspicium quoque optimum instituti operis capiendum, cum veneratione, ut facio, imprimis commemoranda esse duxi. Nam quis est qui patriæ decora non arbitretur sua? quid patriæ cujusquam esse magis decori aut gloriæ potest, quàm libertas, non civili tantùm vitæ, sed divino etiam cultui restituta? quæ gens, quæ civitas, aut felicius aut fortiùs hanc sibi utrobique peperit? Etenim fortitudo, cùm non tota in bello atque armis eniteat, sed contra omnes æque formidines diffundat vim suam atque intrepida sit, Græci quidem illi, quos maximè admiramur, et Romani, ad tollendos ex civitatibus tyrannos nullam ferè virtutem, præter studium libertatis, expedita arma, promptasque manus attulere; cætera omnia in proclivi, inter laudes omnium et plausus, et læta omnia, peragebant; nec tam ad discrimen et ambiguum facinus quam ad certamen virtutis gloriosissimum atque pulcherrimum, ad præmia denique et coronas spemque immortalitatis certissimam properabant. Nondum enim tyrannis res sacra erat; nondum tyranni, Christi scilicet proreges atque vicarii repentè facti, cùm benevolentia non possent; cæca vulgi superstitione sese munierant: nondum clericorum malis artibus attonita plebs, ad barbariem ea fœdiorem, quæ stolidissimos mortalium infamat Indos, degeneraverat. Illi enim noxios sibi dæmonas, quos abigere non possunt, pro diis colunt; hæc tyrannos nè liceret tollere cùm posset, impotentissimos creabat in se deos; et humani generis pestes in suam perniciem consecrabat. At contra has omnes traditarum diu opinionum, religionum, calumniarum, atque terrorum densissimas acies, hoste ipso vehementiùs ab aliis formidatas, decertandum Anglis erat. Quæ omnia, edocti meliùs, et proculdubio cœlitus imbuti, tanta causæ fiducia, tanta animorum firmitate ac virtute superarunt, ut cùm numero populus sanè magnus essent, animis tamen tam erectis tamque excelsis, vulgus esse desierint; Britanniaque ipsa posthac, quæ tyrannorum terra ferax dicta olim est, nunc liberatorum longè feracior, perpetua sæculorum omnium celebratione dici meruerit. Quos non legum contemptus aut violatio in effrænatam licentiam effudit; non virtutis et gloriæ falsa species, aut stulta veterum æmulatio inani nomine libertatis incendit, sed innocentia vitæ, morumque sanctitas rectum atque solum iter ad libertatem veram docuit, legum et religionis justissima defensio necessariò armavit. Atque illi quidem Deo perinde confisi, servitutem honestissimis armis pepulere: cujus laudis etsi nullam partem mihi vendico, à reprehensione tamen vel timiditatis vel ignaviæ, siqua infertur, facilè me tueor. Neque enim militiæ labores et pericula sic defugi, ut non alia ratione, et operam, multò utiliorem, nec minore cum periculo meis civibus navarim, et animum dubiis in rebus neque demissum unquam, neque ullius invidiæ, vel etiam mortis plus æquo metuentem præstiterim. Nam cum ab adolescentulo humanioribus essem studiis, ut qui maximè deditus, et ingenio semper quàm corpore validior, posthabita castrensi opera, qua me gregarius quilibet robustior facilè superasset, ad ea me contuli, quibus plus potui; ut parte mei meliore ac potiore, si saperem, non deteriore, ad rationes patriæ, causamque hanc præstantissimam, quantum maximè possem momentum accederem. Sic itaque existimabam, si illos Deus res gerere tam præclaras voluit, esse itidem alios à quibus gestas dici pro dignitate atque ornari, et defensam armis veritatem, ratione etiam, (quod unicum est præsidium verè ac propriè humanum,) defendi voluerit. Unde est, ut dum illos invictos acie viros admiror, de mea interim provincia non querar; immo mihi gratuler, et gratias insuper largitori munerum cœlesti iterum summas agam obtigisse talem, ut aliis invidenda multò magis, quàm mihi ullo modo pœnitentia videatur. Et me quidem nemini vel infimo libens confero; nec verbum de me ullum insolentius facio; ad causam verò omnium nobilissimam, ac celeberrimam, et hoc simul defensores ipsos defendendi munus ornatissimum ipsorum mihi suffragiis attributum atque judiciis, quoties animum refero, fateor me mihi vix temperare, quin altiùs atque audentiùs quàm pro exordii ratione insurgam; et grandius quiddam, quod eloqui possim, quæram: quandoquidem oratores illos antiquos et insignes, quantum ego ab illis non dicendi solùm sed et loquendi facultate, (in extranea præsertim, qua utor necessariò, lingua, et persæpe mihi nequaquam satisfacio,) haud dubiè vincor, tantùm omnes omnium ætatum, materiæ nobilitate et argumento vincam. Quod et rei tantam expectationem ac celebritatem adjecit, ut jam ipse me sentiam non in foro aut rostris, uno duntaxat populo, vel Romano, vel Atheniensi circumfusum; sed attenta, et confidente quasi tota penè Europa, et judicium ferente, ad universos quacunque gravissimorum hominum, urbium, gentium, consessus atque conventus, et priore defensione, dixisse, et hac rursus dicturum. Jam videor mihi, ingressus iter, transmarinos tractus et porrectas latè regiones, sublimis perlustrare; vultus innumeros atque ignotos, animi sensus mecum conjunctissimos. Hinc Germanorum virile et infestum servituti robur, inde Francorum vividi dignique nomine liberales impetus, hinc Hispanorum consulta virtus, Italorum inde sedata suique compos magnanimitas ob oculos versatur. Quicquid uspiam liberorum pectorum, quicquid ingenui, quicquid magnanimi aut prudens latet aut se palàm profitetur, alii tacitè favere, alii apertè suffragari, accurrere alii et plausu accipere, alii tandem vero victi, dedititios se tradere. Videor jam mihi, tantis circumseptus copiis, ab Herculeis usque columnis ad extremos Liberi patris terminos, libertatem diu pulsam atque exulem, longo intervallo domum ubique gentium reducere: et, quod Triptolemus olim fertur, sed longè nobiliorem Cereali illa frugem ex civitate mea gentibus importare; restitutum nempe civilem liberumque vitæ cultum, per urbes, per regna, perque nationes disseminare. Sed nec ignotus planè, nec fortasse non gratus rursum advenero; si sum idem, qui pugnacissimum tyrannorum satellitem, et opinione plerorumque, et sui fiducia insuperabilem antea creditum, cùm nos nostrasque acies contumeliosè lacesseret, et optimates nostri me primùm intuerentur, singulari certamine congressus, adacto convitiantis in jugulum hoc stylo, immò suismet ipsius telis, collocavi; et nisi velim tot undique lectorum intelligentium calculis atque sententiis, neutiquam addictis mihi aut obnoxiis diffidere prorsus et derogare, opima spolia retuli. Hæc sine ulla vaniloquentia ità esse re vera, vel illud maximè argumento esse potest, quod ego nec sine Dei nutu reor accidisse, quòd, cùm à regina Suedorum serenissima, qua vivit opinor nemo, aut olim vixit, vel optimarum artium, vel doctorum hominum studiosior, honorificè sanè esset invitatus, venissetque et Salmasius et Salmasia, (uter enim horum is erat, uxoris palàm dominatus cum fama tum domi incertum admodum reddiderat,) quo in loco peregrinus magno in honore degebat, ibi eum nostra defensio nihil tale metuentem occupavit. Qua statim à pluribus perlecta, regina quidem, quæ et ipsa cum primis perlegerat, de sua pristina benignitate ac munificentia, id solum spectans quod se dignum erat, in hospitem nihil remisit: de cætero, si audita sæpius et quæ arcana non sunt, licet referre, tanta animorum facta subitò mutatio est, ut qui nudiustertius summa gratia floruerat, nunc penè obsolesceret; nec ità multò post discedens cum bona venia hoc unum in dubio permultis relinqueret, honoratiorne advenerit, an contemptior abierit. Sed neque aliis in locis detrimentum levius fecisse famæ satis constat. Verùm hæc omnia non eò attuli; quò me cuiquam venditarem, neque enim est opus; sed quò id duntaxat latiùs ostenderem, quod initio institui, quas ob causas, et quàm non leves, ab agendis Deo Optimo Maximo gratiis potissimùm sim exorsus; mihique prooemium hoc fore honestissimum atque pulcherrimum, in quo præcipuè, tot argumentis enumeratis, demonstrare liceat, me, haud expertem licèt calamitatum humanarum, me tamen, resque meas Deo curæ esse; me maximis prope de rebus, et ad patriæ necessaria tempora accommodatis, et civilis vitæ religionisque ex usu maximè futuris, non uno pro populo, nedum uno pro reo, sed pro universo potiùs hominum genere, contra humanæ libertatis hostes, quasi in communi omnium gentium et frequentissimo concursu disserentem, divino favore et auxilio adjutum atque auctum: quo ego majus aut gloriosius quicquam mihi tribuere, neque possim ullo tempore neque cu-piam. Eundem proinde immortalem Deum oro, ut consueta ejus ope ac benignitate sola fretus, qua integritate, diligentia, fide, felicitate etiam, fortissimè justissimeque simul facta haud ità pridem defendi, eadem, vel ea amplius, authores ipsos, meque tantis viris ignominiæ causa, non honoris additum ab immeritis opprobriis, atque calumniis vindicare sufficiam. Quòd si est, qui contemni hæc satiùs arbitretur potuisse, fateor equidem, si apud eos qui nos rectè nôssent hæc spargerentur: cæteris qua tandem ratione constabit non esse verum quicquid adversarius noster est mentitus? cùm autem, data, quæ par est, opera, à nobis erit, ut quo præcessit calumnia, eodem vindex quoque veritas sequatur, et illos de nobis perperam sentire opinor desituros, et istum fortasse mendaciorum pudebit: si non puduerit, tum demùm, satiùs contempserimus. Huic interea responsum pro meritis celeriùs expedivissem, nisi se falsis rumoribus hactenus muniisset; dum sæpius denuntiaret, an incudem sudare Salmasium, nova volumina in nos fabricare, jam jamque editurum: ex quo hoc solum est consequutus, ut maledicentiæ pœnas aliquanto seriùs daret: expectandum enim duxi potiùs, ut potiori viribus adversario, integrum me servarem. Sed cum Salmasio debellatum jam puto mihi esse, utpote mortuo; et quemadmodum mortuo, non dicam: non enim ut ille mihi cæcitatem, sic ego illi mortem vitio vertam. Quanquam sunt, qui nos etiam necis ejus reos faciunt, illosque nostros nimis acriter strictos aculeos; quos dum repugnando altius sibi infixit, dum quod præ manibus habebat opus, vidit spissius procedere, tempus responsionis abiisse, operis gratiam periisse, recordatione amissæ famæ, existimationis, principum denique favoris, ob rem regiam malè defensam, erga se imminuti, triennali tandem mœstitia, et animi magis ægritudine, quàm morbo confectum obiisse. Utcunque sit, si iterum cum hoste satis mihi cognito, si bella etiam posthuma gerenda sunt, cujus feroces ac strenuos impetus facilè sustinui, ejus languentes et moribundos conatus non est ut reformidem.

Nunc verò ad hoc quicquid est hominis, qui nos inclamat, aliquando veniamus: clamorem quidem audio, non regii sanguinis, ut præ se fert titulus, sed obscuri cujuspiam nebulonis; clamantem enim nusquam reperio. Eho! quis es? homone an nemo? hominum certè infimi, nè mancipia quidem, sine nomine sunt. Semperne ergò mihi cum anonymis res erit? at verò hi regios haberi se vel maximè volunt: miror si regibus sic persuaserint. Regum sequaces atque amicos regum non pudet; quo pacto igitur sunt isti regibus amici? non dant munera; immo verò libentiùs multò accipiunt: res suas non impendunt, qui ne nomina quidem causæ regiæ dare audent: quid ergò? verba dant, sed nec verba gratìs dare suis regibus, vel satis benevoli in animum inducunt, vel satìs constantes nomine adscripto audent. Me quidem, ὦ ἄνδρες ἀνώνυμοι, fas enim sit Græcè quos Latinè quid nominem non reperio, me inquam, cùm vester ille Claudius de jure regio, materia sanè gratiosissima, sine nomine tamen orsus esset scribere, et exemplo possem uti, usque adeò neque mei, neque causæ puditum est, ut ad rem tantam accedere, nisi nomen palàm professus, turpe ducerem. Quid ego in republica palàm videor contra reges, cur vos in regno, vel regum sub patrocinio, non nisi furtim et clanculum, contra rempublicam audetis? cur in tuto pavidi, cur in luce nocturni, summam potentiam, summam gratiam, timiditate invidiosa planè atque suspecta obscuratis? satisne vobis ut præsidii sit in regibus veremini? sic tecti, sic obvoluti non vos mehercule ad asserendum jus regium defensores, sed ad ærarium compilandum fures potiùs videmini venisse. Equidem quod sum, profiteor; quod regibus nego jus esse, vel in regno quovis legitimo pernegare ausim: nemo me læserit monarcha, quin se priùs damnet, tyrannum fassus. Si tyrannos insector, quid hoc ad reges? quos ego à tyrannis longissimè sejungo. Quantum à viro malo distat vir bonus, tantundem à tyranno discrepare regem contendo: unde efficitur, tyrannum non modò non esse regem, sed regi quidem adversissimum semper imminere. Et sanè qui monumenta rerum percurrit, plures à tyrannis quàm à populo oppressos reges, atque sublatos inveniet. Qui igitur tollendos affirmat tyrannos, non reges, sed inimicissimos regibus, immo infestissimos regum hostes tollendos affirmat. Vos contrà, quod regibus jus datis, ut quicquid libeat jus sit, non est jus, sed injuria, sed scelus, sed ipsa pernicies: venenato isto munere, non salutari, quos supra omnem vim atque periculum fore prædicatis, eos ipsi occiditis; regem et tyrannum idem esse, siquidem idem utrobique jus est, statuitis. Nam si isto suo jure, rex non utitur (utetur autem nunquam quamdiu rex, non tyrannus, erit) non hoc regi, sed viro assignandum est. Quid autem absurdius illo jure regio fingi queat, quo si quis utatur, quoties rex vult esse, toties esse vir bonus desinat; quoties vir esse bonus maluerit, toties se arguerit non esse regem? quo quid in reges dici contumeliosius potest? Hoc jus qui docet, ipse sit oportet injustissimus, atque omnium pessimus: pejor autem quo pacto fiat, quàm si quales format ac fingit alios, talis ipse imprimis fuerit? Quòd si omnis vir bonus, ut antiquorum secta quædam magnificè sanè philosophatur, est rex, pari ratione sequitur, omnem virum malum pro suo quemque modulo tyrannum esse: neque enim magnum, nè hoc nomine intumescat, sed infimum quiddam est tyrannus; et quantò omnium maximus, tantò omnium vilissimus, et maximè servilis. Alii enim suis tantum vitiis volentes serviunt; hic non modò suis, sed ministrorum etiam atque satellitum importunissimis flagitiis etiam nolens cogitur servire; et suas quasdam tyrannides abjectissimo cuique suorum concedere: tyranni igitur servorum infimi, suis serviunt etiam servitiis. Quamobrem rectè hoc nomen vel in minimum quemque tyrannorum pugilem, vel in hunc etiam clamatorem poterit convenire; qui in hac causa tyrannica cur tam strenuè vociferetur, ex his quæ dicta sunt, quæque mox dicentur, satis liquebit: uti etiam cur anonymus: aut enim turpiter conductus, clamorem hunc suum regio sanguini, Salmasium sequutus, vendidit; aut infamis doctrinæ conscientia pallens, aut vita flagitiosus ac turpis, latere si cupit, mirum non est: aut fortassis ità se parat, ut sicubi spem quæstûs uberiorem odoretur, desertis quandoque regibus integrum sibi sit, ad quamlibet etiam futuram rempublicam transfugere; nè tunc quidem sine exemplo magni sui Salmasii, qui affulgente lucro captus, ab orthodoxis ad episcopos, à popularibus ad regios, etiam senex defecit. Tu igitur iste è gurgustio clamator, qui sis non fallis; frustrà tibi ista latibula quæsisti: extrahêre mihi crede, neque Plutonis ista galea diutiùs te teget: dejerabis, quoad vixeris, me aut cæcum non esse, aut tibi saltem non connivere. Quis igitur sit, quod genus hominis, qua spe adductus, quibus illecebris, quibus lenociniis delinitus, ad hanc causam regiam accesserit, (Milesia propemodum, aut Baiana fabula est,) si vacat nunc audite.

Est "Morus" quidam, partim Scotus, partim Gallus; nè tota hominis infamia, gens una, aut regio nimiùm laboraret; homo improbus, et cum aliorum, tum, quod gravissimum est, amicorum, quos ex intimis inimicissimos sibi fecit, testimoniis quamplurimis infidus, mendax, ingratus, maledicus, et virorum perpetuus obtrectator et fœminarum, quarum nec pudicitiæ plus unquam parcere, quàm famæ consuevit. Is, ut primæ ætatis obscuriora prætercam, primùm Genevæ Græcas literas docuit; verum, sæpius licèt nomen suum Græcè Morum discipulis interpretatus, stultum et nequam ipse dediscere nequivit; quin eo potius furore est agitatus cùm tot scelerum esset sibi conscius, quamvis fortasse nondum compertus, ut pastoris in ecclesia munus ambire, atque istis moribus inquinare non horresceret. Verùm haud diu presbyterorum censuram effugere potuit, mulierarius ac vanus, multisque aliis criminibus notatus, multis ab orthodoxa fide erroribus damnatus, quos et turpiter ejuravit, et ejuratos impiè retinuit, tandem adulterii manifestus. Hospitis ancillam quandam fortè adamaverat; eam paulò pòst etiam alteri nuptam sectari non destitit; tuguriolum quoddam intrare hortuli, solum cum sola, vicini sæpe animadverterant. Citra adulterium, inquis; poterat enim quidvis aliud: sanè quidem; poterat confabulari, nimirum de re hortensi, prælectiones quasdam suas sciolæ fortasse fœminæ et audiendi cupidæ expromere de hortis, Alcinoi putà vel Adonidis; poterat nunc areolas laudare, umbram tantummodo desiderare, liceret modò ficui morum inserere, complures indè sycomoros quàm citissimè enasci, ambulationem amœnissimam; modum deinde insitionis mulieri poterat monstrare: hæc et plura poterat, quis negat? Veruntamen presbyteris satisfacere non poterat, quin illum tanquam adulterum censura ferirent, et pastoris munere indignum prorsus judicarent: harum et hujusmodi accusationum capita in bibliotheca illius urbis publica etiamnum asservantur. Interea, dum hæc palàm nota non essent, ab ecclesia, quæ Middleburgi erat Gallica, procurante Salmasio, in Hollandiam vocatus, magna cum offensione Spanhemii, viri sanè docti, et pastoris integerrimi, qui eum Genevæ antea probè noverat, literas testimoniales, quas vocant, dum alii non ferendum existimarent, ut homo istiusmodi ecclesiæ testimonio ornaretur, alii quidvis potiùs ferendum, quàm ipsum hominem, ægrè à Genevensibus, et non alia quàm sui discessûs conditione, atque illas quidem frigidulas, tandem impetravit. In Hollandiam ut venit, ad salutandum Salmasium profectus, domi ejus in uxoris ancillam, cui Pontiæ nomen erat, oculos nequiter conjecit: semper enim in ancillis prolabitur libido hominis; hinc summa assiduitate Salmasium cœpit colere, et quoties licuit Pontiam. Nescio an ille commoditate hominis et assentatione captus, an hic optabilem excogitasse se conveniendæ eo sæpius Pontiæ occasionem ratus, prior sermones injecerit de responso Miltonii ad Salmasium. Utut fuit, Morus propugnandum suscipit Salmasium: et Salmasius quidem theologicam in ea urbe cathedram sua opera pollicetur Moro; Morus et hanc et aliud insuper suaviculum, furtivos Pontiæ concubitus pollicetur sibi. Per causam consulendi de hoc opere Salmasium, dies ac noctes eam domum frequentat. Jámque ut olim Pyramus in morum, ita nunc repente morus in Pyramum transmutatus sibi videtur, Genevensis in Babylonium; verùm illo juvene quantò improbior, tantò fortunatior, nunc suam Thisben, facta sub eodem tecto copia, ut libitum est, Pontiam alloquitur; rimam in pariete conquirere opus non erat: spondet matrimonium; ea spe pellectam vitiat; eodemque scelere, horreo dicere, sed dicendum est, sacrosancti evangelii minister, hospitalem etiam domum constuprat. Ex hoc demum congressu, mirum quiddam, et præter solitum naturæ prodigiosum accidit, ut et fœmina et mas etiam conciperet, Pontia quidem Morillum, quod et Plinianum exercitatorem diu postea exercuit Salmasium; Morus ovum hoc irritum et ventosum, ex quo tympanites iste clamor regii sanguinis prorupit. Quod quidem primò regiis nostris in Belgio esurientibus pergrata admodum sorbitio fuit; nunc rupto putamine, vitiosum ac putridum repertum aversantur. Nam Morus hoc suo fœtu haud mediocriter inflatus, et Arausiacam factionem totam demeruisse se sentiens, jam integras professionum cathedras spe improba devoraverat, et suam Pontiam utpote ancillam et pauperculam, jam gravidam sceleratus deseruerat. Illa despectam se atque delusam querens, et synodi fidem et magistratûs imploravit. Sic tandem evulgata hæc res, et conviviis penè omnibus, ac circulis diu risum et cachinnos præbuit. Unde aliquis, et lepidi sanè, quisquis erat, ingenii, hoc distichon,

> Galli ex concubitu gravidam te, Pontia, Mori,
> Quis bene moratam, morigeramque neget?

Sola Pontia non risit; sed nec querendo quicquam profecit; clamor enim regii sanguinis clamorem stupri, et stupratæ mulierculæ ploratum facilè obruerat; Salmasius quoque illatam sibi hanc totique familiæ et injuriam et labem ægrè ferens, seque ab amico et laudatore suo sic ludos factum, sic adversario rursus obnoxium, accedente ad priores ejus in causa regia infelicitates forsitan hoc etiam infortunio, haud ità multò pòst supremum diem obiit. Verùm aliquantò hæc posteriùs. Interim Salmasius, Salmacidis quodam fato, ut enim nomen, ità et fabula non abludit, nescius hermaphroditum se adjunxisse sibi Morum tam gignendi quàm pariendi compotem, quid is domì genuisset ignarus, quod peperit exosculatur; librum nempe istum in quo sentit se Magnum toties dici, et suo fortè judicio dignè, aliorum certè stultè atque ridiculè laudatum. Itaque typographum festinanter quærit; et fugientem ab se jamdiu famam, retinere frustrà conatus, quas laudes, quas potiùs fœdas suî adulationes per hunc atque alios miserè concupiverat, iis etiam divulgandis obstetricatur ipse atque subservit. Ad hanc operam Vlaccus quidam est visus omnium maximè idoneus; huic facilè persuadet, non modò ut librum illum excudendum curaret, quod nemo reprehendisset; sed etiam ut epistolæ ad Carolum videlicet missæ, multis in me, qui hominem nunquam nôram, probris et contumeliis refertæ, subscripto nomine se profiteretur authorem. Nequis igitur miretur cur se exorari tam facilè sit passus, ut me tam impudenter nulla de causa lacesseret, et alienas etiam intemperies in se transferre atque præstare tam pro nihilo duceret, erga omnes etiam alios quemadmodum se gesserit, sicuti ego compertum habeo, ostendam. Est Vlaccus unde gentium nescio, vagus quidam librariolus, veterator atque decoctor notissimus; is Londini aliquandiu bibliopola fuit clancularius; qua ex urbe, post innumeras fraudes, obæratus aufugit. Eundem Parisiis fide cassum et malè agendo insignem, vita tota Jacobæa cognovit: unde olim quoque profugus nè multis quidem parasangis audet appropinquare; nunc si cui opus est balatrone perditissimo atque venali, prostat Hagæcomitis typographus recoctus. Nunc ut intelligatis, quid dicat, quidve agat, quàm nihil pensi habeat, nihil esse tam sanctum, quod non lucro vel exiguo posterius putet, seque non causa publica, quod quis putàsset, sic in me esse debacchatum, fatentem ipsum in se testem producam. Is cum vidisset quod in Salmasium scripseram, nonnullis librariis æra meruisse, scribit ad amicos quosdam meos mecum agerent, ut siquid haberem excudendum, sibi committeretur; se typis longè melioribus, quàm qui priùs excudisset, mandaturum: respondi per eosdem, non habere me in præsentia, quod excuso esset opus. Ecce autem! cui suam operam tam officiosè modò detulerat, in eum haud ita multò post, scripti contumeliosissimi non excusor solum sed et author, subdititius licèt, prodit. Indignantur amici; rescribit impudentissimus, mirari se simplicitatem eorum, et rerum imperitiam, qui officii rationem aut honesti ab se exigant aut desiderent, cùm videant quibus rebus quæstum faciat: se ab ipso Salmasio illam epistolam, cum libro accepisse; qui rogabat, id utì sua gratia, vellet facere quod fecit; si Miltonio, vel cuivis alteri visum esset respondere, nullum sibi esse scrupulum; siquidem eadem sua opera uti voluerint: id est, vel in Salmasium vel in Carolum; namque id erat solum quod in responso ejusmodi futurum expectare poterat. Quid plura? Hominem videtis; ad reliquos nunc pergo, non enim unus est duntaxat, qui hanc in nos regii clamoris quasi tragœdiam adornavit. En igitur initio, ut solet, dramatis personæ: clamor prologus, Vlaccus balatro, aut si mavultis, Salmasius Vlacci balatronis persona et lacernis involutus, duo poetastri cerevisiali vappa temulenti, Morus adulter et stuprator. Mirificos sanè tragœdos! bellum certamen mihi paratum! Verùm qualescunque sortiti, quoniam alios atque hujusmodi adversarios vix est ut causa nostra habere possit, nunc singulos aggrediamur; hoc tantùm præfati, si cui minus gravitatis nostra alicubi refutatio habere videbitur, cogitare eum debere, non cum gravi adversario, sed cum grege histrionico, nobis rem esse; ad quem dum refutationis genus accommodandum erat, non semper quid magis decuisset, sed quid illis dignum esset, spectandum duximus.

Siquidem non jure fusum ostendisses, More, istum sànguinem, haud incredibile narrares: nunc, quemadmodum primis restituti evangelii temporibus, monachi, cùm argumentis minùs valerent, ad spectra nescio quæ, et ficta monstra decurrere solebant; sic vos, postquam omnia defecere, ad clamores nusquam auditos, et obsoletas fraterculorum artes revertimini. Voces è cœlo audire quemquam nostrorum, longè abest ut credas; ego te clamores ab inferis audisse, quod postulas, facilè crediderim. Verùm hunc regii sanguinis clamorem die sodes quis audivit? Te aïs: nugæ: primùm enim male audis: ad cœlum autem qui clamor perveniat, si quis præter Deum, justi puto soli et integerrimi quique audiunt, ut qui possint, immunes ipsi, iram Dei conseiis denuntiare. Tu verò quorsum audires, an ut satyram cinædus scriberes? Videris enim eodem tempore, et ementitus hunc clamorem ad cœlum, et cum Pontia furtim libidinatus esse. Multa te impediunt, More, multa, intus forisque circumsonant, quæ te res istiusmodi ad cœlum perlatas audire non sinunt; et si nihil aliud, certè qui contra ipsum te ad cœlum quam plurimus fit clamor. Clamat contra te, si nescis, mœcha illa tua hortensis, tuo maximè pastoris sui exemplo, deceptam se esse questa; clamat contra te maritus, cujus torum violasti; clamat Pontia, cui partum nuptiale temerasti; clamat, siquis est, quem probro genitum, infantulum abdicasti; horum omnium clamores ad cœlum contra te, si non audis, neque illum regii sanguinis audiveris: interea libellus iste, non regii sanguinis clamor ad cœlum, sed lascivientis Mori hinnitus ad Pontiam, rectius inscribetur. Quæ sequitur epistola, prolixa quidem, et bene putida, partim Carolo, partim Miltonio, alteri amplificando, alteri infamando, dedicatur. Ab ipso statim initio authorem discite: "Caroli regna," inquit, "in sacrilegam parricidarum, et (quia verba desunt idonea, Tertullianæa voce abutimur) Deicidarum potestatem venerunt." Hæc sive Salmasiæa, sive Moræa, sive Vlaccæa sartago sit, prætereamus. Hoc verò aliis ridendum, Carolo indignandum profectò est, quod paulò post, "neminem," ait, "vivere felicitatis Caroli studiosiorem." Quine eandem et epistolandi, et excudendi operam Caroli hostibus detulisti, te vivit nemo felicitatis ejus studiosior? Miserum profectò dicis regem sic ab amicis omnibus derelictum, ut qui intimi restant, iis vappa typographus comparare se audeat. Miserrimum, cujus fidelissimis, Vlaccus perfidus fide ac studio non cedat: quo quid insolentius de se, contemptius de rege amicisque regiis pronunciare potuit? Neque hoc minùs ridiculum, induci idiotam et operarium de rebus gravissimis ac regiis virtutibus philosophantem, eaque dicentem, qualiacunque sunt, quibus nec Salmasius ipse, nec Morus meliora dixisset. Equidem Salmasium, ut sæpe aliàs, ità hoc loco haud obscurè, si multa lectione, judicio tamen puerili et nullius usûs hominem deprehendi; qui cùm legere potuisset summos in Spartana civitate optimè instituta magistratus, si quid fortè viro malo excidisset sapienter dictum, id ei adimi jussisse, et in virum aliquem bonum ac frugi sortitione conferri, adeò id omne quod decorum dicitur ignorârit, ut è contra, quas probum atque prudentem decere sententias arbitraretur, eas homini nequissimo attribui sustineret. Bono es animo, Carole: veterator Vlaccus, "quæ sua est in Deum fiducia," bono animo te esse jubet. "Noli tot mala perdere:" Vlaccus decoctor perditissimus, qui bona omnia, siqua habuit, perdidit, author tibi est, perdere ut nolis mala: "Fruere novercante fortuna:" potin'es ut nè fruare, hortatore præsertim tali, qui alienis etiam fortunis frui per fas et nefas tot annis consuevit? "In sapientiam penitùs ingurgitasti, et ingurgita:" sic monet, sic præcipit regum institutor sanè optimus Vlaccus gurges, qui arrepta atramentosis manibus, coriacea lagena, inter combibones operas, ingenti haustu, sapientiam tibi propinat. Hæc audet tuus Vlaccus, tam præclara monita, nomine etiam conscripto, quæ Salmasius, quæ Morus, cæterique pugiles tui aut timidi non audent, aut superbi non dignantur; nimirum quoties te monito est opus aut defenso, alieno semper nomine, atque periculo, non suo, sapientes aut fortes sunt. Desinat ergò, quisquis hic est, "strenuam et animosam facundiam" ipse suam inaniter jactare; dum "vir," si diis placet, "insignis, decoro ingenio nomen suum celeberrimum" edere metuit; librum quo regium sanguinem ulcisci se ait, ne dicare quidem Carolo nisi per Vlaccum interpretem et vicarium ausus, verbis typographi miserè contentus significare, "librum" se, sine nomine, "si pateris, O rex, tuo nomini dicatum ire." Sic functus Carolo in me impetum parat minitabundus: "Post hæc prooemia, tubam terribilem inflabit ὁ Θαυμάσιος "ille Salmasius." Salubritatem prædicis et concentûs musici novum genus futurum: isti enim tubæ terribili, cùm inflabitur, nulla aptior excogitari symphonia poterit, quàm si affatim oppedetur. Buccam verò Salmasius nimis inflatam ne afferat moneo: quo enim attulerit inflatiorem, eò mihi crede, opportuniorem ad colaphos præbebit; qui thaumasii Salmasii rhythmicum hunc sonum, quo delectaris, buccis ambabus resonantibus, numerose reddent. Pergis cornicari. "Qui nec parem nec secundum habet, in universo literarum et scientiarum orbe." Vestram fidem! Eruditi, quotquot estis, vestram fidem! Siccine vobis omnibus anteferri cimicem grammaticum, cujus res atque spes omnis in glossario vertebatur? Quem vel extremum meritò occupet scabies, si cum viris verè doctis comparetur. Hæc autem, nisi ab infimo quopiam et infra Vlaccum ipsum væcorde affirmari tam fatuè nequiverunt. "Quique jam stupendam et infinitam eruditionem cœlesti junctam ingenio ad causam tuæ majestatis contulit." Si meministis quod suprà narravi, ipsum Salmasium attulisse hanc epistolam cum libro excudendam, vel ab ipso scriptam, vel ab anonymo quovis, vernamque typographum exorasse, ut quod author nollet, ipse suum nomen adscriberet, cognoscetis profectò pusilli omnino, et abjectissimi hominem ingenii suis laudibus tam miserè velificantem, et immensa encomia tam stolidi laudatoris aucupantem. "Opus æternum frustrà sugillantibus nonnullis, jurisconsulti mirari satis nequeunt quòd homo Gallus ità subitò res Anglicas, leges, decreta, instrumenta, ità teneat, enodet, &c." Immo quàm ineptierit in nostris legibus et psittacus fuerit, nostris etiam jurisconsultis testibus, abunde ostendimus. "Sed ipse mox altera, quam in rebelles molitur, impressione, simul Theonum ora comprimet, simul Miltonum nobis pro eo ac meretur concastigatum dabit." Tu igitur ut pisciculus ille anteambulo, præcurris balænam Salmasium, impressiones in hæc littora minitantem; nos ferramenta acuimus, expressuri si quid habent impressiones et concastigationes illæ sive olei sive gari. Bonitatem interea magni viri mirabimur plusquam Pythagoricam, qui animalia quoque miseratus, et præsertim pisces, quorum carnibus, ne quadragesima quidem parcit, iis tam decenter involvendis tot volumina destinârit, tot pauperum millibus, thunnorum, credo, aut scombrorum, chartaceas in singulos tunicas testamento legarit.

> Gaudete scombri, et quicquid est piscium salo,
> Qui frigida hyeme incolitis algentes freta,
> Vestrûm misertus ille Salmasius eques
> Bonus amicire nuditatem cogitat;
> Chartæque largus apparat papyrinos
> Vobis cucullos præferentes Claudii
> Insignia nomenque et decus Salmasii,
> Gestetis ut per omne cetarium forum
> Equitis clientes, scriniis mungentium
> Cubito virorum, et capsulis gratissimos.

Hæc habui in editionem diu exspectatam tam nobilis libri; cujus impressionem, dum, ut ais, molitur Salmasius, tu ejus domum, More, fœdissima compressione Pontiæ contaminasti. Et videtur sanè, ad hoc opus absolvendum, Salmasius diu multumque incubuisse; paucis enim ante mortem diebus, cùm vir quidam doctus, à quo hoc ipsum accepi, misisset, qui ex eo quæreret, ecquando apparatûs partem secundam in primatum papæ editurus esset, respondit, ad illud opus non ante reversurum se, quàm absolvisset quod adhuc commentaretur adversùs Miltonium. Ità ego etiam papæ refutandus præferor; et quem illi primatum in ecclesia negavit, eum mihi ultro in inimicitia sua concedit; sic ego primatui papæ jam jam evertendo salutem attuli; ego redivivum hunc Catilinam, non in toga, ut consul olim Tullius, nè per somnum quidem, sed aliud omnino agens, Romanis mœnibus averti; non unus profectò cardinalatus mihi hoc nomine debebitur; vereor, nè translato in me regum nostrorum titulo, defensor fidei ab Romano pontifice appellandus sim. Videtis quantus invidiæ artifex in me concitandæ Salmasius fuerit; verùm ipse viderit, qui, tam honesta provincia turpiter relicta, alienis se controversiis immiscuerit, ab ecclesiæ causa, ad civiles et externas, quarum sua nihil interesset, se traduxerit; cum papa inducias fecerit; et, quod fœdissimum fuit, cum episcopis, post bellum apertissimum, in gratiam redierit. Veniamus nunc ad mea crimina: estne quod in vita aut moribus reprehendat? Certè nihil: Quid ergo? Quod nemo nisi immanis ac barbarus fecisset, formam mihi ac cæcitatem objectat.

Nunquam existimabam equidem fore, ut de forma cum Cyclope certamen mihi esset; verùm statim se revocat. "Quanquam nec ingens, quo nihil est exilius, exsanguius, contractius." Tametsi virum nihil attinet de forma dicere, tandem quando hìc quoque est, unde gratias Deo agam, et mendaces redarguam, nè quis (quod Hispanorum vulgus de hæreticis, quos vocant, plus nimio sacerdotibus suis credulum, opinatur) me fortè cynocephalum quempiam, aut rhinocerota esse putet, dicam. Deformis quidem à nemine, quod sciam, qui modò me vidit, sum unquam habitus; formosus necne, minùs laboro; statura fateor non sum procera: sed quæ mediocri tamen quàm parvæ propior sit: sed quid si parva, qua et summi sæpe tum pace tum bello viri fuere, quanquam parva cur dicitur, quæ ad virtutem satis magna est. Sed neque exilis admodum, eo sanè animo iisque viribus ut cùm ætas vitæque ratio sic ferebat, nec ferrum tractare, nec stringere quotidiano usu exercitatus nescirem; eo accinctus, ut plerumque eram, cuivis vel multò robustiori exæquatum me putabam, securus quid mihi quis injuriæ vir viro inferre posset. Idem hodie animus, eædem vires, oculi non iidem; ità tamen extrinsecus illæsi, ità sine nube clari ac lucidi, ut eorum qui acutissimum cernunt: in hac solùm parte, memet invito, simulator sum. In vultu, quo "nihil exsanguius" esse dixit, is manet etiamnum color exsangui et pallenti planè contrarius, ut quadragenario major vix sit cui non denis prope annis videar natu minor; neque corpore contracto neque cute. In his ego si ulla ex parte mentior, multis millibus popularium meorum, qui de facie me nôrunt, exteris etiam non paucis, ridiculus meritò sim: sin iste in re minimè necessaria, tàm impudenter et gratuitò mendax comperietur, poteritis de reliquo eandem conjecturam facere. Atque hæc de forma mea vel coactus: de tua quanquam et contemptissimam accepi, et habitantis in te improbitatis atque malitiæ vivam imaginem, neque ego dicere, neque ullus audire curat. Utinam de cæcitate pariter liceret inhumanum hunc refellere adversarium; sed non licet; feramus igitur: non est miserum esse cæcum; miserum est cæcitatem non posse ferre: quidni autem feram, quod unumquemque ità parare se oportet, ut si acciderit, non ægrè ferat, quod et humanitus accidere cuivis mortalium, et præstantissimis quibusdam, atque optimis omni memoria viris accidisse sciam: sive illos memorem, vetustatis ultimæ priscos vates, ac sapientissimos; quorum calamitatem, et dii, ut fertur, multò potioribus donis compensârunt, et homines eo honore affecerunt, ut ipsos inculpare maluerint deos, quàm cæcitatem illis crimini dare. De augure Tiresia quod traditur, vulgò notum. De Phineo sic cecinit Apollonius in Argonauticis:

——'Ουδ' ὅσσον ὀπίζετο καὶ Διὸς ἀυτοῦ
Χρειον ἀτρεκέως ἱερὸν νόον ἀνθρώποισι.
Τῷ καὶ οἱ γῆρας μὲν ἐπὶ δηναιὸν ἴαλλεν
'Εκ δ' ἕλετ' ὀφθαλμῶν γλυκερὸν φάος.

——neque est veritus Jovem ipsum
Edens veraciter mentem divinam hominibus.
Quare et senectam ei diuturnam dedit,
Eripuit autem oculorum dulce lumen.

Cæterum Deus et ipse veritas est: in qua homines edocenda quò quis veracior eò similior Deo acceptiorque sit, oportet. Non est pium veritatis invidentem Deum credere; aut nolle hominibus quàm liberrimè impertitam: ob nullam igitur noxam, divinus vir, et humani generis erudiendi studiosissimus, ut philosophorum etiam complures, caruisse luminibus videtur. Sive illos commemorem civili prudentia gestisque rebus admirabiles olim viros; primùm Timoleontem Corinthium, et civitatis suæ, et Siciliæ totius liberatorem; quo virum meliorem, aut in republica sanctiorem, nulla ætas tulit; tum Appium Claudium, cujus in senatu pulchrè dicta sententia, Italiam Pyrrho, gravi hoste, seipsum cæcitate non liberavit; tum Cæcilium Metellum pontificem, qui non urbem solùm, sed et fatum urbis Palladium, et penitissima sacra dum ab incendio servavit, suos oculos perdidit; quanquam aliàs certè Deus pietati tam egregiæ favere se, etiam inter gentes, testatus est: quod tali igitur viro usu venit, ponendum in malis esse vix putem. Quid alios recentiorum temporum adjungam, vel illum Venetiarum principem Dandulum longè omnium præstantissimum; vel Boëmorum Ziscam ducem fortissimum, orthodoxæ fidei propugnatorem? Quid summi nominis theologos Hieronymum Zanchium, nonnullosque alios? cum et ipsum Isaacum patriarcham, quo nemo unquam mortalium Deo charior fuit, annos haud paucos, cæcum vixisse constet; aliquot fortasse Jacobum etiam ejus filium, et ipsum Deo haud minùs dilectum: cùm denique Christi servatoris nostri divino testimonio compertissimum sit, illum hominem ab se sanatum, neque ob suum, neque ob parentum suorum aliquod peccatum, etiam ab utero cæcum fuisse. Ad me quod attinet, te testor, Deus, mentis intimæ, cogitationumque omnium indagator, me nullius rei, (quanquam hoc apud me sæpius, et quàm maximè potui, seriò quæsivi et recessus vitæ omnes excussi,) nullius vel recèns vel olim commissi, mihimet conscium esse, cujus atrocitas hanc mihi præ cæteris calamitatem creare, aut accersisse meritò potuerit. Quod etiam ullo tempore scripsi (quoniam hoc nunc me luere quasi piaculum regii existimant atque adeò triumphant) testor itidem Deum, me nihil istiusmodi scripsisse, quod non rectum et verum, Deoque gratum esse, et persuaserim tum mihi, et etiamnum persuasus sim; idque nulla ambitione, lucro, aut gloria ductus; sed officii, sed honesti, sed pietatis in patriam ratione sola; nec reipublicæ tantùm, sed ecclesiæ quoque liberandæ causa potissimùm fecisse: adeò ut cùm datum mihi publicè esset illud in defensionem regiam negotium, eodemque tempore et adversa simul valetudine, et oculo jam penè altero amisso, conflictarer, prædicerentque disertè medici, si hunc laborem suscepissem, fore, ut utrumque brevì amitterem, nihil ista præmonitione deterritus, non medici, nè Æsculapii quidem Epidaurii ex adyto vocem, sed divinioris cujusdam intus monitoris viderer mihi audire; duasque sortes, fatali quodam natu, jam mihi propositas, hinc cæcitatem, indè officium; aut oculorum jacturam necessariò faciendam, aut summum officium deserendum: occurrebantque animo bina illa fata, quæ retulisse Delphis consulentem de se matrem, narrat Thetidis filius.

Εἰ μέν κ' αὖθι μένων Τρώων πόλιν ἀμφιμάχωμαι,
Ὤλετο μέν μοι νόστος· ἀτὰρ κλέος ἄφθιτον ἔσται.
Εἰ δέ κεν οἴκαδ' ἵκωμαι φίλην ἐς πατρίδα γαῖαν,
Ὤλετό μοι κλέος ἐσθλόν ἐπὶ δηρὸν δέ μοι αἰὼν
Ἔσσεται.——

Iliad. 9.

Duplicia fata ducere ad mortis finem:
Si hic manens circa Troüm urbem pugnavero,
Amittitur mihi reditus; sed gloria immortalis erit:
Si domum revertor dulce ad patrium solum,
Amittitur mihi gloria pulchra, sed diuturna vita
Erit.——

Unde sic mecum reputabam, multos graviore malo minus bonum, morte gloriam, redemisse; mihi contrà majus bonum minore cum malo proponi: ut possem cum cæcitate sola vel honestissimum officii munus implere; quod ut ipsa gloria per se est sŏlidius, ità cuique optatius atque antiquius debet esse. Hac igitur tam brevi luminum usura, quanta maxima quivi cum utilitate publica, quoad liceret, fruendum esse statui. Videtis quid prætulerim, quid amiserim, qua inductus ratione: desinant ergò judiciorum Dei calumniatores maledicere, deque me somnia sibi fingere: sic denique habento; me sortis meæ neque pigere neque pœnitere; immotum atque fixum in sententia perstare; Deum iratum neque sentire, neque habere, immò maximis in rebus clementiam ejus et benignitatem erga me paternam experiri atque agnoscere; in hoc præsertim, quòd solante ipso atque animum confirmante in ejus divina voluntate acquiescam; quid is largitus mihi sit quàm quid negaverit sæpius cogitans: postremò nolle me cum suo quovis rectissimè facto, facti mei conscientiam permutare, aut recordationem ejus gratam mihi semper atque tranquillam deponere. Ad cæcitatem denique quod attinet, malle me, si necesse est, meam, quàm vel suam, More, vel tuam. Vestra imis sensibus immersa, nequid sani videatis aut solidi, mentem obcæcat: mea, quam objicitis, colorem tantummodo rebus et superficiem demit; quod verum ac stabile in iis est contemplationi mentis non adimit. Quàm multa deinde sunt quæ videre nollem, quàm multa quæ possem libens non videre, quàm pauca reliqua sunt quæ videre cupiam. Sed neque ego cæcis, afflictis, mœrentibus, imbecillis, tametsi vos id miserum ducitis, aggregari me discrutior; quandoquidem spes est, eo me propiùs ad misericordiam summi patris atque tutelam pertinere. Est quoddam per imbecillitatem, præeunte Apostolo, ad maximas vires iter: sim ego debilissimus, dummodo in mea debilitate immortalis ille et melior vigor eo se efficaciùs exerat; dummodo in meis tenebris divini vultûs lumen eo clariùs eluceat; tum enim infirmissimus ero simul et validissimus, cæcus eodem tempore et perspicacissimus; hac possim ego infirmitate consummari, hac perfici, possim in hac obscuritate sic ego irradiari. Et sanè haud ultima Dei cura cæci sumus; qui nos, quò minus quicquam aliud præter ipsum cernere valemus, eò clementiùs atque benigniùs respicere dignatur. Væ qui illudit nos, væ qui lædit, execratione publica devovendo; nos ab injuriis hominum non modò incolumes, sed penè sacros, divina lex reddidit, divinus favor; nec tam oculorum hebetudine, quàm cœlestium alarum umbra has nobis fecisse tenebras videtur, factas illustrare rursus interiore ac longe præstabiliore lumine haud raro solet. Huc refero, quòd et amici officiosiùs nunc etiam quàm solebant, colunt, observant, adsunt; quòd et nonnulli sunt, quibuscum Pyladeas atque Theseas alternare voces verorum amicorum liceat.

Non enim hoc casu factum me omnino nullum; non quicquid est probi aut cordati hominis, positum in oculis putant esse. Quin et summi quoque in republica viri, quandoquidem non otio torpentem me, sed impigrum et summa discrimina pro libertate inter primos adeuntem oculi deseruerunt, ipsi non deserunt; verùm humana qualia sint, secum reputantes, tanquam emerito favent, indulgent, vacationem atque otium faciles concedunt; si quid est ornamenti, non detrahunt; si quid publici muneris, non adimunt; si quid ex ea re commodi, non minuunt; et quamvis non æquè nunc utilis, præbendum nihilo minùs benignè censent; eodem planè honore, ac si, ut olim Atheniensibus mos erat, in Prytaneo alendum decrevissent. Sic mihi et apud Deum et apud homines cæcitatem solari meam quandiu licuerit, amissos honesti causa oculos, nemo meos lugeat; absit quoque ut ipse lugeam, aut vel animi satis ut nè habeam quo cæcitatis convitiatores facilè possim contemnere, vel veniæ ut nè possim faciliùs condonare. Ad te, quisquis es, redeo, qui parùm tibi constans, nunc pumilionem me, nunc Antæum vis esse: "Non aliud" postremò optas "libentiùs fœderatis Belgii Provinciis, quàm ut tam facile, tamque feliciter defungantur, hoc bello, quàm defungetur Salmasius Miltonio." Cui ego voto facilè assensero, arbitror me nostris successibus reique Anglicanæ nec ominari malè nec malè precari.

En verò iterum clamorem, alienum quendam et stridulum! anseres puto aliciunde advolare: jam sentio quid sit; memini clamoris haud esse tragœdiam; prodit chorus: en duo poëtastri; vel duo vel unus, biformi sanè specie et bicolore; Sphingemne dicam an Horatianum illud monstrum Poëticum, capite muliebri, cervice asinina variis indutum plumis, undique collatis membris: id profectò ipsissimum est. Rhapsodus videlicet quispiam, centonibus et pannis obsitus; unusne an duo incertum, nam et Anonymus quoque est. Poëtas equidem verè dictos et diligo et colo, et audiendo sæpissimè delector; illorum etiam plerosque tyrannis esse scio inimicissimos, si vel à primis exorsus ad Buchananum usque nostrum recenserem: istos verò versiculorum nugivendos, quis non oderit? quo genere hominum nihil stultius, aut vanius, aut corruptius, aut mendacius. Laudant, vituperant, sine delectu, sine discrimine, judicio, aut modo, nunc principes, nunc plebeios, doctos juxtà atque indoctos, probos an improbos, perinde habent; prout Cantharus, aut spes nummuli, aut fatuus ille furor inflat ac rapit; congestris undique et verborum et rerum tot discoloribus ineptiis tamque putidis, ut laudatum longè præstet sileri, et pravo, quod aïunt, vivere naso, quàm sic laudari: vituperatus verò qui sit, haud mediocri sanè honori sibi ducat, se tam absurdis, tam stolidis nebulonibus displicere. Primus qui est, si modò bini sunt, dubito poëta sit an cæmentaris; ità Salmasio os oblinit, immo totum quasi parietem dealbat atque incrustat. Curru nempe "triumphantem" inducit, heroëm gigantomachum, "hastilia et cæstus," et nescio quæ nugamenta armorum vibrantem, doctos omnes pedibus quadrigam sequentes, sed post terga ejus innumeris spatiis relictos, utpote "quem numen rebus trepidis salutem orbis admoverit; tandem ergo tali tempus erat tegi umbone reges, parente" nimirum "juris et imperii." Delirus necesse est fuerit et bis puer Salmasius, qui his laudibus non solùm tantopere sibi placuerit, sed excudendas etiam quàm primùm de se tam sedulò curaverit: Misellus etiam poëta atque indecorus, qui grammaticum, quod genus hominum poëtis ministrum semper atque subserviens fuit, tam immodicis laudibus dignetur. Alter verò non versos facit, sed planè insanit enthusiastarum omnium quos tam rabidè insectatur, ipse amentissimus: hic Salmasii carnifex quasi sit, Syri damæ filius, Lorarios invocat et Cadmum; veratro deinde ebrius, totam, quicquid ubique est, servulorum et ballionum sentinam, ex Indice Plautino evomit; credas lingua Oscum non latinè loquentem, aut inferarum, quas natat, paludum coaxare ranam. Tum ut intelligatis, quantus sit iamborum artifex, duabus syllabis una in voce peccat, altera producta, altera perperam correpta.

Hi trucidato rege per horrendum nefas.

Aufer istas, asine, "vacivitatum" tuarum clitellas; et tria verba, si potes, sani ac sobrii tandem hominis affer; si tua ista cucurbita et "blennum caput" vel ad punctum temporis potest sapere: interea te ego puerorum "virgidemiis" tuis cædendum trado Orbilium. Tu mihi sic perge maledicere, ut "Cromuello pejor" tibi sim, qua nulla majore me laude afficere potuisti. Te verò benevolumne dicam, an stolidum, an hostem insidiosum? benevolus certè non es, verba enim hostem indicant; cur ergò tam stolidus fuisti vituperator, ut anteferre me tanto viro in buccam tibi venerit? ecquid tu non intelligis, an me putas non intelligere, quo graviora vestra in me esse odia ostenditis, eò vos ampliora mea in rempublicam merita prædicare, vestra tot opprobria, tot mea esse apud meos præconia? Nam si vos me omnium maximè odistis, sanè ego vos omnium maximè exulceravi, vos ego maximè afflixi, causæque vestræ nocui: id si ità est, idem ego de meis civibus optime quoque merui; hostis enim vel testimonium vel judicium, etsi aliàs leve admodùm, de suo tamen dolore longè est gravissimum. An poëta non meministi, cùm de Achillis mortui armis, Ajax et Ulysses contenderent, non Græcos populares sed Trojanos hostes ex sententia Nestoris judices datos?

Quapropter Trojanis permittamus prudentibus hanc litem judicandam.

Et paulò post,

Οἵ ρα δίκην ἰθεῖαν ἐπὶ σφίσι ποιήσονται,
Οὔ τινι ἦρα φέροντες, ἐπεὶ μάλα πάντας Ἀχαιοὺς
Ἶσον ἀπεχθαίρουσι κακῆς μεμνημένοι ἄτης.

Qui justum judicium de iis fecerint,
Nemini gratificantes, cùm vehementer omnes Achivos
Æquè oderint, mali memores damni.

Hæc Smyrnæus ille, sive Calaber. Insidiosus itaque sis oportet, meque in invidiam conjicere labores, qui quod judicium in hoste rectum atque sincerum esse solet, id dolo malo et graviùs lædendi animo corrumpis atque depravas, ita non vir modò, sed et hostis depravatissimus es. Verùm ego nullo negotio frustrabor te, vir bone; quanquam enim Ulyssem, id est, quàm optimè de patria meritum me esse sanè perquàm vellem, tamen Achilleïa arma non ambio; cœlum in clypeo pictum, quod alii, non ego, in certamine aspiciant, præferre, onus non pictum sed verum, humeris portare, quod ego, non alii sentiant, non quæro: equidem cùm nullas omnino simultates aut inimicitias ullo cum homine privatas geram, neque ullus, quod sciam, mecum gerat, tot in me maledicta jactari, tot probra torqueri, reipublicæ duntaxat causa, non mea, eo æquiore animo fero: nec præmii et commodorum inde provenientium, partem longè minimam, ignominiæ longè maximam pervenisse ad me queror; contentus quæ honesta factu sunt, ea propter se solùm appetisse, et gratis persequi: id alii viderint, tuque scito, me illas "opimitates" atque "opes," quas mihi exprobas, non attigisse, neque eo nomine quo maximè accusas, obolo factum ditiorem. Hic rursus infit Morus, et secunda epistola causas scribendi refert; cuinam? "Lectori Christiano" nempe mœchus et stuprator Morus salutem: piam sanè epistolam promittis; jam causas incipe. "Excitati sunt Europæarum gentium animi, maximè omnium Galli nostri reformati, ut parricidium et parricidas, &c. cognoscerent." Galli et ipsi reformati contra leges bella gesserunt; quid ulterius fuissent facturi, paribus usi rerum successibus, affirmari non potest: certè reges ipsorum, si qua earum rerum monumentis fides, ab illis haud minùs metuebant sibi, quàm à nobis noster: neque injuria, quoties meminissent quæ etiam illi scriptitarunt, et minati sæpe sunt: Nolint igitur, quicquid tu causare, splendidè nimis de se polliceri, iniquiùs de nobis sentire. Pergit in causis. "Equidem ea Anglorum melioris notæ consuetudine sum usus." Qui tibi sunt melioris notæ, viris bonis sunt pessimæ. "Ut ausim dicere me ista hominum monstra nosse intus et in cute." Putabam te mœchas tantummodo tuas et scorta; tu etiam monstra intus et in cute. "Ut nomen meum premerem, facile impetrarunt Angli quibuscum consuevi." Et astutè quidem illi: sic enim sperabant et se impudentia tua eò largiore fruituros, et te tua fama, etiam tum mala, eo minus causæ nociturum. Noverant enim te, et quàm esses olim bonus hortorum custos, et nunc rasus licèt et pumicatus sacerdos, ut à Pontia ne Pilata quidem abstinere manus potueris; nec de nihilo sanè, si enim à conficienda carne carnifex dictus putatur, cur minùs tu conficiendo Pontiam Pontifex factus ex sacerdote tibi videare? Hæc cùm de te non nescirent alii, cùm non posses ipse quin tibimet conscires, tamen incredibili, et execranda quadam impietate palam audes profiteri, te "Dei gloriam unice quærere, et vindicare:" et dum ipse turpissima quæris, simul accusare alios, quod "pietatis larvam criminibus imponant:" cùm id nemo manifestiùs ac sceleratiùs quàm tu ipse facis, unquam fecerit. "Ad rerum" aïs "gestarum seriem magno" tibi "fuisse adjumento cum alios scriptores tum maxime elenchum motuum nuperorum in Anglia." Næ tu ineptus homo es, qui tanto clamore facto, quod tuum sit nihil afferas; sed scriptores tantùm, regiis partibus addictos eoque meritò suspectos authores contra nos adducere potuisti, quorum fides si elevabitur, progredi nequeas. Nos igitur scriptores illos, si opus erit et elenchum elencho refutabimus, non illis per te, sed tibi per illos, cum visum erit respondebimus; tibi quæ de tuo protuleris, videndum interea, ut tueri queas; quæ cujusmodi sint, ab impio et planè atheo nomine professa, audiant nunc omnes pii et horrescant. "Jubet amor Dei, et injuriæ sancto ejus nomini factæ sensus acerrimus cogit supplices manus ad Deum attollere." Abde, abde obscœnas illas manus, quas libidine et ambitione supinatus attollere non vereris, nè cœlum ipsum quoque audeas iis manibus incestâre, quibus sacra religionis mysteria contrectando polluisti. Quam enim divinam ultionem aliis temerarius et væcors imprecaris, eam in ipsius tuum impurissimum caput devocasse te olim intelliges.

Hactenus clamoris quasi præludia fuere; nunc, (summas enim, et propè solas in hoc dramate partes clamor obtinet,) quàm potest maximo hiatu, rictum diducit in cœlum scilicet iturus; quo si ascenderit, in neminem profectò acriùs clamabit quàm in ipsum clamatorem Morum. "Cùm omnibus seculis sacra fuerit regum majestas, &c." Multa tu quidem, More, vulgariter, multa malitiosè in nos declamas, quæ nihil attinent: regis enim cædes, et tyranni supplicium non sunt idem, More, non sunt, inter se distant longissimè, atque distabunt, dum sensus et ratio, jus atque fas, rectique et obliqui judicium hominibus concedetur. Verùm de his satìs jam sæpiùs dictum, satìs defensum est: non patiar qui tot diris inanibus lædere non potes, ut repetita crambe nos demum occidas. De patientia, deinde et pietate, bellè disputas: sed

Clunem agitas: ego te ceventem more verebor?

"Omnes" aïs "reformatos, præsertim Belgas et Gallos, factum nostrum horruisse;" et statim, "bonis ubique non licuisse, idem sentire et loqui." Sed te tibi repugnare periculum est; hoc multo indignius atque atrocius: "præ nostro," inquis, "scelere, nihil fuit Judæorum scelus, Christum crucifigentium, sive hominum mentem, sive sceleris effectus compares." Furiose! tunc Christi minister perpetratum facinus in Christum tam leviter fers, quacunque demum "mente" vel "effectu," ut pari scelere interfectum quemlibet regem audeas dicere? Judæi certè clarissimis indiciis Dei filium agnovisse poterant; nos Carolum non esse tyrannum, nulla ratione potimus intelligere. Eventûs autem, ad minuendum scelus, ineptissimè facis mentionem: verùm semper animadverto regios, quò quisque acrior est, eò leviùs ferre quicquid committitur in Christum, quàm si quid in regem: cui tamen cùm Christi præcipuè causa obediendum doceant, facilè ostendunt se neque Christum verè colere, neque regem: sed aliud quiddam sibi quærentes, incredibilem hanc erga reges fidem ac religionem suam, vel ambitioni, vel occultis quibusdam aliis cupiditatibus obtendere. "Prodiit ergo magnus literarum princeps Salmasius." Desine toties magnum illud, More; quod millies licèt ingesseris, haud cuiquam profectò intelligenti persuaseris magnum esse Salmasium, sed minimum esse Morum, et nullius pretii homulum, qui, quid deceat ignarus, magni cognomine tam imperitè abutatur. Nos grammaticis atque criticis, quorum summa laus aut in alienis lucubrationibus edendis, aut librariorum mendulis corrigendis versatur, industriam quidem ac literarum scientiam, doctrinæ etiam haud contemnendæ laudem, ac præmia libenter concedimus, magni cognomen haud largimur. Is solus magnus est appellandus, qui res magnas aut gerit, aut docet, aut dignè scribit: res autem magnæ sunt solæ, quæ vel vitam hanc nostram efficiunt beatam, aut saltem cum honestate commodam atque jucundam, vel ad alteram ducunt beatiorem. Horum verò Salmasius quid egit? egit verò nihil: quid autem docuit aut scripsit magnum? nisi fortè contra episcopos, et primatum papæ, quod ipse postea et suis moribus, et aliis in nos pro episcopatu scriptis, recantatum penitus evertit. Magnus ergo scriptor dici non debet, qui aut nihil magnum, aut quod optimum in vita scripserat, ei fœdissimè renunciavit. "Literarum princeps" ut sit, et alphabeti per me licet; at verò tibi non "princeps" modò "literarum" est, sed "patronus regum," et "patronus quidem dignus tantis clientibus." Pulchrè tu quidem regibus consuluisti, ut post alios insignes titulos, Claudii Salmasii clientes appellentur. Ea nimirum lege solvimini cunctis aliis legibus reges, ut in clientelam grammatico tradatis vos Salmasio, sceptra ferulæ submittatis: "Debebunt ei reges, dum stabit orbis, dignitatis et salutis suæ vindicias." Audite principes; qui pessimè vos defendit, immo ne defendit quidem, nemo enim oppugnavit, dignitatem et salutem vestram sibi imputat. Hoc nempe solum consequuti sunt, qui superbissimum grammaticum sustinendis regum rationibus et tinearum et blattarum foro advocarunt. "Cui quantum res regia, tantundem etiam ecclesia debebit;" non laudem sanè, sed meritissimam desertæ suæ causæ notam. Nunc in laudes effunderis defensionis regiæ; "ingenium, doctrinam, infinitum prope rerum usum, et intimam sacri et profani juris penum, concitatæ orationis vigorem, eloquentiam, facundiam aurei illius operis" admiraris, quorum cum nihil affuisse homini contendo (quid enim Salmasio cum eloquentia?) tum aureum fuisse illud opus vel centies fateor; tot enim Carolus aureos numeravit, ne dicam quid Arausiacus etiam princeps in idem opus profuderit. "Nunquam major surrexit vir magnus, nunquam magis Salmasius:" et tantò quidem major ut se ruperit, quàm magnus enim fuerit in illo opere jam vidimus; et siquid ejusdem argumenti, ut fertur, posthumum reliquit, fortasse videbimus. Non equidem inficior, edito illo libro, Salmasium in ore omnium fuisse, regiis mirè placuisse; "ab augustissima Sueciæ regina, amplissimis præmiis invitatum; quinimò tota illa contentione Salmasio secunda omnia, adversa mihi penè omnia fuere. Primùm de illius eruditione, erat hominum summa opinio, quam multis ab annis jam diu collegerat, libros conscribendo multos, et bene magnos, non eos quidem plerumque utiles, sed abstrusissimis de rebus, et summorum authorum citatiunculis differtos; quo nihil citius literatorum vulgus in admirationem rapit; me verò quis essem, nemo in iis ferè regionibus nôrat; magnam ille suî expectationem concitârat, attentior operi quàm solebat aliàs, ut in re tanta; ego mei nullam potui movere: immò verò multi me ab illo dehortabantur, tyronem cum veterano congressurum, partim invidentes, nè utcunque mihi gloriæ foret cum tanto hoste decertasse; partim et mihi, et causæ metuentes, nè utriusque gravi cum ignominia victus discederem; causa denique speciosa atque plausibilis, inveterata vulgi opinio, sive superstitio dicenda potiùs est, et propensus in regium nomen favor Salmasio vires et spiritus addiderat; eadem omnia contra me fecêre, quo magis est mirandum. quamprimum responsio nostra prodiit, non si à plerisque avidè arriperetur, videre gestientibus ecquis tam præceps animi esset ut auderet cum Salmasio confligere, sed tam esse placitam multis atque gratam, ut, non authoris, sed ipsius veritatis ratione habita, qui modò summo in honore fuerat Salmasius, nunc quasi detracta, sub qua latuerat, persona, et existimatione, et animo repentè caderet; seque asserere, tametsi omnibus nervis id agens, quoad vixit postea non valuerit. Te verò, serenissima Suecorum regina, tuumque illud acre judicium fallere haud diu potuit; tu veritatis partium studiis anteferendæ, princeps atque author propè dicam cœlestis extitisti. Quamvis enim illum hominem eximiæ doctrinæ fama, causæque regiæ patrocinio tunc temporis longè omnium celeberrimum, à te invitatum, multis honoribus affecisses, tamen prodeunte illo responso, et singulari æquanimitate abs te perlecto, postquam vanitatis et apertissimæ corruptelæ redargutum Salmasium, multa leviter, multa immoderatè, falsa quædam, adversùs seipsum alia, et prioribus sententiis contraria disseruisse animadverteras, ad quæ, coram accitus, ut ferunt, quod satis responderet nihil habuit, ita palàm animo affecta es, ut ab illo tempore neque hominem, ut antea, colere, neque ejus ingenium aut doctrinam magni facere, et, quod erat planè inopinatum, ejus adversario propensiùs favere, omnes te intelligerent. Quod enim erat in tyrannos dictum, negabas id ad te ullo modo pertinere: unde et apud te fructum, et apud alios famam rectissimæ conscientiæ adepta es. Cùm enim tua facta satis declarent, tyrannum te non esse, hæc tua tam aperta animi significatio adhuc clariùs demonstrabat, te ejus rei ne omnino quidem tibi esse consciam. O me spe mea omni feliciorem! (eloquentiam enim, nisi quæ in ipsa veritate Suada est, nullam mihi sumo;) qui, cùm in ea patriæ tempora incidissem, ut necesse esset in causa tam ardua tamque invidiosa versari, ut jus omne regium impugnare viderer, tam illustrem, tam verè regiam nactus sim integritatis meæ testem atque interpretem, nullum me verbum fecisse contra reges, sed contra regum labes ac pestes, duntaxat tyrannos. Te verò magnanimam, Augusta, te tutam undique divina planè virtute ac sapientia munitam! quæ quod in jus tuum ac dignitatem poterat videri scriptum, non solùm tam æquo animo atque sedato, tam incredibili mentis candore, vultusque vera serenitate perlegere sustinuisti; sed contra ipsum patronum tuum ejusmodi sententiam ferre, ut ejus adversario palmam etiam adjudicare à plerisque existimeris. Quo te honore, qua te veneratione, regina, prosequi semper debuero, cujus excelsa virtus ac magnitudo animi non tibi solùm gloriosa, sed mihi etiam tam fausta atque fortunata, et suspicione me omni atque infamia apud alios reges liberavit, et præclaro ac immortali hoc beneficio tibi in perpetuum devinxit. Quàm bene de æquitate tua, deque justitia et sentire exteri, et sentire et sperare semper tui populi debebunt, qui, cùm tua res ac majestas ipsa agi videretur, tam nihil turbatam te de tuo haud minùs placidè, quàm de populi jure soles, judicantem viderunt. Jam tu quidem haud temerè, tot conquisita undique volumina, tot literarum monumenta congessisti, non quasi te illa quicquam docere, sed ut ex illis tui cives te discere, tuæque virtutis ac sapientiæ præstantiam contemplari possint; cujus ipsa divæ species, nisi tuo animo penitùs insedisset, et quasi oculis conspiciendam se tibi præbuisset, haud ulla profectò librorum lectione, tam incredibiles amores excitasset in te sui: quò magis illum mentis tuæ vigorem planè æthereum et quasi purissimam divinæ auræ partem in illas ultimas regiones delapsam admiramur; quam neque cœlum illud triste ac nubilosum ullis frigoribus extinguere aut gravare, neque solum illud horridum ac salebrosum, quod et ingenia quoque incolarum haud rarò indurat, quicquam in te inæquale aut asperum creare potuit: quin et ipsa terra illa, tot metallis fœcunda, si aliis noverca, tibi certè alma parens, te summis enixa viribus totam auream produxisse videtur. Dicerem Adolphi filiam invicti atque inclyti regis unicam prolem, nisi tu illi, "Christina," tantum præluceres, quantum viribus sapientia, belli artibus pacis studia præcellunt. Jam inde profectò regina austri haud sola celebrabitur: habet nunc et septentrio reginam suam, et dignam sanè quæ non modò sapientissimum illum Judæorum regem, aut siquis unquam similis futurus esset, auditum proficisceretur, sed ad quam alii tanquam ad clarissimum regalium virtutum exemplar, et visendam omnibus heroinam, undique concurrant: nullumque in terris fastigium par esse ejus laudibus ac meritis fateantur, in qua minimum hoc esse videant, quòd sit regina, tot gentium monarcha. Non autem hoc minimum, quòd etiam hoc esse decorum suorum minimum ipsa sentiat, aliudque longè majus atque sublimius meditetur, quàm regnare; hoc ipso nomine innumeris regibus præponenda. Potest itaque, si ea manet Suecorum gentem calamitas, regnum abdicare, reginam deponere nunquam potest, non Sueciæ sed totius orbis terrarum dignam se imperio testata.

In has digressum me reginæ meritissimas laudes nemo est, opinor, qui non collaudet, nedum reprehendat; quas ego quidem sine summa ingratitudinis culpa, vel aliis tacentibus, prætermittere non potui; qui nescio qua mea sorte, sanè felicissima, aut si quis est occultus vel siderum, vel animorum, vel rerum consensus aut moderamen, tantam arbitram quam omnium minimè sperabam, omnium maximè optabam, tam mihi æquam et faventem in ultimis terris repererim. Nunc ad relictum opus, longè quidem diversissimum, redeundum tamen est. "Infremuisse," ais, "nos ad defensionis regiæ famam; dispexisse igitur grammaticastrum aliquem famelicum, qui venalem calamum parricidii patrocinio vellet commodare." Hæc abs te malitiosissimè ficta sunt, ex quo memineras, regios, cum suis mendaciis ac maledicentiæ præconem dispicerent, adiisse grammaticum, si non famelicum, certè auri plus nimio sitientem Salmasium; qui non solùm præsentem operam suam, sed bonam quoque mentem, si quam priùs habuit, illis libentissimè vendidit; ex quo memineras Salmasium, fama jam deplorata atque perdita, cum dispiceret, qui existimationem afflictam atque obtritam, quoquo modo reparare quiret, te invenisse justo Dei judicio, non, unde excussus es, ministrum Genevensem, sed episcopum Lampsacenum, id est, ex horto Priapum, suæ domûs constupratorem; unde et insulsissimas laudes, tanto cum dedecore emptas aversatus, et ex amico inimicissimus factus, tibi laudatori suo, multa moriens imprecatus est. "Unus inventus est, magnus scilicet heros, quem Salmasio opponerent, Joannes Miltonus." Ego heroëm me esse nesciebam, tu heroïs cujuspiam fortè filius per me sis licèt; totus enim noxa es. Atque unum me esse inventum, qui causam populi Anglicani tuear, si reipublicæ rationes cogito, sanè quàm doleo, si laudem, ejus participem habere me neminem facilè patior. Quis et unde sim dubium ais esse. Tam olim erat dubium quis Homerus, quis Demosthenes. Equidem tacere diu, et posse non scribere, quod nunquam potuit Salmasius, didiceram; eaque in sinu gestabam tacitus, quæ si tum proferre libuisset, æquè ac nunc, inclaruisse jamdudum poteram: sed cunctantis famæ avidus non eram, ne hæc quidem, nisi idonea data occasione unquam prolaturus; nihil laborans etsi alii me quæcunque nossem scire nesciebant; non enim famam sed opportunitatem cujusque rei præstolabar; unde factum est, ut multò ante plurimis essem notus, quàm Salmasius notus esset sibi; nunc Andremone notior est caballo. "Homone an vermis." Equidem malim me vermem esse, quod fatetur de se etiam rex Davides, quàm tuum vermem in pectore nunquam moriturum intùs celare. "Aiunt," inquis, "hominem Cantabrigiensi academia ob flagitia pulsum, dedecus et patriam fugisse, et in Italiam commigrasse." Vel hinc licebit conjicere quàm veraces illi fuerint, ex quibus res nostras auditione accepisti; hìc enim et te et illos impudentissimè mentiri et nôrunt omnes qui me nôrunt, et statim ampliùs ostendam. Pulsus verò Cantabrigia, cur in Italiam potiùs quàm in Galliam aut Hollandiam commigrarem? ubi tu tot flagitiis coopertus, minister Evangelii, non modò impunè vivis, sed concionaris, sed sacra etiam ministeria, summo cum illius ecclesiæ opprobrio, inquinatissimis manibus conspurcas. Cur verò in Italiam, More? novus credo Saturnus, ut alicubi laterem, in Latium scilicet profugi. Verùm ego Italiam, non, ut tu putas, facinorosorum latibulum aut asylum, sed humanitatis potiùs, et civilium doctrinarum omnium hospitium et novercam antea, et expertus sum. "Reversus librum de divortiis conscripsit." Non aliud scripsi atque ante me Bucerus de regno Christi copiosè, Fagius in Deuteronomium, Erasmus in Epistolam primam ad Corinthios dedita opera in Anglorum gratiam, aliique multi percelebres viri, in commune bonum scripserunt. Quod in illis nemo reprehendit, cur id mihi præ cæteris fraudi esset, non intelligo: vellem hoc tantùm, sermone vernaculo me non scripsisse; non enim in vernas lectores incidissem; quibus solenne est sua bona ignorare, aliorum mala irridere. Tene verò, turpissime, de divortiis obstrepere, qui cum Pontia ancilla tibi desponsata, post stuprum eo obtentu illatum, immanissimum omnium divortium fecisti? Et tamen erat illa Salmasii famula, Anglica, ut fertur, fœmina, regiis partibus apprimè dedita; nempe hoc erat, scelerate, adamasti ut rem regiam, reliquisti ut rem publicam, cujus tamen conversionis, quam odisse adeo vis videri, vide ne ipse author fueris; vide inquam ne subversa funditus dominatione Salmasiana Pontiam ipse in rem publicam converteris. Et hoc modo multas tu quidem una in urbe res publicas, regius licet, aut fundasse diceris aut ab aliis fundatas minister publicus administrare. Hæc tua sunt divortia, seu mavis, diverticula, unde in me Curius prodiisti. Ad mendacia nunc redis. "Cum de regis capite inter conjuratos ageretur, scripsit ad eos, et nutantes in malam partem impulit." Ego vero neque ad eos scripsi, neque impellere attinebat, quibus id omnino agere sine me deliberatum jam erat: verum ea de re quid scripserim, infrà dicetur, uti etiam de Iconoclaste. Nunc quoniam iste (hominem an dicam hæreo, purgamentum potiùs hominis) ab ancillarum adulteriis, ad adulterandam omnem veritatem progressus, congestis in me tot una serie mendaciis, apud exteros infamem reddere conatus est, peto ne quis rem secùs interpretetur, aut in invidiam trahat, neve molestè ferat, si de me plura quàm vellem et dixi suprà, et porrò dicam: ut si oculos à cæcitate, nomen ab oblivione aut calumnia non possum, vitam tamen possim ab ea saltem obscuritate quæ cum macula sit, in lucem vindicare. Idque non unam ob causam mihi erit necessariò faciendum. Primùm ut tot viros bonos atque doctos, qui per omnes vicinas gentes nostra jam legunt, deque me haud malè sentiunt, ne propter hujus maledicta mei pœniteat; verùm ita sibi persuadeant non eum esse me, qui honestam orationem inhonestis moribus, aut liberè dicta serviliter factis, unquam dedecorarim; vitamque nostram, Deo bene juvante, ab omni turpitudine ac flagitio remotam longè semper fuisse: deinde, ut quos laudandos mihi sumo viros illustres ac laude dignos, hi sciant nihil me pudendum magis existimare, quàm si ad eorum laudes vituperandus ipse ac nequam accederem; sciat denique populus Anglicanus, quem ut defenderem, meum sive fatum sive officium, sua virtus impulit, si vitam pudentur atque honestè semper egi, meam defensionem, nescio an honori aut ornamento, certè pudori aut dedecori nunquam sibi fore: qui igitur, et unde sim, nunc dicam. Londini sum natus, genere honesto, patre viro integerrimo, matre probatissima, et eleemosynis per viciniam potissimùm nota. Pater me puerulum humaniorum literarum studiis destinavit; quas ita avidè arripui, ut ab anno ætatis duodecimo vix unquam ante mediam noctem à lucubrationibus cubitum discederem; quæ prima oculorum pernicies fuit: quorum ad naturalem debilitatem accesserant et crebri capitis dolores; quæ omnia cum discendi impetum non retardarent, et in ludo literario, et sub aliis domi magistris erudiendum quotidie curavit: ita variis instructum linguis, et percepta haud leviter philosophiæ dulcedine, ad gymnasium gentis alterum, Cantabrigiam misit: Illìc disciplinis atque artibus tradi solitis septennium studui: procul omni flagitio, bonis omnibus probatus, usquedum magistri, quem vocant, gradum, cum laude etiam adeptus, non in Italiam, quod impurus ille comminiscitur, profugi, sed sponte mea domum me contuli, meique etiam desiderium, apud collegii plerosque socios à quibus eram haud mediocriter cultus, reliqui. Paterno rure, quo is transigendæ senectutis causa concesserat, evolvendis Græcis Latinisque scriptoribus summum per otium totus vacavi; ita tamen ut nonnunquam, rus urbe mutarem, aut coëmendorum gratia librorum, aut novum quidpiam in mathematicis, vel in musicis, quibus tum oblectabar, addiscendi. Exacto in hunc modum quinquennio, post matris obitum, regiones exteras, et Italiam potissimùm, videndi cupidus, exorato patre, uno cum famulo profectus sum. Abeuntem vir clarissimus Henricus Woottonus, qui ad Venetos orator Jacobi regis diu fuerat, et votis et præceptis, eunti peregrè sanè utilissimis, eleganti epistola perscriptis, me amicissimè prosequutus est. Commendatum ab aliis nobilissimus vir Thomas Scudamorus vicecomes Slegonensis, Caroli regis legatus, Parisiis humanissimè accepit; meque Hugoni Grotio viro eruditissimo, ab regina Succorum tunc temporis ad Galliæ regem legato, quem invisere cupiebam, suo nomine, et suorum uno atque altero deducente, commendavit: Discedenti post dies aliquot Italiam versùs, literas ad mercatores Anglos, quà iter eram facturus, dedit, ut quibus possent officiis mihi præstò essent. Nicæa solvens, Genuam perveni; mox Liburnum et Pisas, inde Florentiam. Illa in urbe, quam præ cæteris propter elegantiam cum linguæ tum ingeniorum semper colui, ad duos circiter menses substiti; illic multorum et nobilium sanè et doctorum hominum familiaritatem statim contraxi; quorum etiam privatas academias (qui mos illic, cum ad literas humaniores, tum ad amicitias conservandas laudatissimus est) assiduè frequentavi. Tui enim Jacobe Gaddi, Carole Dati, Frescobalde, Cultelline, Bonmatthæi, Clementille, Francine, aliorumque plurium memoriam, apud me semper gratam atque jucundam, nulla dies delebit. Florentia Senas, inde Romam profectus, postquam illius urbis antiquitas et prisca fama me ad bimestre ferè spatium tenuisset, (ubi et Luca Holstenio, aliisque viris cum doctis tum ingeniosis, sum usus humanissimis,) Neapolim perrexi: Illìc per eremitam quendam, quícum Roma iter feceram, ad Joannem Baptistam Mansum, marchionem Villensem, virum nobilissimum atque gravissimum, (ad quem Torquatus Tassus insignis poeta Italus de amicitia scripsit,) sum introductus; eodemque usus, quamdiu illic fui, sanè amicissimo; qui et ipse me per urbis loca et proregis aulam circumduxit, et visendi gratia haud semel ipse ad hospitium venit: Discedenti seriò excusavit se, tametsi multò plura detulisse mihi officia maximè cupiebat, non potuisse illa in urbe, propterea quòd nolebam in religione esse tectior. In Siciliam quoque et Græciam trajicere volentem me, tristis ex Anglia belli civilis nuntius revocavit: Turpe enim existimabam, dum mei cives domi de libertate dimicarent, me animi causa otiosè peregrinari. Romam autem reversurum, monebant mercatores se didicisse per literas parari mihi ab Jesuitis Anglis insidias, si Romam reverterem; eò quod de religione nimis liberè loquutus essem. Sic enim mecum statueram, de religione quidem iis in locis sermones ultrò non inferre; interrogatus de fide, quicquid essem passurus, nihil dissimulare. Romam itaque nihilominùs redii: Quid essem, si quis interrogabat, neminem celavi; si quis adoriebatur, in ipsa urbe pontificis, alteros prope duos menses, orthodoxam religionem, ut antea, liberrimè tuebar: Deoque sic volente, incolumis Florentiam rursus perveni; haud minùs mei cupientes revisens, ac si in patriam revertissem. Illic totidem, quot priùs, menses libenter commoratus, nisi quod ad paucos dies Luccam excucurri, transcenso Apennino, per Bononiam et Ferraram, Venetias contendi. Cui urbi lustrandæ cum mensem unum impendissem, et libros, quos per Italiam conquisiveram, in navem imponendos curâssem, per Veronam ac Mediolanum, et Pœninas Alpes, lacu denique Lemanno, Genevam delatus sum. Quæ urbs, cum in mentem mihi hinc veniat Mori calumniatoris, facit ut Deum hìc rursus testem invocem, me his omnibus in locis, ubi tam multa licent, ab omni flagitio ac probro integrum atque intactum vixisse, illud perpetuò cogitantem, si hominum latere oculos possem, Dei certè non posse. Genevæ cum Joanne Deodato, theologiæ professore doctissimo, quotidianus versabar. Deinde eodem itinere, quo priùs, per Galliam, post annum et tres plus minus menses in patriam revertor; eodem ferme tempore quo Carolus cum Scotis, rupta pace, bellum alterum quod vocant episcopale, redintegrabat; in quo fusis primo congressu regiis copiis, cùm videret etiam omnes Anglos, et meritò quidem, in se pessimè animatos, malo coactus, non sponte, parlamentum haud ita multò post convocavit. Ipse, sicubi possem, tam rebus turbatis et fluctuantibus, locum consistendi circumspiciens, mihi librisque meis, sat amplam in urbe domum conduxi; ibi ad intermissa studia beatulus me recepi; rerum exitu Deo imprimis, et quibus id muneris populus dabat, facile permisso. Interea parlamento rem strenuè gerente, episcoporum fastus detumuit. Ut primùm loquendi saltem cœpta est libertas concedi, omnia in episcopos aperiri ora; alii de ipsorum vitiis, alii de ipsius ordinis vitio conqueri; iniquum esse, se solos ab ecclesiis omnibus, quotquot reformatæ sunt, discrepare; exemplo fratrum, sed maximè ex verbo Dei, gubernari ecclesiam convenire. Ad hæc sanè experrectus, cùm veram affectari viam ad libertatem cernerem, ab his initiis, his passibus, ad liberandam servitute vitam omnem mortalium, rectissimè procedi, si ab religione disciplina orta, ad mores et instituta reipublicæ emanaret, cùm etiam me ita ab adolescentia parassem, ut quid divini, quid humani esset juris, ante omnia possem non ignorare, meque consuluissem ecquando ullius usus essem futurus, si nunc patriæ, immo verò ecclesiæ totque fratribus evangelii causa, periculo sese objicientibus deessem, statuti, etsi tunc alia quædam meditabar, huc omne ingenium, omnes industriæ vires transferre. Primùm itaque de reformanda ecclesia Anglicana, duos ad amicum quendam libros conscripsi: Deinde, cum duo præ cæteris magni nominis episcopi suum jus contra ministros quosdam primarios assererent, ratus de iis rebus, quas amore solo veritatis, et ex officii Christiani ratione didiceram, haud pejùs me dicturum, quàm qui de suo quæstu et injustissimo dominatu contendebant, ad hunc, libris duobus, quorum unus de episcopatu prælatico, alter de ratione disciplinæ ecclesiasticæ inscribitur, ad illum, scriptis quibusdam animadversionibus, et mox apologia, respondi; et ministris facundiam hominis, ut ferebatur, ægrè sustinentibus, suppetias tuli; et ab eo temporè, si quid postea responderent, interfui. Cùm petiti omnium telis episcopi tandem cecidissent, otiumque ab illis esset, verti aliò cogitationes; si qua in re possem libertatis veræ ac solidæ rationem promovere; quæ non foris, sed intus quærenda, non pugnando, sed vitam rectè instituendo recteque administrando, adipiscenda potissimùm est. Cùm itaque tres omnino animadverterem libertatis esse species, quæ nisi adsint, vita ulla transigi commodè vix possit, ecclesiasticam, domesticam seu privatam, atque civilem, deque prima jam scripsissem, deque tertia magistratum sedulò agere viderem, quæ reliqua secunda erat, domesticam mihi desumpsi; ea quoque tripartita, cum videretur esse, si res conjugalis, si liberorum institutio rectè se haberet, si denique liberè philosophandi potestas esset, de conjugio non solùm ritè contrahendo, verùm etiam, si necesse esset, dissolvendo, quid sentirem explicui; idque ex divina lege quam Christus non sustulit, nedum aliam, toto lege Mosaïca graviorem, civiliter sanxit; quid item de excepta solùm fornicatione sentiendum sit, et meam aliorumque sententiam exprompsi, et clarissimus vir Seldenus noster, in uxore Hebræa plùs minùs biennio pòst edita, uberiùs demonstravit. Frustrà enim libertatem in comitiis et foro crepat, qui domi, servitutem viro indignissimam, inferiori etiam servit; ea igitur de re aliquot libros edidi; eo præsertim tempore cùm vir sæpe et conjux hostes inter se acerrimi, hic domi cum liberis, illa in castris hostium materfamilias versaretur, viro cædem atque perniciem minitans. Institutionem deinde liberorum uno opusculo breviùs quidem tractabam; sed quod satis arbitrabar iis fore, qui ad eam rem, qua par esset diligentia, incumberent; qua quidem re, nihil ad imbuendas, unde vera atque interna oritur libertas, virtute hominum mentes, nihil ad rempublicam bene gerendam, et quam diutissimè conservandam majus momentum potest afferre. Postremò de typographia liberandâ, ne veri et falsi arbitrium, quid edendum, quid premendum, penès paucos esset, eosque ferè indoctos, et vulgaris judicii homines, librorum inspectioni præpositos, per quos nemini ferè quicquam quod supra vulgus sapiat, in lucem emittere, aut licet aut libet, ad justæ orationis modum Areopagiticam scripsi. Civilem, quæ postrema species restabat, non attigeram; quam, magistratui satis curæ esse cernebam: Neque de jure regio quicquam à me scriptum est, donec rex hostis à senatu judicatus, belloque victus, causam captivus apud judices diceret, capitisque damnatus est. Tum verò tandem, cum presbyteriani quidam ministri, Carolo priùs infestissimi, nunc independentium partes suis anteferri, et in senatu plus posse indignantes, parlamenti sententiæ de rege latæ (non facto irati, sed quod ipsorum factio non fecisset) reclamitarent, et quantum in ipsis erat, tumultuarentur, ausi affirmare protestantium doctrinam, omnesque ecclesias reformatas ab ejusmodi in reges atroci sententia abhorrere, ratus falsitati tam apertæ palàm eundum obviàm esse, ne tum quidem de Carolo quicquam scripsi aut suasi, sed quid in genere contra tyrannos liceret, adductis haud paucis summorum theologorum testimoniis, ostendi; et insignem hominum meliora profitentium, sive ignorantiam sive impudentiam propè concionabundus incessi. Liber iste non nisi post mortem regis prodiit, ad componendos potiùs hominum animos factus, quàm ad statuendum de Carolo quicquam quod non mea, sed magistratuum intererat, et peractum jam tum erat. Hanc intra privatos parietes meam operam nunc ecclesiæ, nunc reipublicæ gratis dedi; mihi vicissim vel hæc vel illa præter incolumitatem nihil; bonam certè conscientiam, bonam apud bonos existimationem, et honestam hanc dicendi libertatem facta ipsa reddidere: Commoda alii, alii honores gratis ad se trahebant: Me nemo ambientem, nemo per amicos quicquam petentem, curiæ foribus affixum petitorio vultu, aut minorem conventuum vestibulis hærentem nemo me unquam vidit. Domi fere me continebam, meis ipse facultatibus, tametsi hoc civili tumultu magna ex parte sæpe tetentis, et censum fere iniquiùs mihi impositum, et vitam utcunque frugi tolerabam. His rebus confectis, cùm jam abundè otii existimarem mihi futurum, ad historiam gentis, ab ultima origine repetitam, ad hæc usque tempora, si possem, perpetuo filo deducendam me converti: Quatuor jam libros absolveram, cum ecce nihil tale cogitantem me, Caroli regno in rempublicam redacto, concilium status, quod dicitur, tum primùm authoritate parlamenti constitutum, ad se vocat, meaque opera ad res præsertim externas uti voluit. Prodiit haud multò post attributus regi liber, contra parlamentum invidiosissimè sane scriptus: Huic respondere jussus, Iconi Iconoclasten opposui; non "regiis manibus insultans," ut insimulor, sed reginam veritatem regi Carolo anteponendam arbitratus; immo cum præviderem hanc calumniam cuivis maledico in promptu fore, ipso exordio, et sæpe aliàs, quoad licuit, à me istam invidiam sum amolitus.

Prodiit deinde Salmasius; cui quis responderet, adeò non diu, quod ait Morus, dispiciebant, ut me in concilio tum etiam præsentem statim omnes ultro nominarent. Hactenus ad obturandum os tuum, More, et mendacia redarguenda bonorum maximè virorum in gratiam, qui me aliàs non nôrint, mei rationem reddidi. Tu igitur, More, tibi dico immunde, φιμώθητι, obmutesce inquam; quo enim magis mihi maledixeris, eo me rationes meas uberiùs explicare coëgeris; ex quo aliud lucrari nihil poteris, quàm ut tibi mendaciorum opprobrium adhuc gravius concilies, mihi ad integritatis commendationem eo latiùs viam aperias. Reprehenderam ego Salmasium, quòd extraneum se et alienigenam rebus nostris immiscuisset: Tu instas, "ad eos, qui ad Angliam non pertinent, hanc defensionem maxime pertinere." Quid enim? "Possint," inquis, "Angli existimari studio partium acriùs agere; Gallos verò consentaneum est rei, non hominum, rationem habuisse." Ad hæc eadem quæ priùs regero; externum et longinquum, qualis tu es, in alienas res præsertim turbatas, immersurum se neminem nisi corruptum; Salmasium prius demonstravi mercede conductum; te constat per Salmasium et Arausionenses professoriam cathedram petiise; deinde, quod fœdius est, exagitas parlamentum, et subagitas Pontiam. Quam autem affers rationem, cur hæc ad exteros potius pertinerent, deridicula prorsus est; si enim Angli partium studiis feruntur, quid vos aliud, qui illos solos sequimini, quàm eorum affectus duntaxat in vos transfertis? Adeò ut, si Anglis illis credendum in sua causa non est, vobis profectò sit multò minus; qui rerum nostrarum nihil intelligitis, aut saltem creditis, nisi quas ab ipsis accepistis, quibus, vestra quoque sententia, vix est credendum. Hic rursum effundis te in laudem magni Salmasii: Magnus sanè tibi fuit, quem tu quasi pro lenone habuisti ancillæ suæ; laudas tamen; at is te non laudat, immo ante mortem palàm est abominatus, seque ipse millies incusavit, quod Spanhemio gravissimo theologo, de te, quàm impius esses, non credidisset. Nunc totus in rabiem versus rationi quasi renuntias; "Jamdudum ratione" scilicet "defunctus est Salmasius." Tu clamandi tantum et furendi partes tibi deposcis, et tamen primas in maledicendo etiam tribuis Salmasio; "non quia verbis sævit, sed quia Salmasius." Ω σπερμολόγε! Has nempe argutias morigeranti debemus Pontiæ. Hinc clamor tuus argutari atque etiam minurizare didicit; hinc minitabundus quoque, "experiemini," inquis, "aliquando, fœdissimæ belluæ, quid styli potuerint." Tene experiemur, ancillariole, tene mœche, aut stylum tuum, ancillis tantummodo metuendum? Cui si quis raphanum aut mugilem solùm intenderit, actum mehercule præclarè tecum putes, si nate non fissa, et incolumi stylo isto salaci tuo, queas aufugere. "Equidem non adeo sum," inquis, "vacui capitis, ut provinciam à Salmasio susceptam aggrediar:" Quam ille quidem sine capite admodum vacuo, nunquam aggressus fuisset; festivè tu quidem vacuitate capitis, magnum Salmasium tibi anteponis. "At regii sanguinis clamorem ad cœlum tollere," quod "ineruditi" etiam "debent:" hoc nempè tuum esse ais. Clama, vociferare, boa; perge hypocritari, sancta verba usurpare, et Priapeïa vivere: Exurget, mihi crede, aliquando quem inclamas toties ultionum Deus; exurget, teque imprimis eradicabit, diaboli ministrum, et reformatæ ecclesiæ infandum dedecus et luem. Inculpantibus Salmasii maledicentiam quamplurimis, respondes, "Sic cum parricidis monstrorum omnium turpissimis, fuisse agendum." Laudo; telis enim nos instruis: et quo te pacto, tuosque perduelles tractari conveniat, commodus doces, nosque ipse absolvis. Nunc quando ratione nihil potes, ne audes quidem occupatum ab Salmasio jus omne regium, et quicquid est in eo rationis causatus, à contumeliis et rabie ad narrationes quasdam miserabiles conversus, expers rationis, institutos ab initio clamores tantùm persequeris: quas partim Salmasianas recoxisti, partim ex elencho illo ἐλεγχίστῳ anonymo, qui non patria solùm, sed nomine etiam profugit, descriptas interpolasti: quarum ad præcipua capita, vel in Iconoclaste, vel in Salmasianis ita jam respondi, ut citra modum historiæ, responderi ampliùs posse non putem. Sempernè ego ut identidem eandem orbitam teram, et ad balatronis cujusque stridorem dicta toties cogar iterare? non faciam; neque mea sic abutar vel opera vel otio. Si quis conductitios ejulatus, et compositos venalissimi hominis ploratus, si quis declamatiunculas, quas etiam ancillaris concubitus, adulterinas edixit et spurias, Morilli nothi gemellas, fide satis locupletes, arbitratur esse, ad me quod attinet, nihil quidem moror, quo minùs ita existimet; neque enim est ut ab ejusmodi credulo ac temerario metuendum nobis quicquam sit: attingam tamen pauca, multorum instar, ex quibus tam quis ipse, quàm quid dicat, et quid de reliquo judicandum sit, summatim intelligetis. Postquam de camera plebis et camera procerum ad unam redigenda, multa exoticus deblateravit (quod postulatum nemo sanus reprehenderet) "ut æqualitate," inquit, "in rempublicam invecta, ad eandem in ecclesiam introducendam procederetur; tunc enim adhuc stabant episcopi: hic nisi sit purus putus anabaptismus, nihil video." Quis hoc à theologo et ministro Gallico sperasset unquam? sanè qui anabaptismus quid sit, nisi hoc sit, non videt, eum ego crediderim haud magis videre quid sit baptismus. Sed si res propriis vocabulis appellare malimus, æqualitas in republica non est anabaptismus, sed democratia, longè antiquior: in ecclesia præsertim constituta, est disciplina apostolica. At enim "stabant episcopi." Fatemur, stabant et Genevæ; cum illa civitas et episcopum et eundem legitimum principem religionis causa expulit; quod illis laudi, cur id nobis probro ducitur? scio quid tibi vis, More, Genevensium suffragia ultum is; quibus dimissus cum ignominia, an ejectus ex illa ecclesia fueris, in dubio est. Te ergo cum Salmasio tuo ab evangelico hoc instituto descivisse, et ad episcopos transfugisse, si modò refert quo tu transfugeris, apparet. "Deinde ad ministrorum," inquis, "nostratium æqualitatem respublica transiit, ut palàm sit eundem spiritum tunc viguisse qui octavo demum anno nefando regis parricidio rem peregit." Ergo idem ut videtur spiritus et ministros constituit vestrates, et parricidium peregit: Perge ut occepisti, quas par est apostatam, eructare insanias. "Non plures," inquis, "tribus libellis supplicibus confecerunt, qui in regem animadverti postulabant." Quod notum est, et ipse memini falsissimum esse. Sanè qui has res apud nos memoriæ mandarunt, non tres tantummodo libellos istiusmodi, sed multos ex diversis Angliæ provinciis, exercitusque legionibus unius ferè mensis spatio, tres uno die allatos fuisse memorant. Vides quanta cum gravitate hac de re deliberaverit senatus, cujus cunctationem populus lenitatis nimiæ suspectam tot supplicibus libellis eximendam putavit. Quot reris millia hominum fuisse idem sentientium, qui senatum ad id hortari, quod jam tum seriò agitabat, vel importunum existimarent vel supervacaneum? quorum ex numero et ipse fui, qui tamen quid voluerim obscurum non est. Quid si conticuissent omnes rei magnitudine perculsi, cone minùs habuisset senatus in re tanta quod statueret, expectandusne populi nutus erat, ex quo tantorum exitus consiliorum penderet? enimverò supremum gentis concilium, ab universo populo ea mente adhibitum, ut impotentem regis dominatum coerceret, posteaquam efferatum et repugnantem bello cepisset, si recurrere ad jussa populi deberet, velit jubeatne de captivo hoste supplicium sumi, profectò qui rempublicam fortissimè recuperassent, quid aliud fecisse viderenter quàm in laqueos tyranni à populo, si fors ita ferret, absoluti sese præcipites dedisse? aut si accepta maximis de rebus decernendi summa potestate, de iis quæ præsertim vulgi captum superant, non dico ad populum (nam cum hac potestate ipsi populus jam sunt) sed ad multitudinem rursus referre cogerentur, quæ, imperitiæ suæ conscia, ad eos prius omnia retulerat, quis ultro citroque referendi finis esset? quis tandem in hoc Euripo consistendi locus? quod firmamentum inter libellos istiusmodi tot capitum levissimorum, quæ salus quassatis rebus hominum foret? quid si restituendum regno Carolum postulassent? cujusmodi libellos extitisse aliquot non supplices sed minaces fatendum est seditiosorum hominum, quorum nunc odium, nunc miseratio æquè stulta aut malitiosa esse solebat; horumne ratio habenda fuit? qui "ut cum rege colloquium institueretur, ingenti," inquis, "numero pagis relictis ad parlamenti fores accurrebant; quorum senatores, immisso milite, plurimos trucidarunt." Et Surrienses dicis paganos, qui nescio aliorumne malitia, agrestes ipsi, an sua improbitate impulsi, cum libello supplice bene poti, et comessabundi potiùs, quam aliquid petituri, per urbem ibant; mox curiæ fores, facto agmine, ferociter obsederunt; collocatos ibi milites stationibus deturbarunt, unum ad ipsas curiæ fores occiderunt, priusquam illos vel dicto vel facto quisquam lacessisset; inde meritò pulsi ac malè multati, haud ultra duos tresve occisi, vinolentiam potius quàm "libertatem spirantes." Passim concedis "potiores fuisse independentium partes, non numero, sed consilio et virtute militari." Unde ego et jure et merito superiores quoque fuisse contendo: nihil enim est naturæ convenientius, nihil justius, nihil humano generi utilius aut melius, quàm ut minor majori, non numerus numero, sed virtuti, consilium consilio cedat; qui prudentia, qui rerum usu, industria, atque virtute pollent, hi mea quidem sententia, quantumvis pauci, quantovis numero, plures erunt, et suffragiis ubique potiores. Multa sparsim inseris de "Cromuello," quæ cujusmodi sint infra videbimus; de reliquis responsum jampridem Salmasio est. Judicium quoque regis non prætermittis, quamvis et illud à mago tuo rhetore miserabiliter sit declamatum. Proceres, id est, regis purpuratos, et ministros ferè aulicos, à judicando rege ais abhorruisse: Nos id parùm referre, altero libro ostendimus. "Deinde curiarum judices erasos; quippe qui responderant esse contra Angliæ leges, regem judicio sisti." Nescio quid tunc responderint, scio quid jam approbent atque defendant: non est novum, judices, quos minimè decet, meticulosos esse. "Præficitur ergo sordidæ et sceleratæ curiæ par præses, obscurissimus et petulantissimus nebulo." Te verò tot vitiis et sceleribus obstrictum, immo meram spurcitiem, merum scelus, usque adeo obduxisse menti et sensibus callum, nisi tua mens potiùs tota callus est, ut in Deum atheus, et sacrorum contaminator, in homines inhumanus, cujusque optimi calumniator esse ausis, quid aliud est esse quàm germanum Iscariotam atque diabolum? Quamvis autem tua vituperatio laus summa sit, tamen præstantissimo viro cui oblatras, necnon amico mihi semper plurimùm colendo, nequaquam deero; quominus ab improbissimis perfugarum et Mororum linguis, quas, nisi causa reipublicæ nunquam sensisset, vindicem. Est Joannes Bradscianus, (quod nomen libertas ipsa, quacunque gentium colitur, memoriæ sempiternæ celebrandum commendavit,) nobili familia, ut satis notum est, ortus; unde patriis legibus addiscendis, primam omnem ætatem sedulò impendit; dein consultissimus causarum ac disertissimus patronus, libertatis et populi vindex acerrimus, et magnis reipublicæ negotiis est adhibitus, et incorrupti judicis munere aliquoties perfunctus: Tandem uti regis judicio præsidere vellet, à senatu rogatus, provinciam sanè periculosissimam non recusavit. Attulerat enim ad legum scientiam ingenium liberale, animum excelsum, mores integros ac nemini obnoxios; unde illud munus omni prope exemplo majus ac formidabilius, tot sicariorum pugionibus ac minis petitus, ita constanter, ita graviter, tanta animi cum præsentia ac dignitate gessit atque implevit, ut ad hoc ipsum opus, quod jam olim Deus edendum in hoc populo mirabili providentia decreverat, ab ipso Numine designatus atque factus videretur; et tyrannicidarum omnium gloriam tantum superaverit, quantò est humanius, quantò justius, ac majestate plenius, tyrannum judicare, quàm injudicatum occidere. Alioqui nec tristis, nec severus, sed comis ac placidus, personam tamen quam suscepit tantam, æqualis ubique sibi, ac veluti consul non unius anni, pari gravitate sustinet: ut non de tribunali tantùm, sed per omnem vitam judicare regem diceres. In consiliis ac laboribus publicis maximè omnium indefessus, multisque par unus; domi, si quis alius, pro suis facultatibus hospitalis ac splendidus, amicus longè fidelissimus, atque in omni fortuna certissimus, bene merentes quoscunque nemo citiùs aut libentiùs agnoscit, neque majore benevolentia prosequitur; nunc pios, nunc doctos, aut quavis ingenii laude cognitos, nunc militares etiam et fortes viros ad inopiam redactos suis opibus sublevat; iis si non indigent, colit tamen libens atque amplec-titur; alienas laudes perpetuò prædicare, suas tacere, solitus; hostium quoque civilium, si quis ad sanitatem rediit, quod experti sunt plurimi, nemo ignoscentior. Quòd si causa oppressi cujuspiam defendenda palam, si gratia aut vis potentiorum oppugnanda, si in quenquam bene meritum, ingratitudo publica objurganda sit, tum quidem in illo viro, vel facundiam vel constantiam nemo desideret, non patronum, non amicum, vel idoneum magis et intrepidum, vel disertiorem alium quisquam sibi optet; habet, quem non minæ dimovere recto, non metus aut munera proposito bono atque officio, vultusque ac mentis firmissimo statu dejicere valeant. Quibus virtutibus, et plerisque merito charus, et inimicissimis non contemnendus, gestarum egregiè rerum in republica laudem, dirupto te, More, tuique similibus, apud omnes tum exteros tum posteros, in omne ævum propagabit. Sed pergendum: Rex capite damnatus est: "contra hanc vesaniam Londini pulpita fere omnia detonare." Ligneo isto tonitru haud multum terres; istos Salmoneas nihil veremur, qui fictitium illud fulmen et arrogatum sibi, aliquando luent; graves profectò authores et sinceri, qui paulò ante ex iisdem pulpitis contra pluralistas et nonresidentes strepitu æquè horribili detonabant; paulò post, raptis hic sibi ternis, ille quaternis prælatorum sacerdotiis, quos tonando abegerant, atque inde nonresidentes necessario facti, eodem ipsi crimine tenebantur in quod detonabant, et sui quisque tonitrus bidental factus est: neque ullus adhuc pudor; nunc in vindicandis sibi decimis toti sunt; et sanè si decimarum tanta sitis est, censeo affatim decimandos: non terræ fructus tantùm, sed et maris fluctus sibi habeant decumanos. Iidem primò bellum suadebant in regem, ut in hostem exitio devotum; mox capto hosti, et imputatæ à semetipsis toties cædis ac sanguinis effusi damnato, parci volebant utpote regi. Ita in pulpitis tanquam in taberna quadam meritoria, quæ volunt mercimonia, quæ volunt scruta, vendunt popello; et quod miserius est, quæ jam vendidere, quotiès volunt reposcunt. At "Scoti regem sibi reddi flagitabant, commemorant senatus promissa quando Anglis regem tradiderant." Atqui ego vel Scotos etiam fatentes habeo, nulla omnino promissa publica intercessisse, cum rex traderetur; et turpe sanè fuisset Anglis, regem suum à Scotis in Anglia conductitiis, reddendum non fuisse nisi per conditiones: quid? quòd ipsa parlamenti responsio ad Scotorum cartulas id. Mart. 1647, edita, ullam hac de re interpositam ab se fidem, quo pacto rex tractandus esset, dilucidè negat; indignum quippe censuisse, non nisi ea lege sua jura obtineri à Scotis potuisse. Attamen "regem reddi sibi flagitabant." Mites, credo, homines frangebantur animo, desiderium sui regis ferre diutiùs non poterant: immo verò iidem illi, cùm ab initio horum in Britannia motuum, de jure regio haud semel in parlamento retulissent, essetque ab omnibus assensum, ob tres maximè causas regem privari regno posse, si tyrannus existat, si fundum regium alienet, si suos deserat, circa annum 1645. Parlamento Perthæ habito sententias rogare cœperunt; sitne rex, quem sanctis infestum esse constet, communione ecclesiæ interdicendus? verùm antequam ea de re quicquam decerneretur, Montrossius ad eam urbem cum copiis accedens conventum disturbavit. Iidem, in suo quodam ad Cromuellum imperatorem responso, An. 1650, fatentur punitum jure regem, juris tantummodo formam fuisse vitiosam, eo quòd ipsi in illius judicii consortium non vocarentur. Hoc ergo facinus sine illis atrox, cum illis egregium fuisset, ex eorum quippe nutu fas atque nefas pendebat, justum atque injustum definiendum erat: quid isti, obsecro, rege sibi reddito lenius in eum statuissent? At "Delegati Scotici à senatu Anglico responsum hoc prius tulerant, nolle se regni Anglicani formam immutare, postea tamen respondere se tunc noluisse, nunc velle, prout salus reipublicæ postularet." Et rectè quidem responderunt: quid tu hinc? "hæc stropha," inquis, "omnia fœdera, commercium, ipsumque sensum communem evertit." Tuum quidem evertit, qui nescis inter libera promissa, et pactam fœderis fidem quid intersit: Angli de forma reipublicæ suæ futura, cujus rationem Scotis reddere necesse non erat, quod tum ipsis videbatur, liberè quidem respondent; nunc salus reipublicæ aliud suadebat; si fidem, si jusjurandum populo datum violare nollent. Utrum sanctius obligare putas, liberumne de forma reipublicæ futura datum Scoticis legatis responsum, an necessarium de salute reipublicæ procuranda datum suo populo jusjurandum et summam fidem? Licere autem parlamento vel senatui, prout expedit, consilia mutare, quoniam quicquid nos affirmamus, anabaptisticum tibi est et monstrosum, malo ex Cicerone audias pro Plancio. 'Stare omnes debemus tanquam in orbe aliquo reipub-'licæ; qui quoniam versetur, eam deligere partem de-'bemus, ad quam nos illius utilitas salusque converterit. 'Et statim. Neque enim inconstantis puto, sententiam, 'tanquam aliquod navigium atque cursum, ex reipub-'licæ tempestate moderari. Ego verò hæc didici, hæc 'vidi, hæc scripta legi, hæc de sapientissimis et claris-'simis viris et in hac republica, et in aliis civitatibus 'monumenta nobis literæ prodiderunt, non semper 'easdem sententias, ab iisdem, sed quascunque reipub-'licæ status, inclinatio temporum, ratio concordiæ pos-'tularet, esse defendendas.' Hæc Marcus Tullius: sed tu, More, Hortensium mavis; hæc illæ ætatis quæ civile maximè prudentia floruerunt; quæ si sequuntur anabaptistæ, mea quidem sententia sapiunt. Quàm multa alia possem proferre, quæ à ministerculis hisce et suo Salmasio, si res non verba spectemus, planè indocto, pro anabaptisticis damnantur. At "nihilo," inquis, "plus potuerant potentissimi Belgii fœderati ordines, qui per oratores suos et prece et pretio oblato strenuè allaborarunt sacrum regis caput redimere." Velle profectò justitiam sic redimere, idem erat atque regem salvum nolle: verùm didicerunt, non omnes esse mercatores; non adeò vendacem esse senatum Anglicanum. Quod autem ad judicium regis, "ut plurima," inquis, "Christo similia Carolus pateretur, milites in eum ingeminant ludibria." Plura quidem passus est similia Christus maleficis, quàm Carolus Christo; et multa istiusmodi jactabantur vulgò ab iis quibus ad invidiam facti majorem excitandam, quidvis fingere aut fictum referre studium erat: fac tamen gregarios milites insolentiùs se gessisse; non id continuò in causam est conferendum. "Mactatum vero esse quempiam ad pedes regis prætereuntis apprecantem ut Deus ejus misereretur," nec antea audivi unquam, nec convenire quenquam adhuc potui qui audivisset: quin immo tribunum ipsum, qui toto illius judicii tempore custodiis præfuit, regisque à latere vix discessit, interrogandum hac de re curavi: is denique nec audisse se hoc antea, et pro certo scire falsissimum id esse, constanter asseverabat. Ex quo intelligi potest tuarum narrationum fides, etiam in reliquis quàm firma sit. Nam in benevolentia quoque et adoratione, si posses, Carolo post mortem procuranda, quàm in odio nobis vel iniquissimè conflando haud multo veracior inveniens. "Auditum," ais, "fuisse regem in fatali pegmate episcopo Londinensi ingeminantem, memento, memento." Id regis judices anxios nempe habuit, quid illa ultimum iterata vox sibi voluisset; accersitur, ut ais, episcopus, et illud geminum "memento" quid sibi quæsivisset, additis minis, enuntiare jubetur. Is primò (sic enim fingi expediebat) ex composito nimirum delicias fecit, et, quasi arcanum quoddam, prodere recusavit. Cum illi vehementiùs instarent, id quasi metu sibi expressum, et nolenti extortum, ægrè tandem edidit, quod revera quovis pretio divulgatum vellet. "Jusserat me," inquiens, "rex, ut si possem ad filium pervenire, hoc supremum morientis patris mandatum ad eum perferrem, ut regno et potestati suæ restitutus, vobis suæ necis authoribus ignosceret: hoc me meminisse, rex iterum atque iterum jussit." O magis, regemne dicam pietatis, an episcopum rimarum plenum! qui rem tam secretò in pegmate suæ fidei commissam ut effutiret, tam facilè expugnari potuit. At ô taciturne! jampridem Carolus hoc idem inter alia præcepta filio mandaverat, in illa Icone Basilica; quem librum ideo scriptum satis apparet, ut omni cum diligentia nobis vel invitis secretum illud, qua ostentatione simulatum erat, eadem paulò pòst evulgaretur. Sed video plane decrevisse vos Carolum quendam absolutissimum, si non Stuartum hunc, at saltem hyperboreum aliquem et fabulosum, fucatis quibuslibet coloribus depictum, imperitis rerum obtrudere: ita fabellam hanc velut acroama quoddam, diverbiis et sententiolis pulchrè distinctum, nescio quem ethologum imitatus, ad inescandas vulgi aures putidè concinnasti. Ego verò, ut non negaverim interrogatum fortasse obiter ab uno vel altero concessorum hac de re episcopum, ita accersitum, dedita opera vel à concilio vel ab illo judicum collegio, quasi id omnes curassent, aut sollicitè quæsivissent non comperio. Sed demus inde quæ vis: dederit in pegmate suprema hæc episcopo mandata, ut suæ necis authoribus ignosceretur, perferenda ad filium Carolus: quid tam egregium aut singulare præter cæteros eò loci deductos fecit? quotusquisque est morientium in pegmate, qui peracturus jam vitæ fabulam, cùm hæc mortalia quàm vana sint videt, non idem faciat; et inimicitias, iras, odia, tanquam ex scena quadam jam exiturus, libens non deponat, aut saltem simulet, ut vel misericordiam, vel innocentiæ opinionem suæ in animis hominum relinquat? Simulasse Carolum, neque unquam ex animo, et sincero mentis proposito tale mandatum dedisse filio, "ut suæ necis authoribus ignosceret," vel si hoc palàm aliud tamen clanculum mandasse, argumentis non levibus demonstrari potest: nam filius, alioqui plus satis patri obsequens, patris gravissimo atque ultimo præcepto tam religiosè sibi per episcopum tradito, haud dubiè paruisset: quì autem paruit, cujus vel jussu vel authoritate duo legati nostri, alter in Hollandia, alter in Hispania, et hic ne suspicione quidem ulla regiæ necis reus, trucidati sunt? qui denique haud semel scripto publico edixit atque omnibus palam fecit, se nolle patris sui interfectoribus ullo pacto veniam concedere? Hanc igitur narratiunculam tuam vide an veram esse velis; quæ quo magis collaudat patrem, eo magis vituperat filium. Nunc instituti oblitus, non regii sanguinis ad cœlum, sed populi senatum clamores ementiris, odiosissimus post Salmasium in republica aliena pragmaticus et ardelio, qui tam fœdè præsertim res tuas domi agas. Tuane voce, impurissime, populus pro se utatur, cujus halitum ipsum oris lue venerea fœtidum purus omnis aversaretur? tu vero perfugarum ac perditorum voces populo attribuis; et quod agyrta peregrinus ad coronam solet, vilissimorum duntaxat animalium voces imitaris. Quis autem negat ea posse tempora sæpiùs accidere, in quibus civium longè major numerus improborum sit; qui Catilinam vel Antonium, quàm saniorem senatus partem sequi malint; neque idcirco boni cives obniti contra, et fortiter facere non debebunt, sui magis officii, quàm paucitatis rationem ducentes: tuam ergo tam bellam pro nostro populo oratiunculam, ne charta omnino pereat, in annales Volusi suadeo inseras; nobis rhetorculo tam hircoso atque olido, non est usus. Dehinc injuriarum in ecclesiam postulamur. "Exercitus est omnium hæreseωn Lerna." Qui non maledicunt, exercitum nostrum ut fortissimum, ita modestissimum ac religiosissimum esse confitentur: aliis in castris ferè potatur, variis libidinibus indulgetur, rapitur, alea luditur, juratur et perjuratur: in his nostris quod datur otii, disquirendæ veritati impenditur, sacræ scripturæ invigilatur; nec quisquam pulchrius existimat hostem ferire, quàm se atque alios cœlestium cognitione rerum erudire, aut bellicam magis quàm evangelicam militiam exercere. Et sanè si proprium belli usum consideramus, quid aliud magis deceat milites? qui ideo constituti sunt atque conscripti, ut essent legum defensores, paludati justitiæ satellites, ecclesiæ propugnatores: quid illis, non ferocius aut truculentius, sed civilius aut humanius esse oporteat? qui non bellum serere ac metere, sed pacem et incolumitatem humano generi arare, vero ac proprio fine laborum suorum debent. Quòd siquos ad hæc præclara instituta aspirantes vel alienus error, vel sua animi infirmitas transversos abducit, in eos, non ferro sæviendum, sed rationibus ac monitis precibus quoque ad Deum fusis enitendum, cujus est solius omnes animo errores dispellere, et cœlestem veritatis lucem, cui volet impertire. Hæreses quidem, sic verè dictas, nos nullas approbamus, ne omnes quidem toleramus; extirpatas etiam volumus, sed quibus convenit modis, præceptis nimirum et saniore doctrina, ut in mente sitas, non ferro ac flagris quasi ex corpore evellendas. "Altera," inquis, "par nostra injuria est in temporali, quod vocant, ecclesiæ fundo." Percontare Belgas vel etiam Germaniæ superioris protestantes, numquid ab ecclesiæ bonis abstinuerint; in quos Cæsar Austriacus quoties bellum movet, vix alium quærit belli titulum, quàm ut bona ecclesiæ restitui jubeat. Verùm illa profectò non ecclesiæ, sed ecclesiasticorum duntaxat bona fuere, qui hoc maximè sensu clerici, vel etiam holoclerici, ut qui sortem totam invasissent, rectius nominari poterant; immo lupi veriùs plerique eorum, quàm aliud quidvis erant dicendi; luporum autem bona, vel congestas potiùs prædas majorum ex superstitione partas, quam per tot sæcula quæstui habuerunt, in usus transferre belli à semetipsis conflati, nefas non erat, quando aliud non erat reliquum, unde sumptus belli tam gravis ac diuturni suppeterent. Atqui "expectabatur, ut episcopis ereptæ opes in pastores ecclesiarum erogarentur." Expectabant, scio, illi, et avebant omnia in se transfundi: nulla enim est vorago tam profunda, quæ non expleri citiùs quàm clericorum avaritia possit. Aliis fortasse in locis, haud æquè ministris provisum; nostris jam satis superque bene erat; oves potiùs appellandi quàm pastores, pascuntur magis quàm pascunt; pinguia illis plerumque omnia, ne ingenio quidem excepto; decimis enim saginantur, improbato ab aliis omnibus ecclesiis more; Deoque sic diffidunt, ut eas malint per magistratum atque per vim suis gregibus extorquere, quàm vel divinæ providentiæ, vel ecclesiarum benevolentiæ et gratitudini debere; atque inter hæc tamen et apud discipulos et apud discipulas, tam crebrò convivantur, ut quid domicœnium sit, aut domiprandium penè nesciant: hinc itaque luxuriant plerique, non egent; liberique eorum et conjuges luxu et lautitiis, cum divitum liberis atque conjugibus certant: hanc novis latifundiis adauxisse luxuriam, idem prorsus fuisset, ac si quis novum venenum (quam olim pestem sub Constantino vox missa cœlitùs, deflevit) in ecclesiam infudisset. Proximum est ut de injuriis in Deum, quarum tres maximè nominantur, de fiducia nimirum divinæ opis, "de precibus etiam atque jejuniis," reddenda nobis ratio sit. Verùm ex ore tuo, hominum corruptissime, te redarguo; illudque apostoli abs te prolatum in te retorqueo, Quis es tu qui "alienum servum judicas?" coram domino nostro sine stemus vel cadamus. Illud insuper addam Davidis prophetæ, cùm flens affligo jejunio animam meam, tum hoc vertitur in summum probrum mihi. Cæteras hac de re tuas garritiones febriculosas, quas nemo bis legat, minutim persequi si vellem, haud leviùs profectò ipse peccem. Nec minus aliena sunt quæ de successibus prolixè oscitas: Cave tibi, More, et vide, ne post Pontianos sudores, gravedinem fortè contraxeris aut polypum; metuendum, ne, ut Salmasius ille magnus nuper, thermas refrigeres. Equidem de successu sic paucis respondeo; causam successu neque probari bonam, neque argui malam: nos causam nostram non ex eventu, sed eventum ex causa judicari postulamus. Jam rationes politicas desumis tibi tractandas, mancipium cathedrarium, immo cathedralitium; injurias nimirum nostras, in omnes reges ac populos. Quas? nobis enim nihil tale propositum erat; res nostras tantummodo egimus, aliorum missas fecimus; siquid ad vicinos ab exemplo nostro boni redundavit, haud invidemus; si quid secùs non nostra id culpa, sed abutentium evenire credimus. Regis aut populi, te balatronem suarum injuriarum interpretem, quinam tandem constituerunt? certè oratores eorum ac legatos, alii in senatu, ipse in concilio cum audirentur sæpè audivi non solùm de suis injuriis nihil querentes, sed amicitiam nostram ac societatem ultrò petentes; quinetiam regum suorum ac principum nomine, de rebus nostris nobis gratulantes, etiam bene precantes, pacem ac diuturnitatem, atque eosdem felices successus, in perpetuum exoptantes. Non inimicorum hæ voces, non eorum qui odissent, ut tu prædicas; aut tu mendacii, quod in te levissimum est, aut reges ipsi fraudum ac malarum artium, quod illis inhonestissimum foret, damnentur necesse est. Verùm scripta nostra objectas confitentium, "dedisse nos exemplum populis omnibus salutare, tyrannis omnibus formidandum." Immane crimen profectò narras; idem ferè atque si dixisset quispiam, Discite justitiam moniti, et non temnere Divos.

Numquid dici potuit perniciosius? "hæc Cromuellius ad Scotos post Dumbarrense prælium scripsit." Et se quidem et illa nobili victoria dignè. "Ejusmodi sesamo et papavere conspersæ sunt infames Miltoni paginæ." Illustrem tu quidem collegam semper mihi adjungis, et in hoc facinore parem planè facis, nonnunquam et superiorem; quo ego nomine cohonestari me maximè abs te putem, siquid à te honestum posset proficisci. "Crematæ vero," inquis, "sunt istæ paginæ à carnifice Parisiensi supremi senatus authoritate." Nequaquam id comperi à senatu factum, sed ab officiario quodam urbico, locotenente civili nescio an incivili, cui clerici quidam, ignavissima animalia, authores fuere; tam ex dissito atque longinquo, abdomini suo, quod aliquando precor evenire possit, augurantes. Censes non potuisse nos vicissim Salmasii defensionem regiam cremasse? potuissem sanè vel ipse à magistratibus nostris hoc facilè impetrasse, nisi illam contumeliam contemptu potiùs ulciscendam existimassem: vos ignem igne properantes extinguere, Herculeum præbuistis rogum, unde clarior exurgerem; nos consultiùs, defensionis regiæ frigus calfaciendum non censuimus. Illud miror, tam esse majorum dissimiles factos Tolosates (nam et Tolosæ combustos nos accepimus) ut qua in urbe sub Raimundis comitibus, et libertas et religio defensa olim tam insigniter est, in ea nunc et libertatis et religionis defensio combureretur. "Utinam et Scriptor," inquis. Itane ergastulum? et ego parem ne reddam tibi salutem, More, tu egregiè cavisti; ut qui nigrioribus multò ignibus jamdudum pereas: urunt te adulteria tua, urunt stupra, urunt perjuria, quorum ope desponsatam tibi stupro fœminam perfidus excussisti; urunt perditissimi furores, qui impulerunt te, ut sacrosancta munia facinorosus concupisceres, et imperspectum Domini corpus incestis manibus sacerdos pollueres; sanctitatem etiam simulans, in sanctitatis simulatores, dira omnia hoc tuo clamore denunciares; tuumque execrabile caput, tuamet ipsius damnatum sententia irretires: his tu sceleribus et infamiis totus flagras, his tu flammis furialibus dies atque noctes torreris, dasque nobis pœnas quibus graviores imprecari tibi nullus hostis potest. Me interim concremationes vestræ non lædunt, non tangunt, et istis ignominiis habeo complura quæ opponam grata meo animo atque jucunda. Una me curia, unus fortè lictor Parisiensis, malarum avium impulsu, combussit; at quamplurimi per totam Galliam viri boni atque docti nihilo minus legunt, approbant, amplectuntur? quamplurimi per immensum Germaniæ totius tractum, libertatis ferè domicilium, per cæteras quoque regiones, quàcunque ejus vestigia ulla adhuc manent; quin et ipsa Græcia, ipsæ Athenæ Atticæ, quasi jam redivivæ, nobilissimi alumni sui Philaræ voce, applausere. Hoc etiam verè possum dicere, quo primùm tempore nostra defensio est edita, et legentium studia incaluere, nullum vel principis vel civitatis legatum in urbe tum fuisse, qui non vel fortè obvio mihi gratularetur, vel conventum apud se cuperet vel domi inviseret. Tuos verò nefas sit præterire manes, Adriane Pauui, qui legatus ad nos summo cum honore missus, Hollandiæ decus atque ornamentum, summam in me ac singularem benevolentiam tuam, etiamsi videre nunquam contigerit, multis sæpè nuntiis significandam curasti. Hoc verò etiam sæpius recolere memoria juvat, quod sine Dei propitio numine accidere arbitror nunquam potuisse; mihi, qui contra reges, ut videbatur, scripseram, majestatem ipsam regiam placidè annuisse; meæque integritati, necnon sententiæ, ut veriori, testimonium divino proximum perhibuisse. Quid enim verear hoc dicere, quoties augustissimam reginam illam, quantis cum laudibus in ore omnium versetur, mécum cogito. Equidem Atheniensem illum sapientissimum, cui me tamen non confero, ne ipsius quidem Pythii testimonio, quàm me illius judicio ornatiorem existimem. Quòd si mihi quidem hæc scribere adolescenti contigisset, et oratoribus idem quod poëtis liceret, haud dubitassem profectò sortem meam deorum sorti nonnullorum anteferre: quippe illos de forma duntaxat aut de musica deos, humano sub judice, contendisse; me hominem in certamine longè omnium præclarissimo, dea judice, superiorem discessisse. Sic me cohonestatum, nemo nisi carnifex ignominiosè audeat tractare, tam qui jusserit, quàm qui fecerit. Hic vehementer laboras, ut ne facta nostra Belgicorum pro libertate facinorum exemplo tueri queamus; quod à Salmasio quoque frustra laboratum est: cui quod tunc respondi, idem tibi nunc responsum volo; Falli qui nos opinatur cujusquam exemplo niti; Belgarum pro libertate facinora adjuvisse sæpius ac fovisse, æmulari necesse nunquam habuisse; siquid pro libertate fortiter faciendum est, authores ipsi nobis sumus, præire, non sequi alios assueti. Tu verò etiam ad bellum contra nos tressis orator, stultissimis argumentis, et te verberone dignis, Gallos hortaris: "Nostros," inquis, "legatos excipere Gallicus spiritus nunquam sustinebit." Sustinuit, quod plus est, suos jam ter et amplius ad nos ultrò mittere: Galli igitur generosi, ut solent; tu degener et spurius, politicarum rationum rudis ac falsus deprehenderis. Hinc id agis ut demonstres, "à fœderatis ordinibus ex composito rem in longum duci, eosque nobiscum nec fœdus nec bellum velle." Atqui interest profectò ipsorum ordinum, non pati consilia sua sic nudari, et, ut ita dicam, vitiari à Genevense perfuga apud se stabulante, qui si diutiùs toleretur, non ancillis modò, sed consiliis etiam publicis stuprum videtur illaturus; cùm ipsi fraterna atque sincera omnia præ se ferant; nunc pacem, quæ vota sunt bonorum omnium, perpetuam nobiscum redintegraverint. "Jucundum erat," inquit, "videre quibus ludibriis, quibus periculis furciferi illi legati," Anglorum scilicet, "quotidie conflictarentur, non modo ab Anglis regiis, &c. sed maxime omnium à Batavis." Nisi exploratum nobis jam diu esset quibusnam et prioris legati Dorislai cædes, et duorum postea acceptæ injuriæ referendæ sint, en delatorem, qui hospites et altores suos etiam falsò deferat: Hunccine apud vos, Batavi, non modò venereum in ecclesia ministrum, sed sanguinarium etiam, nec violandi solùm juris omnis hortatorem, sed violati quoque falsum indicem ac proditorem ali?

Ultimus accusationum titulus est "nostra injuria in reformatas ecclesias." At verò quî magis nostra in illas quàm illarum in nos? si exemplo instes, certè si ab ipsis Valdensibus et Tolosanis, ad Rupellanam usque famem monumenta repetas, nos omnium ecclesiarum ultimi reperiemur contra tyrannos arma sumpsisse, at primi capite damnasse. Sanè quia nobis hoc primis in manu adhuc fuit: quid illi, si data similis facultas fuisset, fuissent facturi, opinor ne ipsos quidem satis nôsse. Equidem in ea sum sententia: contra quem bellum gerimus, eum, siquis rationis aut judicii usus sit, hostem à nobis judicari; hostem autem tam interficere quàm oppugnare eodem semper jure licuisse: Tyrannus igitur cùm non noster solùm, sed totius propè generis humani publicus hostis sit, eum quo jure armis oppugnari, eodem posse et interfici. Nec verò hæc mea unius sententia est, aut nova; eandem et aliis olim sive prudentia sive sensus communis dictavit. Hinc pro Rabirio M. Tullius: "Si interfici Saturninum nefas fuit, arma sumpta esse contra Saturninum sine scelere non possunt; si arma jure sumpta concedis, interfectum jure concedas necesse est." Plura hac de re et suprà dixi, et sæpè aliàs, et per se res obscura non est: Ex quibus quid Galli etiam, eadem data occasione fuissent facturi, ipse queas divinare. Addo et hoc amplius: quicunque armis tyrannum oppugnant, iidem, quantum in se est, et interficiunt: immo, quicquid vel sibi vel aliis ineptè satis persuadere cupiunt, jam interficere. Sed et doctrina hæc nobis haud magis quàm Gallis, quos tu hoc piaculo cupis eximere, debetur: unde enim Francogallia illa, nisi ex Gallia, unde Vindiciæ contra tyrannos? qui liber etiam Bezæ vulgò tribuitur; undè alii, quorum meminit Thuanus? tu tamen, quasi ego solus, "id satagit," inquis, "Miltonus, cujus ego piacularem vesaniam pro meritis excepissem." Tu excepisses, furcifer? cujus nefaria flagitia si ecclesia illa Middelburgensis, te pastore infamis et infelix, pro meritis excepisset, jamdudum te Satanæ mandasset; si pro meritis excepisset magistratus, jamdudum adulteria patibulo pendens luisses: Et luiturus propediem sane videris; evigilavit enim, ut audio nuper, tua illa ecclesia Middelburgensis, suæque famæ consuluit, teque caprimulgum pastorem, immo hircum potius olentissimum, ablegavit ab se in malam crucem; hinc et magistratus Amsterodamensis pulpitum quoque interdixit tibi, orchestram tuam; tuumque illud os impudicum eo ex loco ad summam omnium bonorum offensionem conspici, illam impiam vocem vetuit in sacro publicè audiri: restat jam tibi sola Græcarum literarum professio; et hæc quoque brevi eripienda, præter unam illam literam, cujus non professor, sed discipulus mox pensilis meritò futurus es. Neque hæc iratus tibi ominor, sed duntaxat jus dico: maledicis enim tantum abest ut talibus offendamur qualis tu es, ut tales semper nobis vel exoptemus; immo divina planè benevolentia fieri arbitremur, ut qui nos acerrimè clamitarunt, tales potissimum semper extiterint; qui maledicendo non infamant, sed honestant, sed laudant, non laudando certè maledixissent. Sed irruentem modò quid te retinuit tam fortem homuncionem? "Nisi mihi," inquis, "religio fuisset in magni Salmasii provinciam excurrere, cui solida de magno scilicet adversario victoria relinquetur." Siquidem et ille et ego nunc magnus tibi videor, eò difficilior provincia, præsertim mortuo, fortassis ero; de victoria, modò veritas vincat, parum solicitus. Interim tu clamitas; "parricidium in doctrinam vertunt, eamque reformatarum ecclesiarum consensione cupiunt quidem, non audent aperto ore defendere; fuit, inquit Miltonus, etiam summorum hæc sententia theologorum, qui ipsi reformandæ ecclesiæ authores fuere." Fuit, inquam, et id fusius docui in eo libro qui nostro idiomate Tenor sive Tenura Regum et Magistratuum inscriptus est, secundùm editus, et alibi: nunc actum toties, agendi fastidium cepit: illic ex Luthero, Zuinglio, Calvino, Bucero, Martyre, Paræo, citantur ipsa verbatim loca; ex illo denique Cnoxo, quem "unum," me, "Scotum" ais "innuere, quemque hac in re reformatos omnes, præsertim Gallos, illa ætate condemnasse." Atqui ille contrà, quod ibi narratur, se illam doctrinam nominatim à Calvino, summisque aliis ea tempestate theologis, quibuscum familiariter consueverat, hausisse affirmat: plura etiam illic nostrorum, regnante Maria et Elizabetha, sinceriorum theologorum in eandem sententiam deprompta reperies. Tu verò tandem conceptis ad Deum precibus malè prolixis peroras impius abominandis; et os illud adulterum, obduratus cœlo offers: sino te facilè, neque interpello; major enim cumulus ad impietatem tuam accedere non potuit. Revertor nunc ad id quod suprà pollicitus sum, et objecta Cromuello præcipua crimina quæ sunt, in medio hic ponam; ut sparsa quàm fuerint levia possit intelligi, quæ collecta nullum pondus in se habent. "Coram pluribus testibus pronunciavit sibi in animo esse, monarchias omnes evertere, reges omnes exitio dare." Quæ tua sit narrationum fides, jam aliquoties vidimus; dixit fortasse tibi perfugarum aliquis Cromuellum ita dixisse; ex illis multis testibus nullum nominas: quod itaque sine authore maledicis, suopte vitio ruit. Non is est Cromuellus, quem de suis jam factis ullus unquam vaniloquum audierit; tantùm abest ut infecta, quæ sunt, tamque difficilia, de iis insolentius quicquam promittere ac minitari consueverit: sanè ista tibi qui narrarunt, nisi voluntate atque natura magis quàm consilio mendaces essent, hoc saltem quod ab ingenio ejus alienissimum est non affinxissent. Regibus autem, quos ut sibi caveant frequenter mones, licebit cum saluti prospexerint suæ, spreto te monitore tam imperito, non sermunculos ex trivio arripere, sed rationes se dignas inire, quibus quid sua intersit faciliùs perspexerint. Alterum est crimen persuasisse regi Cromuellum, "ut in insulam Vectim clanculum se subduceret." Constat regem Carolum rem suam multis aliàs rebus, ter fuga perdidisse; primùm cum Londino Eboracum fugit, deinde cum ad Scotos in Anglia conductitios, postremò cum ad insulam Vectim. At hujus postremæ suasor erat Cromuellus. Optimè; sed tamen ego regios illos primùm miror, qui Carolum totiès affirmare non dubitant fuisse prudentissimum, et eundem simul vix unquam suæ spontis; sive apud amicos sive inimicos, in aula vel in castris, in aliena ferè potestate semper fuisse; nunc uxoris, nunc episcoporum, nunc purpuratorum, nunc militum, denique hostium: pejora plerumque consilia, et pejorum fermè sequutum; Carolo persuadetur, Carolo imponitur, Carolo illuditur, metus incutitur, spes vana ostenditur, velut præda omnium communis, tam amicorum quàm hostium, agitur et fertur Carolus. Aut hæc è scriptis suis tollant, aut sagacitatem Caroli prædicare desistant. Fateor deinde, quamvis prudentia atque consilio præstare pulchrum sit, tamen ubi respublica factionibus laborat, suis incommodis haud carere; et consultissimum quemque eo magis obnoxium calumniis utriusque partis reddere: hoc sæpe Cromuello obfuit; hinc presbyteriani, inde hostes quicquid in se durius fieri putant, non id communi senatus consilio, sed Cromuello soli imputant; immo siquid per imprudentiam ipsi malè gerunt, id dolis et fraudibus Cromuelli assignare non erubescunt; culpa omnis in eum derivatur, omnis in eum faba cuditur. Et tamen certissimum est, fugam ad Vectim regis Caroli, absenti tum aliquot milibus passuum Cromuello, tam novam accidisse et inopinatum, quàm cuilibet ex senatu tum in urbe versanti, quem ut de re inopinatissima sibi recens allata per literas certiorem fecit. Res autem ita se habuit; exercitûs universi vocibus rex territus, qui eum nullis officiis suis aut pollicitis factum meliorem, ad supplicium poscere jam tunc cœperat, statuit cum duobus tantummodo conseiis nocturna fuga sibi consulere: verum fugiendi certior, quàm quo fugeret, per comitum suorum vel imperitiam vel timiditatem, inops consilii quo se reciperet, Hamundo Vectis insulæ præsidi se ultro dedidit; ea spe, facilem sibi ex ea insula, parato clam navigio, transitum in Galliam aut in Belgium fore. Hæc ego de fuga regis in Vectim ex iis comperi, quibus rem totam pernoscendi quàm proxima facultas erat. Sed et hoc quoque criminosum est, quòd per Cromuellum, "Angli ingentem de Scotis parti sunt victoriam." Non "parti sunt," More, sed sine solœcismo claram sibi pepererunt; tu verò cogita, quàm Scotis cruentum illud prælium fuerit, cujus tu mentionem tantummodo facere nequivisti, quin instabile præ metu professorium caput tuum ad Prisciani pluteum nutando allideres. Sed videamus porro quantum flagitium Cromuelli fuerit, Scotos irrumpentes, imperium sibi in Anglos jam pollicentes, nobilissimo post multas ætates prœlio vicisse. "Inter has turbas, dum Cromuellus cum exercitu abest:" Immò dum hostem in Angliæ viscera jam progressum, jam parlamento ipsi imminentem Cromuellus, etiam deficientes Cambros ad fidem reducendo, et obsidione longa defessus, ut vidit, ut vicit, ut gloriosissimè fudit, presbyterianos "tædium Cromuelli ceperat:" Hîc verum dicis; dum is communem hostem cum vitæ discrimine propulsat, hi militantem pro sese et in acie fortiter dimicantem confictis criminibus accusant domi; et Huntingtonum centurionem quendam in ejus caput subornant. Quis tantæ ingratitudinis fœditatem sine fremitu vel audire possit? Eorundem instinctu, nequissimum genus homuncionum ac petulantissimum, tyrones tabernarum maximo numero curiæ fores obsident: senatum, quicquid ipsis videtur (quo quid indignius?) clamore suo ac minis cogunt decernere: jamque reducem à Scotis victorem fortissimum, aut exulantem, aut pœnas indignissimas dantem vidissemus Camillum nostrum; nisi Fairfaxius imperator, invictissimi legati sui tantum dedecus perferendum non censuisset; nisi cunctus exercitus, et is quoque satis ingratè habitus, tam atrocia prohibuisset. Urbem itaque ingressus, urbicos nullo negotio repressit; Scotorum hostium partibus addictos meritò senatu movit: pars reliqua, insolentiis tabernariorum jam liberata, colloquium Vectense, contra senatûs consultum edictumque publicum cum rege initum, rescindit: Huntingtonus autem ille accusator, impunis et sui juris relictus, tandem pœnitentia ductus, ipse sua sponte à Cromuello veniam petiit, et à quibus esset subornatus ultro fassus est. Hæc ferè sunt quæ fortissimo patriæ liberatori, nisi ad quæ supra respondi, crimina objiciuntur; quæ quid valeant videtis. Verùm ego tantum virum, deque hac republica tam insignitè meritum, si duntaxat nihil mali commisisse defendam, nihil egero; cum præsertim non reipublicæ solùm, sed et mea quoque intersit, ut qui eadem infamia tam prope sim conjunctus, quàm optimum eum, atque omni laude dignissimum, gentibus, quoad possum, omnibus atque sæculis demonstrare. Est "Oliverius Cromuellus" genere nobili atque illustri ortus: nomen republica olim sub regibus benè administrata clarum, religione simul orthodoxa vel restituta tum primùm apud nos vel stabilita clarius: Is matura jam atque firmata ætate, quam et privatus traduxit, nulla re magis quàm religionis cultu purioris, et integritate vitæ cognitus, domi in occulto creverat; et ad summa quæque tempora fiduciam Deo fretam et ingentem animum tacito pectore aluerat. Parlamento ab rege ultimùm convocato, sui municipii suffragiis lectus senatorium munus obtinuit; illic rectissimis sententiis consiliisque firmissimis statim innotuit: ubi ad arma deventum est, delata sua opera, equitum turmæ præficitur; sed bonorum virorum concursu, ad ejus signa undique confluentium, auctus copiis, et gestarum rerum magnitudine et celeritate conficiendi summos ferè duces brevi superavit. Nec mirum; sui enim noscendi exercitatissimus miles, quicquid intus hostis erat, spes vanas, metus, cupiditates, apud se prius aut deleverat, aut subactas jam habuerat; in se priùs imperator, sui victor, de se potissimùm triumphare didicerat; itaque ad externum hostem, quo primùm die in castra venit, veteranus, et in illa omni castrensi militia consummatus, accessit. Non est ut in his possim orationis carceribus, tot urbes captas, tot prælia et quidem maxima, in quibus nunquam victus aut fusus, Britannicum orbem totum continuis victoriis peragravit, pro dignitate rerum exequi; quæ justæ sanè historiæ grande opus, et iterum quasi campum quendam dicendi, et exæquata rebus narrandi spatia desiderant. Sufficit hoc unicum singularis et prope divinæ virtutis indicium, tantam in eo viguisse sive animi vim atque ingenii, sive disciplinæ non ad militarem modo, sed ad Christianam potiùs normam et sanctimoniam institutæ, ut omnes ad sua castra tanquam ad optimum non militaris duntaxat scientiæ, sed religionis ac pietatis gymnasium, vel jam bonos et fortes undique attraheret, vel tales, ipsius maximè exemplo, efficeret: eosque toto belli, pacis etiam nonnunquam intermediæ tempore, per tot animorum et rerum vicissitudines, non largitionibus et militari licentia, sed authoritate et solo stipendio, adversantibus licèt multis, in officio contineret et adhuc contineat: qua quidem laude neque Cyro, neque Epaminondæ, neque antiquorum ulli excellentissimo imperatori laus ulla major attribui solet. Hinc enim exercitum, quo nemo minori spatio majorem aut instructiorem, sibi comparavit, et per omnia dicto audientem, et civibus gratum atque dilectum; et hostibus, armatis quidem formidolosum, pacatis admirabilem, quorum in agris atque sub tectis ita non gravis, et sine omni maleficio versabatur, ut cum regiorum suorum vim, vinolentiam, impietatem, atque libidines, cogitarent, mutata sorte læti, non nunc hostes, sed hospites advenisse crederent; præsidium bonis omnibus, terrorem malis, virtutis etiam omnis et pietatis hortatores. Sed neque te fas est præterire, Fairfaxi, in quo cum summa fortitudine summam modestiam, summam vitæ sanctitatem, et natura et divinus favor conjunxit: Tu harum in partem laudum evocandus tuo jure ac merito es; quanquam in illo nunc tuo secessu, quantus olim Literni Africanus ille Scipio, abdis te quoad potes; nec hostem solùm, sed ambitionem, et quæ præstantissimum quemque mortalium vincit, gloriam quoque vicisti; tuisque virtutibus et præclarè factis, jucundissimum et gloriosissimum per otium frueris, quod est laborum omnium et humanarum actionum vel maximarum finis; qualique otio cùm antiqui heroes, post bella et decora tuis haud majora, fruerentur, qui eos laudare conati sunt poetæ, desperabant se posse alia ratione id quale esset dignè describere, nisi eos fabularentur, cœlo receptos, deorum epulis accumbere. Verùm te sive valetudo, quod maxime crediderim, sive quid aliud retraxit, persuasissimum hoc habeo, nihil te à rationibus reipublicæ divellere potuisse, nisi vidisses quantum libertatis conservatorem, quàm firmum atque fidum Anglicanæ rei columen ac munimentum in successore tuo relinqueres. Te enim salvo, Cromuelle, ne Deo quidem satis confidit, qui rebus Anglorum, satis ut salvæ sint, metuat; cùm videat tam faventem tibi, tam evidenter opitulantem ubique Deum. Verùm tibi tum soli decertanda alia bellorum palæstra erat.

Hibernia præter unam urbem tota, tu, exercitu transmisso, uno statim prælio Hibernicorum opes fregisti; reliqua indies conficiebas; cùm repentè ad bellum Scoticum revocaris. Hinc contra Scotos irruptionem cum rege suo in Angliam parantes, indefessus proficisceris; regnum illud, quod omnes reges nostri octingentis annis non poterant, uno circiter anno perdomuisti, et Anglorum ditioni adjecisti; reliquas eorum copias, validissimas tamen et expeditas, per summam desperationem in Angliam tum ferè præsidiis nudatam, inopina impressione facta, Vigornium usque progressas, magnis itineribus assecutus, uno prælio delevisti; capta penè tota gentis nobilitate. Hinc alta pax domi: tum te, sed neque tum primùm, non minùs consiliis, quàm belli artibus valere sensimus; id quotidie in senatu agebas, vel ut cum hoste pacta fides servaretur, vel uti ea, quæ ex republica essent, mature decernerentur. Cum videres moras necti, privatæ quemque rei, quàm publicæ, attentionem, populum queri delusum se sua spe, et potentia paucorum circumventum esse, quod ipsi toties moniti nolebant, eorum dominationi finem imposuisti. Parlamentum aliud convocatur novum; concessa iis duntaxat, quibus par erat, eligendi potestate; conveniunt electi; nihil agunt; cùm se invicem dissidiis et altercationibus diu defatigassent, animadvertentes plerique se rebus tantis exequendis, neque pares esse, neque idoneos, ipsi sese dissolvunt. Deserimur Cromuelle; tu solus superes, ad te rerum summa nostrarum rediit; in te solo consistit; insuperabili tuæ virtuti cedimus cuncti, nemine vel obloquente, nisi qui aut æquales inæqualis ipse honores sibi quærit, aut digniori concessos invidet, aut non intelligit nihil esse in societate hominum magis vel Deo gratum, vel rationi consentaneum, esse in civitate nihil æquius, nihil utilius, quàm potiri rerum dignissimum. Eum te agnoscunt omnes, Cromuelle, ea tu civis maximus et gloriosissimus, dux publici consilii, fortissimorum exercituum imperator, pater patriæ gessisti: sic tu spontanea bonorum omnium et animitùs missa voce salutaris: alios titulos te dignos tua facta non norunt, non ferunt, et superbos illos, vulgi licet opinione magnos, meritò respuunt. Quid enim est titulus, nisi definitus quidam dignitatis modus? tuæ res gestæ cùm admirationis, tum certè titulorum modum omnem excedunt; et velut pyramidum apices cœlo se condunt, populari titulorum aura excelsiores. Sed quoniam summis etiam virtutibus, qui honos habetur, humano quodam fastigio finiri ac terminari, non dignum est, sed tamen expedit, assumpto quodam titulo patris patriæ simillimo, non evehi te quidem, sed tot gradibus ex sublimi descendere, et velut in ordinem cogi, publico commodo, et sensisti et sustinuisti; regium nomen majestate longè majore aspernatus. Et merito quidem: quod enim nomen, privatus sub jugum mittere, et ad nihilum planè redigere potuisti, eo si tantus vir factus caperere, idem penè faceres, atque si gentem aliquam idololatram Dei veri ope cùm subegisses, victos abs te coleres deos. Tu igitur, Cromuelle, magnitudine illa animi macte esto; te enim decet: tu patriæ liberator, libertatis auctor, custosque idem et conservator, neque graviorem personam, neque augustiorem suscipere potes aliam; qui non modò regum res gestas, sed heroum quoque nostrorum fabulas factis exuperasti. Cogita sæpiùs, quàm caram rem, ab quàm cara parente tua, libertatem à patria tibi commendatam atque concreditam, apud te depositam habes; quod ab electissimis gentis universæ viris, illa modò expectabat, id nunc à te uno expectat, per te unum consequi sperat. Reverere tantam de te expectationem, spem patriæ de te unicam; reverere vultus et vulnera tot fortium virorum, quotquot, te duce, pro libertate tam strenuè decertarunt; manes etiam eorum qui in ipso certamine occubuerunt: reverere exterarum quoque civitatum existimationem de nobis atque sermones; quantas res de libertate nostra, tam fortiter parta, de nostra republica, tam gloriosè exorta sibi pollicEantur: quæ si tam citò quasi aborto evanuerit, profectò nihil æquè dedecorosum huic genti, atque pudendum fuerit: teipsum denique reverere, ut pro qua adipiscenda libertate, tot ærumnas pertulisti, tot pericula adiisti, eam adeptus, violatam per te, aut ulla in parte imminutam aliis, ne sinas esse. Profectò tu ipse liber sine nobis esse non potes; sic enim natura comparatum est, ut qui aliorum libertatem occupat, suam ipse primus omnium amittat; seque primum omnium intelligat serviri: atque id quidem non injuria. At verò, si patronus ipse libertatis, et quasi tutelaris deus, si is, quo nemo justior, nemo sanctior est habitus, nemo vir melior, quam vindicavit ipse, eam postmodùm invaserit, id non ipsi tantùm, sed universæ virtutis ac pietatis rationi perniciosum ac lethale propemòdum sit necesse est: ipsa honestas, ipsa virtus decoxisse videbitur, religionis angusta fides, existimatio perexigua in posterum erit, quo gravius generi humano vulnus, post illud primum, infligi nullum poterit. Onus longè gravissimum suscepisti, quod te penitùs explorabit, totum te atque intimum perscrutabitur atque ostendet, quid tibi animi, quid virium insit, quid ponderis; vivatne in te verè illa pietas, fides, justitia, animique moderatio, ob quas evectum te præ cæteris Dei numine ad hanc summam dignitatem credimus. Tres nationes validissimas consilio regere, populos ab institutis pravis ad meliorem, quàm ante hac, frugem ac disciplinam velle perducere, remotissimas in partes, sollicitam mentem, cogitationesque immittere, vigilare, prævidere, nullum laborem accusare, nulla voluptatum blandimenta non spernere, divitiarum atque potentiæ ostentationem fugere, hæc sunt illa ardua, præ quibus bellum ludus est; hæc te ventilabunt atque excutient, hæc virum poscunt divino fultum auxilio, divino penè colloquio monitum atque edoctum. Quæ tu, et plura, sæpenumero quin tecum reputes atque animo revolvas, non dubito: uti et illud, quibus potissimùm queas modis et illa maxima perficere, et libertatem salvam nobis reddere et auctiorem. Quod meo quidem judicio, haud alia ratione rectiùs effeceris, quàm si primùm quos laborum atque discriminum comites habuisti, eosdem, quod facis, conciliorum socios cum primis adhibueris; viros sanè et modestissimos, et integerrimos, et fortissimos; quos tot mortes conspectæ, tot strages ante ora editæ, non ad crudelitatem, aut duritiem animi; sed ad justitiam, et numinis reverentiam, et humanæ sortis miserationem, ad libertatem denique eo acriùs retinendam erudierunt, quo gravio-ribus ejus causa, periculis ipsi suum caput objecêre: Non illi quidem ex colluvione vulgi, aut advenarum, non turba collectitia, sed melioris plerique notæ cives, genere vel nobili, vel non inhonesto, fortunis vel amplis, vel mediocribus; quid si ipsa paupertate aliqui commendatiores? quos non præda convocavit, sed difficillima tempora, rebus maximè dubiis, sæpè adversis, ad liberandam tyrannide rempubl. excitarunt; non in tuto aut curia sermones inter se atque sententias tantùm, sed manus cum hoste conserere paratos. Quòd nisi spes semper infinitas, atque inanes persequemur, in quibus tandem mortalium sisti aut confidi possit non video, si his horùmque similibus fides non habebitur. Quorum fidelitatis certissimum pignus, et indubitatum habemus, quòd pro republica vel mortem oppetere, si ita sors tulisset, non recusarint; pietatis, quòd implorato suppliciter dei auxilio, totiesque ab eo insigniter adjuti, à quo auxilium petere, eidem gloriam tribuere omnem rerum prosperè gestarum consueverint; justitiæ, quòd etiam regem in judicium adduxerint, damnato parci noluerint: moderationis, quòd et eam experti jam diu sumus, et, quam ipsi sibi peperere pacem, si eorundem per injuriam rumpatur, quæ mala inde oritura sunt, ipsi primi sint persensuri, ipsi prima vulnera suis corporibus excepturi, deque suis omnibus fortunis atque ornamentis feliciter jam partis rursus dimicaturi; fortitudinis denique, quòd nulli unquam libertatem feliciùs aut fortiùs recuperaverint; ne arbitremur ullos alios posse diligentiùs conservare. Gestit clarorum virorum nomina commemorare oratio mea: te primum, Fletuode, quem ego ab ipsis tyrociniis ad hos usque militiæ honores, quos nunc obtines à summis proximos, humanitate, mansuetudine, benignitate animi eundem novi; hostis fortem et imperterritum, sed et mitissimum quoque victorem sensit: Te, Lamberte, qui vix modicæ dux manûs, ducem Hamiltonum juvenis, totius Scotiæ juventutis flore ac robore circumseptum, et progredientem retardasti, et retardatum sustinuisti: Te, Desboroe, te, Hualei, qui atrocissimas hujus belli pugnas vel audienti mihi vel legenti, inter hostes confertissimos expectati semper occurristis: Te, Overtone, mihi multis abhinc annis, et studiorum similitudine, et morum suavitate, concordia plusquam fraterna conjunctissime; te Marstonensi prælio illo memorabili, pulso sinistro cornu nostro, respectantes in fuga duces stantem cum tuo pedite, et hostium impetus propulsantem inter densas utrinque cædes vidêre: Scotico deinde bello, ut primùm Cromuelli auspiciis, tuo marte occupata Fifæ littora, et patefactus ultra Sterlinium aditus est, te Scoti occidentales, te Boreales humanissimum hostem, te Orcades extremæ domitorem fatentur. Addam et nonnullos, quos toga celebres et pacis artibus, consiliarios tibi advocasti, vel amicitia vel fama mihi cognitos; Huitlochium, Pickeringum, Striclandium, Sidnamum, atque Sidneium, (quod ego illustre nomen nostris semper adhæsisse partibus lætor) Montacutium, Laurentium, summo ingenio ambos, optimisque artibus expolitos; aliosque permultos eximiis meritis cives, partim senatorio jampridem munere, partim militari opera insignes. His et ornatissimis viris et spectatissimis civibus libertatem nostram proculdubio rectè commiseris; immo quibus tutiùs committi possit aut concredi, haud facilè quis dixerit. Deinde si ecclesiam ecclesiæ reliqueris, teque ac magistratus eo onere, et dimidio simul et alienissimo, prudens levaveris; nec duas potestates longè diversissimas, civilem et ecclesiasticam, siveris inter se scortari; seque invicem promiscuis ac falsis opibus in speciem quidem firmare re autem vera labefactare ac demum subvertere: si vim omnem ab ecclesia sustuleris; vis autem nunquam aberit; quandiu pecunia, ecclesiæ toxicum, veritatis angina, enuntiandi evangelii merces, vi etiam ab nolentibus coacta, erit; ejeceris ex ecclesia nummularios illos, non columbas sed columbam, sanctum ipsum spiritum, cauponantes. Tum si leges non tot rogaveris novas, quot abrogaveris veteres; sunt enim sæpè in republica, qui multas leges ferendi, ut versificatores multa carmina fundendi, impetigine quadam pruriunt: sed leges quo sunt plures, eo ferè sunt deteriores; non cautiones sed cautes, tu necessarias duntaxat retinueris, alias tuleris, non quæ bonos cum malis eodem jugo subjiciant, aut quibus, dum improborum fraudes præcaventur, quod bonis liberum esse debet, vetatur, sed quæ in vitia tantum animadvertant, res per se licitas abutentium ob noxam, non prohibeant. Leges enim ad frænandam maliciam solum sunt comparatæ, virtutis libertas formatrix optima atque auctrix est. Deinde si juventutis institutioni ac moribus melius prospexeris, quàm est adhuc prospectum, nec dociles juxta atque indociles, gnavos atque ignavos, impensis publicis ali æquum senseris, sed jam doctis, jam benè meritis doctorum præmia reservaveris. Tum si liberè philosophari volentibus permiseris, quæ habent, sine magistelli cujuspiam privato examine, suo periculo in lucem proferre: ita enim maximè veritas effloruerit; nec semidoctorum semper sive censura, sive invidia, sive tenuitas animi, sive superstitio aliorum inventa, omnemque scientiam suo modulo metietur, suoque arbitrio nobis impertiverit. Postremò si ipse neque verum neque falsum, quicquid id est, audire metueris: eos autem minimè omnium audieris, qui sese liberos esse non credunt, nisi aliis esse liberis, per ipsos non liceat; nec studiosius aut violentius quicquam agunt, quàm ut fratrum non corporibus modò sed conscientiis quoque vincula injiciant; pessimamque omnium tyrannidem, vel pravarum consuetudinum vel opinionum suarum et in rempublicam et in ecclesiam inducant; tu ab eorum parte semper steteris, qui non suam tantummodo sectam aut factionem, sed omnes æquè cives, æquali jure liberos esse in civitate arbitrantur oportere. Hæc si cui satis libertas non est, quæ quidem à magistratibus exhiberi potest, is mihi ambitionis atque turbarum, quam libertatis ingenuæ studiosior videtur; præsertim cum agitatus tot factionibus populus, ut post tempestatem, cum fluctus nondum resederunt, statum illum rerum optabilem atque perfectum, ipse non admittat.

Nam et vos, ô cives, quales ipsi sitis ad libertatem vel acquirendam vel retinendam haud parvi interest: nisi libertas vestra ejusmodi sit, quæ neque parari armis, neque auferri possit, ea autem sola est, quæ pietate, justitia, temperantia, vera denique virtute nata, altas atque intimas radices animis vestris egerit, non deerit profectò qui vobis istam, quam vi atque armis quæsivisse gloriamini, etiam sine armis citò eripiat. Multos bellum auxit, quos pax minuit; si perfuncti bello, pacis studia neglexeritis, si bellum pax vestra atque libertas, bellum tantummodò vestra virtus est, vestra summa gloria, invenietis, mihi credite, ipsam pacem vobis infestissimam; pax ipsa vestrum bellum longè difficillimum, et quam putastis libertatem, servitus vestra erit. Nisi per veram atque sinceram in Deum atque homines pietatem, non vanam atque verbosam, sed efficacem et operosam, superstitiones animis, religionis veræ ac solidæ ignoratione ortas, abegeritis, habebitis, qui dorso atque cervicibus vestris, tanquam jumentis insidebunt; qui vos etiam victores bello suam veluti prædam sub hasta non bellica nundinabuntur; et ex ignorantia et superstitione vestra, uberem quæstum facient. Nisi avaritiam, ambitionem, luxuriam mentibus, immo familiis quoque vestris luxum expuleritis, quem tyrannum foris et in acie quærendum credidistis eum domi, eum intus vel duriorem sentietis, immò multi indies tyranni ex ipsis præcordiis vestris intolerandi pullulabunt. Hos vincete in primis, hæc pacis militia est, hæ sunt victoriæ, difficiles quidem, et incruentæ, illis bellicis et cruentis longè pulchriores; nisi hìc quoque victores eritis, illum modo in acie hostem atque tyrannum, aut non omnino aut frustra vicistis: nam pecuniæ vim maximam in ærarium inferendi rationes posse calidissimas excogitare, pedestres atque navales copias impigrè posse instruere, posse cum legatis exterorum cautè agere, societates et fœdera peritè contrahere, si qui majus atque utilius ac sapientius in republica existimavistis esse, quam incorrupta populo judicia præstare, afflictis per injuriam atque oppressis opem ferre, suum cuique jus expeditum reddere, quanto sitis in errore versati, tum serò nimis perspicietis, cum illa magna repentè vos fefellerint, hæc parva vestro nunc judicio et neglecta adversa tum vobis et exitio fuerint. Quin et exercituum et sociorum, quibus confiditis, fluxa fides, nisi justitiæ sola authoritate retineatur: et opes atque honores, quos plerique sectantur, facilè dominos mutant: ubi virtus, ubi industria, et laborum tolerantia plus viget, eò transfugiunt, et ignavos deserunt. Sic gens gentem urget, aut sanior pars gentis corruptiorem proturbat: sic vos regios dejecistis. Si vos in eadem vitia prolabi, si illos imitari, eadem sequi, easdem inanitates aucupari ceperitis, vos profectò regii istis, vel eisdem adhuc hostibus, vel aliis vicissim opportuni; qui iisdem ad Deum precibus, eadem patientia, integritate, solertia freti, qua vos primò valuistis, depravatos nunc, et in regium luxum atque socordiam prolapsos, meritò subjugabunt. Tum verò, quod miserum est, videbimini, planè quasi Deum vestri pœnituisset, pervasisse ignem ut fumo pereatis: quantæ nunc admirationi, tantæ tunc omnibus contemptioni eritis; hoc solum quod aliis fortasse, non vobis, prodesse in posterum queat, salutare documentum relicturi, quantas res vera virtus et pietas efficere potuisset, cum ficta et adumbrata, duntaxat bellè simulando, et aggredi tantas, et progressus in iis tantos per vos facere valuerit. Non enim, si propter vestram sive imperitiam, sive inconstantiam, sive improbitatem tam præclarè facta malè cesserunt, idcirco viris melioribus minus post hæc vel licebit vel sperandum erit. Sed liberare vos denuò tam facilè corruptos nemo, ne Cromuellus quidem, nec tota, si revivisceret, Brutorum natio liberatorum, aut si velit, possit, aut si possit, velit. Quid enim quisquam vobis libera suffragia et eligendi quos vultis in senatum potestatem tum assereret, an ut suæ quisque factiones hominis per urbes, aut qui conviviis unctiùs vos, et majoribus poculis per municipia colonos ac rusticos exceperit, cum quantumvis*indignum eligere possitis? ita non prudentia, non authoritas, sed factio et sagina, aut ex tabernis urbicis caupones et institores reipublicæ, aut ex pagis bubulcos, et verè pecuarios senatores, nobis creaverit. Illis nempe rempublicam commendaret, quibus vel rem privatam nemo committeret; illis ærarium et vectigalia qui rem suam turpiter prodegere? illis publicos reditus, quos depeculentur, quos ex publicis privatos reddant? an legislatores ut illi extemplò gentis universæ fiant, qui ipsi quid lex, quid ratio, quid fas aut jus, rectum aut curvum, licitum aut illicitum sit, nunquam intellexerint? qui potestatem omnem in violentia, dignitatem in superbia atque fastidio positam existiment? Qui in senatu nihil prius agant, quàm ut amicis pravè gratificentur, inimicis memores adversentur? qui propinquos sibi ac necessarios, tributis imperandis, bonis proscribendis, per provincias substituant, homines plerosque viles ac perditos, qui suarum ipsi auctionum sectores, grandem exinde pecuniam cogant, coactam intervertant, rempublicam fraudent, provincias expilent, se locupletent ad opulentiam atque fastum ex mendicitate hesterna ac sordibus repentini emergant? quis tales ferat servos furaces, dominorum vicarios? quis ipsos furum dominos ac patronos, libertatis idoneos fore custodes crediderit, aut illiusmodi curatoribus reipublicæ (quingenti licet consueto numero sint ex municipiis omnibus hunc in modum electi) pilo se factum liberiorem putet, cùm et libertatis ipsi custodes et quibus custoditur, tam pauci tum sint futuri, qui libertate uti atque frui vel sciant vel digni sint? Libertate autem indigni, quod omittendum postremò non est, erga ipsos primum liberatores ingratissimi ferè existunt. Quis nunc talium pro libertate pugnare, aut vel minimum adire periculum velit? non convenit, non cadit in tales esse liberos; utut libertatem strepant atque jactent, servi sunt et domi et foris, nec sentiunt; et cùm senserint tandem, et velut ferocientes equi frænum indignantes, non veræ libertatis amore (quam solus vir bonus rectè potest appetere) sed superbia et cupiditatibus parvis impulsi, jugum excutere conabuntur, etiamsi armis rem sæpius tentaverint, nihil tamen proficient; mutare servitutem fortasse poterunt, exuere non poterunt. Id quod Romanis etiam antiquis luxu jam fractis ac diffluentibus persæpè accidit; recentioribus multò magis; cùm longo post tempore Crescentii Nomentani auspiciis, et postea duce Nicolao Rentio, qui se tribunum plebis nominaverat, antiquam renovare gloriam, et rempublicam restituere affectarent. Scitote enim, ne fortè stomachemini, aut quemquam præter vosmetipsos inculpare possitis, scitote, quemadmodum esse liberum idem planè est atque esse pium, esse sapientem, esse justum ac temperantem, sui providum, alieni abstinentem, atque exinde demum magnanimum ac fortem, ita his contrarium esse, idem esse atque esse servum; solitoque Dei judicio et quasi talione justissima fit, ut quæ gens se regere seque moderari nequit, suisque ipsa se libidinibus in servitutem tradidit, ea aliis, quibus nollet, dominis tradatur; nec libens modò, sed invita quoque serviat. Quod etiam et jure et natura ipsa sancitum est, ut qui impos sui, qui per inopiam mentis aut furorem suas res rectè administrare nequit, in sua potestate ne sit; sed tanquam pupillus, alieno dedatur imperio; nedum ut alienis negotiis, aut reipublicæ præficiendus fit. Qui liberi igitur vultis permanere, aut sapite imprimis, aut quamprimùm resipiscite: si servire durum est, atque nolitis, rectæ rationi obtemperare discite, vestrùm esse compotes; postremo factionibus, odiis, superstitionibus, injuriis, libidinibus ac rapinis invicem abstinete. Id nisi pro virili vestra parte feceritis, neque Deo neque hominibus, ne vestris quidem jam nunc liberatoribus, idonei poteritis videri, penes quos libertas et reipublicæ gubernatio, et imperandi aliis, quod tam cupidè vobis arrogatis, potestas relinquenda sit: cum tutore potius aliquo rerumque vestrarum fideli ac forti curatore tanquam pupilla gens, tum quidem indigeatis. Ad me quod attinet, quocunque res redierit, quam ego operam meam maximè ex usu reipublicæ futuram judicavi, haud gravatim certè, et ut spero, haud frustra impendi; meaque arma pro libertate, non solùm ante fores extuli, sed etiam iis ita latè sum usus, ut factorum minimè vulgarium jus atque ratio, et apud nostros et apud exteros explicata, defensa, atque bonis certè omnibus probata, et ad meorum civium summam laudem, et posterorum ad exemplum præclarè constet. Si postrema primis non satis responderint, ipsi viderint; ego quæ eximia, quæ excelsa, quæ omni laude propè majora fuere, iis testimonium, prope dixerim monumentum, perhibui, haud citò interiturum; et si aliud nihil, certè fidem meam liberavi. Quemadmodum autem poeta is qui epicus vocatur, si quis paulò accuratior, minimeque abnormis est, quem heroem versibus canendum sibi proponit, ejus non vitam omnem, sed unam ferè vitæ actionem, Achillis putà ad Trojam, vel Ulyssis reditum, vel Æneæ in Italiam adventum ornandum sibi sumit, reliquas prætermittit; ita mihi quoque vel ad officium, vel ad excusationem satis fuerit, unam saltem popularium meorum heroicè rem gestam exornasse; reliqua prætereo, omnia universi populi præstare quis possit? si post tam fortia facinora fœdiùs deliqueritis, si quid vobis indignum commiseritis, loquetur profectò posteritas, et judicium feret; jacta strenuè fundamenta fuisse, præclara initia, immò plusquam initia; sed qui opus exædificarent, qui fastigium imponerent, non sine commotione quadam animi desiderabit; tantis incœptis, tantis virtutibus, non adfuisse perseverantiam dolebit; ingentem gloriæ segetem, et maximarum rerum gerendarum materiam præbitam videbit, sed materiæ defuisse viros: non defuisse qui monere recta, hortari, incitare qui egregiè tum facta, tum qui fecissent, condecorare, et victuris in omne ævum celebrare laudibus potuerit.

AUTHORIS PRO SE DEFENSIO,

CONTRA

ALEXANDRUM MORUM ECCLESIASTEN,

LIBELLI FAMOSI, CUI TITULUS, "REGII SANGUINIS CLAMOR AD CŒLUM ADVERSUS PARRICIDAS ANGLICANOS," AUTHOREM RECTÈ DICTUM.

[FIRST PUBLISHED 1654.]

NIHIL equidem aut antea inauditum, aut mea tum expectatione alienum, cùm libertatis causam primò accepi defendendam, usu venturum mihi arbitratus sum, si liberatores Patriæ, cives meos, unus præ cæteris publicè laudassem, tyrannorum jus infinitum atque injurium coarguissem, ut improborum omnium in me propè unum ferentur odia, atque redundarent. Prævidebam etiam tum bellum vobis, Angli, cum hostibus haud diuturnum, mihi cum perfugis, et eorum mercenariis sempiternum propemodum fore: ut quorum vos tela de manibus eripuissetis, eorum in me maledicta atque convitia eò acriùs conjicerentur. In vos ergo furor hostium atque impetus deferbuit: mihi, ut videtur, soli hujus belli reliquiæ supersunt; contemptissimæ quidem illæ, sed ut ferè sunt infirmorum impetus animalium, satis infestæ. Non perditorum duntaxat civium, sed exterorum etiam ut quisque alienarum rerum plus nimio curiosus, ut quisque importunissimus, corruptissimusque est, in me involat, officii tantummodo mei satagentem; in me omne virus et aculeos diriget. Quo fit, ut quod plerique ad commendationem operis, et audientiam sibi faciendam præfari initio solent, se ab exili atque humili rerum materia ad res dictu gravissimas atque maximas aspirare, id mihi in præsentia nequaquam concessum sit; ut cui nunc contrà vel invito atque nolenti à rebus maximis et gloriosissimis dicendis ad res obscuras, anonymorum latebras, et adversarii turpissimi per sequenda lustra atque flagitia necessariò sit descendendum. Quod etsi parum exordienti honorificum et ad reddendos lectorum animos attentiores minus accommodatum esse videatur, habet tamen quod exemplo haud absimili, cùm viris optimis et præstantissimis idem contigerit, consolari possit: siquidem et Africanus ipse Scipio, postquam ea gesserat quibus nihil in eo laudis genere felicius aut majus potuit, inclinatione rerum suarum perpetua et decrescente semper suæ virtutis materia usus esse videtur: et primò dux quidem summus, atque Hannibale superior, mox contra hostem Syrum et imbellem legatus, tribunorum deinde impotentia vexatus, suam tandem communire villam Liternensem contra fures atque latrones coactus est: in hac tamen rerum suarum declivitate atque descensu par ipse semper sibi et æqualis dicitur fuisse. Unde ego, utque aliis aliundè monitis, quicquid sortis aut provinciæ dederit modò Deus, multò licet priore angustius, atque tenuius, id non aspernari erudior. Sed quemadmodum dux bonus, (quidni enim bonos in omni genere liceat imitari?) contra hostem qualemcunque boni ducis officium explebit; vel si hoc nimis invidiosum est, ut sutor bonus, ita enim vir sapiens olim philosophatus est, ex eo quodcunque est ad manum corio calceamentum quàm potest optimum conficiet, sic ego ex hoc calceamento (argumentum enim cùm instituissem dicere puduit) trito præsertim jam antea atque dissuto, siquid concinnare quod legentium auribus tantùm non fastidio sit potero, experiar. Parsurus utique omninò huic operæ, nisi accusationes mihi nescio quas falsas, et mendacia objecisset adversarius, quam ego maculam aut suspicionem adhærere mihi minimè volo. Quando hoc necessariò tollendum mihi onus est, dabit quisque veniam, uti spero, si populo qui non defui pridem et reipublicæ, mihimet nunc non defuero.

Quoniam itaque "tuam fidem," More, quam in ipso libelli titulo tu "publicam" vocas, ego publicatam jamdudum et perditam scio, ita ultrò statim nobis obstringis, ut "siquid eorum in te agnosceres," quæ de te ego scripserim, "majorem in modum irascerere," ex ore imprimis tuo, quo laqueo solet improbus irretiri semper et capi, judicandum te omnibus atque damnandum addico. Cùm enim et ex perpetua calumnia, qua meum omne dictum aut factum in deterrimam partem trahis, meque obruere invidia quæris, et ex contumeliis quas semper iniquissimas undique in me arripis jaciendas, ex omnibus denique signis atque indiciis iræ facilè appareat vehementissimè te, quamvis id usque neges, et apertissimè irasci, effugere non potes quia arguaris agnoscere in te ea, quæ vel "affinxisse" tibi me ais, vel in lucem protulisse.

Duæ sunt res quarum ego te postulabam: altera injuriarum, altera flagitiorum. Injuriarum, quòd libelli in nos clamosissimi author extitisses; nam quòd populum Anglicanum satis lædere existimares te non posse, nisi me eximiè præter cæteros læsisses, id ego honori mihi potius, quàm contumeliæ duco. Flagitia verò tua commemorare, ut dignum erat, idcirco non gravabar, ut ostenderem, siquidem is est habendus clamoris author, qui edidit, et alius certè præter te nemo hactenus comparuit, quàmcasto ex ore clamor ille prorupisset. Quid tu ad hæc? negas te authorem illius libelli; et ita sedulò, ita prolixè negas, cùm tamen liber ille nequaquam tibi displiceat, ut magis mihi pertimuisse videare, ne illum librum scripsisse, quàm ne illa in te tot probra admisisse reperiaris; de quibus sic leviter et timidè, sed simul versutè ac veteratoriè te purgas, ut nemo non subesse ulcus perspiciat. Haud incallido fortasse consilio; nam quis unum libellum scripserit, quàm quis multa stupra fecerit, difficilior longè est probatio; libellus sine arbitris confici potuit; hæc sine sociis, et scelerum consciis non potuerunt: illic vestigia penè nulla necessariò apparent; hic plurima indicia et præcedunt, et unà adsunt, et subsequuntur. Itaque, si pernegasses ad te librum illum pertinere, arbitrabaris eadem opera et fidem meam de reliqua tua vita saltem apud longinquos infirmari, et mea credulitate atque injuria, qua te scilicet temere violassem, tuam magna ex parte levari infamiam: sin ire inficias de libello non posses, restare tibi hoc solum prævidebas, quo nihil difficilius erat aut acerbius, ut de moribus et flagitiis haud perfunctoriè respondendum tibi esset. Verùm ego nisi hoc doceo, nisi planum facio aut te authorem illius libelli famosissimi in nos esse, aut te satis causæ præbuisse cur pro authore meritò haberi debeas, non recuso quin abs te victus in hac causa cum dedecore atque pudore turpiter discedam; nullam à me culpam neque imprudentiæ, neque temeritatis, neque maledicentiæ deprecor.

Prodiit hoc biennio anonymus et probrosus liber, "Regii sanguinis clamor ad cœlum adversus Parricidas Anglicanos" inscriptus; in quo libro, cùm Respublica Anglorum tota, tum nominatim "Cromuellus," eo quidem tempore nostrorum exercituum imperator, nunc totius reipublicæ vir summus, omni verborum contumelia laceratur: secundùm eum, sic illi anonymo visum est, maledictorum pars maxima in me conjicitur. Vix suis integer schedulis liber iste in consilio mihi est traditus; ab eo mox consessu, qui quæstionibus tum præfuit, alter mittitur: significatum quoque est, expectari à me hanc operam reipub. navandam, ut huic importuno clamatori os obturarem. Verùm me, tum maximè, et infirma simul valetudo, et duorum funerum luctus domesticus, et defectum jam penitus oculorum lumen diversa longè sollicitudine urgebat: foris quoque adversarius ille prior, isti longè præferendus, impendebat; jamjamque se totis viribus incursurum indies minitabatur: quo derepente mortuo levatum me parte aliqua laboris ratus, et valetudine partim desperata, partim restituta, utcunque confirmatus, ne omnino vel summorum hominum expectationi deesse, vel omnem inter tot mala abjecisse curam existimationis viderer, ut primùm de isto clamatore anonymo certum aliquid comperiendi facultas data est, hominem aggredior. De te, More, dictum hoc volo: quem ego (quamvis tu nunc, quasi insons omnium atque insciens falsò te accusari vocifereris) nefandi illius clamoris vel esse authorem, vel esse pro authore haud injuria habendum statuo. Et cur sic statuam nunc audies. Primùm ego, neque hoc leve putaveris, famam communem, consentientem, constantem sum sequutus; neque eam solùm quæ populi vox, et ab antiquis Dea credita est, et à nobis hodie vox Dei nuncupatur, sed eam etiam, ut legitimè tecum agi intelligas, quam jurisperiti ab authoribus et probis et benè notis exortam, fidem adjicere testimonio docent. Verè hoc dico et religiosè, me toto biennio nullum neque popularem, neque peregrinum convenisse, cum quo de isthoc libello sermones mihi fuissent, quin omnes una voce te ejus authorem dici consentirent, neminem præter te alium nominarent. Ita universim obtinuit hæc fama, ut te possim ipsum hujus rei testem producere. Recita tuum ipse testimonium.

Testimonium Mori, pag. 10.

"Neque verò tacui, si cui fortè subiit aliquid ejusmodi "suspicari, sed palam et exertè respondi reclamans, con-"questusque sum invito supponi mihi fœtum alienum, "siquidem illius auctor libri vel ex parte vel in totum "existimarer."

Quamvis hoc falsum sit tacuisse te, aut reclamasse quod plurimi testantur, qui te de eo libro et confitentem et gloriantem audierunt, dum hoc tutum tibi, aut lucro aut honori credidisti fore, hìc tamen vides, quàm hæc fuerit concepta altè, nec sine causa proculdubio, hominum opinio, ut ne familiaribus quidem tuis persuadere potueris, quo minùs "reclamantem" te et "conquerentem" atque "invitum" illius libri authorem "vel ex parte vel in totum existimarint." Quid si ego, qui te nostris partibus inimicissimum esse, et de republica nostra pessimè solere loqui intelligerem, hac plusquam fama nixus, hac hominum non vulgarium communi opinione atque consensu adductus, hoc pro certo sumpsissem, te hunc libellum composuisse? Tu contra quid affers, quamobrem tantæ hominum, etiam amicorum tuorum consensioni de inimico nostro facilè habere fidem non debuerim? Factum negas. At quotusquisque est reorum, qui multis etiam testibus in judicio convictus atque damnatus in ipso supplicii loco, ubi etiam pœna capitali jamjam plectendus est, pernegare crimen suum non soleat; immò secretum quodvis anteactæ vitæ facinus suum proferre in lucem non malit, cujus pœnas meritas dare se nunc dicat, quàm de illo crimine confiteri de quo sit condemnatus? Accedit quod is tum negat, cùm sententia jam lata, cùm expedita et imminente jam securi, nihil juvat neque prodest negare: tu propterea, quòd prodest, quòd est cur metuas, quòd manendum tibi in iis provinciis si faterere non esset, idcirco negas. Pacis articulos inter nos et Fœderatas Provincias "Latinè conditos" vertisse te dicis. Legito itaque nonum, decimum, et undecimum, quos tu cùm vertebas, solùm vertere debuisti.

Articulus pacis nonus.

Quod neutra dictarum rerump. hostes alterius reipub. declaratos vel declarandos, in ejus dominia recipiet, neque eorum alicui in prædictis locis vel aliò quocunque, etiam extra sua dominia auxilium, consilium, hospitium, concedet, nec istiusmodi hostibus ullum auxilium, consilium, hospitium, favorem, pecunias præstari permittet.

Articulus decimus.

Quòd si alterutra dictarum rerumpub. aliquem suum fuisse et esse hostem, et in sua dominia receptum esse, aut ibidem commorari per literas suas publicas alteri significaverit, tunc illa resp. quæ hujusmodi literas receperit, intra spatium viginti octo dierum tenebitur dicto hosti mandare, ut extra sua dominia exeat. Et siquis prædictorum hostium intra quindecimum diem non exiverit, singuli morte et amissione bonorum multabuntur.

Quod nullus hostis publicus reip. Angliæ in aliqua oppida, vel alia loca recipietur; neque Domini Ordines Generales alicui hujusmodi hosti publico in locis prædictis, pecuniis, commeatu, aut alio quocunque modo auxilium, consilium, aut favorem dari permittent.

Hæccine audis? quàm diligenter, quàm severè ab utraque republica tribus continuis articulis cautum atque provisum sit, nequis alterius hostis ab alterutra hospitio vel tecto recipiatur; qui hostis declaratus vel declarandus ab alterutra sit, ei ut aqua et igni ab altera sit interdicendum, ut morte etiam multandus sit, ni intra dies quindecim post denunciatum sibi discessum sarcinas collegerit? Hæccine, inquam, sine metu ac trepidatione audis? qui si hostis esse aut fuisse deprehendêris, nosque ut viros fortes decet, in sententia persistemus, neque articulos otiosos ad numerum duntaxat composuimus, ubi tua illa stipendia, et sacrarum historiarum professiones? cui de tota illa ditione intra paucos dies decedendum erit; et relictis historiis, illa vitæ tuæ fabula nequissima nescio quibus in terris peragenda. Quis enim hostis noster magis publicus est dicendus, quàm is, qui libro famosissimo in vulgus edito totam Angliæ rempub. inhumanissimis verborum contumeliis proscindit atque dilaniat? latrocinii, cædis, perduellionis, impietatis, parricidii, immò novo prorsus vocabulo deicidii demùm incusat; omnes principes, populos, nationes in nos, tanquam in monstra ac pestes generis humani ad arma, quantum in se est, concitat; et quasi ad commune atque sacrum bellum nobis inferendum hortatur? Hunc tu confecisse librum nisi pertinaciter negares, nullus nunc locus consistendi iis in locis tibi esset. Cum igitur tibi tam sit omnino periculosum fateri, cùm incolumitatis et commodorum tuorum, ac prope salutis tam vehementer intersit librum istum ejurare, cur tua inimici et improbissimi hominis negatio contra famam constantem, immò verò quod plus est, contra tot hominum satis perspicacium, et amicorum aliquot tuorum opinionem valere debeat, non video. At enim dicis, non te solum negasse; testem habere "reverendum antistitem Ottonum," qui clarissimum Duræum "admonuerit te illius libri non esse auctorem, sibi probè notum auctorem longè alium." Itaque ex ipsis Duræi literis ostendam, neque probè hoc novisse Ottonum, neque testem omnino esse, vel siquid testatur, ex eo reddi te multo quàm antea suspectiorem.

Ex Literis Duræi, Haga, April $\frac{14}{24}$ 1654.

Quod ad responsum Miltoni ad eum librum, cui titulus Regii Sanguinis Clamor: equidem à ministro quodam Midelburgensi, qui Mori perfamiliaris est, certior sum factus, Morum non esse illius libri authorem, sed ministrum quendam Gallicum, quem Morus sub conditione silentii eidem nominavit.

Et ex alteris Amsterodamo, April $\frac{10}{20}$. 1654.

Cum D. Ottono colloquutus sum; hic quidem acerrimè regius est, et Moro perquam intimus; idque mihi dixit, quod superioribus literis ad te scripsi, Morum non esse "Clamoris Regii Sanguinis" authorem.

Ex quibus hoc in primis nemo non intelligit, Ottono, ut qui partibus regiis addictissimus, nobis inimicissimus, Moro à secretis sit, ne si sua quidem fide quicquam afferat, credendum esse. Nunc autem cùm apertè fateatur Ottonus, quicquid hac de re sciat, abs te hausisse, tua sola authoritate niti, tuum hoc apud se depositum arcanum esse, non hoc Ottoni testimonium, sed tua adhuc sola negatio est: immò verò potiùs tua clara confessio dicenda erit, illius te libelli vel componendi vel procurandi cum paucissimis esse conscium; si non authorem, at certè socium et administrum; vel tua opera vel tuo consilio librum illum fuisse editum. Quod si ita est, ut est sanè per tuum testem, ex tuomet-ipsius ore verisimillimum, equidem haud metuo, ne te falsò insimulasse dicar, si vel authorem ipsum affirmaverim te, vel eodem numero habuerim. Quis non jam planè perspiciat, quàm penitùs ex sinu tuo liber iste prodierit? quàm non de nihilo constantissima de te ista fama invaluerit? verùm adhuc clarius hoc idem statim perspicere cuivis licebit. Jam enim à fama, quod postmodum apparebit, minimè fallaci, ne vocis invidia contra me utaris, ad justam probationem et compertissimos mihi testes transeo. Accipe in primis literarum partem, quæ haud ita multo pòst Lugduno Batavorum sunt datæ, quàm libellus iste clamosus Hagæ-Comitis est editus. Missæ sunt hæ literæ ad amicum quendam meum ab homine et docto et prudente, et rerum peritissimo, mihi satis noto, et in Hollandia notissimo: in quibus libelli cujusdam famosi facta mentione, hæc statim verba subjungit.

Literæ Leidenses, Septemb. 27, stilo novo, 1652.

"Nec majoris momenti est iste Mori liber, cui titulus Clamor Regii sanguinis ad Cœlum: satisque vendibilis fuit, donec author illius vitiata Salmasii uxoris ancilla, ipse suam existimationem commaculavit." Hæ literæ, eodem puto mense, integræ sunt evulgatæ, inque actis diurnis apud nos quinto quoque die hebdomadæ prodire solitis, palam extant; ejusque authoritate vel qui misit eas, vel qui edidit, fidem facilè suam tuentur, meam absolvunt. Hæc habui neque levia, neque ullo modo contemnenda, cur hunc Regii Sanguinis Clamorem opus tuum esse crediderim: famam constantem, non vulgi, sed amplissimorum hominum per biennium totum opinionem atque consensum, literas viri intelligentissimi atque honestissimi vicina ex urbe missas, quibus an quid certius in re præsertim longinqua de inimico et extraneo homine, et omni infamia jamdudum cooperto, expectandum fuerit aut requirendum, haud scio. Age vero; ne tu me tristem nimis et obstinatum queraris, aliquanto laxiùs te habebo, quo deinde fortiùs teneam atque constringam: quoniam attributum tibi librum elegantulum sic aversaris atque horres, contra hæc omnia quæ afferre hactenus potui tam valida, tuam valere singularem et suspectissimam negationem patiar; remittâm tibi hoc totum atque largiar, non esse te hujus libelli, qui Regii Sanguinis Clamor inscribitur, authorem; et tamen, quod jam forsitan expectas, non sic abibis. Constat iste liber et coagmentatur proœmiis quibusdam et epilogis, epistola ad Carolum, altera ad lectorem, clauditur carmine, altero in Salmasium "Eucharistico," altero in me diffamatorio: si ullam hujus libri paginam, si versiculum fortè unicum scripsisse aut contulisse, si edidisse, aut procurasse, aut suasisse, si denique edendo præfuisse, aut vel operæ tantillum accommodasse te repererо, quandoquidem nemo alius existit, tu mihi solus totius operis reus, et author, et clamator eris. Neque verò meam hanc severitatem, aut vehementem animum esse dixeris; idem apud omnes fere gentes jure et æquissimis legibus est comparatum. Quod ab omnibus receptissimum est adducam, jus civile imperatorium.

Siquis ad infamiam alicujus libellum, aut carmen (aut historiam) scripserit, composuerit, ediderit, dolove malo fecerit, quo quid eorum fieret, &c. Adjiciunt aliæ leges; "Etiamsi alterius nomine ediderit, vel sine nomine." Et omnes decernunt eum pro authore habendum esse atque plectendum. Quæro nunc ex te, non utrùm Regii Sanguinis Clamorem, sed an præmissam Clamori epistolam Carolo dicatam, ullamve ejus particulam feceris, scripseris, edideris, edendamve curaveris? quæro an alteram ad lectorem, quæro denique an illud infame carmen condideris, aut vulgandum curaveris? nihildum ad hæc respondisti; si Clamorem ipsum tantummodo abdicasses, omnemque ejus particulam gnaviter ejurasses, salva fide evasisse te putabas, nosque probè ludificasse; epistolam videlicet ad Carolum filium, aut ad lectorem, carmen etiam iambum, Regii Sanguinis Clamorem non esse. Tu itaque sic breviter habeto, ne tergiversari in posteram queas, aut prævaricari; ne diverticulum ullum, aut latibulum sperare; ut jam sciant omnes quàm non mendax, sed veriloqua, aut saltem non de nihilo ista fama de te increbuerit, tu, inquam, sic habeto: me non fama solum, sed eo testimonio, quo nullum certius esse potest comperisse, te et libelli totius cui Regii Sanguinis Clamor est titulus, editionem administrasse, et operam typographicam correxisse, et epistolam illam ad Carolum secundum, Vlacci nomen præferentem, vel solum, vel "cum uno atque altero" composuisse. Id quod tuum ipsum nomen Alexander Morus exemplis aliquot illius epistolæ subscriptus, multis ejus rei testibus oculatis clariùs indicavit, quàm tu negare aut expedire te ullo pacto queas. Si dicis, importunitati quorundam amicorum te hoc dedisse, ut epistolæ nomen tuum apponeres, non aliunde quàm ex ore tuo sic excusanti tibi occurro. Qui solenniter affirmas, et eo præsertim loco paginæ 39, in quo, ut credatur tibi enixè flagitas "tueri te tua, aliena tunc demum forte curaturum cum excussus propriis fueris." Teipso itaque flagitante, credendum non est te nomen tuum illi epistolæ fuisse subscripturum, tua nisi esset: id quod sequente pagina penè confiteris, tuamque ipse fraudem detegis et fallaciam, qua fretus clamoris authorem te esse toties negas. "Nam quis non misereatur," inquis, "hallucinationis tuæ cùm præfationem typographo tribuis modo, modo adimis: Clamorem totum in me confers, qui ne particulam quidem ullam ejus extuli." Hoc cui non suboleat? cum præfationis seu epistolæ simul et Clamoris mentionem facis, Clamoris ne ullam quidem particulam conferri in te sinis; præfationis nullam respuis, nullam inficiaris: immò quasi errorem meum videris propemodum ridere, quòd satis constanter non dixerim tuam esse. Si insciente te et prorsus ignaro factum hoc dicis, ut nomen tuum subscriberetur, primùm credibile non est quenquam esse ausum mittendæ ad Regem epistolæ cum dedicato libro excusæ, alienum nomen ipso inconsulto subscribere. Complures deinde sunt, qui ex te ipso audierunt, cùm tuam esse illam epistolam vel interrogantibus faterere, vel ultrò ipse prædicares. Verùm tua necne fuerit, non admodum laboro; tune solus an "cum uno aut altero" eam composueris; quod et hic pag. 41 subindicare ludibundus propè videris. Te istius ego non epistolæ duntaxat, sed et libelli infamissimi solum propè conscium, te ejusdem editorem aut edendi administrum, te epistolæ ad Carolum aliquam multis exemplaribus divulgatæ subscriptorem notissimum, te scriptorem etiam confessum, te ergò omnium legum consensu atque sententia totius operis authorem ipsum tuo ore convictum atque constrictum teneo. Hæc quo dicam testimonio tam remotus, et unde mihi tam liquidò constare potuerint, si quæris, non fama, inquam, sola sed partim testibus religiosissimis qui coràm hæc mihi sanctissimè asseverarunt, partim literis vel ad alios vel ad me scriptis. Literarum verba ipsa expromam, scribentium nomina non edam; propterea quod in rebus alioqui notissimis necesse non habeo. Hem tibi imprimis ab homine probo, et cui ad hanc rem pervestigandam haud mediocris facultas fuit, literas Haga Comitis ad me datas.

Ex Literis Hag. Com.

Exploratissimum mihi est, Morum ipsum Clamoris Regii Sanguinis exemplar nonnullis aliis imprimendum obtulisse, antequam Vlaccus illud accepisset; ipsum corrigendis operarum erratis præfuisse; ab ipso exemplaria, ut primum quodque absolutum est, compluribus impertita ac dissipata.

Viden' ut hæc dilucida atque distincta sint, ut non dubiis rumoribus collecta, sed data opera ac diligentia hominis iis in locis ac rebus versatissimi, pervestigata et inquisita, certissimis indiciis comprobata atque comperta? Atqui testem, inquies, unum jus omne rejecit. en itaque ex ore duorum testium, quo testimonio neque sacrum, neque civile jus quicquam amplius aut locupletius desiderat, firmatum à me omne verbum, ut dicitur, et corroboratum habebis. Accipe nunc sis quæ vir honestissimus idemque intelligentissimus et certò sibi cognita, et illic testatissima Amsterodamo sic scribit.

Ex Literis Amsterodamo.

Certissimum est omnes ferè per hæc loca Morum pro authore illius libri habuisse, qui "Regii Sanguinis Clamor" inscribitur; nam et schedas à prælo exceptas ipse correxit, et aliqua exemplo subscriptum dedicatoriæ nomen Mori præferebant, cujus et ipse author erat; dixit enim ipse amico cuidam meo, se illius epistolæ authorem fuisse: immò nihil certius est, quam illam sibi Morum vel attribuisse, vel agnovisse pro sua.

Verùm requiris adhuc tertium: non id quidem cogit lex, attamen indulget. Esto; largissima per me lege utere: potest fieri, ut terni opus sint testes: coarctatum tibi à me juris quicquam non dices. Addo jam tertium.

Ex alteris literis Haga Comitis.

Dixit mihi Hagæ Comitis vir quidam primarius, habere se Regii Sanguinis Clamorem, cum ipsa Mori epistola.

Vides quàm largiter tibi admetiar: clara enim hæc sunt, quis neget? tu tamen scito clariora apud me esse, quæ datæ fidei causa reticeo, quam quæ nunc palam exhibeo. Quod si adhuc tamen vis cumulum, fortassis accedet. Interea nunc libero ac soluto animo ad reliqua proficiscor; quandoquidem id quod Deum Opt. Max. precatus sum, adeptum me esse spero, ut nemini videar, viro præsertim bono et intelligenti, incertis rumoribus elatus temerè, accusationem contra te falsam instituisse, nec fictis criminibus innocentem, quod quereris, et immeritum perfudisse, sed tectum atque duplicem veris redarguisse, latentem atque sectantem tenebras in lucem protraxisse: quod quidem et ex ipsa testimonii claritate perspicuum esse reor, et in ipsis plurimorum hominum non conscientiis modò, sed et sermonibus, ubi hæc gesta sunt, clarius elucere. Quibus si ego testimonium denuntiare possem, obruerere, mihi crede, multitudine tot testium: quos tamen aliquando sponte sua veritati tam illustri, si opus erit, sua nomina palam daturos esse confido. Quòd si hanc probationis vim atque evidentiam, quam ne judex quidem severissimus repudiasset, tu falsam tamen esse, id quod incredibile est, contendere audebis, erit fortasse cur de tuo queraris atque deplores infortunio, aut iratum tibi atque infensum agnoscas Deum, qui per aliorum vel errorem vel mendacium assignati tibi hujus libelli illa alia tua dedecora in ecclesia diutius non ferenda, latiùs patefieri, et personam illam ecclesiasticam, quam circumfers impudentissimè, detrahi tibi voluerit; me cur incuses deinceps aut reprehendas non erit, immo nec unquam fuit, velles modò tua in nos commissa recognoscere; verùm illa mordicus inficiari nimiùm tibi expedit, et simul pergis lacessere. Noli igitur, quod jam iterum moneo, me inculpare, si rursus quæ nolis nunc vicissim audieris. Sed videamus quid sit. Primùm occurrit mihi, nec opinatò, mea pro Pop. Anglicano Defensio secunda, typis Vlacci malevoli mendosissimè ac malitiosissimè excusa; omissis nonnunquam verbis integris, non sine structuræ totius atque sententiæ vel depravatione vel interitu. Quod ego omnes volo monitos, qui mea curant legisse, nequid meum ex officina hominis inimici et veteratoris exire integrum aut sincerum existiment. Huic accessio est, Vlacci itidem mala merx, "Alexandri Mori fides publica." Ita ego quos à me longissimè summovisse ac protelasse sum ratus, eos vel invitus sub iisdem pellibus conjunctissimos mihi reperio. Sic est profecto; qui liberrimè riserit hos homines, sibi devinxerit. Cavendum sanè et procul fugiendum erit cui putaverint isti nasum esse aduncum; ne aliquando satis irrisi, irridentis naribus duntaxat uncis ipsi sese tanquam uniones hinc atque inde suspendant. Cognoscite verò nunc adversarium, siquis unquam fuit, degenerem, iniquum, odiosum. Nam ut primùm, nescio quo casu per amicum meum, non id agentem ut ab isto gratiam iniret ullam, intellexit me ad Clamorem Regii Sanguinis responsum in se edere, æstuare mens hominis conscia, et omnes in partes versare se cœpit. Inter alia trepidantis atque degeneris animi indicia, qui libellum modò famosum tam cupidè, tamque improbè in alios edidisset, libellum nunc supplicem ad legatum fœderatorum ordinum apud nos commorantem scribit, orans atque obsecrans, uti cum Dom. Protectore quam instantissimè de supprimenda mea defensione ageret. Cùm responsum tulisset impetrari nequaquam id posse, exire nihilominus in lucem, jamque adnavigare animadversorem in se librum cum spicilegio quodam et collectaneis facinorum suorum conturbatus, et huc, illuc cursitans, circumspectissimus deinde homo, totus in speculis est; oculos ab litore dimovere vix audet; ubi advenisse librum cognovit, suumque statim indicem sensit, prece nescio an pretio exorat librarium, ut exemplum illius libri ullum ne divenderet, donec ipse responsum suum confecisset; id est, ut commercii fidem violaret, donec iste "fidem publicam" conflasset. Ita bonus ille vir quingenta plus minus exempla rectè et emendatè edita suo arbitratu premit, dum Vlaccus interim jacturam alienam suum ratus compendium, quot sibi videtur mendosa imprimit. Bene agis, Vlacce, ut consuevisti; sed auctarium hoc damni quid sibi vult adjectum? cur appendices vos ipsos adjunxistis mihi, hominum importunissimi? nemone ut possit me velle, quin vos quoque vel ingratissimum unus unà ferre cogatur? Ergo ego, ut videtur, non cæcus, sed cæcias. quos volebam propellere nebulones, attraxi. Tu verò, adeone tibi, More, tuoque sive genio sive ingenio diffisus es, ut victurum te, et in manus hominum perventurum desperares, nisi te mihi asseclam quocunque irem, malè conciliatum agglutinares, et emptoribus etiam nolentibus te obtruderes? verùm expertus jam didici quid sit picem attrectare; et erat hoc, opinor, haud minus Vlacci astutia provisum, qui non typographus solùm, sed arithmeticus, quod jam fateor, vetulus, metuebat ne "Alexandri Mori" neglecta "fides publica" jaceret, seque à societate segregaretur, nisi hanc artem aligationis, verè cauponariam, adhibuisset, et vile ac vitiosum vendibili miscuisset. Age verò, quoniam necesse est cum Defensione pro Pop. Anglicano, Alexandri Mori fidem publicam coëmere, quanquam parva hæc, utcunque nummulorum jactura erit, discere ex te avemus, quid sit "Mori fides publica?" utrum confessionem tuæ fidei publicam nobis exhibes, an quid in symbolum? Hæc enim tua fides publica est, opinor; privata an sit dicant, qui te Spir. Sanctum non agnoscere accusant. Quid ergo est? tuamne dicamus fidem esse publicam, an fidem publicam esse tuam? Tuam fidem, sicut et pudicitiam esse publicam, non est difficile ut credamus. Qui enim alienas uxores et ancillas vis esse publicas, quidni tua omnia, pudorem etiam ac fidem publicam esse velis? An verò hoc est quod dicis, fidem publicam esse tuam? at hoc quî potest fieri? Tunè fidem publicam pro scorto abduxisse te putas, tua ut simul esset et publica? aut captiosus hic titulus est, aut sensu vacuus. Si tua fides hæc est, quemadmodum est publica? si publica est, quemadmodum est tua? Relinquitur ut vel imprudens hoc titulo significasse videare cum Alexandri Mori fides publica sit, adeoque non tua; rursus cum tua sit, ideoque non publica, hanc quam affers fidem repugnantem et implicitam, nec publicam esse nec tuam. Quid ergo? aut dubiam, aut inanem, aut denique nullam. Quod si contendis hanc fidem omnino esse publicam, quæ tua tanta impudentia est, More, ut cum fidem ipse nullam habeas quam pro te afferas, tot flagitia perpetrare fide publica existimes tibi licere? ut nunquam aliàs dici veriùs, quàm de te versiculus iste videatur, quicquid peccat Morus, plectitur fides publica. Hæc tibi uni licentia si concedatur, non tu Alexander Morus, sed Alexander ille Phrygius mea quidem sententia nominaberis. Beatum interim te, cui militet fides publica. Contra quem autem? contra meas nempe "calumnias." Quas tandem illas? an quòd infamis libelli Clamoris Regii authorem te affirmaverim, nunc etiam justa probatione arguerim? at verbum de isto Clamore in tua fide publica nullum. An quòd hortensem te adulterum, domesticum Pontiæ stupratorem enarraverim? at horti percautè tu quidem ac timidè mentionem facis; facta utrobique flagitia aut non omnino, aut oblique tantum et frigidè negas. Quid ergo fidem publicam sollicitare opus erat iis de rebus, quas audacter ipse negare non potes? nihil sane, nisi quòd circumforanei pharmacopolæ et vanissimi circulatoris hoc solum tibi defuit, ut elogiis ac testimoniis, nescio quo pacto adscitis atque correptis, et ostentata fide publica te venditares. Tibi igitur si "scurra" sum, minus commoveor; quandoquidem is, qui ab oraculo sapientissimus, ab tui similibus scurra Atticus est dictus. Cur autem scurra tibi videor, More? an quòd nequitias tuas interdum falsè perstrinxerim? ne tu stultior sis, More, et adhuc magis ridendus, si quenquam putas, modò emunctæ naris sit, ad tuos fœtores, nisi fale conspersos, posse appropinquare. Sed vide, quàm tibi temperaverim, quàm leniter tecum egerim: Cùm enim in ipsa fronte libri nullo negotio potuerim tibi paria retulisse, et affixo tibi cognomento appositissimo atque meritissimo ita scripsisse, "Contra Alexandrum Morum adulterum et cinædum," cohibui me; partim tui misertus, partim ut legentium oculis atque auribus nonnihil consulerem, ne subito occursu tantæ fœditatis atque offensione averterentur.

Sed de his plus satis; infantissimo nunc titulo ad librum ipsum veniamus: id quod te, ut video, non delectat; nam rectà eunti viam obstruis; et ægrotantem doctorculum nescio quem Crantzium cum lectulo et culcitra, tanquam aggerem aut vallum obdis tibi et transversum extrudis. Qui "æger," ut ipse ait, et ni fallor ægerrimus, id est maledicendi cupidissimus, haud scio an ventilata lodice vix se in cubitum erexerit, ut hæc sua febriculosa somnia deliraret. Mox quasi testamento jam facto subjicit, "Scripsi propria manu et subsignavi licet æger corpore." Age jam tu, si vis, animam; nos resignemus; et lectori imprimis quid legaveris inspiciamus: multam, opinor, salutem; ne unciolam quidem; quid ergo? plorare: "Lege si potes et luge." Me verò, quòd ignotus minimè expectabam, secundum hæredem quincunce toto maledictorum aspergis. "Lege," inquis, "et luge sæculi vicem, in quo maledicentiæ tantum licet:" Luge potiùs tot insipientes doctorculos, quos nisi maturè caveat hoc sæculum, vereor ne propediem et lugeat et luat. Tu vero tum luxisses, cum inaudita audacia Salmasius homo privatus, extraneus, nulla injuria lacessitus, in universam Anglicanam remp. atque senatum fœdissimis contumeliis bacchatus est: tum luxisses, cùm probrosus ille anonymus Clamorem Regii Sanguinis in nos eructavit, nec acerbissimis modo verborum contumeliis ad rabiem usque furit ac sævit, sed nobiscum si agi oportere, decere, convenire, rationibus et argumentis, ut ipse putat, Christianis defendere conatur. Cognosce nunc, si potes, tuam ipse iniquitatem: cum externi, ad quos nostra nihil pertinent, nobis vel acerbissimè maledicunt, et maledicentiam ipsam defendunt, vis omnes "legant:" cum ego et pro meo in patriam officio, et magistratuum jussu, meos cives ac populares, me denique ipsum probris omnibus læsum defendo, vis omnes "lugeant." Tum cavere lectorem jubes, ne me "credat historicum." At neque tu Albertus es Crantzius; et hoc tibi edico caveas, ne ego antequam peroravero te citiùs mendacem, quàm tu me "fabulatorem" coarguas. "Quis et qualis sit iste Miltonus," inquis, "ignoro." Non displicet; neque enim tanti est tuum nosse aut non nosse: Ego verò te statim novi et morbum tuum. "Quis sit," inquis, "ignoro; libelli ejus satis docent." Indocilis ergo Crantzius, qui ignorat; temerarius item atque injurius, qui ignotum illæsus lædis, qui per calumniam ac maledicendi præproperam libidinem ex libro de divortiis, loco non citato, verbis aut non plenè aut perperam adscriptis, blasphemiæ falsò insimulas. Tu antè, quisquis es Crantzi, in malam pestem abieris, quam dixisse me "Doctrinam Evangelii et Dom. nostri Jesu Christi de divortio esse diabolicam," usquam inveneris. Quòd si dixi fortasse, quam inde conficiunt vulgares interpretes doctrinam, qua post divortium necessariò factum, omne aliud matrimonium interdicunt, esse diabolicam, id esse blas-phemiam quo tu pacto evincis? nisi si fortè theologorum dictatis quibusvis contradicere, nunc primùm blasphemia est credenda. Quod autem affirmas doctrinam de divortiis "ab omnibus patribus à theologis veteribus et hodiernis, ab omnibus academiis et ecclesiis Britannicis, Hollandicis, Gallicis" eodem modo explicari, scito te vehementer hallucinari: et ignorantiam doctori tibi et præsertim reprehensori turpem prodere: quam si vacat, in eo libro, qui à me "Tetrachordon" est inscriptus, exues. Poteris ibi, si libet, discere, quam ego tueor sententiam eam et patrum aliquot, et summorum postea theologorum Buceri, Fagii, Martyris, Erasmi fuisse; quorum hic justo tractatu Phimostomum quendam doctorem, tui comparem, eademque ferè blaterantem refellit. Interea non miror laborare te tantopere de inhibendis divortiis, cùm animadverto etiam domi tuæ haud leve accidere divortium solere; nimirum sensûs communis ab loquacitate tua. Quis enim mentis compos aut sententiæ suæ sic loquitur? "In Salmasio vix ipsi inimici aliud requirunt, quàm quod fuerit iracundior, et male conjugatus." Patere te doceri, doctorcule, quod pueruli sciant. Non requirebant illi quod fuit, sed quod non fuit. Ais me "Eunuchum dixisse Salmasium," quod nunquam dixi; duos tantummodo versus ex Eunuchi Terentiani prologo desumpsi, ut scenicum plorantis exordium, et lamentabile ridiculum risu, ut par erat, exciperem. "Nihil minus quam Eunuchum" fuisse affirmas: id mea nihil refert. Tu tamen, quid hac in parte solus tam audacter pronuncies, cave. Adeòne legum nescius ac rudis es, ut ullam rem difficiliùs probare te posse sine duobus testibus arbitreris? Sed minitaris deinde; "siquando prodibit viri summi posthumus liber, Miltonius sentiet mortuos quoque mordere." Vos ipsi existimare potestis, qui vivum non pertimui, eundem mortuum quàm non reformidem.

Æternum latrans exangues terreat umbras.

Si mordacem in me mortuum emiseritis, scitote neque melle neque mulso placatum à me iri. Cognoscetis an et ego λόγον ἐπιτάφιον commodè possim scribere. "Dii boni," inquis, "quam niger est Miltonius, si fides Salmasio?" at ipsam inferorum fuliginem si secum trahat, me, Deo benè juvante, denigrare non poterit. Tu Salmasii in me convitia ut lætè nunc refers! quasi pulmentum ægroto tibi hoc esset: contra illa convitia cùm ego me, ut par atque æquum est, defendam, tunc tuum illud triste et querebundum rursus audiemus, "Lege et luge;" et illi "Dii boni" tui tunc rursus fortassè implorabuntur. Sed dic, quæso, sacrosanctæ theologiæ doctor, quos tu Deos bonos colis? vereor ne catechumenus hic potiùs, quàm doctor dicendus sis. Docent sacræ literæ unum esse bonum Deum. Tibi si Dii boni sunt, erit fortassis et bona Dea; cujus tu sacerdos et mystagogus Corybantem in me nunc agis. Ego quæ in Morum attuli, quanquam tu "falsissima esse" præfidenter affirmas, sciunt illi esse vera, qui rebus omnibus interfuere, quique nullum Genevæ Crantzium eo tempore cognoverunt. Hoc sanè miretur quispiam si hæc Mori fides publica est, quo pacto, quòve nomine tua ista privata fides huc nobis ex grabatulo in præfationem irrepsit. Iniquitas certè in me tua fidem de illa quam infercis hic tuam in dubium vocat, qui me accusas, quòd "innocentissimo typographo parcere non potuerim." Ergo Vlaccus qui me sibi prorsus ignotum petulantissimis conuitiis adscripto nomine palam appetivit, tibi "innocentissimus" est. Audi ergo iterum, theologe, cui tu sacræ scientiæ vix initiatus mihi videris, audi quam te tuosque mores theologia sacra et sapientissimus præceptor dedoceat: qui absolvit improbum, et qui condemnat justum, abominationi Jehovæ sunt æquè ambo. Verùm haud scio utrum in me ex ignoto factum modò inimicum iniquior, an in amicum ipsum ineptior sis Morum: cujus predicatas virtutes tot vitiis interpunctas, et prope alternas introducis, ut non ornatum, sed maculis tantummodo variatum, non Morum, sed morionem demisisse abs tuis laudibus videaris. Pictor sanè eximius primam laudis lineam cum litura ducis; "semper magnas inimicitias exercuit cum æmulis." Vitium narras, Crantzi, in ministro evangelii quam minimè tolerandum; præsertim cum "iis inimicitiis ipse," quod fateris, "nimia loquendi libertate, locum sæpe præbuerit." Deinde est arrogans et Gallicè "Altierus," et Spanhemii judicio et tuo. Hactenus nigro lapillo; nunc vario: "Fœlix ingenium, nisi crabrones irritasset." Æmulos nimirum suos, non ipse aquila, sed ut muscas olim scarabeus ille vespæ filius. "Nullum novit Salmasius nobiliorem genium, si laboris tolerantior fuisset:" Ignavus igitur Morus; et tamen semper genio satis indulsit. Additque ipse Salmasius "variè læsisse uxorem suam:" Unde protervus in matronas etiam Morus; "præter inconsiderationem" quoque "tali homine indignam:" Salmasio itaque judice, quid est Morus nisi morus? Hic autem fateor satis causæ fuisse, cur "ægrum" te subscriberes; manifestò enim febricitas. Qui sic tibi dixisse Salmasium ais, "siquid in" Pontia "peccavit" Morus, "ego sum leno et uxor mea lena." Festivè tu quidem in hoc dramate personarum numerum auxisti, et uberem ridendi ansam, sicuti otium esset, porrexisti. Verum siquid hujusmodi Salmasius amico tibi et privatim, siquid incommodius de se vel de uxore familiariter locutus est, id tu, nisi planè delirares, amicitiam saltem reveritus et arcanum domesticum, non tam stolidè hoc in loco effutisses. Sed redis ad laudes, "acutum judicium Mori;" adjunge "inconsiderationem" illam "tali homine indignam," res duas inter se conjunctissimas. "Fœlicitatem in concionando;" et infœlicitatem in scortando: par alterum in Mori laudibus appositissimum. Accedit corollari loco "trium linguarum peritia:" quæ professorem hunc tandem consummat nobis trilinguem; id est, cum supradictis virtutibus paulò plus quàm triobolarem. Cum voto denique finem facis ineptiendi; ut "Deus Christianorum" (modo enim reliquisse "Deos bonos" tuos videris) "hanc mentem inspiret potestatibus, ut hanc scripturiendi licentiam Christianis infamem compescant." Vos itaque priores compescant, à quibus hæc omnis licentia primò exorta est: mihi mei defendendi jus ac potestatem adversus contumelias vestras, uti spero, non eripient. Intelliges tum ipse, quàm ego libens omni hoc genere contentionum supersedeam. Atque tibi jam, ut puto, satisfactum est; idque eò ampliùs feci,

Nunc Vlaccum paucis dignemur: nam et Vlaccus responsat, typographus meus, et necessarius jam factus. Responsa hominis breviter collegam, ut perspiciatis quàm bellè quadrent. Es veterator, inquam, Vlacce. Sum bonus, inquit, "arithmeticus." Et tamen queruntur, qui tibi expensum tulerunt, pessimè te numerare. Ego ad probitatis normam te exigo. Hem tibi, inquit, "canonem logarithmicum! Sophistica hæc est, Vlacce, non logistica: perinde quasi idcirco solum arithmeticam didicisses, quod in ea falsi regulam doceri audiveras. Clancularius es, inquam, et obæratus aufugisti. Tu mihi "sinuum tabulas," et "tangentium," et "secantium" crepas. At quibus tecum ratio est, expensi tabulis te urgent: Atque ipsum est quòd sinuosum te nimis, et alieni cupidius tangentem, et male secantem queruntur. "Trigonometriam," inquis, "conversis sinubus in logarithmos artificialem absolvi." At artificia interim tua et versutias creditores luunt: Non trigonometram, sed tetragonum sine fraude cum illis te esse oportuit; non angulos et obliquitates, sed suum cuique metiri ac reddere. De cætero, ad tuam te confessionem ipsam rejicio. Londini, Parisiis, iniqui librarii, iniquum judicium, iniqui judices; tu solus integer et castus: at illi contra te unum omnes cum audientur, vera esse ea quæ de te dixi, nemo non fatebitur. In me autem quàm scelestus fueris, facile evincam. Primùm scripsisti ad Hartlibium, petens, ut mea, siquid haberem, posses excudere; et simul de mea oculorum calamitate, essemne omnino orbus luminum, sedulò et quasi dolens quæsivisti: mox proditorie, cum intelligeres nihil tibi à me excudendum venire, cæcitatem mihi, quam quasi sollicitè modò et dolenter inquirebas, eam statim sceleratè insultans palam exprobrasti. Nam typographus, inquis, sum; "quid ad typographos tam magnæ controversiæ, nisi ut operam suam?" Acutum sanè et typographicum! Non alius quisquam typographis plus hac in parte quam ego concesserim. Num ergò tu famosissimo libello tuum subscribere professum nomen quasi author esses, debuisti? et cujus ex libris lucrari cupiebas, neque nunc primum, ut audio, lucratus es, ejus nomen turpissimis contumeliis maculare, cum privilegio scilicet, licere tibi existimasti? "Bellum," inquis, "erat;" et simul miratur tua vastitas, quòd, facta pace, bacchationes in me privatim tuas et singularem insolentiam impunè tibi esse noluerim. Nescis enim, vappa, quid belli ratio, in causa etiam longissimè diversa, ab temulenta tua rabie discrepet. An siquis existimationem meam privatùs per causam belli famoso libro violaverit, ea mihi injuria devoranda est, ut ne possim, cùm visum erit, me justa et expectata defensione vindicare? "Non me puduit," inquis, "quanquam ignominiosè accusatum, alteram editionem adornare." At non omnes tibi similes sunt, Vlacce, ut non pudeat fidem, pudorem, omnia lucro postponere; cujus fœda cupiditas adeò vilem tibi et abjectum animum ingeneravit, ut tuis ipse typis teipsum graphicè nebulonem depinxisse non erubescas; eodemque tempore mihi maledicere, et meis ex libris quæstum facere. In quo quid cani similius fieri abs te potuit? cujus ego allatrantis capiti, cùm os illud vehementer inflixissem, exclamas tu quidem et quæritaris; mox ut esculentum esse comperisti, reversus blandulè, rodis simul et liguris. Tu verò mea ut non omninò attigisse debuisti, aut non corrupisse; nunc inimicus librum meum non solùm excudisti, sed ultione vilissima deformatum ac mutilatum et adversariis hinc inde obsessum exposuisti: quorum alterum rapacissimam lucelli cujusvis aviditatem tuam, alterum et tuam singularem militiam et tuarum mercium improbitatem declarat. Hæc tua sunt, Vlacce. Nunc remoto te circumpedo herum tuum aggredi tandem ab latere aperto liberiùs licebit. Qui quamvis non modò intus turpis, et sibi conscius, sed foris jam penè omnibus manifestus atque perspicuus sit, tamen cùm in audacia positam sibi esse spem unicam statuerit, absterso ore, ut in proverbio sacro scortum illud, et assumpta non solum viri sancti oratione atque persona, sed sapientissimi quoque titulo Ecclesiastes novus cum mala cruce, et sacrarum literarum professor profanus incedit. Adeò ut mirentur omnes in quo summa esse tot vitia reperirentur, in eo illa omnia potuisse ab impudentia tam longè superari.

Ego verò eorum quæ de te scripsi, More, cum "affinxerim" sanè nihil, affirmaverim autem ea quæ et creberrima passim fama, et mihi privatim testibus idoneis essent cognita, utrius hoc nostri "ad sempiternum dedecus" futurum sit, non id tuum, quod tamen tibi arrogas, judicium erit, sed, Dei voluntate, hominum integrorum sententiis dirimetur. Tu interim præfationis mihi (quid enim "tui præfatio" si nondum assequor) vel "vanissimi" vel "mendacissimi," quanquam uberrima tibi mendaciorum copia est, mitte "comparare." Testimonialium ut sis tibimet callidissimus æruscator, præfationum tamen coactorem te mihi nolo. Nam quod ais, quæ de te protuli "ejusmodi esse, nemo ut sit eorum quibus paulo propius innotuisti, quamvis iniquior esset, quin falsitatis perpetuæ coarguat," id usque eò veritati planè contrarium est, ut eorum qui te "propius" norunt, multi nuntiis, non nemo literis questus mecum sit huic me argumento facinorum tuorum tam uberi et copioso parùm satisfecisse; tantum abesse, quicquam ut finxerim, ut permultas, præclaras etiam, tuas res gestas silentio præterierim: se, si adfuissent, quod et optabant quoque nonnulli, largiore me palmarum tuarum accessione et copia facilè fuisse instructuros. Tuum ergo illud "miserere," quo tu et operarius tuus, par bipedum odiosissimum, "misereri meam vicem" vultis ridiculè videri, vobis vestrisque vicibus moneo reservetis, ego à me procul arceo: miserationes improborum cujusmodi sint, didici. Nam quid est, obsecro, quod miserationem hanc vestram inhumanam tandem commoverit? quòd "in te" nempe "hominem immeritum grassatus sim." At ô gemina impudentia, et consciorum par callosissimum! vosne ut audeatis vos "immeritos" asseverare, nisi fortè vocis ambiguo colluditis, quorum alter Clamorem illum infamem atque infandum edidit, alter excudit, uterque divulgavit? Discant hinc omnes, quæ vos "cum bono Deo" affirmare soleatis, quam sint pro nihilo habenda. Nec precationem feliciùs, quàm miserationem adscivisti; ut ad "justam no-minis tui defensionem aggredienti veram et verecundam suggerat tibi Deus orationem, ab omni mendacio et obscœnitate prorsus abhorrentem:" Alterum enim nunquam es præstiturus, ut mendaciis abstineas; alterum iniquissimè precaris, ut cùm tua facta obscœnissima sint, orationem suggerat tibi Deus factis abhorrentem: quod contrà precari debuisses, ut suggereret tibi Deus non verecundam, sed obscœnam: sic enim tua facta verbis saltem propriis et non mendacibus Deo atque hominibus confessus esses; sic non hypocritam egisses; quod Deo longè gratius fuisset. Nunc non Deus te, sed tua illa Dea audit Cotytto, sive ea Laverna, sive utraque est, labra tacitè moventem:

> "Da mihi fallere; da justo sanctoque videri ·
> "Noctem peccatis, et stupris objice nubem "

Quæris quî sciam quæ tu tecum? Dicam. Vocale quiddam, si nescis, omnis, totusque homo est: non lingua, non vox hominis sola loquitur; vita ipsa, mores, facta, quid quisque velit, tacente sæpius lingua, clamant atque testantur. Tu itaque hæc tacitè; illa clarè; "Orationem videlicet ob omni mendacio et obscœnitate prorsus abhorrentem, hoc est inquis dissimillimam tuæ." De hoc utroque sigillatim à me tuo ordine respondebitur. A mendaciis exordiris: "nam ut hinc," inquis "ordiar, quid mendacius ipsa fronte libelli tui? quem," nescis quare, Defensionem Secundam pro Populo Anglicano vocem; "re quidem vera" inquis "teterrimam contra me satyram et ventosissimum panegyricum à te dictum tibi." Næ tu mendacia jejunus admodum et esuriens, sed inani morsu captas, si toto libro nihil mendacius ipsa fronte invenire potes. Quam ego et veracem esse, et per omnia libro consentaneam facile demonstrabo; quid enim appositius, quid accommodatius ad defensionem populi Anglicani, quàm si ejus vitam et mores turpissimos esse convincam, qui probrosissimo libello edito populum Anglicanum tanta injuria lacessisset? eum te esse confirmo. Quid si digressus aliquoties essem, et in materia præsertim tam trita et sæpe tristi lectoris nonnunquam recreare animum aliunde experirer? Tùne adeo pressus et minimè laxus homo es, ut latum unguem ab argumenti cancellis discedere quoquam licere non putes? quæ lex rhetorum tuorum digressiones istiusmodi reprehendit? Ego si exemplis, quod possem, oratorum illustrium explicarem quid hac in parte liceat et usitatum sit, efficerem ut appareret statim facili negotio, quàm tu harum rerum rudis atque ignarus sis. Nec solam satyram, quod ais, in te scripsi, sed ut perspicerent omnes, libentius me et multo studiosiùs bonos collaudare, quàm malos vituperare, clarissimorum aliquot nominum laudes, qui vel patriam armis et consilio egregiè liberassent, vel mihi saltem facta eorum defendenti favissent, (cum id etiam causam cohonestaret,) et passim admiscui, et plenius introduxi. Atque adeò ne hoc quidem, quòd serenissimæ Suecorum Reginæ gratias potiùs, quàm laudes persolverim, tu unquam ostenderis à defensione pop. Anglicani, cui illa impensè existimata est favisse, alienum fuisse. Quid si, quod objectas, me denique laudassem aliquantisper digressus? quis ea tempora, eas persæpe causas incidere non fateatur, ut propriæ laudes etiam sanctissimis modestissimisque viris indecoræ non sint, nec unquam fuerint? hunc etiam locum uberrimum exemplorum illustrare copia si vellem, equidem me omnibus facilè probarem tu obmutesceres. Sed me nusquam laudavi; nec, quod criminaris, panegyricum à me mihimet dictum usquam invenies. Singulare quidem in me divini numinis beneficium, quòd me ad defendendam libertatis tam fortiter vindicatæ causam præter cæteros evocasset, et agnovisse fateor, et nunquam non agnoscere debere: et præclaram hinc minimeque culpandam, ut ego quidem arbitror, exordiendi materiam sumpsisse. Petitus deinde ab illo Clamore Regio convitiis omnibus atque calumniis, et infimorum numero habitus, non me laudibus, quanquam id nefas non erat, contra adversarios despectores, sed nuda ac simplici rerum mearum narratione contentus, tuebar: id populi Anglicani quem defendebam, quanti interesset, uti ego meam existimationem non planè abjicerem nec obtrectandam quibusvis et obculcandam relinquerem, præfatus antequam mei facerem mentionem sedulò ostendi; offensionem denique si cujus fortè hac in re incurrissem, haud negligenter sum deprecatus. Hæc tu si propter invidentiam et livorem aut non legere aut meminisse non vis, quid est reliqui nisi ut crepes? nullum enim in fronte libri mendacium, nisi abs te per malitiam atque calumniam conflatum reperietur. Quanto mendacior "Alexandri Mori fides publica?" an te omnia in illo libro ex fide publica scripsisse audes dicere? atqui aut hoc tibi necessariò dicendum, aut libri illius fronti nulla fides est. Ita tu dum in titulo tuo putidus, in meo malitiosus es, aut fides publica frontem per te, aut tua frons fidem perdidit. Pergis de mendaciis "Alterum est," inquis, "authorem esse me libri, cui titulus, Clamor Sanguinis Regii." Quod cum ego verum esse firmissimis testimoniis jam suprà demonstraverim, teque illius libri certissimum curatorem atque editorem, omnium jure gentium et legibus pro authore habendum esse, sequitur ut quæ mei fallendi spe nixus hoc loco vociferaris, quasi author non esses, tametsi infirma per se, atque inania sunt, nunc fundamento illo fallaci subruto, sua sponte corruant atque subsidant: simulque ut totum illud mendacium, illa omnis "temeritas, impudentia, immanitas," qua me per summam impudentiam hinc oneras, in teipsum recidat. Exclamantem itaque et frigentem et tuo laqueo impeditum, te hic prætereo: nugas autem quasdam tuas sine risu non possum; per quas acutius et miserabilius exclamare te putas. "Nam licet," inquis, "ea crimina quæ in me conjicis vera essent, tamen contra jus et fas omne esset, quod nullius in nos authoritatis, quoddam tribunal excitas, criminationes publicè spargis." An nescis ergo, hominum ineptissime, idem hoc tribunal esse, eandem sellam atque authoritatem, jus idem criminandi et judicandi, quod ego vestro primùm Salmasio, mox Clamatori Regio defensione justissima eripui? vestrum ego nunc exemplum atque judicium in vos converto, vestro jure utor; vestrum ipsum tribunal, vestra subsellia, quæ in nos parastis, de vestris erepta manibus in vos justissimè statuo. "Deinde," inquis, "tametsi libri author illius essem, non tibi tamen integrum fuisset tot scommata nihil ad causam pertinentia huic propinare sæculo." Videte, quæso, æquitatem hominis: Sibi et Salmasio licere vult omnia, calumnias, mendacia, contumelias; nobis vera in illos crimina retorquere, quasi ad causam scilicet minùs pertinentia, non licebit. Sanè qui res, rationesque rerum recto judicio ponderare solent, non dubito quin mecum sentiant, nihil vehementius ad causam pertinere, quàm quali quis vita atque moribus sit qui eam acerrimè defendat. Ego causam Regiam, qui vehementissimè defenderit, si aut corruptum esse aut facinorosum arguo, haud levi argumento impugnâsse me causam Regiam satis intelligo: Si mendacem, si turpem, si perfidum per omnem vitam criminatorem nostrum esse ostendo, eundem quoque in nos esse eò faciliùs fidem facio. Tu interim cùm duo tibi proposueris; "alterum," ut ostenderes "nec esse te libri autorem illius, nec id fuisse mihi persuasum;" alterum, "falsa esse quæ in te conjecta sunt probra," nihil horum efficis; sed dissolutus ac fluens, modò huc, modò illuc vagando, tum eadem inculcando, ignarus quàm in propinquo tibi effusè nunc, pabulanti latens à tergo atque intactus hostis instet, dum nescire me putas quid sit libelli authorem esse, aut quid tu feceris, in eadem perstas vel futilitate vel fallacia. "Quid commerui? quid peccavi? quando populum tuum læsi?" Cavillaris etiam; "quando boves tuos aut equos abegi?" Non tu boves meos abegisti, cacus pastor ut sis; sed alienas oves abduxisti, tuam deseruisti Phryx novus Alexander, vel etiam Cataphryx Morus. At "sciscitari ex amicis" credo poteram, quos isthic apud nos habes, nec "paucos nec vulgaris notæ." Quasi verò ego, qui "divinus," ut ais, "non sum," tuos amicos quinam essent, scirem, qui ante hunc Clamorem belluinum abs te editum, ne vagiisse quidem adhuc te aut infantem natum sciebam. Aut tu planè sensu, vel saltem logica destitutus es, aut ejus rudimenta non sic didicisses, relationes in sensum non incurrere. Itaque et inimicos esse tibi tam multos eosque tua non pietate, sed turpitudine quæsitos necdum audieram; neque ut "ludibriis" tam esses "opportunus," neque ut tu, Veneris nepos, "Junonem" sic iratam tibi haberes: quæ tibi essent infensa numina æque ignorabam, et qui essent Crantzio "Dii boni." "Anni duo sunt," inquis, "ex quo tuum hoc drama exornas." Quanquam hoc perridiculum est, quod optasses nunquam editum, id serò editum queri, et sum ego qui elaboratum rectè atque limatum siquid est, id diu accurasse si dicor, non reprehendendum me magis quàm scriptores quosque optimos putem, qui tarditatem scribendi imputatam sibi à sciolis facilè contempsere, tamen et hoc esse falsissimum ex procemio superioris libri intelligitur, ubi cur maturiùs non respondissem causam reddidi, et errare te vehementer scito, si operis tam ardui fuisse credis vel inanem clamorem refutare, vel te cuivis obnoxium ludos facere. Nec mihi tot subcisivis horulis "dicta illa Floralia," quæ vocas, quot tibi furtivis noctibus atque dieculis facta illa Fescennina stetere. Et "periisset" sanè, hìc enim tecum sentio, paradisus ille tuus, et ficus et morus et sycomorus, quibus nequitiam tuam, quantum potuit fieri, honestè adumbratam quoniam sunt qui rem oculis non visam, factam credi nolint, istius defensionis inanitatem ridens, vel argutè vel contemptim exposui: periissent, inquam, illi omnes non sanè flosculi, sed arbusculæ, nisi tu in horto mœchatus esses: ex hortensi et suburbana cultione tua, non ex urbanitate mea amœnitas ista omnis effloruit. Quod autem "in frontispicio satyræ in te meæ" (quæ non magis satyra est, quàm quæ est Marci Tullii in Vatinium quemvis oratio) "tanquam propylæum operis illustre collocasse" me aïs, "quid Morus Græcè significet," frustrà tu quidem propylæa somnias; non ita eram decori nescius, ut sublime quicquam aut tragicum in historia tua ponerem: Ego tuguriolum illud tuum in horto, tu Palatium illud vetus, in quo hortus ille erat, fortasse cogitabas; et in illa olitoris cellula, haud dubiè Palatinus adulter tibi videbaris. Id ipsum autem Græce significare te dixi quod etsi lingua nulla esset, reipsà te esse nunc dico. Illud tamen negaverim, quoties te tuo nomine Morum appello, "invidiam me velle," quod quereris, "ex nomine facere," et moriam tibi objicere; mihi enim id ferè in mentem non venit; sed professori Græcæ linguæ Græcum etymon Mori ita perpetuò salire per cerebrum tibi solet, ut nemo salutare te possit More, quin tu ab eo te stultum appellari morose admodum suspicèris. Hæc sunt et hujusmodi quæ tu paginis paulo minùs viginti, cùm authorem te non esse Clamoris Regii probare debuisses, nugatus es: in quibus singulis si otiari tecum diutius et morari vellem, ipse Morus essem. Nunc tandem seriò videris velle agere. "Non rumores, non sermones, sed literas testes dabis, admonitum me fuisse ne in hominem innoxium incurrerem." Literas ergo inspiciamus, quas in medium affers "amplissimi viri D. Nicuportii fœderati Belgii legati" ad te scriptas; quas tu, ut videtur, literas non ad probationis vim, quam nullam habent, sed ad ostentationem solùm legendas proposuisti. Is, quod singularem "viri amplissimi" humanitatem declarat (quid enim is non viri boni, qui tui indignissimi causâ tantopere laboraret?) ad Dom. Thurloium secretarium adit, tuas literas communicat. Cum nihil se proficere videret, ad me duos viros nobiles, amicos meos, cum literis iisdem tuis allegat. Quid illi? Literas illas Mori recitant, rogant, et legatum Nieuportium idem rogare aiunt, uti literis tuis, quibus authorem Clamoris Regii negares te esse, fidem haberem. Respondi non esse æquum quod postularent; neque tanta fide Morum, neque id fieri solere, ut contra famam communem et rem alioqui satis compertam negantis de se rei et adversarii solis literis crederetur. Illi, cùm aliud è contra nihil quod dicerent haberent, pugnare desinunt. Si hæc non credis, tute percurre legati literas, quibus ego nunc testibus in te utor. "Optabat eum non invulgare librum:" verùm id mei juris erat et potestatis. "Ne tibi hanc injuriam facerem, ut illud tibi opus imputarem:" At liquere sibi, aut unde sibi liqueret, injurium tibi hoc esse quòd imputassem, non scribit. Saltem ut "nihil vellem inserere, quod te tangeret." Quidni verò te tangeret quod ad te pertinet, nisi id ad te non pertinere demonstrasset? demonstrare autem non potuisse, argumento firmissimo est, quòd cùm Dom. Thurloio secretario idem denuò persuadere vellet, nihil habuit quod mitteret, præterquam idem illud exemplum literarum tuarum; ex quo et illud facilè perspicuum est, "rationes" illas ad me allatas "ob quas optabat," ne vellem eum librum evulgare, nihil conjunctum cum reipubl. rationibus habuisse. Noli itaque tu literas legati corrumpere: nihil illic de "hostili spiritu," nihil de "importuno tempore:" tantùm "dolere" se scribit "noluisse me rogatu suo tantillum moderationis ostendere:" id est, noluisse me suo privatim rogatu tibi adversario publico rem gratam facere; opus excusum et jam penè editum revocare et de integro retexere. Excusatum me habeat "vir amplissimus," et præsertim legatus, si injurias publicas privatis intercessionibus condonare noluerim, nec sanè potuerim; multoque minùs eas injurias Clamoris Regii, quæ neque ad bellum neque ad pacem recens factam ullo modo spectarent. Bellum illud contra Anglos non contra rempubl. fuit: bellum vestrum non contra Anglos, sed contra rempubl. est. An siquis regiarum partium per bellum Regium quicquam in nos commisit, id per pacem Batavicam à nobis non erit vindicandum? siquis in rempubl. nostram contumeliosè quid scripsit, id post pacem cum Batavis factam non erit refellendum? an per alienum bellum plus Regiis in nos, quàm per nostram pacem nobis in Regios licebit? At non nos cum Regiis ut eorum Clamatoribus, sed cum iis provinciis pacem fecimus, à quibus causa Regia longissimè sejuncta est; eamque pacem in qua de hostibus nostræ reipubl. non modo non favendis, sed ne tectò quidem recipiendis nominatim exceptum est. At enim hoc "intempestivum," et "ἀπειροκαλον fuit quod alienissimo tempore cum omnia hic et isthic festis ob pacem ignibus collucerent," tu solus gelida perfunderis. Equidem non in eo positam ἀπειροκαλίαν existimabam tu lautus homo ista meliùs: doleo non satis perpensa à me officii momenta in te mei. At graviter peccatum est; tum enim "lætis clamoribus nostrum vestrumque cœlum consonabat." Quasi verò te ardelione et incendiario benè multato, non multo lætiùs illi ignes pacifici et sociales relucerent: quasi etiam "vestrum nostrumque cœlum" faustis clamoribus non multò lætiùs consonet; cùm infaustus et feralis inimicorum clamor compescitur. Quod tu itaque alienissimum tempus, id ego opportunissimum fuisse contendo: nec "obstrepuisse" me, quod ais, "Pacis articulis," sed acclamasse et plausisse. Postremò et me prorsus ignoras, et tibimet intra paucos versiculos manifestò mendax deprehenderis. "Abs te," inquis, "quo factum sit animo non interpretor:" Et statim, quòd "depositis armis, animum retineres armatum." Mirum ni ex eo bello quæstum feci, aut stipendium aliquod navale, qui factam pacem usque eò molestè tulerim. Dicam igitur quod me dicere neque ullum obsequium, neque necessitas cogit. Falleris tu quidem magnoperè, si quenquam esse Anglorum putas, qui Fœderatis Provinciis me uno sit amicior, aut voluntate conjunctior; qui præclariùs de republ. illa sentiat; qui eorum industriam, artes, ingenium, libertatem aut pluris faciat, aut sæpiùs collaudet; qui bellum incœptum cum iis minùs voluerit, susceptum pacatiùs gesserit, compositum seriò magis triumpharit; qui denique obtrectatoribus eorum minùs unquam crediderit. Unde tu nullam in me calumniam mendaciorem aut minùs congruentem affingere potuisti. "At illum rerum cardinem aucupatus esse videor, ut prodeuntibus demum articulis pacis obstreperem." Tu scilicet cardo rerum; in te pacis articuli vertuntur; hunc si attingas, actum de pace est. At quem hominem? quo numero? civem credo egregium, senatorem primarium, ornamentum curiæ: immò ne civem quidem, sed inquilinum, alienigenam, et Scoto-Gallum impurissimum, odiosum omnibus atque offensum, reipubl. hostem, qui si quò expulsus, ejectus, et in rem malam amandatus esset, ne tantillum quidem articulis pacis noceretur; immò satisfieret potius. Tu itaque desine, si sapis, politicari; et pacis articulos cave dehinc mussites, nequis te ex pacis articulis Regii Clamoris editorem ad supplicium poscat. Pollicitus sum, inquis, legato, "nihil indecens exiturum è calamo meo." Neque fefelli; vel siquid omninò illa in parte commisi, in me solum commisi, dum tuos excutere putores, tua tractare inquinamenta sustinui: et, quòd illic etiam præfatus sum, non tam quid me magìs decuisset, quàm quid te dignum esset spectabam. Nec tamen indecentiùs aut acerbiùs in te ego, quàm olim viri gravissimi in improbum quemque ac perditum et concionibus honestissimo quoque civitatis in loco atque conventu habitis, et scriptis palam editis invecti sunt. Verùm ad illud nunc venio quod virum sanctissimum et hujus ætatis longè castissimum offendit Morum; "illoto" scilicet "sermone utor, verbis nudis et prætextatis. Propudium hominis et prostibulum! Tene illota verba reprehendere, qui facta turpissima patrare non erubuisti? Jam non pœniteret profectò, siquid in hoc genere liberiùs paulo dixissem; etiamsi aliud inde nihil assequutus essem, nisi ut elicerem ex te dissimulationem hanc improbissimam, teque personatum omnibus vel hinc palam educerem hypocritarum omnium deterrimum. Quod autem tu mihi dictum libro toto ostenderis, quod verbum illotius, quàm hoc ipsum Morus? sed non in verbo neque in re, sed in te vitium omne atque obscœnitas tota est. Tu fauno quovis aut nudo satyro turpior, bona verba uti nuda essent tuis moribus effecisti. Tuam nulla umbra, ne ficus ipsa quidem, velare turpitudinem potuit. Qui te dicit, tuaque flagitia, cum necesse est obscœna dicere. Itaque si in tuum opprobrium vel nuda verba exeruissem, facilè me etiam gravissimorum authorum exemplo defendissem. Qui ita semper existimarunt, verba nuda atque exerta cum indignatione prolata, non obscœnitatem, sed gravissimæ reprehensionis vehementiam significare. Quis unquam Pisoni annalium scriptori, qui propter virtutem et pudicos mores Frugi dictus est, vitio vertit, quòd in annalibus questus est "adolescentes peni deditos esse." Quis unquam Sallustium scriptorem gravissimum reprehendit, quòd etiam in historia dixit;

Quid Herodotum, Senecam, Suetonium, Plutarchum, authores omnium gravissimos adducam? quos tu si negas verba etiam plusquam prætextata, resque satis turpes rebus gravioribus aliquoties immiscuisse, satis declaras te iis in authoribus versatum non esse. Hoc si omni tempore et loco indecens est, quoties tu Erasmo doctissimo qui Roterodami stat æreus, quoties Thomæ Morò nostro, cujus tu nomen tuo commaculas, quoties denique ipsis ecclesiæ patribus antiquis, Alexandrino Clementi, Arnobio, Lactantio, Eusebio, dum obscœna veterum religionum mysteria vel denudant, vel derident, indecentiæ et obscœnitatis dicam scribere debebis? Verùm tu fortassè, ut sunt ferè hypocritæ, verbis tetrici, rebus obscœni, ne ipsum quidem Moseu ista noxa immunem abs te dimiseris; cùm alibi sæpiùs, tum etiam ubi Phiniæ hasta qua parte mulierem transfixerit, siqua fides Hebræis, apertè narrat. Ne ipsum quidem Jobum pudentissimum ac patientissimum, dum meretricem sibi uxorem nudato et prisco sermone imprecatur, si ipse alienæ uxori insidiatus unquam fuisset. Non te Salomonis Euphemismi censorem, non prophetarum scripta tuam turpiculi immò nunnunquam planè obscœni censuram effugerint, quoties Masorethis et Rabinis, pro eo quod disertè scriptum est, suum libet Keri adscribere. Ad me quod attinet, fateor malle me cum sacris scriptoribus εὐθυῤῥήμονα, quàm cum futilibus Rabinis εὐσχήμονα esse. Tuque frustra Marcum Tullium inclamas; qui si "in aureo" illo quem citas, "de Officiis libro," illud jocandi genus elegans, urbanum, ingeniosum, facetum arbitratur, quo genere non modò Plautus et Atticorum antiqua comœdia, sed etiam philosophorum Socraticorum libri referti sunt, id quod illic legisse poteras, non ille mihi quidem nimis angustos, non nimis severos decori statuisse fines videtur, ut cuiquam difficile sit intra eos fines sese continere; nedum ut ego me non continuerim. Noli itaque tu mihi homo inquinatissimus, de honesto et decoro ineptire; non est tuum, mihi crede; immò tu sic habeto, nihil minùs decere, nihil ab ratione ipsa decori magis abhorrere, quàm te talem, qualis es, lautum sermonem usurpare, aut illotum reprehendere. Sed videris nunc velle rem omnem in pauca redigere: "Non sum," inquis, "autor Clamoris." Non suades. "Res patet, dilucet, eamque pluribus argumentis affirmare tam sit ineptum, quàm in clarissimum solem mortale lumen inferre." Desine ampullas; dic tandem aliquid. "Ipse ego quantum possum reclamo." Nempe nunc denuò; minacitèr modò et regiè; nunc miserè. "Amici non tacent." Ex ore tuo. "Ecclesiastæ admonent." Fide tua. "Legati confimant." Ex literis tuis. Quid hoc omne aliud est, nisi illa initio tua singularis negatio, "Non sum author?" Verùm tu, antequam ad hunc locum pervenisti, jamdiu intelligis miser quo loco res tuæ sint; quos in laqueos te indueris; quibus à me vinculis obses tenearis: nunc quantum voles clama, te non authorem Clamoris esse; cùm omnium gentium leges atque jura, præconem te mihi pro clamatore, procuratorem pro authore tradiderint. Quid nunc authore fiat, aut ubi terrarum degat, nihil moror: vixerit sanè in Gallia, et simul in Hollandia "jucundum fuerit videre," quod narrat ipse, "quibus ludibriis, quibus periculis legati nostri" eo tempore conflictarentur: sit vel Satanicæ minister synagogæ, non laboro; hoc saltem unum benè fecit, quod te tam diligentem sibi tamque fidelem diaconum, non Evangelii, sed infamissimi libelli ministrum reliquit. Age nunc triumphos de me istos, quos ego flebiles tibi efficiam: profer in medium, si potes, mea illa "mendacia, meam illam imprudentiam, temeritatem, audaciam, pertinaciam et impudentiam," meum illud ingens piaculum quòd te Regii Clamoris affirmaverim authorem. Clama quantum potes è longinquo ad populum Anglicanum quem illo anteà nefario clamore edito tam indignè læsisti: nam accedere non audes. Vociferare, inquam, si satis in tuto es; "Quantum te, popule Anglicane, tua de Miltono fefellit opinio!" Hæc enim ipsa dum clamas, dum plaudis tibi, et tanquam elapso gratularis, nescis me lustra tua, et sylvas anonymas indagasse, nescis in plagis te meis esse: sentit pop. Anglicanus me non pœnitendum vel defensorem juris sui, vel venatorem ferarum suarum. En ego te reluctantem obtorto collo, traductum per ora omnium, pestem populi, in ecclesia verrem, cauda non minus, quàm obliquo dente maleficum, in conspectum omnium protraho. Teque belluam pop. Anglicano inspectandam, non ædilitatis, sed defensionis meæ gratissimum munus edo. Tu interea, nequid desit ad triumphum, quem de me, ut putas, deluso atque decepto agis, quòd authorem Clamoris te dixerim, adhibes, ut solet, jocos. Et "frontem," inquis, "immeritò perfricare diceris, tota enim jamdudum frons tibi periit." Noli nunc de me queri; noli "sarcasmos," et "sannas" et scommata," simulata rursus gravitate, reprehendere: memineris ut hi ludi à teipso instaurati et introducti nunc sint; ut reprehensos modò et damnatos ipse nunc revoces. Facetus esse cupis; non succurrit in præsentia: suggeram itaque ego jocos quosdam tuos; et quod triumphum maximè deceat, militares: quique admoneant te temporis cujusdam, in quo frons tua tam validè "perfricta" est, ut tibi tum multo maluisses totam frontem periisse. Meministi fortasse illius diei, immo verò diei, credo, et horæ et loci meministi, cùm tu Pontiam in domo Salmasii ultimùm, ut opinor, convenisti: tu illam, ut copulæ renunciares; illa te, ut nuptiis diem diceres. Quæ ubi è contrario pactum stupro conjugium dissolvere in animo tibi esse videt, tum verò tua innuba, non enim dicam Tisiphone, impatiens tantæ injuriæ in faciem tibi atque oculos, non sectis unguibus, furens involavit. Tu qui teste Crantzio (præstat enim non sine tua fide publica tantum certamen exordiri) qui teste, inquam, Crantzio "Gallicè Altier," Latinè feroculus esses, teste Deodato, "terribiles ungues ad tui tutelam haberes," pro virili tua parte ad fœmineum hoc genus pugnæ te comparas. Stat arbitra certaminis Juno Salmasia. Ipse Salmasius in conclavi proximo decumbens pedibus æger, ut prælium commissum audiit, risu penè moritur. At heu nefas! imbellis noster Alexander, et Amazoni congressus impar, succumbit. Illa inferiorem nacta, in frontem et supercilia nasumque hominis tum primùm supernè peccat: miris capreolis et Phrygiano opere totum jacentis vultum percurrit: nunquam tibi More lineamenta Pontiæ minùs placuere. Ipse plena jam utraque margine genarum, scriptus et in mento necdum finitus, ægrè tandem surgis: sed ne pœniteat te, homo ad unguem factus; non jam professor, sed tamen Doctor Pontificius: jure enim poteras tanquam in picta tabula scripsisse, "Pontia fecit." Quid autem? Doctor? immò codex jam factus, in quo ultrix Pontia sua adversaria exaravit stilo novo. Sensisti puto Vlacci tabu-las tangentium et secantium ad radium cifrarum nescio quot lugubrium in pelle tua excudi. Tu tùm More "facie non integra" domum te proripuisti; fronte quidem exporrecta, quam vix contrahere jam poteras; superciliosus tamen et caperatus, quippe derepentè multò literatior; et quantum potes, abdis te quoque, reconditæ ut posses dici homo literaturæ. Eho noster Ecclesiastes! ubi es? quid lates? expectant te jam nunc, qui "tibi aures è superiore loco dicenti accommodare" solebant. Sed tibi misero nunc Pontia è superiore loco dixit, tuisque auribus ungues accommodavit. Redde nunc tuum vultum nobis, Ecclesiastes, antiquum sanè et rugis venerandum; cur apocryphus vis esse? cùm ipsa Pontia pontifice canonicus jam maximè sis et rubricatus. Quin etiam hinc critici, inde antiquarii ad fores te inclamant; tui videndi desiderio ardent. Emanavit, nescio quo pacto, novas quasdam inscriptiones Gruterianas apud te esse; alii Arabicas, alii Copticas aiunt; qui verius, Ponticas ex terra Taurica. Omnes uno ore consentiunt pulcherrimas esse oportere, utpote in ære frontis tuæ tam graphicè, Pontiano præsertim onyche, insculptas. Nemini respondet Morus, omnibus negatur, spernit omnium desideria; et delibutus unguentis domi, literas dediscere Pontianas mavult. Hæc habui, More, quoniam te mecum jocandi cupidum animadverti, quo ego tuum de me triumphum velut militari carmine exornatum volebam. Quidni enim pugnas tuas tum maximè commemorarem? quanquam palma quidem erat Pontiæ; illa tibi lemniscos tantummodo reliquit. Etenim quod tuum non est, tibi non attribuo; tametsi tu id toto libro, quasi absurdum meum insectaris, oblitus te procuratione et chirographo tuo fidejussorem mihi factum; oblitus, quod æs alienum tu esse dicis, id nunc legitimè non minus tuum esse, quàm cujum tu esse dicis. Tu itaque cæcitatem cyclopeam mihi exprobrasti; et quòd impudentius est, dum id negas fecisse, iterum facis: Qui nulli tum fuerant oculi, nunc "exemptiles" et "Lamiarum" sunt. "Narcissus" nunc sum; quia te depingente nolui Cyclops esse; quia tu effigiem mei dissimillimam, "præfixam poematibus" vidisti. Ego verò si impulsu et ambitione librarii, me imperito, scalptori, propterea quòd in urbe alius eo belli tempore non erat, infabrè scalpendum permisi, id me neglexisse potiùs eam rem arguebat, cujus tu mihi nimium cultum objicis. Tu itidem is es, qui clarissimum virum, Consilii Statûs tum præsidem, contumeliis incessisti; de quo iratior, quam de meipso, quæsivi ex te quid aliud esset calumniari perpetuò bonos, quam esse diabolum. Hinc tu pulchram nactus hypocritandi occasionem ex Crantziana videlicet calumnia, quasi ego "Christi doctrinam de divortio quemadmodum à theologis explicari solet, diabolicam" dixissem, qui ater modò eras et maledicentissimus, nunc albus repentè factus, et mitis et patiens "agis gratias," quòd "te communi cum cœlesti doctrina convitio honestem."—Hyæna! aut siqua alia est bellua, tam tetra fraude noxia atque infamis; tune cœlestem doctrinam tot tuorum facinorum asylum atque perfugium speras fore? Sed perge quò tendis: si enim theologorum quasvis explicationes pro cœlesti doctrina amplecteris, toto cœlo, ut te dignum est, erras. Quin et Apostoli gloriosum illud cum bestiis pugnandi martyrium tibimet tribuis nequissime; qui nuper non homo cum bestia, sed ipse bestia cum homine, id est cum fœmina, de fide connubiali abs te rupta pugnam tam inhonestam pugnasti. Reversus deinde ad mores pristinos, solitamque jactantiam, dicendo me provocas. "Neque verò," inquis, "mihi tantum derogo, quanquam nihil arrogo, ut te commodius aut faciliùs quàm me putem posse dicere." Concedo equidem, si tibi istum in modum furari licet: hæc enim ipsa verba, quibus copiam tuam venditas, ex oratione Marci Tullii pro Roscio Amerino apertissimè furatus es. Atque hinc puto est, quòd Francofurtanas nundinas librorum tuorum catalogo tam copioso nobis obtrudas cum editorum tum edendorum: ex quibus aliqui sunt quos videre gestiam; et imprimis illum "de gratia et libero arbitrio," ad amicam præsertim illam si scriptus est, cujus tu nunc gratiam, rejecta pro arbitrio Pontia, accommodato forsitan argumento ambis: tum illum "de Scriptura sacra," quorum scriptores multa humanitùs et imprudenter scripsisse ferunt te affirmare: illam deinde "pro Calvino," quem tu veluti prophetam extructo monumento Pharisæus exornas, vita et moribus jugulas: nam quæ "prodibunt" opera tua, quæ "premis et retractas, et ad umbilicum spectantia molitis," ea meritò suspicantur omnes esse turpissima. Illam "de piis fraudibus dissertationem" sanè expecto: nam de impiis abs te factis fraudibus abundè audivimus: enim vero "Commentarius ille tuus," quinam sit in quintum "Evangelium" futurus demiror; nam illa quatuor priora jamdudum factis abnegasti: unde et "Theoremata illa practica" mirè desidero, nam tu in practicis egregius homo sine controversia es; id quod de te tot fabulæ non fabulæ testantur. Ad illa autem "loca Novi Fœderis, et axiomata quibus ex Veteri Novum Fœdus illustratur," Pontiæ quoque notas vellem simul ederes. Et postremò isthuc memineris, te alterum volumen operum tuorum, quod Genevæ in bibliotheca publica etiamnum extat, totum omisisse: uti etiam inscriptiones illas, cum frontispicio mirabili, quas quamvis opus Pontianum, in tua tamen membrana tuas esse, adstipulante etiam Justiniano, rectè dixerim: nam noctes tuas, nescio an Atticas cum Pontia, sive dialogum morillum, alii spurium, alii duntaxat embryonem, qui subtilius non inter libros, sed inter liberos tuos numerandum existimant. Sed properabas credo ad alteram instituti operis partem, calumnias meas. Nam mendacia, id nempe unicum, quòd te authorem Clamoris dixerim, partem tui operis longè maximam tandem aliquando confecisse te significas. Cùm autem leve hoc merito cuiquam videri possit, etiamsi falsa aliqua persuasione imbutus attribuissem tibi librum istum, alioqui nec improbatum tibi, nec tua existimatione indignum, cur unam tantummodo noxam tam verbosè tam iracundè summa cum invidia rei per se levissimæ sic exaggeres atque exagites, perinde quasi in se omnes impietates et crimina complecteretur, nisi jam antea docuissem, id magis mirandum possit cuiquam videri. Sed ea nimirum arx erat unica, in qua spem omnem collocaveras; si persuasisses plerisque te authorem Clamoris non esse, meque mentitum, in altera parte quam de calumniis vocas, de quibus quod pro te dicas nihil prorsus habes, sperabas te facili defensione usurum contra me scilicet mendacem jam antea compertum, teque omnes vitæ maculas apud longinquos et ignotos hac arte gratis eluiturum. Verùm ego cum præter spem opinionemque tuam te authorem Clamoris tergiversantem licet et reclamantem legitimè arguerim, non dubito quin ad flagitia quoque tua, et quas tu calumnias dici mavis, accuratiùs prout res feret exequendas apud omnes rerum æquos æstimatores fidem integram attulero. Nunc quàm frigidè, quàm invitè, quàm planè sontis in morem vafri ac vetuli has abs te dictas calumnias tractes, quamque infœliciter amoliri abs te coneris, reliquum est ut ostendam. Primùm cunctabundus, et incerto pede à prioribus castris in hæc altera cum multis impedimentis ægrè et ne vix quidem transis: quippe à mendacio non ad alterum mendacium, id enim non audes dicere, sed ad "calumnias" duntaxat et "rumusculos." Itaque ad mendacium illud toties jactatum, modò dimissum atque præteritum perpetuò recurris, cum præsens arguere, siquod esset, deberes: et adversarii quod miserum est, quàm tui securior, in illo errore, quemadmodum credi vis meo, quam in tua nunc apud te recta conscientia multò plus repositum tibi spei atque præsidii declaras. Atqui non meo, siquod fuit, mendacio, sed tua de veritate, siqua fuit, munire debuisti. At enim "authoritate propria meras calumnias intento, quas nullo argumento probo, nullo teste confirmo." Vis igitur dicam apertius rem ipsam? nam te, ut video, præ ista mollitie frontis non perfrictæ, sed inscriptæ modò, pudet dicere; qui ne stuprum quidem aut adulterium toto responso nominare homo pudentissimus et flos castitatis ausus es, ne "vanissimam fabulam" scilicet et obscœnam, id est tua facta "retexeres." Dicam ergo, et quia non abnuis, rerum ordinem sequar.

Est Claudia Pelletta quædam, pellicem posthac nominemus licet, nescio an tuam solùm; quæ, cum ancilla in eadem domo honestissimi viri Genevensis esset, in qua tu hospes eras turpissimus, cum calone et rhedario communis tibi fuit. Ea muliercula, postmodum nupta, quod stupri tecum habuerat commercium adulterio continuavit. Cedo "testes," inquis, et "argumenta." Nugator! quid tu testes ex me ubi non sunt, quæris, quas ubi erant, fugisti? Genevam revertere, ubi horum criminum jamdiu reus factus es. Dic velle te modò abolendæ calumniæ causa judicium his de rebus legitimum fieri; invenies qui tecum libentissimè his de criminibus experiri lege velint; qui vadari, qui sponsionem facere non recusent. Nec testes deerunt. Aderit imprimis Hortulanus ille qui te vidit, cùm in illud tuguriolum cum fœmina solus intrares; vidit, cùm illa Claudia tua clauderet fores; vidit postea egressum te, amplexantem palàm cùm muliere impudica, et usque eò petulantem, ut illum veterem hortorum custodem obscœnum, non ex ficu, ut olim, sed ex moro factum conspexisse existimaret. Aderunt et alii quos viri gravissimi, qui tuum nomen detulerunt, testes in promptu habent. Cujus tu testimonii vim veritus cum dimanasse rem illam sentires quam in occulto patrasse te arbitrabaris, ut infamis ille reus Siciliensis, non jam quid responderes, sed quemamodum non responderes, cogitare cœpisti. et paulo ante ferox judiciique cupidus (nam de aliis quoque multis rebus et antea et tum etiam deferebaris) demissus repentè et consternatus, abeundi licentiam (id quod plerique maximè volebant, ne in rem tam fœdam de pastore suo inquirere cogerentur) quasi jamjam abiturus petisti. Per hanc tu rationem liberatus judicii metu, cùm alibi non haberes quò te reciperes, omni munere cùm Ecclesiæ tùm Scholæ, omnique stipendio privatus, octo circiter vel decem menses in eadem urbe fœdis factis notatus detrectata causæ dictione vixisti: quo nullum majus argumentum contra te esse potuit. Nunc posteaquam oblatum tibi certamen defugisti, tuisque commodis carere omnibus, quàm judicium de illa re pati maluisti, posteaquam tuo ipsius judicio temet ipse damnasti, à me homine longinquo testes et argumenta ridicule sanè quæris. Quinimmò, ut dixi, Genevam revertere; et quando vadimonium illud tam malè obiisti, i sodes ad supplicium quod te illic manet adulterio debitum; si pristina illius urbis religiosissimæ disciplina nondum refrixit. Ad illa verò sponsalitia stupra tu quod attinet cum Pontia, quæ te ubique decantatum et digito monstratum insignem hominem illis in provinciis reddidere, multo minus est cur à me "testes" et "argumenta" postules. Famam ipsam communem, constantem, et illa centum vel potiùs mille ora, si vis, in judicium voca: hæc totidem sunt testes quibus si in foro sæpe creditum est, cur ego de adversario publico non crederem? cur ego solus quæ in ore omnibus et sermone sunt, adversarius tacerem? sed nec testes hic mihi, nec justo numero, nec literæ desunt; in quibus literis et libidines tuæ et illa perjuria quorum ope elapsus ex judicio es, cum horrore ac detestatione maxima narrantur. Sunt et muti testes qui etiam sine voce testantur; illa nocturna itinera quæ Hagacomitis Leidam cucurristi; illi nocturni et furtivi congressus cum Pontia; cum qua tu muliere per causam, ut aiunt, impudicitiæ divortium fecisti. Si tu eam parùm pudicè versatam interdiu cum aliis credidisti, cur alii te continentiorem noctu cum eadem consuevisse crederent? an expectas dum servulum tuum in te producam, nequitiarum tuarum diu conscium, donec, nondum planè amisso pudore, aufugere abs te in bonam frugem conspectæ ipsis oculis libidines tuæ pudefactum coëgerunt? Opus utique non erit servum illum ad quæstionem poscere: Ipse detestatus tanta in Ecclesiastico homine flagitia, latè prædicat. Tu interim ut lectorum, si non aures, at saltem oculos invitare possis, oratiunculam nescio quam infercis hîc putidissimam, historicorum more, lunulis adnotatam, quasi acutissimam nimirum et lectu dignissimam: non orationem, sed chorum quendam Battologorum introductum abs te aliquis putet; amicorum scilicet tuorum, hortantium ut "teipsum verearis;" ut "ungues tuos," quos tibi fatentur "non deesse," ad necessaria magis tempora, Pontianam credo alteram dimicationem, velis potiùs reservare: mecum ne velis "in arenam descendere." Sed perdunt suam operam amici verbosissimi, sua monita præclara, tot curta adagia, triviorum symbola, oleum nempe tuum Battologiæ professor: illis posthabitis me potius usus es consultore adversario, ut responderes cum tuo magno malo.

Non ut "tuum" ego "silentium in conscientiam ne verterem," sed ut conscientiam tuam suo, quod optat, silentio frui ne sinerem. Nam attendite quæso, et cognoscite nunc, si unquam aliàs, hypocritam numeris omnibus absolutum. Videt necesse sibi esse aliquid pro se dicere; se intuetur, quamvis invitus; videt in turpi præter turpe nihil esse quod possit responderi; circumspectat ecquid foris propè se refugii sit, ecquid adminiculi quo inniti possit; ecquid quo se tegere, sub quo latitare; ecquos in societatem et communionem scelerum suorum possit attrahere, ecquem ordinem aut genus hominum suis privatis rationibus illigare, ut causam suam quasi communem communi periculo et aliorum existimatione defenderet; nihil magis idoneum invenire potuit, in quod omne suum dedecus transferret, nihil in quod deonerare spurcitiam suam commodius posset, quàm ipsam Ecclesiam Dei: "Si mea," inquit, "propriè tantum res ageretur, imponere fibulam ori meo et obmutescere poteram exemplo Domini mei: sed universus ordo noster, et Ecclesia Dei per meum petitur latus." O scortum et ganearum antistes! cujus non ori magis, quàm inguini fibulam impositam oportuit; quanto tibi præstitisset obmutuisse, "exemplo Domini tui," cui Christus Dominus silentium cum capistro imperavit, quàm ecclesiam Dei hac tanta ignominia affecisse? Ais "universum ordinem vestrum à me licèt obliquè stigmate notari." A me ais? dic ubi; recita, si potes, locum; nisi fortè quòd ego in mercenarios, id tu in ministros Evangelii dictum putas. Erras More; et aliud fortasse multo justiùs haud absimile conquestus esses; non ego vestrum ordinem obliquè, sed te extra ordinem tua pontifex et obliquo et directo et transverso stigmate notavit. "Ecclesia," inquis, "Dei, cui mea omnia tempora consecravi, per meum petitur latus." Per tuumne latus turpissime? qui tantum abest, ut omnia tua tempora Ecclesiæ consecraveris, ut ipsa Ecclesiæ tempora, omisso nonnunquam matutino concionandi munere, furtivis libidinibus consecrasse haud semel dicaris. Ne repetam quid etiam temporis famosis libellis Ecclesiastes consecraveris. Per tuumne latus? at nihil omnino est quod graviore cum vulnere Ecclesiam petat, quàm tuum ipsum impurissimum, Ecclesiæ tam malè contiguum latus. Hoc si vis intelligi per tuum latus, id est, per tuam turpitudinem, propter tua scelera Ecclesiam opprobriis impiorum peti, macula aspergi, infamiam contrahere, hoc quidem verum esse non diffiteor. Itaque universus ordo tuus, et ministri præsertim Gallici, qui te optimè norunt, ne tuo illo pestifero latere diutius periclitentur, teipsum quantum possunt, tuique contagionem amovere ab se atque depellere conantur: causam ullam aut rationem tuam communicatam sibi nolunt; ne scelerum tuorum atque dedecorum participes fiant: ejectum te ex suo ordine, et exturbatum, ut meritus es, cupiunt; et illam, quam ais "fibulam" ori tuo impudicissimo affigere conantur. Macte estote integritate vestra atque constantia, viri Ecclesia digni; prospicite, ut instituistis, Ecclesiæ puritati, existimationi, disciplinæ exemplo: amovete à lateribus vestris immundum illud et verrinum latus, cujus non solùm ictu Ecclesia læditur, sed affrictu etiam polluitur. Nolite hanc indignissimam contumeliam pati, ut is, cùm flagitiorum suorum nomine meritis conviciis atque infamia petitur, non se peti, sed quasi is, quia cœnum hominis est, idcirco murus et munimentum Ecclesiæ esset, per suum latus Ecclesiam peti dicat. Abigite procul ab Ecclesiæ septis concionantem lupum; vocem illam hircinam tot stupris et adulteriis impuratam, populo verba dantem, imò vendentem, idque è superiore, quod jactat, loco, ne siveritis in sacro cœtu ampliùs audiri. Profectò si Ethnicorum legibus, verbi gratia Solonis cautum est, nequis rhetor turpitudine vitæ notatus, civilem concionem habendi ad populum, ne Atticorum quidem si disertissimus fuisset, jus haberet, additaque præclara ratio est, plus exemplo nocere turpem, quàm oratione quamvis castissima atque sanctissima prodesse, quo etiam nomine Timarchus, vir inter primos illius reipub. accusante Æschine, damnatus est, quanto est indignius scortatorem atque adulterum tanquam Dei nuntium et ministrum, ad Christianum populum sacras habendi conciones jus in Ecclesia perniciosissimum obtinere. Nolite committere, ut magistratus Ethnicus, Deique expers, religiosior atque sanctior in foro fuisse, quàm Christi sacra synodus in Ecclesia esse videatur. Nolite vereri, quem iste scrupulum callidus injecit, si eum quem approbastis, cui sanctas manus imposuistis, cui gregem Dei commisistis, perspectum nunc adulterinum et spurium ejeceritis, nequis vestrum judicium aut prudentiam desideret; neque enim Paulus hac in parte, ut nostis, vidit omnia: illud veremini, si pastoris in munere talem retinueritis, ne omnes non judicium modò et prudentiam, sed religionem quoque et pietatem et gregis denique curam in vobis requirant. Hæc ad pastores de te, More; nunc ad gregem pro me pauca dicam. "Patriæ," inquis, "meæ greges qui pascuntur inter lilia, nescio quam in invidiam vocas." Utinam ne ista lilia, spinas esse aliquando sentiant; verùm non ego tuæ patriæ greges in invidiam, sed tuus Clamor Regius ad societatem sui furoris vocare cupiebat. Quem enim non irritassent istiusmodi opprobria? "maximè omnium Galli nostri reformati, non modo horrendo facto perculsi, sed ejusdem injusta infamia pressi, plurimum allaboraverunt, ut parricidium et parricidas cognoscerent." Hæc et multa alia acerba quidem et planè hostilia Clamor iste Gallorum sub nomine reformatorum, in nos clamitavit: ad quæ omni respondi solum, Gallis etiam reformatis impositam eandem olim necessitatem fuisse, ut suum quoque Regem hostis numero haberent. Verum ego incogitantior (quid enim de me non fatear potius, aut non indictum velim, quod Ecclesias Galliæ reformatas, quas esse scio nobis omnibus charissimas, in invidiam vocare possit) incogitantior, inquam, fui, qui isti insanissimo Clamori vocem ullam Ecclesiarum aut fratrum interjectam esse credidissem. Scimus eos quo sub regno vivant, quibus in periculis, quibus in angustiis Evangelii causa versentur; et tamen amplum hoc sibi esse, si tueri sua queant. Nos ut vel minimam nostra causa invidiam apud suos reges aut offensionem susciperent, nunquam petivimus; ut de nostris factis aut consiliis suum sensum declararent, tametsi fratrum judicia plurimi semper fecimus, tamen ne hoc iis periculum crearet, nunquam postulavimus; preces eorum, non sententias aut suffragia prodesse nobis censuimus, suam autem erga reges fidem ex suo in nos odio verborumque acerbitate perspici aut probari non arbitramur. Multa deinde præteris, "quæ nimis meum in religione animum produnt;" et sapis: fac et illud quoque prætereas, quòd "te hominem sacris addictum" Cotyttiis, credo, aut Isiacis, non Evangelicis (nisi addictum ita ut devotum intelligis) "adversarium," quod ego mihi honestissimum duco, nactus sum. At enim illi "qui diversum à nobis in religione sentiunt," sic enim tibi prospiciens, Ecclesiæ prospicere videri velles, "ex ista fabula Ecclesiis nostris insultandi ansam arripiunt, quasi patiantur, ipsæ qualia vulgò turpia dictu sacrificulis objiciuntur suis:" et meritò quidem, si patiantur, verùm spes est, non esse passuras: salus certè unica rerum est, si pati noluerint. Si enim patiantur, quæ tu in me tela levissime conjecisti, ea in te ego acutissima retorqueo. "Satanæ triumphus paratur, scandalum infirmioribus creatur, inimicis gaudium, sociis dolor, fidei damnum." Hæc vera sunt non me accusante, sed te impunito. Talem esse quenquam in reformata videlicet Ecclesia ministrum adversarii gaudent: accusat aliquis? multum, mihi crede, de isto gaudio protinus remittunt: damnatur is incorruptis et integerrimis Ecclesiarum suffragiis? Nihil æquè dolent: nam qui presbyterum reformatum flagitiorum incusat, accusat idem sacerdotes omnes et sacrificulos eorundem facinorum sibi conscios: qui illum absolvit, hos multo faciliùs absolvat necesse est. Frustra nos quidem opinionum quarundam et dogmatum, frustra etiam fidei reformationem gloriamur, nisi morum sancta censura pariter quoque vigeat. Non doctrinam tantùm reformatam, sed doctores reformatos esse convenit, si ereptam "sacrificulis," ereptam "Satanæ insultandi ansam" cupimus. "Magnum," ais, "honorem habere me ordinibus Fœderati Belgii, quos indigere putem notore me:" monitore opinor volebas dicere. Immò verò tu illis quem honorem habuisti? quorum existimatio gravissima tam apud te parum potuit, ut eorum de te opinionem fallere turpissimè malueris, quàm flagitiosam vitæ tuæ licentiam refrænare; quique ejusmodi homo cùm sis, arrogare tibi tantum potes, ut existimes tot viros graves atque prudentes te "notore," etiam "è superiore loco" indigere; tuo "admonitu" posse unquam sapere; ut idcirco os tuum è suggesto importunissimum tantæ gravissimorum hominum frequentiæ, et præsertim sacræ concioni offerendum sit. Qui denique apud quos tanto te in pretio esse dicis, iis nihil aliud nisi aut minimum judicium, aut maximam doctorum penuriam relinquis. Minimum profectò ipsi sibi honorem habent, qui abs te doctore et Ecclesiaste meliores discedere se posse crediderint. Verùm tu nihilominus buccam inflas: "Quid nunc, inquis, memorem tot illustres ac principes viros, tot proceres, tot Ecclesias, tot academias, quæ me fovent et ornant, vel optant et exambiunt." Et ego, quid, inquam, nunc memorem tot agyrtas, tot empiricos, tot seplasiarios, tot circulatores, quos Romæ aut Venetiis iisdem penè verbis suas pyxides et pharmaca vendentes, præteriens audivi. Atqui "dum hæc scribo," inquis, "literas accipio quibus ad Ecclesiastæ ordinarii munus et sacræ theologiæ professionem invitor in urbe nobilissima." Nam hoc certè habes, in quo omnes doctores circumforaneos ventalitios ambitione superas. Primùm per amicos tui similes occultam das operam, ut quot potes ex locis inviteris: posteaquam id difficile repertum est, ex quo jam passim notus es, hoc solum (quæ tua animi egestas atque mendicitas vera est) miserè contendis, et nonnunquam perficis ut omnino inviteris, quamvis ea diserta lege et pactu interposito, ut omnino ne venias. Hoc modo invitatum te nuper in Galliam, et ni fallor, Montalbanum, invitatum et Franekeram, vel Groningham intelligo: Harum utram in urbem sanè nescio, in alterutram sat scio: de loco enim fateor nondum satis liquere, de re satis. Hanc demum rationem excogitare coacti sunt homines importunitate tua fatigati et victi, qua et abs te simul tanquam à peste sibi caverent, et tuæ miseræ gloriolæ multo cum risu vela panderent; teque erraticum sophistam et planum tuismet ventis ludibrium commendarent. Sed ne cui forte vanior quàm mendacior esse videaris, in illud nunc incidimus usitatissimum tibi et impudentissimum artificium quoddam tuum maledicendi simul et maledicentiam vituperandi. Quoties enim strenuè conviciando vel ad inopiam vel ad ravim, quasi ad incitas redactus es exhausto penu, dum novum virus colligis, subitò bonus et bellus abhorrere te fingis à conviciis omnibus: nolle te scilicet "luto ludere," nolle "sordes mihi regerendo manus tuas coinquinare; non placere tibi de cane latrante victoriam;" malle te "omittere latrantem caniculam." Quid hæc quæso nisi convicia sunt? quæ dum deponere te dicis, totis viribus intorques; ita caudam atterere et simul ringere idem tibi est: idque ipsum agis, dum agere te negas; usque eò totus ex mendacio conflatus, ut ne verax quidem utrovis modo sine mendacio esse possis: si enim negas te nunc maledicere, quod tu negas, verba ipsa, te invito, fatentur; si fateris, tua eadem verba id ipsum, quod fateris, negant. Quid est, si hæc non est "maledicendi ars" illa, quam tu "Dæmonum Rhetoricam" infamis libelli editor "vocare te" ais "solere?" Sic tu nimirum homo sanctus et veriloquus, "Christum didicisti et doces:" id est, dum latrare te negas, mordes. Tibimet tam apertè mendax, in me ut sis religiosior, non expecto: tentas, ut video, omnia, captas omnia; siquem fortè rumusculum, aut susurrum aquilones cum fugitivis famigerantibus ad vos perferunt, aures arrigis: Hinc illud, "non is es," inquis, "de quo mentiri fama vereatur;" minùs quidem tu hic subdolus es, quàm soles. Famam etiam mendacem mihi minitaris; dici nempe "me aliorum ingenia ex moribus meis æstimare, nulli non vitio quod insequor obnoxium." Ergo ego scortator, ut fama mentitur, ergo adulter; hæc enim in te crimina insector. Fac sanè periculum famæ; age, insimula, dic, siquid habes, audacter et clare; tempus, locum, nomina simul ede; quod ego in te facio. Dic cum qua Claudia Pelletta, dic cum qua Pontia, dic siquo in horto, siqua in domo, noctu an interdiu, siquod in judicium adductus unquam sim, siquod unquam recusaverim: hæc tibi omnia dicenda sunt, hæc ego in te omnia demonstravi. Invenies profectò me ad injurias meas tuaque crimina persequenda attulisse hanc dicendi libertatem, et anteactæ vitæ meæ certissimum indicium atque fructum, et agendæ posthac firmissimum propositum. Nunquam me libertatis hujus pœnitere audies, ut Lucium Crassum pœnituisse olim ferunt, quòd Caium Carbonem unquam in judicium vocavisset; cùm hac sua severitate præcisam sibi aut circumscriptam in posterum liberius vivendi veniam apud omnes arbitraretur. Is Caium Carbonem civem improbum in judicium senatûs populique Rom. vocavit: ego te, More, et meo et pop. Anglicani nomine, quem tu infami Clamore edito prior lacessisti, illo Carbone multò nigriorem, judicia patria detrectantem, sæculorum omnium judiciis trado. Quid tui interim famigeruli de me mussitent aut loquantur, unicè securus. Tu senties eam esse vitæ meæ et apud me conscientiam, et apud bonos existimationem, eam esse et præteritæ fiduciam et reliquæ spem bonam, ut nihil impedire me aut absterrere possit, quo minus flagitia tua, si pergis lacessere, etiam liberiùs adhunc et diligentius persequar; teque simul tuasque etiam famæ quas meditaris corruptelas et perspexero facilè et risero. Interea, ne cui dubium sit, quin tu omnia pervestigando nihil prorsus in me habeas quod verum crimen sit, aut si haberes, quin ad cupidissimè statim et malitiosissimè diceres modisque omnibus amplificares, videamus quàm non crimina quæ sint, des crimini; etiam rectè facta quàm odiosè calumnieris. Primùm "cur Clamori autoris anonymi responderim" quæris, "et non tot aliis qui nomen ediderunt suum." Quis adversario tam aliena et inepta interroganti rationem redderet? ego tamen ut quàm æquanimiter tecum agam, videas, reddam. Cur Clamoris authori responderim, rogas? quia jussus, inquam, publicè ab iis quorum authoritas apud me gravis esse debuit: vix alioqui manum admoturus. Deinde quia nominatim læsus: nam et tu hîc, quamvis id minimè velis ut existimationis aliquam meæ quoque rationem ducam, veniam vel invitus dabis, quam omnes boni dant, scio, libentissimè. At cur "non aliis," inquis, respondisti? "Clamant et illi, nec minus fortiter:" rursus respondeo, ut prius, quia ad rationes publicas non vocatus non accedo. Deinde, quia non læsus; nam et hoc, quamvis tu id maximè velles ut impunè tibi quenquam lædere liceret, non est leve. Deinde quia ex vestro ipsorum judicio tantum Salmasio tribuimus (quem defensorem Regium, quasi solus is esset et instar omnium, nominare soletis) ut post illum posse quenquam alium dicere quod momenti esset non existimaremus. Vis plura? quia liberum erat; quia non vacabat; quia denique homo sum, humana mihi latera sunt, non ferrea, tu licet Alexander ærarius sis. Aliud quiddam opus est, ut mihi videtur, quo tot importunis Clamatoribus ora melius obturentur. Quàm multa tuus ille Stentor anonymus clamitabat, quæ à Salmasio clamata priùs et conclamata erant? quibus ego toties repetitis, quamvis cùm miseria ac tædio sæpiùs respondissem, tamen quia cum isto vociferatore verboso certare ubique non libuit, "languet" tibi scilicèt "oratio mea, quoties pro populo dico:" tibi, inquam, cui "Gallica nive frigidius est" non esse tautologum. De me si accuratiùs dixi, non eò id feci, quo ego minùs populo quàm mihi studerem, sed propterea quòd tuus Clamor tum quidem novum aliquid suppeditabat, unde possem ab odiosa crambe vestra nonnunquam respirare. Quod itaque facetè inquis "non immeritò Defensio pro Populo secunda dicitur;" quoniam id faustum est, ex ore præsertim adversarii, omen accipio. Tu licèt novum quotannis clamorem edideris, rumpas te priùs licebit, quàm Clamorem secundum edidisse dicaris. Alterum meum crimen est quòd in laudes Reginæ Suecorum serenissimæ per occasionem ab adversario ipso datam, digressus sum: et inter alia dixeram (satis modestè quidem ut opinor) nequid adtribuerem mihi quòd Reginam contra Regiam, ut videbatur, causam, tam mihi faventem reperissem, nescire me planè qua mea sorte id evenisset: malebam ad sortem, ad sidera, ad, siquis est occultus vel animorum vel rerum, consensum aut moderamen, quàm ad meum quicquid erat vel ingenii, vel acuminis, vel copiæ referre videri. Hanc tu calumniandi simul èt parasitandi materiam nactus, fremere exemplo, quasi indignum hoc esset; et "lutum" illud in visceribus tuis concretum, in ore mox tibi, ut frequentissimè solet, fluitare. Age, despue; quid est? "eam," inquis, "propterea tam importunè laudabas, ut cum ea te componeres lutum." Tune Morus es an Momus? an uterque idem est? utro te nomine appellem dubito: quis enim præter Morum aut Momum tam sinistrè ac perperam interpretatus hæc esset? quod ullum dictum modestissimum hæc tanta malitia non depravaret atque perverteret? Tum illud simul depromis ex peculio tuo servile et parasiticum; "nesciebat Christina se tibi esse tam familiarem." Tene scabellum hominis ex tuis loculis et immunditiis Christinæ suggerere quid nesciat, aut quid dicat? atqui sciebat se illa pro sua singulari in literatos benevolentia Salmasio familiarem; cui me tamen arbitrio suo liberrimaque sententia haud semel dicta est prætulisse. Sed "hoc unum," inquis, "Regina non meruit abs te laudari." Abs te ergo illaudatissime? concedo libens! quis enim obstare potest, si tibi modò libeat vel invitissimi cujusvis laudes contaminare? experire sanè; persequere modo istud, quod veluti specimen laudationum tuarum egregium hoc loco inseruisti; "quam supra mortalitatis modum inusitata naturæ vis, et stupendum ingenii lumen evexit." Perge, inquam, et macte isto ore: ab isto exorsu quantumvis in sublime evoles per me licet: isto enim tenore, si perrexeris, mirificum tu quidem fastigium ac propè nubiferum tam altis substructionibus impositurus videris. Mihi, fateor, non placet sic altè insurgere; unde statim necesse erit, vel ridiculè ruam, vel inter nubes frigescam. Attamen "iis," inquis, "dotibus insignis es, quæ possunt etiam heroibus animum laxantibus placere." Esto; sunt et tua dotes et præsertim scripta, quæ heroibus placere quiddam aliud laxantibus, possint. Et in primis ista tua quæ sequitur sapientissima et ministello te digna ad typographos conciuncula; quam idcirco prætereo: nam ad tertium jam crimen meum perveni; quòd dixerim nimirum, uno cum famulo me peregrè fuisse. Crimen grave; quo ego nomine haud uno in loco perstringor: id scilicet nefas erat meminisse, ne versificatores vestri, qui ex egestate nescio qua emersisse me per hanc rerum apud nos conversionem versificabant, cecinisse falsa reperirentur. Jocum verò hic tuum, quando hæc tam rara avis est, non possum prætermittere. Non equidem vobis "typographis litem unquam intenderim, non certè magis quàm illi servo qui Miltonum euntem peregrè comitabatur." O longè et miserè petitum! quid hac capitis cucurbita facias, ex qua, ut id maximè labores, nullam salis micam potis es extundere. Sed quietus homo et fugitans litium es; itaque non meo sed ne tuo quidem servo intendis, qui domesticæ turpitudinis tuæ fugitivus, secretiora flagitia et nefarias libidines tuas divulgavit. Quartum est, siquidem id crimen dici meum debet, quod tuum est mendacium, "in eodem" scilicet "libro, quem scatere," ais, "discinctorum nepotum festivitatibus, ausum me censuram agere, et graviter concionari de republ. deque civium officio." Quis non germanum te nunc dicat epicureum? cùjus neque in moribus honestas, neque in scriptis urbanitas ulla reperiatur. Mirum non est si hoc nomine facetiis omnibus infensior sis, cùm quia negantur tibi, tum quia te pungunt: non mirum est, inquam, si tibi tam ulceroso sal omnis inimicus est. Id mirum, professor cùm sis, cur mihi succenseas qui sic diligenter salarium tibi curo. At verò quos tu "jocos è lustro popinaque desumptos" falsò ais (nisi desumptos ex lustris idcirco dicis, quòd te illic latitantem extraxerint) eos si cæteri omnes non inhonestos aut illiberales, sed honestos atque urbanos, tuamque putredinem perfricanti sales concessos non negaverint, tum quidem tua professoris insulsi ignorantia, ut persæpe alias, hinc satis manifesta est, qui id parum convenire dicas, quod Marcus Tullius in oratore summum esse statuit, ubi de oratione L. Crassi in Cn. Domitium summa cum admiratione sic loquitur. Nec enim concio major unquam fuit, nec apud populum gravior oratio, quàm hujus contra collegam in censura nuper, neque lepore et festivitate conditior. Et paulo infra, id uni Crasso contigisse ait, ut non solùm venustissimus et urbanissimus, sed et omnium gravissimus et severissimus et esset et videretur. Quin etiam Platoni et Socraticis nihil magis convenire aut decuisse visum est, quàm rebus interdum severissimis intermistus atque inspersus lepos. Hæc ego viris doctis et intelligentibus quin et supra et nunc denuò satis probaverim, non dubito. Te interim non reprehendo, qui "mollior," inquis "debuit esse transitus à naso ad supercilium:" nam digitorum Pontiæ credo adhuc meministi, quàm iste transitus abs tuo naso ad supercilia minimè mollis fuerit. Fœlicem te quidem, si hoc tum mulierculæ persuasisses: sed de oratorum transitionibus, More, judicium longè aliud faciendum est. "At leges scribo," hoc quintum crimen est, "quibus se teneat non populus modò, sed illi etiam qui me præceptore nihil egent." Quid tu mihi quo quis egeat, homo levissime et arrogantissime? tene "superiore ex loco" egent Fœderati Ordines concionatore, me ex inferiore, quod omnibus ex æquo civibus licet, nostri non tam egeant libero hortatore? non est, More, cur ego me natum in mea patria tam inutilem existimem, cùm te in aliena tam arrogantem videam; non est, quam ob rem te mercede concionantem, quàm me gratis monentem rectiora putem posse suadere. Hæc mea quinque sunt peccata mortifera; nam illa septem, opinor, conficere nequisti. Ex quo intelligitur, inania quàm fuerint quæ "condonasse" mihi te dicis, cùm sint tam levia, quæ crimineris. Nisi et illud fortè criminosum mihi vis esse, quòd Deum testem invocarim; et certè parùm abest ut istud quoque in criminibus meis numeres. "Hinc illa," inquis, "nimium sane sollicita protestatio." Quænam ista fuit, More? audies vel invitus; nec illam nunc recito, sed iisdem conceptis verbis (neque enim pœnitet, et hic etiam peregrinationem meam calumniaris) rursus Deum testem invoco, me illis omnibus in locis, ubi tam multa licent, ab omni flagitio ac probro integrum atque intactum vixisse, illud perpetuò cogitantem, si hominum latere oculos possem, Dei certè non posse. Hæc tibi "nimium sollicita protestatio" est, More: cui non magis sollicitum est, Deum testem invocare, quàm invocatum pejerare. Quàm multi et quàm multis de rebus te accusent, non ignoras: aude modò, siquid in te integri, siquid incorrupti est, iisdem quibus ego nunc præivi tibi verbis, teipsum defendere. Dic age in hæc verba: Deum testem invoco me ab omnibus illis flagitiis quorum insimulor, integrum atque intactum semper vixisse; me neque Claudiæ, neque Pontiæ, neque ullius omnino fœminæ stupratorem esse aut adulterum. Non audebis, opinor, tametsi facilè perjurus esse diceris, in hæc verba præeuntem me sequi. Verùm si Dei non audes, hominum saltem fidem implora. Genevam, inquam redi, permitte te illic magistratibus et populo; dic illis ut castum et innocentem hominem, falsò insimulatum, deceat: Viri Genevenses, multorum apud vos et gravissimorum criminum accusor; si ita vixi, si inter vos ita versatus sum, ut hæc per idoneos testes et argumenta probari vobis possint, en sisto me; legitimum pati judicium, quod antea recusavi, nunc non recuso. Hoc multo minùs audebis, sat scio: malis tergiversari, ut supra dixi, malis aliunde perfugia et latebras et diverticula veterani scortatoris in modum quærere. Veruntamen "honestam" fuisse illam "orationem" meam fateris; sed "præcedenti parùm consentientem." Cuinam præcedenti obsecro? vellem recitasses: ego enim aliquot retrò paginis pro certo habeo, ne minimum quidem obscœni vestigium inveniri posse, quia tanto intervallo de te nulla fit mentio. Quòd siquem alium locum intelligis, ubi in tua vitia salsè animadversum est, velim te scire, quicquid tu ex "Platone" detorsisti, neque alienum esse neque inverecundum eodem in libro cum acrimonia et sale ("profligati" enim "pudoris" verba nusquam illic reperies) et turpia insectari, et de "Deo cogitare." Sanè si oratoris præceptum hoc verum atque honestum est, in eodem vultu convenire et pudorem et acrimoniam, quidni itidem in eodem ore conveniant? Nullius enim pudentis pudorem minuit vehemens et falsa turpitudinis exprobratio vel etiam irrisio, sed pudorem, in quo prius non erat, impudenti reo nulla res efficaciùs incutere videtur. Tu vide, ut cum pudore et "cogitatione Dei" tua stare perpetua possint mendacia, Ecclesiastes adulterine; qui scripsisse me ais "Romæ martyrii fuisse candidatum; structas ab Jesuitis vitæ meæ insidias." Ad quod utrumque mendacium diluendum opus est nihil aliud, nisi ut quis locum ipsum libri inspiciat: et cur ea de re aliquid omnino scripserim, conjectura per se assequi nemo facilè non poterit, cui id modò credibile non sit eum "ob flagitia in Italiam profugisse," qui religionis ibidem confitendæ periculum toties adierit. Nugaris deinde multa, et "machæras et legiones" garris Pontiæ mastigia. Verùm hæc satis risimus: nunc luculentam et insignem calumniam quæso attendite; ut cognoscatis qua fide vel in sacris etiam literis, quas cum summa ecclesiæ ignominia profitetur, versari soleat; quàm nulla isti falsario Ecclesiastæ religio sit verbum ipsum Dei sacrosanctum corrumpere, si id commodum sibi fore crediderit. Ego ut refellerem eos, qui grammatistæ aut critico magni titulum et cognomen largiri ineptissimè solent, sic scripseram: Is solus magnus est appellandus, qui res magnas aut gerit aut docet, aut dignè scribit. Quis hac verissima sententia offendatur, nisi grammatista? Quid hîc noster professor? id est, inquit, qui res magnas docet, "ut Miltonus de Divortiis," aut dignè scribit "ut Miltonus idem pro Populo, bis magnus." Lepidum sanè interpretamentum, More! et ejusdem planè artificii, quo Evangelii etiam locum illum de divortiis non verbo, sed factis interpretatus es. Licet ob scortationem dimittere vel uxorem vel sponsam: Morus cum desponsata sibi Pontia scortatus est, ergo, licet Moro sponsam ob scortationem dimittere. Vos "O tot Principes, tot Proceres, tot Ecclesiæ, tot Academiæ, quæ hunc hominem fovetis et ornatis, vel optatis et exambitis," evocate nunc certatim hunc vobis, quà sacrarum, quà profanarum literarum interpretem tam fidum et religiosum; ut sacras profanare literas apud vos quà actis, quà commentis suis possit. Vel si id minimè vultis, nam doctorem hunc commentitium longè latèque olfecisse jamdiu videmini, date saltem et concedite hoc palpum tumori hominis et gloriolæ: evocate quæso per literas quàm honorificas ludionem hunc cathedrarium; sed cum hac cautione, si salvi esse vultis, clam interposita, cum hoc urbanissimo interdicto, ut nullo modo accedat. Miros profectò reddet ludos inter tot cathedras, dum professiones et prælectiones et murmura et plausus et Pontias novas sibi somniat. Sed dimitto nunc hominem, quia me prope dimittet. Aliò se vertit; imò verò "quò se vertat," non habet. Simulat velle nunc de vita et moribus suis causam pro se dicere. Exordiri jam putares hominem, et velle aliquid præfari; cùm in ipso statim præfationis vestibulo, elusa omnium expectatione perorat. Tam tenue se esse argumentum, tam turpe etiam dum reperit, vel ipsa rerum inopia subitò exarescit, vel ipsa fœditate perculsus et quasi sideratus obmutescit: Vultus, vox, latera deficere videntur; animus tamen veteratorius, et ut dixi antea, indurati utroque jamdiu foro veteris et crebri sontis artes non deficiunt. "Quò me vertam?" quò te vertas, miselle? quis unquam nocens reus demissa barba sordidatus et squalens tam miserabili prooemio deprecatus unquam judices est? quo te, si innocens, si insons, si tutus undique tibi esses, quò te, inquam, nisi ad te verteres? tecum loquerere, te consuleres, extra te ne quæreres? Sed heu miserum te! discordia tibi tecum gravissima jamdiu est. Nihil tibi invisum magis, quàm tecum habitare, apud te esse; neminem libentiùs, quàm te ipsum fugis. Frustra: tecum enim fugis miser, te sequeris: Quod agitat intus est, intus et flagellum et tortor argus ille tuus, qui te semper non "Junoniis," quod quereris, "artibus," sed piaculorum tuorum oestro agitatum, cinctus mille oculis ac testibus persequitur. Quid nunc agas? nam æstuantem te misere et pendentem video. An "tuas ipse laudes vesanus decantares?" vesanus profectò sis, si id suscipias; vesanus, si id unquam cogitabas. "Vitamne conscribas et facinora omnia tua?" pervellem equidem; sed vereor ne non "Morus," sed "Florus" nimiùm in tuis floralibus, id est, multo brevior quàm par esset, futurus sis. Vereor ne invideas nobis tot lepidas fabellas, qui unam solùm "retexere," hortensem nimirum illam, tantopere gravatus sis. Sanè qui illas lites Junonias omnes, qui illa jurgia Salmasii prætermiseris, qui prælium illud nobile Pontianum mihi tantis rebus parum idoneo reliqueris, qui denique totam illam Pontiæ Sestiada sicco pede prætericris, præteribis opinor silentio Tibaltianam quoque illam, et illius nuper domus calamitatem, ubi tu procax in ancillam, proditor in herum extitisti: nam ancillis, ut videtur, quocunque vadis, nullum abs te refugium est. Tacebitur et vidua illa quam tu, solatii tum plenus, nunc inops, cum de marito recens mortuo velle consolari præ te ferebas, ejus pudicitiam tentasse diceris: Nec dices credo qua domo egredientem te cum scorto intempesta nocte Amsterodami illa mulier vidit; quæ delinita primùm pollicitationibus tuis, mox decepta, novissimè nomen tuum ad presbyteros detulit; qui tuum nomen recipere, quod ob priora facinora ejiciendum ex suo ordine et circumscribendum statuebant, ne aucto scelere, cùm augeri pœna tua non posset, augeretur ordinis infamia, recusarunt. Quid ergo? "an quæ fecisses uno cum servo itinera" nocturna illa nempe Hage Leidam "posteris narrares?" ne hoc quidem sat scio, voles: verùm illa servus ipse passim copiosè narrat, et permulta alia præclare abs te gesta: cætera jam tritissima plurimisque per ea loca testibus confirmata. Age vero; post dubitationem sanè miseram quæ te perplexum tamdiu atque suspensum tenuit, post tui fugam, quò tandem fugis? quo ad extremum te recipis? "fidei," inquis, "publicæ monumenta consulamus." Acta tua credo jam publica, quæ in bibliotheca Genevensium enumerata centum prope articulis, tuorum scelerum monumenta posteritati servantur. "A Geneva exorsus," inquis, "fabellam nescio quam poetarum authoritate subnixam instituis." Ferax tu quidem sæculum poetarum dicis, qui tot una in urbe, tibique omnes infestos quæraris; nigrum te aliquem oportet esse, ipsoque moro nigriorem, quem tot poetæ oderint; festivum quoque hominem, qui quorum authoritas testium te jugulavit, eorum nunc poeticam iniquiorem in te causeris. Verùm ista te festivitas nihil in hoc tempore adjuvabit. Permulti sunt in illa civitate viri honestissimi, nonnulli presbyteri, doctores, ministri, nescio an poetæ, qui fabellam tibi hanc in foro agere cupiunt; qui non sua carmina recitare, sed tua crimina pro testimonio dicere parati jampridem sunt. Nemo sic unquam poetam recitantem, ut tu hos omnes contra te testantes et fugisti et fugies.

Adeone verò singulari impudentia occaluisti, ut institutam in te legitimè accusationem testatissimam, cujus vim atque authoritatem cùm sustinere non posses, discedendi, et veluti in exilium abeundi licentiam exorasti, hanc tu quasi " fabellam nescio quam" eludere et uno verbo leviculo sic amoliri abs te posse, existimes? At " permulti sunt," inquis, " in hoc Belgio, qui me Genevæ familiariter usi optimè omnium norunt quàm non ibi nullo in pretio fuerim." Audi igitur quæ sint honestissimorum hominum de te judicia primò Genevæ, deinde in Belgio. Duorum verba ipsa ex literis desumpta, in medium proferam.

Literæ Genevæ datæ pridiè Id. Octob. 1654.

Mirari certè nostrates satis non possunt, ita te interiora ignoti aliàs hominis nosse, tam nativis coloribus depinxisse, ut ne ab illis quidem, quibus familiarissimè usus est, tota hominis histrionia vel certiùs vel feliciùs potuisset adumbrari: unde hærent meritò et ego cum illis, quâ fronte ἀναισχυντος licet homo et oris improbi, in publicum rursus theatrum prodire sit ausurus. Illud enim summum fœlicitatis tuæ hac in parte compendium, quod non vel ficta vel ignota aliàs hominis scelera attuleris, sed quæ omnium et amicissimorum etiam ore decantata, integri cœtus authoritate et assensu, immo plurium adhuc scelerum accessione luculenter possint corroborari.

Et infra. Credas velim vix ullum hîc reperiri amplius, ubi multos annos publico munere, sed cum summo hujus Ecclesiæ dedecore functus est, qui prostituti pudoris homini patrocinium suum vel audeat vel sustineat amplius commodare.

Hæc sunt eorum voces, qui penitissimè te nôrunt: quam turpem tui memoriam Genevæ reliqueris, hæ literæ, aliæque benè multæ si proferrentur, docerent. Nunc in Belgio aliisque locis qua fama sis, " quo in pretio," cognosce. Viri probatissimi tibique noti non literas solùm, sed quoniam abs te priùs nominatus, idque in tua causa, atque laudatus est, nomen quoque edam. Is est vir gravissimus Joannes Duræus; qui dum Ottoni sola fide nixus interponit se, mecùmque agit, ut innocentem te scilicet missum facerem, non potest non fateri simul quàm longè alia de te cæterorum penè omnium existimatio, aliusque sermo sit.

Ex literis Duræi Basilia, Octob. 3. 1654.

Quod ad Mori vitia improbitatemque attinet, non videtur Ottonus ita de eo sentire: scio tamen alios pessimè de eo loqui, manus ejus in omnes pene, manus omnium in eum esse, plerosque etiam Gallicæ synodi ministros dare operam ut ei pastoris munus abrogetur. Neque hîc aliam Basileæ reperio de eo hominum opinionem, quàm quæ in Belgio est eorum qui eum minimè amant.

O pulchrum elogium! quo tu omnium penè mortalium judicio Ismaeli hosti Ecclesiæ, quàm ministro pacis et evangelii similior judicaris. Hunc tuæ ubique gentium existimationis testem integerrimum, si potes, rejice. Mihi credulitatem desine objectare: " Nemo omnes, neminem omnes fefellerunt," tua tibi verba regero. Hæc cùm ita sint, perficiam haud multo negotio, ut intelligas, quàm exiguum tibi in aliis præsidium sit, cùm tam exiguum tibi in teipso fuerit. Quod enim potest aliena fides testimonium de te aliis perhibere, cùm tua fides perhibere nullum quod juvet aut cui confidas, de temetipso possit tibi? Et videte quæso quàm dissoluto animo, quam abjecto desertor sui et perfuga ad patrocinium alienæ fidei ab se transfugiat. " Neque vero," inquit, " tempus teram in eorum sollicita refutatione, quæcunque tu garris." Laudo te læti animi atque jucundi, nihil tu magis sollicitè, quam sollicitudinem ipsam vitas. Mea modò " nimis sollicita" tibi fuit ad Deum " protestatio:" nunc tuam non minùs " sollicitam" putas tuorum criminum " refutationem." Atque ego si duntaxat " garrio," haud multam sanè sollicitudinem tua refutatio desiderabit. Ignavissimus profectò sis, aut malè conscius necesse est, cui tam facilis tuimetipsius defensio, tam gravis et " sollicita" videatur: ineptus planè et ridendus, qui nullum tempus inutilius terere te putes, quàm in eo ipso quod ad rem, siquid vides, et ad causam maximè pertineat. Nam " quid proficiam," inquis, " si fabulam hanc penitus retexuero? statim aliam ordieris." Sanè quidem difficile id esset nemini; neque de nihilo te urit ista suspicio. Tanta enim tu solus fabularum sylva es, ut ex tuis unius rebus gestis atque nequitiis suppeditare centum triviis atque circulis unde multos in dies rideant satis fabularum unus possis. Atque adeo hujus fabulæ actum jam quartum peregimus: exit Morus; aliam credo vult personam induere. " Ut semel," inquit, " defungamur, quod fuerit Ecclesiæ Genevensis, quod civitatis illius de me judicium hæ docebunt literæ testimoniales, alia occasione datæ." Ita est; ad elogia nunc transit sua; actus quintus incipit; nova planè persona, sed eodem tamen subtus latente Moro, prodit cornicula, sed et ea quoque personata: miris nescio quot repentè plumis adscititiis atque coloribus ita indutus, ut phœnicopterus nescio quis potiùs, et exornati quiddam monstri simile videatur. Aves Aristophanicas expoliasse hominem diceres; sed mala ave, ni fallor; cum se non jam fabulam agere, sed apologum Æsopicum in se verum demonstrare nudatus intelliget. Cùm enim hasce plumas nec tuas esse, More, et partim obsoletas, quæque sua sponte mox defluant, partim falsis coloribus fucatas, partim dolo, malisque artibus surreptas docuero, dubium non est, quin delusus abs te olim grex avium, nunc factus certior qui sis, de repetundis plumis jure tecum sit acturus; et ablato quisque suo, obscœnam sub phœnice upupam non deplumem te modò, sed depygem demum relinquat: Primæ omnium " literæ Genevensium testimoniales" cristam tibi erigunt: quas illi multò mallent, sat scio, aut nunquam tibi datas, qualis postea evasisti, aut abs te nunquam prolatas. Semper ego quidem de Genevensi civitate, pro eo ac debeo, honesta omnia et sentire soleo et loqui: religionis cultum purioris, primumque studium, in republica deinde prudentiam, æqualitatem, moderationem, constantiam propè admiror; qua se tam arctis finibus, inter vicinos hinc inde potentissimos et imminentes, summa in pace ac libertate per tot jam annos conservat et tuetur: rectiusque in re vix mediocri et meliùs id agit quòd civilis vitæ omnis principium atque finis est, idque populo suo fœliciùs præstat, quàm summis opibus instructi, summis opinione hominum adjuti consiliis reges maximi servientibus præstant suis. De Genevensibus igitur, quod eorum laudem, et existimationem possit imminuere, non est ut quicquam velim aut queam dicere, etiamsi de his literis testimonialibus ea dicerem, quæ et ab aliis dicta olim ipsi fatentur, et ad me recentiùs allata sunt. Sed necesse non est; non dicam igitur qua occasione sint datæ; propterea quòd ipse non hac, sed "alia occasione" datas esse ait. Non quæram, utrùm summa Ecclesiæ senatusque voluntas honorarium hoc Moro testimonium sua sponte concesserit, an impudentissima hominis postulatio, cùm accusatus gravissimorum criminum nequisset se defendere, ab iis duntaxat abstulerit qui Ecclesiæ pastorumque communi existimationi perperam metuentes, amandare ab se hominem quoquo modo malebant, quàm hæc publico judicio severiùs perquiri, nec sine offensa fortassis infirmiorum palam agitari. Non dicam, id quod multi tamen dicunt mihique confirmant, nec conventu frequenti, nec solito conveniendi die datas hasce literas: ne id quidem dicam scribenti adstitisse Morum; unde illud fortasse "tralatitium," et "exambire" ex elegantiis Mori selectioribus tam in promptu erant; et "rupta concionante Moro subsellia, gemmæque illæ clarissimæ;" quæ omnia usque eo vel cupiditatem scribentis vel judicium non grave significant, ut non solùm nimio laudandi studio laudes ipsas corrupisse, quod vitium ab eo qui totius nomine Ecclesiæ scripsit, quam maximè abesse debuit, sed indignissimum ornare dum studet, non tam vivum decorare, quàm mortuum et putentem illis odoribus differtum funerasse videatur. Non dicam denique illa nomina in conventu subscripta non esse, circum vicos cursasse Morum, et pastores domi singulos adortum, quo sibi faciliùs hasce subscriptiones expugnaret; propterea quòd erant in conventu qui reclamare, qui intercedere, qui obsistere non desinebant, qui sese non audiri graviter conquesti sunt. Nihil horum dicam; quod nonnulli tamen dicunt, etiam qui illo tempore Genevæ rebus illis omnibus interfuere; multi aliis in locis "Deûm hominumque fidem implorantes atque jurati" nulla se "simultate, sed officii" religione commotos, hæc dicere: adeoque illis literis fidem se adjungere non posse; quorum inter primos virum sanctissimum Fredericum Spanhemium, theologiæ professorem et pastorem reverendum fuisse intelligo: Hoc solùm dico, hasce literas, quod idem de literis reverendissimi viri Joannis Deodati est dicendum, ante sexennium datas, multis postea maleficiis ab ipso Moro obliteratas jampridem esse et antiquatas. Nondum increbuerat Claudia, nondum hortus, et illa, ad Claudiam nescio an cum Claudia, Mori suavissima cohortatio;

—Poma alba ferebat,
Qui post nigra tulit Morus:—

Id quod viris proculdubio integerrimis et honestissimis, harum literarum subscriptoribus, quin imposuerit non dubito. At postquam illa cum muliere, primò ancilla, deinde nupta, occultari diutiùs consuetudo istius nefaria non potuit, factus iterum reus, cùm honestam rationem defendendi sui nullam inveniret, et manifestis in rebus teneretur, fractus jam animo, atque id maximè veritus, si judicium fieret, nequid in se gravius consuleretur, quo ipso die pronuncianda de se sententia presbyterorum, deinde magistratuum erat, judicium declinat, licentiam abeundi petit. Illi necessitatem hanc rati se hoc modo effugisse, quam impositam sibi minimè volebant, ut Ecclesiæ ministrum tantorum scelerum damnare, et in homine Ecclesiastico tam triste exemplum statuere cogerentur, libenter assensere. Petit insuper literas impudentissimus homo commendatitias. Id verò postulare ab judicibus suis reum indignè ferentes, prorsùs recusant: ita bonus ille tabellarius permanere sine literis illa in urbe, omni munere exutus, circiter decem menses coactus est: Etesiis credo sacrificans, ut aliquam saltem auram commendatitiam impetrare aliquò posset: Donec multi gravissimi viri ne moram quidem ejus illa in urbe ferendam rati, rursus rem adducere in judicium cœperunt. Id autem cùm ad novas lites, et, ut supra dixi, offensionem infirmorum spectare videretur, consultius tandem visum est, quoquo modo hominem ablegare: rursus itaque dant literas; "non frigidulas," quod antea dixisse me queritur, sed, quod nunc dico, frigidissimas; non ut commendare cuiquam mortalium, sed amandare ab se hominem plane viderentur. Hoc si ita non est, More, postulo mihi respondeas, cur superiores illas Genevensium literas, haud uno nomine jam obsoletas, quæque recentiora facinora tua à me tibi potissimùm objecta, ne attinguut quidem; quæ ego vix attigi, ut minùs mihi comperta, "blasphemias" nempe "tuas in Spiritum Sanctum," aliaque opinionum monstra uberiùs commemorant, cur et illas in quibus parùm sibi de te credi à plerisque subscriptores tui queruntur, cur, inquam, illas utrasque in medium protuleris, has novissimas de medio removeris? Cedo proximas hasce literas post alteram in te accusationem illam gravissimam ab aliis ægerrimè, ab aliis facilè, sed eodem tui removendi animo ab omnibus concessas. Sapies opinor, non exhibebis; non delectant te istæ literæ; ex quibus mutatam de te Genevensium opinionem, refrigerata amicissimorum studia manifestò perspicere possimus; eosque his literis non te laudatum, sed ab se, dummodo longissimè remotum, quasvis in terras exportatum cupiisse. Hæc Mori fides publica est; qua se in Ecclesiam credere, quàm in Spiritum Sanctum planius facit. Quæ reliqua à me dicta in eum sunt neque diluit, neque refellit, ne oppugnat quidem. Sed quoniam, Vlacco fidejussore, tomum insuper alterum fidei publicæ promittit, in quo "virorum aliquot insignium, senatusque et ecclesiæ Midelburgensis, et Amstelodamensis testimonia" dicentur, dum volumen illud, cudendum, puto, in Gallia, excudendum Hagæ-Comitis à Vlacco expectamus, aut ne expectamus quidem, visum est de toto hoc genere testimoniorum pauca disserere.

Magnum ego ornamentum quidem virtutis testimonium publicum esse fateor; argumentum perinde certum atque firmum longè abest ut existimem; nam ut illud omittam quòd virtutis multo difficilior quàm nummorum spectatio est, hoc sanè constat, privatorum privatos mores, et præsertim vitia ad aures gravissimas, tot alioqui negotiis occupatas, rarissimè perferri. Et testimonium publicum tam qui petunt, quàm qui dant, boni juxta malique ferè sunt; et petunt quidem mali sæpiùs quàm boni, falsa specie proborum induti. Ut quisque optimus est, ita minimè testimonio eget alieno: neque enim facit quicquam vir bonus ut noscatur, seipso contentus. Si commendato est opus, virtutem semper apud se habet commendatricem optimam; si defenso, obtrectationibus nimirum et calumniis haud raró appetitus, eandem circundat sibi integritatem suam, et invictam rectè factorum conscientiam; quo veluti munimento atque præsidio firmissimo, improborum hominum et impetus vanos excipit, et tela frustratur. Contrà hic noster omnia: non enim virtutem, sed opinionem duntaxat ejus integumentum vitiorum, sibi comparaverat: ut retectus, ut deprehensus, abscondere diutiùs improbitatem suam non potest, exors ipse fidei et naufragus ad alienam fidem se confert: quorum oculis antea servierat, eorum nunc manus commendatitias implorat; et singulari quadam atque inaudita hactenùs impudentia, quorum judicium experiri non audet, eorum postulat testimonium. Propterea quòd meamet ipsius sententia damnatus turpissimè discedo, quòd sententias vestras horreo atque defugio, "literas" quæso date innocentiæ, pietatis, pudicitiæ apud vos meæ, "testimoniales." Si hæsitatur, si ambigitur, si ad aliis denique reclamatur rei vehementissimè commotis, quò non demittit se? quo non descendit? circumcursare, ambire, prensare, obtestari, et quò adire non audet, eò amicorum allegationes dimittere. Aguntur fortunæ hominis, agitur caput, existimatio, immò Ecclesiæ, totius et sacri ordinis existimatio agitur. Expugnantur multi, partim fatigati, partim inducti, partim veriti nequid istius ignominiæ in publicum redundaret, partim delictis ignoscere, literato parcere, laboranti consulere suæ bonitatis esse arbitrati. Ita tandem victor iste laureatas literas aufert; ita emendicata quovis tempore vel occasione, non jam testimonia de se publica, quæ si fuissent ipse abolevit, sed sua de publico reportata spolia ad coronam venditat; nec tam laudes videtur suas, quàm pœnitentiam publicam circumferre. Quem enim non pœniteat præconem sese laudum ejus fuisse, qui ad omnes postea libidines tam turpem sui auctionem fecerit: nunc ejusdem sese mangonem fieri, qui servus omnium nequissimus ministrum se licitanti cuivis Ecclesiæ ex hac laudum catasta vendibiliorem, et sacrárum literarum miseris emptoribus venalem se pretii quantivis professorem profitetur. Nam viderint per Deum immortalem, qui ex istius vel commendatione vel impunitate ignoscentes et bonos haberi se postulant, ne ista bonitas in malum desinat; viderint ne ipsis bonis fraudi sit. Cùm necesse sit, serpat latiùs, serpat ocyùs ista contagio pastoris in gregem, doctoris in scholam; atque in ipsos fortasse bonorum istorum liberos, qui sophistæ huic errabundo et infami in disciplinam traduntur. Viderint ne tot pigmentis illita atque ornata turpitudo, tanta bonarum laudum jactura atque dispendio dealbata labes, spem faciat et aliis, eamque mentem injiciat, posse se quoque tutissimo hoc exemplo, eandem scholis, eandem ecclesiis inferre personam, sine suo periculo cum summa etiam commendatione improbissimam. Cogitent, qui celari adversarios nostras maculas putant oportere, non celando sed eluendo maculas purgari: celando apparere multo manifestiùs, et majorem indies fœditatem contrahere. Postremò viderint, ne Ecclesiastas hujusmodi amovere ab Ecclesia tamdiu negligant, donec ipsa Ecclesia cum Ecclesiastis unà amoveatur. Sanè cùm apostoli præceptum de Episcopo notissimum sit, eum ab extraneis etiam bonùm habere testimonium oportere, quid adversariis lætius aut triumphandum magis potest accidere, quàm cùm legerint atque audierint, qui non levi atque incerta, sed constante fama, summèque consentiente, multis testibus, multis in locis flagitiosus atque nefarius compertus sit, eum quasi Ecclesiæ lumen unicum et ornamentum collatitiis presbyterorum laudibus, et multiplici commendatione publica decorari. Quod hostibus nostris gaudium ne diuturnum sit, provideri non alia ratione potest, nisi siquis poterit exemplo, reque ipsa demonstrare, nullum esse pestibus hujusmodi in Ecclesia reformata consistendi locum: hæc testimonia, has laudes tum olim datas, cùm is, cui dabantur, longè alius affectaret videri, atque esse nunc perspicitur, ipsum nunc irritas et nequaquam suas usurpasse sibi fraude pessima; et amicorum de se elogia suo ipsius vitio abrogata, non ad vilissimas merces involvendas, quo fato mala scripta solent ferè perire, sed ad fœdissimas flagitiorum ipsius sordes integendas, pro involucris abusum esse. Ego certe in priore illa defensione, et publicè jussus et privatim læsus, nisi siquam dicendo peperissem mihi honestam existimationem, eam silendo amittere, et quasi vacuam possessore, occupandam mendaciis et opprimendam relinquere maluissem, et patriæ, et mihi simul, cùm una eademque causa esset, communem operam summo studio impendi. Nunc accusatis graviter ab eodem quasi immeritum et innoxium hominem per calumnias et mendacia infamassem, ut impudentiam illius redarguerem, innocentiam tuerer meam, et siquid vel antea jam dixi commodè, vel in posterum quod ex usu sit dicturus sum, si non doctrinæ et ingenii laudem, famam saltem integram, et colendæ veritatis fidem afferre possem, ad contentionem hanc per se minimè gratam, sed necessariam tamen, denuo descendi. Neque verò est, si hæc non essent, cur hujus operæ aut pœnitere me, aut pigere quenquam alium, si ni conscium sibimet, debeat. Sanè improbos vituperare, et bonos laudare, quandoquidem hoc præmii nobilissimi, illud pœnæ gravissimæ rationem habet, et æquè justum et justitiæ propè summa est: quin et ad vitam benè instituendam par fere momentum utriusque cernimus. Ita denique cognatæ inter se hæ duæ res sunt, unoque et eodem opere absolvuntur, ut improborum vituperatio, proborum dici laudatio quodammodo possit. Verùm ut jus et ratio atque usus utrobique par sit, non itidem est par gratia: nam qui alterum vituperat, duarum is uno tempore gravissimarum rerum onus atque invidiam sustinet, et accusandi alterum, et de se benè sentiendi. Itaque laudant facilè nunc boni, nunc mali dignos juxta atque indignos; accusare nemo liberè atque intrepidè, nisi solus integer, vel audet vel potest. Nos qui adolescentes tot sub magistris exudare in umbra eloquentiam solemus, vimque ejus demonstrativam in vituperatione haud minùs, quàm in laude arbitramur esse positam, tyrannorum antiqua nomina fortiter sanè ad pluteum concidimus. Et Mezentium, si fors ferat, putidis rursum antithetis enecamus; aut Agrigentinum Phalarim tristi enthymematum mugitu, quàm in suo tauro, exquisitiùs torremus. In xysto nimirum aut in palæstra, nam in republica plerumquè tales adoramus potiùs et colimus, et potentissimos et maximos et augustissimos appellamus. Atqui oportuit aut non in ludicro primam ferè ætatem umbratiles consumpsisse, aut aliquando cùm patriæ, cùm reipublicæ est opus, relictis rudibus, in solem ac pulverem atque aciem audere; aliquando veros lacertos contendere, vera arma vibrare, verum hostem petere. Parte alia Suffenos et Sophistas; alia Pharisæos et Simones et Hymenæos et Alexandros, veteres quidem illos, multo mucrone insectamur: hodiernos et in Ecclesia redivivos collatis elogiis laudamus, professionibus et stipendiis et cathedris, incomparabiles videlicet et doctissimos et sanctissimos viros, ornamus. Ad censuram si fortè ventum est, sicui fortè persona et speciosa pellis detrahitur, si turpis introrsum, immò verò si palam atque apertè facinorosus arguitur, sunt qui hunc malint, nescio quo studio, quove metu adducti, testimoniis publicè defensum, quàm animadversione debita notatum. Meà ab his fateor, quod aliquoties res ipsa jam docuit, satis longè disjuncta ratio est: ut siquid adolescens in illo otio literarum vel præceptis doctorum vel meis lucubrationibus profeci, id omne ad usum vitæ generisque humani, siquid tam latè possem, pro infirma parte mea conferrem. Quod si etiam ex privatis nonnunquam inimicitiis delicta publica animadverti et sæpè corrigi solent, et adversarium nunc non modò meum, sed penè omnium communem, hominem nefarium, reformatæ religionis et sacri maximè ordinis opprobrium, literatorum labem, juventutis perniciosissimum præceptorem, immundum in sacris Ecclesiasten, impulsus omnibus causis justissima vituperatione prosecutus sum, eo necne cum fructu, quo oporteat, viderint illi, quorum potissimùm interest exemplum in isto edere, me quidem spero (cur enim diffidam?) rem neque Deo ingratam, neque Ecclesiæ insalubrem, neque reipublicæ inutilem præstitisse.

AUTHORIS AD ALEXANDRI MORI

SUPPLEMENTUM RESPONSIO.

Hanc ego defensionem meam cùm ante duos menses hactenus parassem, ne consumptum fortè biennium alterum in se profligando clamitet Morus, tanto cum desiderio Supplementum illud fidei publicæ contra me promissum expectabam, ut nihil mihi longius videretur. Didiceram enim ex Vlacco perorante, recessisse quidem in Galliam Morum, non tamen quiescere: sed vel diffisum viribus Genevensium attritis, vel quòd manu tam exigua vix satis sibi instructus ad decernendum uno prælio videretur, novum contra me exercitum, et quod mirandum sit, Mediburgicorum et Amsterodamensium in Gallia conscribere: Consules etiam et Scabinos magna cum manu signisque infestis adventare. Serò tandem erepsere novæ copiæ; sine quibus prima acies, opinor, labare atque dehiscere videbatur. Sed cur tam serò, cur ab extemporali homine tam tardè advenerint siquis miratur, erant scilicet literæ quædam mortuorum longo situ eruendæ; erant quoque subsidia hæc consularia tam gravis armaturæ, mira itinerum ratione "ex Gallia," teste Vlacco, "transmittenda:" Quid si etiam ibidem conficienda? quibus cùm ipse Vlaccus, homo æquissimus, ut habeatur fides non postulet, sed quod "æquum et justum cuique videbitur," id ut "judicetur," sic omnino faciamus. "Sufficit Vlacco," Supplementi hujus collectitii legato, lectorum "curiositati," non incredulitati "satisfecisse," nempe fidei publicæ, ex Gallia in Hollandiam, quasi postliminio quodam reversæ, fidem defore uniuscujusque privatam, haud ab re sanè suspicabatur. Primum hoc velim unicuique in mentem veniat, quod supra demonstratum est, publica testimonia qua ambitione ferè comparentur; in re privata quid valeant; quàm sæpe hallucinentur: me deinde non ficta crimina in Morum, non ignota, non obscura, sed vera, sed jam vulgata atque testata, in foro denique et judicio agitata haud semel, atque versata protulisse. Non igitur calumniatores nos, non testes in se, sed suos esse judices intelligat Morus: id jure æquissimo; quoniam ipse in nos prior has partes sibi sumpsit; nos ipse prior judicavit; suam in nos sententiam iniquissimam edidit. Prolatis autem utrinque testimoniis cur secundùm eos meritò pronuntiemus, qui Morum gravissimè accusant, in causa est cùm ipsius comperta in nos audacia atque improbitas singularis, tum ipsius testimonii quamvis "publica," tamen ambigua fides; quæ consuetis atque tritissimis laudandi formulis prosequitur Morum, objecta illi crimina ab accusatoribus tam multis non diluit. Quid enim affert vel hoc supplementum, More, quod ad rem pertineat? Accusabant te Genevæ gravissimi viri Theodorus Troncinus pastor et theologiæ professor, duo alii pastores Mermilliodus et Pittetus multis opinor testibus adductis; accusabant multorum criminum, et commissi præsertim in horto quodam probri turpissimi. Tu hîc contrà literas producis Deodati senis; qui venire in conventum jamdiu desierat; nec quid ibi gereretur, nisi ex te tuisque fautoribus audire consueverat. Literas deinde Sartorii, ne non sarsisse omni ex parte causam tuam viderere; tum Gothofridi jurisconsulti, ne non satis cavisse; has omnes literas jam ante scriptas, quàm hæc tua flagitia vel ad Ecclesiam delata, vel amicis, ut solet, omnium ultimis, credibilia essent. Quæ igitur à me tibi objiciuntur, horum nihil negant. Fac autem disertis verbis negasse: haudquaquam tamen istorum negatio affirmatione potior tot hominum probissimorum erit, quorum præsertim testium vim ac veritatem cùm sustinere non posses, petita subitò abeundi licentia, non absolutus judicio, sed elapsus, evasisti. Literis deinde Genevensium non sine multorum gravi intercessione atque etiam indignatione, ut supra dixi, concessis, tu quasi Rheno amne lustratus (quo "devectum te in Belgium" ais) et noxa omni ablutus, utcunque commendatus, mirum non erat si, convocata illic fortè synodo Gallo-Belgica, tanquam Mercurius quidam novus Gallo-Belgicus, non tu quidem illuminatus, sed combustus, ut fit, in synodo, ad tempus latuisti. Eas autem literas cùm supra dixerim fore, ut in medium nullo modo proferres, ne prioribus hìc positis quanto essent frigidiores perspiceremus, lepidè tu quidem "exemplar earum nancisci te non potuisse" causaris. Quòd autem dixi ad tempus, non semper latuisse te, id facilè constat, primùm quòd in illa ipsa synodo "trajecti" ad Mosam habita, quò primùm appulisti rumores quosdam "contra doctrinam" tuam et "conversationem" illis in regionibus jam esse "sparsos," et suspiciones haud leves de te passim vel novas haberi, vel veteres recruduisse, neque ita te iis absolutum, quin ad alteram postea synodum nova rursus commendatione opus tibi fuerit, declarat, quæ sequitur Ecclesiæ Medioburgenæ ad Campensem synodum epistola, declarat etiam illius epistolæ subscriptor primarius Joannes Longus ejusdem ecclesiæ pastor, qui tua tum quidem larva inter alios deceptus, perspectis nunc demum et exploratis moribus tuis, nunquam te nisi maximæ contumeliæ detestationisque causa dicitur nominare. Immò verba ipsa tua declarant quibus fateris post seditionem Midelburgi ortam, in qua amicus quidam tuus potentissimus dignitate excidit eos, qui post eum rerum potiti sunt, in te non "æquè propensâ fuisse voluntate:" id tu eorum ignorantiæ assignatum vis, quibus tu theologiæ professor celeberrimus "non æquè familiariter innotuisses;" cùm ad suspectos jam mores tuos revera sit referendum. Quid enim ad te advenam seditio? qui suffragiis omnium publicè accersitus non studiis partium, sed bona fama ac diligentia in isto munere theologico tueri existimationem tuam notus æque omnibus debebas. Hîc tamen quæreris quòd "ejectum" te dixerim "ab Ecclesia illa." Ego verò non "ejectum" te dixi, sed tantummodo ablegatum; idque non de ipsa ejiciendi vel ablegandi formula, sed de voluntate eorum abs te jam alienata intellectum volui. In hoc non admodum errasse me testis esse potest vir, ut audio, probatissimus, quem suprà appellavi, Joannes Longus ejusdem ecclesiæ pastor, qui nunc, inquam, longè secus de te sentit et loquitur, atque primò sensit, cùm in tuam commendationem "omnium nomine" subscripsit; Testis est vir spectatissimus Joannes Duræus, qui non unam Ecclesiam Midelburgensem ejecisse te, sed universam penè synodum Gallo-Belgicam ejectum velle scribit. Frustra igitur synodi Groudensis actum illud subjungis, quod factis recentioribus irritum fecisti; frustra, inquam, actum illud quod apertissimi te mendacii coarguit: etenim illius synodi authoritatem idcirco adhibuisse te ais, ut "sciam omnia ritè et solemniter" in synedrio Midelburgensi de te "acta:" ipsa synodus non ritè, non solenniter hæc esse acta, sed "nonnullos defectus in modo agendi" notat. Vellem scire illos defectus cujusmodi fuerint, cur tu Midelburgensium testimonia sine nonnullis defectibus in modo agendi auferre non potueris. Illud interea tenendum memoria est, quibus cum "defectibus" Genevensium testimonia adeptus sis: quanto reverà cum dedecore, quanto in speciem cum honore illi te dimiserint. Prorsus, quasi id unum sibi reliquum necessariò decrevissent, laudandum te esse atque tollendum. Verùm, ut dixi, laudes illas qualescunque perspecta postmodum et cognita vitæ tuæ turpitudo antiquavit jamdiu atque delevit: ut ad infamiam potiùs tuam hæc omnia conducere videantur, qui tam præclaram de te olim hominum opinionem, admissis in te postea tot probris, tam fœde fefelleris. Ventum tandem ad Pontiam est; quam sic à me falsò nominatam contendis. Ego verò authorem Batavum et notissimum illud de te distichon, quo me facilè defendam, recito:

> Galli ex concubitu gravidam te Pontia Mori,
> Quis benè moratam morigeramque neget?

Bontiam, fateor, aliud apud me manuscriptum habet. Sed prima utrobique litera, quæ sola variat, ejusdem ferè apud vos potestatis est. Alterum ego nomen ut notius, ut elegantius salvo jure criticorum præposui. Satis de nomine; nunc rem ipsam consideremus. Quis tam est reus, quis tam omni genere criminationum oblitus, qui, si solus audiatur, causam suam vel Cassianis judicibus probare non queat? Tu quam attulisti hujus rei narrationem, ejusmodi est, ut nemo sit, modò integer atque attentus accedat, quin te, etiam inauditis accusatoribus tuis, vel planè condemnandum, vel suspicione gravissima non absolvendum arbitretur. "Uxorem" ais "Salmasii graviter tibi infensam, et ob eas rationes quas commemorare" non vis, "nihil intentatum reliquisse, ut te in nassam infaustissimi matrimonii compingeret." Primùm illud suspiciosissimum est quod celas; illud nempe arcanum quod tibi tam modesto homini et ministro uxorem amici sic inimicam potuit reddere. Mirum deinde inimicitiæ genus narras, quo impulsa uxor amici tui famulam sibi dilectissimam nuptum tibi dare cupiebat. Nassa autem illud matrimonium qui potuit dici? nisi tute eam vel sponsione aliqua tibi induisses, vel escam avidè nimis appetisses, atque ita meritò infaustissimum, quod stupro auspicatus esses, matrimonium reddidisses. "Nihil," inquis, "intentatum reliquit." Quid ergo inter alia tentaverit ut ipse nobis divinandum relinquis; immò ipse non taces, ipse effutire non erubescis; et illud suprà dictum à Crantzio, paulò infra quasi palmarium quiddam pro te ex ore Salmasii repetis; "Siquid in Pontia peccavit Morus, ego sum leno, et uxor mea lena." Hanc scilicet pulcherrimam fore defensionem tibi apud omnes amens credidisti, si ostendisses lenone Salmasio, ejusque uxore lena, te non ignobile stuprum fecisse; et non nisi dominis perductoribus ancillam vitiasse. "Hoc vulgo innotuit;" tu verò "palam vehementissimeque reluctari." Euge corculum pudoris, deliciæ castitatis! Tune reluctari verò? virginali, ut videtur, verecundia homo nassa muliebri indutus. Nam piscis, nisi captus, non reluctatur: illa profectò mulier nisi thunnum te perspexisset, nisi facilem, nisi opportunum, nisi obnoxium ancillæ suæ deprehendisset, nunquam tibi istos laqueos ita elimasset, nunquam tibi Vulcanios illos casses tua Juno tam facilè adaptasset; nunquam in virum gravem, Ecclesiastem, doctum, celebrem, qui mariti domum inter amicissimos frequentasset, nunquam nisi in mulierosum et notæ incontinentiæ hominem tale quicquam moliri aut tentare ausa esset. At, inquis, "cum factione quadam se conjunxit, quæ qualis fuerit, aperire tibi nolo." Ergo hoc etiam non minùs suspitiosum nobis relinquis, quòd tua multùm interfuit aperuisse, quæ ista factio, quo in loco te tot Ecclesiarum, tot synodorum, tot magistratuum testimoniis ac sigillis loricatum hominem et cataphractum tam acritèr oppugnarit. Si ob vitæ sanctimoniam, concionandi assiduitatem, professoriæ facultatis præstantiam te odio habuisset, nihil æquè tibi laudi ac defensioni esse potuit: nunc cùm in re omnium potissimum explicanda tectus atque astutus esse malueris, credendum est non factionem, sed benè magnum bonorum virorum numerum ob impuros mores tuos, vitamque offensam meritò te odisse. Deinde, si Midelburgi, si Amsterodami, ubi tanto in pretio atque honore apud omnes fuisse te prædicas, tam numerosa te factio adorta est, claudicare tua fides publica videtur; eosque demum esse factionem qui te tantopere laudarunt. Sin Hagæ aut Lugduni primùm ista factio in te tam acriter est concitata, nihil profectò obstat quò minùs appareat deseruisse te tandiu et pastoris et professoris munus utrobique sacrum, ut Hagæ libellos famosos, ministerium tui Evangelii ministrares; Lugduni Pontiam ancillam, id est Nassam ipse tuam sectarere; tuosque illos, post diurnum sæpe discessum, tot nocturnos ad eam vicina ex urbe reditus, tot cum ea furtivos, inscientibus dominis, congressus vicinitati notissimos, tantum in te odium plurimorum commovisse. Hos tu "admissarios" uxoris Salmasii vocas; et ignominiam defuncti amici tui matronæ, ejusque propinquis non ferendam inuris. Hæc scilicet cum "Ruffino" et factione illa, "horrenda criminationum tonitrua displosit, et totum insanis clamoribus Belgium implevit." I nunc, et à me conficta hæc esse clamita; dic meas has esse calumnias; quas ego non calumnias, sed criminationes ab universo penè Belgio, te confitente, accepi. Has ego tacerem? his non crederem? proque tua in nos nostramque rempubl. injuria, scelere, audacia veras esse non judicarem? quam tu factionem, eam ego probissimorum hominum multitudinem, testimonium, judicium esse non arbitrer? Hoccine divina animadversione factum non putem, ut dum aliis famosos libellos tam diligenter adornares, famosus ipse passim libellus fieres? Tu verò cum "existimationem" tuam "hærere," ut ais, "ad metas" videres, et "linguis omnium vapulares," haud insolita audacissimi cujusque concilio, potentiorum studiis fretus, quos affectatis concionibus, et Corinthii æris tinnitu illo tibi fortè conciliaveras, "prior Pontiam in jus vocas." Contrà Salmasius, non insaniam, ut tu appellas, sed "causam se uxoris destituere non posse" per amicos tibi denuntiat. Quod eum fuisse facturum nisi justam quoque causam credidisset, tibi verisimile esse non debet. Tu, "non sine consilio summorum et sapientissimorum totius Belgii capitum," quorum nimirum patrocinium vel adulando, vel suppliciter ambiendo ad omnes nequitiarum tuarum eventus tibi comparaveras, "litem in suprema Hollandiæ curia prosequeris." Quo in loco potentiam quorundam, ut dixi, non innocentiam tuam præsidio tibi maximo fuisse, si vel teipsum audiamus causam hîc tuam quanto potes cum artificio et cautione dicentem, obscurum non est. "Desperabant" adversarii "fore se" illa in curia "superiores:" tuam "afflicturos" se esse "famam" non desperabant. Quid ita? quia paucorum vim atque opes in foro dominari, cæteros pæne omnes favere sibi videbant. At verò non tuam, sed suam ipsi famam accusatores tui afflixissent, si tu æquo judicio superior ipsorum opinione futurus videbaris. "Omnes," inquis, "omni ope me unum oppugnabant;" non "defuisse" tamen "amicos" tibi "agnoscis:" paucos igitur et potentes fuisse illos necesse est: id quod etiam "miratos et conquestos esse inimicos tuos" usque eò non diffiteris, ut ne noceret tibi ista gratia tam aperta ac manifesta veritus, haud semel subirasci te simules amicis tuis, cumque iis expostulare, quasi parùm prudenter tibi et non satis cautè favissent. Itaque "suprema capita, quæ tibi suum in hac causa præsidium obtulere, enixè rogasti, siquid valeres gratia, ne quid eorum autoritas de victoria innocentiæ tuæ delibaret." Illius judicii exitus qui demùm fuerit, non dicis; Adversarii certè, tantum abfuit ut jure aut æquitate victos se esse arbitrarentur, ut quos tu reos modò feceras, hi nunc petitores ad synodum provocarent; et quod obtinere à magnatibus jus suum non poterant, id impetrare per Ecclesiam facilè, se posse sperarent. Verum et in illa synodo nimis multùm valuisse gratiam gratis, ut aiunt, id est nullis omnino meritis tuis datam, etiam ex iis quæ pergis ipse narrare, satis constat. "Adsunt delegati Lugdunenses; saccum producunt oppletum fœdissimis criminationibus:" satis amplum, opinor, si tua omnia flagitia contineret, ut induendo etiam tibi, si egisses fortè pœnitentiam, sufficere potuerit. "Urgent delegati, ut prælegerentur omnia, quæ secum sacco illo gerebantur:" vel ut latiniùs dixisses, portabantur in sacco; à te enim puto, gerebantur in sindone. Sed synodi pars magna "reluctari, famosos esse libellos." Animadvertite quæso novam ac singularem judicum æquitatem atque prudentiam; qui criminationes cum testimoniis in judicium allatas, neque dum per lectas, tanquam famosos libellos, rejiciendas esse contendunt. Horum vicit sententia: excurrit confestim unus eorum, gratulabundus Moro, et "bonum factum, inquit; nihil contra te legetur." En iterum severos judices! quorum sententia in Mori gratiam sic manifestò lata est, ut unus eorum pati non possit quin ex ipso judicio de sella prosiliret, gratulatum reo. Puduit Morum ipsum tam dissolutæ sententiæ: perturbari denuò se simulat, et ægrè ferre, non perlegi illa volumina criminum suorum. Objurgatus itaque bonus ille judex et acriter ab ipso reo increpitus, redit in cœtum; cæterisque facile persuadet, ut mutata priore sententia statueretur omnia legenda esse. At verò, quæ isti judices primùm legenda non esse, ad arbitrium deinde rei, conversis eadem hora sententiis, legenda esse decreverant, de iis tandem perlectis quàm non attentè, quàm non severè, quàm denique in reum propensè judicaverint, intellectu difficile non est. Consurgunt judices; reum frequentes adeunt; "amplectuntur;" et cui palam modò gratificare, ei nunc apertè gratulari non dubitant. Quamquam ego in hoc toto judicio non tam Mori, quàm ejus personæ atque ordinis habitam esse rationem crediderem. Synodi præses ipse Riverius complexus te, "nunquam Æthiops, inquit, ita dealbatus est, quemadmodum hodiè tu fuisti." Tune verò adeò obesa nare homo es, ut irrisum te potiùs, quàm absolutum hoc proverbio non sentias? Riverius cùm Æthiopem te lavando et operam et laticem frustra perdidisset, dealbavit. Tu jam salve nobis, Æthiops, aut, si mavis, paries dealbate; quandoquidem quo Paulus Ananiam, eodem te synodi præses titulo decoravit. Nunc ipsum decretum synodi perpendamus. "Lectis chartis iis quæ allatæ fuerunt à delegatis Lugdunensibus circa litem illam quæ in suprema Hollandiæ curia mutilabatur, nihil in iis repertum est, quod valeret adimendæ ecclesiis libertati, qua Morum ad sacras conciones habendas cum occasio se dabat, invitare solebant." Hæc, etiamsi tua sola fide accipiamus, quàm obscura, quàm tepida, quàm ægrè absolvant reum, aut ne absolvant quidem, quis non videt? qui te olim maximis cumulare laudibus solebant, nunc multis criminibus insimulatum, ne uno quidem verbo tenuissimo purum aut insontem pronuntiant. Non commendant te ecclesiis; "libertatem" tantummodo iis non "adimunt" qua te, non ad pastoris assiduum munus, sed "cum occasio se dabat," ad concionandum fortuitò "invitare solebant." Ista autem occasio si se nunquam daret, id sibi displicere aut detrimenti quicquam inde capturam esse ecclesiam, haudquaquam ostendunt. Tibi interim pro ara pulpitum est; illa in aula te jactas bucca notissima; et quo turpior domi, eò clamosior in cœtu es: quicquid in occulto, quicquid in "sacco" illo peccas, hîc tua cymbala, tua æra concrepare strenuè non desinis; et tuum illud rostrum nusquam impudentius, quàm in rostris offers. "I nunc," inquis, "et stupra et spurios tibi finge." Immò, ito tu, inquam, et stupra tua si audes vel uno verbo disertè nega: id quod toto hoc libro facere non es ausus. "Consulantur acta publica;" immò consulantur acta privata, acta furtiva, acta nocturna tua, quæ vulgatissima istis regionibus iamdiu innotuere. Unde spurii si non extiterint, non continuò tu castus, sed eò fortasse nequior fuisti. Hactenus quæ tu testimonia attulisti aut malè parta, aut jam exoleta, id est aliquanto priùs data, quam patefacta ea fuerint facinora quæ à me tibi potissimùm objiciuntur, ostendi. Quibus testimoniis si ab innumeris passim viris bonis quos nunquam nominatim læseras non est creditum, id quod ipsi subscriptores tui queruntur, de me nostrisque hominibus, quos injuriis maximis ultrò irritasti, si non credamus, non est meritò quod queri quisquam possit. Postremas omnium literas Amsterodamensium consulum et rectorum, nescio cujus opera, quove pacto comparatas, ex Gallia transmittis: neque ad tempus omni ex parte satis accommodatus, et ad rem certè minimè appositas. Ego quæ tu ipse flagitiosa feceris, coarguo; tu quid magistratus in te non fecerit hoc testimonio duntaxat ostendis. Scripsi equidem, et, quod tum palam testatus sum, non pro certissimo, sed ut nuper audiveram, idque etiam per literas fide dignas, magistratum Amsterodamensem tibi pulpitum interdixisse. Tu literas fateris "per omnes gentes" contra te ab "adversariis" tuis "missitatas." Et eos adversarios nunc scribis esse tuos; ego et bonos viros esse eos acceperam, et te adversarium sciebam esse meum. Ex ipsis quæro magistratibus Amsterodamensium, num istiusmodi quippiam allatum ad se de adversario non tantum suo, sed civitatis etiam suæ, silentio prætermittendum censuissent? Hoc igitur si verum non sit, est quoque levissimum; de quo et ego minimè laborare, et tu minimè exultare debeas. Numquid est aliud quod testentur tibi hæ literæ? est aliud. Te "ex quo tempore apud se in publico munere versatus es, nihil admisisse quod justum prædictis calumniis locum dare potuerit" Quid si antè admiseris, quàm ad eos venisti? Nam quibus consulibus admissa abs te quæque fuerint, cujus in scabinatum pruritiones tuæ inciderint, si ex ratione fastorum non habeo dicere, id non dices, arbitror, ita magni referre. Quid, inquam, si ante admiseris? quod ego quidem pro certo habeo. Tum sanè et hoc quoque testimonium, ancile tuum, haud multò plus ponderis, quàm alterius cujusquam habuerit; ut, quod de iis, quæ auditione tantum acceperat ab aliis, testificetur. Quod autem adjungitur te "extra culpam notamve fuisse," id adeò liquidò non ita se habet, ut etiam reliqua in dubium vocare videatur. Non alium igitur atque teipsum tuis Consulibus opponam; qui te culpatum, notatum, vexatum, linguis omnium toto Belgio vapulasse, haud semel, pluribusque verbis confessus es. Commodùm itaque interserunt, "ut ad nos relatum est." A quibus autem? nam et ad nos longè alia et à plurimis relata sunt: utrorum qui hæc tam variè referunt anteponenda fides sit, ipsi nostram æquè ac suam existimationem esse sciunt. At verò non ad se omnia quamvis consules, relata esse ut doceam, respondeant mihi rogo libellus iste in nos famosus, à Moro editus, relatusne ad se fuerit? quem libellum edidisse in nostram rempubl. non ministri erat Evangelici, sed ardelionis et calumniatoris, et nebulonis maledicentissimi. Si negant de hoc libello quicquam sibi perlatum, posse et multa alia etiam improbissima non perferri ad se de hoc Moro velim existiment. Sin fateantur allatum sibi esse illius libri editorem fuisse Morum, suum tamen illi testimonium tanquam homini reverendo, probo, inculpato perhibuerint, sciant nos istiusmodi testimonium etiam consulum et scabinorum tanquam levissimum, et nullius planè authoritatis repudiare. Horum, inquis, rectorum "gravitatem, fidem, autoritatem si nosses, sexcentis millenorum Miltonorum libellis retundendis parem agnosceres." Ergo verò, mi homo, id nescio an ita facilè agnoscerem; quandoquidem et id nescio, αριστίνδην, an πλουτίνδην, virtute an census magistratum illum in civitate sua obtineant. Neque me latet consules, et prætores, illustriora longè quàm nunc sunt nomina, etiam Verrem, reorum omnium Romæ perditissimum, studiosè defendisse, cum provincia tota, virique boni universi gravissimè accusarent. Hoc summum fidei tuæ publicæ propugnaculum, eademque basis et firmamentum maximum, quàm nullo tamen negotio labefactetur et corruat, vides. Sequitur ecclesiæ Amstelodamensis Gallo-Belgicæ testimonium, subscriptore imprimis Hottono, Mori intimo, et quod suprà demonstravimus, Regii Clamoris conscio. Valdè nobis probatum sit necesse est hujusmodi testimonium, cujus subscriptionis princeps est Hottonus. Sed tamen quid afferat, videamus. "Tantum abesse," ait, "ut eorum criminum eum reum esse sciamus aut agnoscamus, quorum à quodam Miltone Anglo accusatur."—Hujus fidei vis maxima, ut video, in ignorantiæ professione posita est. Quid hoc testimonio faciamus? quid hac fide? quæ suà se potissimùm ignorantiâ commendat. Reum esse nescimus, non agnoscimus: hoc quis præterea toto propemodum Belgio ignorat, quæ illi præcipuè crimina objicio, eorum ipsum in utroque foro, non reum modò diuturnum fuisse, sed plurimorum judicio damnatissimum; nec nisi potentium quorundam studiis, utque sacro potiùs ordini quàm ipsi consuleretur, fuisse absolutum. Tantum abest ut reum esse sciamus, "ut contrà potius ab illo aliquoties conciones sacras rogaverimus." Contenti nempe hoc forensi judicio, ubi gratia plus justo potuit; et suadente præsertim Hottono, quoties ipse respirare et suis parcere lateribus decrevisset. Verum hoc quid efficit? aut quis est nescius multos in concionibus satis esse placitos, satis suaves ac tinnulos, qui in omni vita reliqua offensioni maximæ fuerint? Etenim qui suis libidinibus explendis dat operam, quid obstat quo minus idem titillandis alienis auribus commodè servire possit. Quod reliquum est, index potiùs operis, quàm testimonium dici meretur: quando enim aliud quod dicat non habet, "satis superque testantur," inquit, "de ipso aliarum ecclesiarum in quibus vixit diutius quam apud nos, publica documenta ad quæ nos iis consentiendo referimus." Quæ vox detrectantium penè, et libenter hoc negotio expedire se cupientium prorsus videtur; facitque ut non immeritò suspicemur, testimonium hoc, tametsi planè friget, non sine sudore tamen Mori, allaborante etiam Hottono, multis repugnantibus, impetratum ægrè fuisse. Epilogi loco est "curatorum scholæ" testimonium. Verum in schola quid tu declamites, quid recites, aut quemamodum te geras, neque tanti esse reor ut cognoscere curemus, neque ad hanc causam pertinet. Vitam et mores tuos excutimus: quos cum isti vix attingere, et ad literas superiores malle nos remittere videantur, quod ad eorum testimonium infirmandum satis sit, superiùs quoque dictum putemus. Ad finem aliquando pervenimus tuæ Fidei publicæ; quæ ex Gallico ferè sermone in Gallico-latinum "tralatitia" inanissimi libri maximam partem occupat. Copias jam omnes tuas cum supplemento etiam lustravimus: peramplas quidem eas, sed ad pompam sanè potiùs, quàm ad verum robur comparatas. Hæ sunt plumæ tuæ, sub quibus corniculam latitare te dixi. Hæc vestis illa multicolor qua Morum revera, id est morionem te induisti: his tu phaleris ne populum quidem fefelleris: tuque si sapuisses, aut ullo rerum usu præditus fuisses, nullius fore usus tibi hæc omnia, quod ad tuam attinet causam, facilè intellexisses. Potest fortasse quispiam, cujus nomen alioqui nunquam audissemus, tam sui venditandi causa quam tui, phalerata verba tibi dedisse: potest aliorum pudor et bonitas flagitanti ac sudanti, et agi jam tuam existimationem miserè querenti, hoc tantillum non denegasse. Potes tu per interpretes Hottonos multa confecisse: et tamen post hæc omnia scito te nihil quod ad rem pertineat in medium protulisse. Quid juverit, quæso, vel in foro testimonia generatim dicta, quid elogia de tuis "dotibus," quid incertas blandientium amicorum laudes proferre, si ego te certorum criminum accuso? Accusarunt te adulterii Genevæ olim viri graves; tempus, locum, adulterum nominarunt: multorum prætereà criminum te detulerunt. Quid si istam farraginem pro testimonio Judicibus tum tuis ostendisses? acceptúrosne putas fuisse eos, teque absolvendum istis criminibus fuisse continuò judicaturos? immò verò jussissent te, ablatis hisce nugis, appositè respondere; ullamne cum ista fœmina rem, rationemve habueris; illo in horto camne conveneris; illo in tugurio, clausis foribus, solusne cum sola fueris. Hæc et hujusmodi multa ex te requisissent; ad quæ singula, neque in illo tum judicio, quod te jure absolvere vel suspicione posset (judicium enim illud petita abeundi licentia commodum prævertisti) neque in hoc libro, tot alioqui ineptiis refertissimo, quicquam respondes. Facis idem prorsus in causa quoque Pontiana: quid in foro transactum sit, quantopere tua gratia ad præjudicium miseræ muliercula post Salmasii obitum valuerit, suspiciosè admodum ipse narras. De illis nocturnis Haga Leidam itineribus, de illis cum Pontia clandestinis atque nocturnis congressibus, quanquam hæc et multò plura hujusmodi omnibus in ore sunt, nullum verbum facis. Quid hæc prorsus alienissima nobis obtrudis? immò quid omnino hanc tantam literarum ac testimoniorum congeriem tibi ullo tempore comparâsti? an quod tuæmet ipse conscientiæ satis probatus apud te non eras? an quod de te nec tibi ipsi, nec spontaneis hominum sermonibus credere audebas, nisi tot coactis nominibus ac testimoniis tibimet confirmatum hoc esset atque testatum, id quod alioqui nunquam credidisses, te virum bonum aut tolerabilem posse cuiquam videri? An verò tot criminibus accusatus, cùm de te homines ubique pessimè loquerentur, commendationibus totidem sanare illa vulnera posse te existimasti? atqui vides quo sæpius ex mala valetudine ad inanem medicinam, ex novis maleficiis et rumoribus inde natis ad novas perpetuò commendationes recurris, earum authoritatem eò semper minorem abs te reddi atque indies leviorem: ægrotare nimirum existimationem tuam et morbosissimam esse, quæ tot purgationibus, tot medicamentis indigeat commendationum quis est quin suspicetur? Sed fortasse longinquas in urbes quemadmodum prædicas, ad professiones amplissimas persæpè invitatus, hoc te quasi commeatu, iter facturus, instruxisti. Optimè: quæro itaque an proficisci in animo tibi fuerit ad eos homines qui te ignorassent, qui an satis nossent? si ad illos, venustus profectò homo necesse est tibi fueris, qui ab illis invitatum iri te unquam credideris, qui te ignorassent: Si ad hos qui te jam satis norant, quid hoc tanto commendationum instrumento ac sarcina ad eos opus erat, quibus jam antea commendatissimum te esse ex eo ipso, quòd invitassent, sciebas. Perspicuum igitur est, nullam ob rem aliam, tantam vim testimoniorum commendatitiam sic te studiosè congessisse et in promptu semper habuisse, nisi vel ad ostentationem quandam circulatoriam, ad quam artem factum te præcipuè atque natum existimarim, vel impendentis ignominiæ metu, quam ex flagitiis nondum patefactis certissimam tibi expectabas. Ut haberes nimirum speciosum aliquid et publicum et foris partum, quod privatæ atque domesticæ 'et erumpenti interdum ex latebris opponeres infamiæ; utque procerum atque doctorum splendidis testimoniis, in quibus consequendis gratia atque ambitio nunc ferè plurimum possunt, contra populi veras voces te communires. Verùm ista te spes ut dixi, et frustrata jam est, et frustrabitur; cùm quia tuam obtegere improbitatem atque nequitiam, neque lux ulla neque tenebræ possunt, tum quia hoc ipsum quicquid est munimenti, quo te circumsepsisti, per se satis infirmum atque rimosum est. Id planius adhuc fiet, si testimonia hæc tua, quemadmodum per se singula consideravimus, ita nunc postrema primis, prima mediis conferamus; et doctores proceresque tuos inter se paulisper committamus. Ut intelligi tandem possit, quæ fides illius fidei publicæ, illorum testium sit, ubi aut alii ab aliis tam longè dissentiunt, aut plerique tam multa vel dissimulant vel nesciunt, quæ sua sponte alii fatentur. Illud imprimis exemplo sit, quod in iis literis occurrit quæ Genevensis esse ecclesiæ dicuntur. "Nihil utique illi," id est Moro, "vel ab infensissimis hostibus meritò objici queat, quod justæ sit reprehensioni obnoxium." Ego contrà non quæ hostes objiciunt Moro, sed quæ amici ejus, quæ testes ejus et "justæ reprehensioni obnoxia" fatentur, et ipsi in eo reprehendunt, ex his iisdem testimoniis depromam.—Quid enim Deodatus? "Non provocat quidem" Morus, "sed terribiles ungues habet ad sui tutelam." Quos ungues? nam istiusmodi quicquam inter Evangelici ministri arma non reperio; et eloquentiam nolim à viro docto atque humano, tam truci metaphora significari: Reliquum est, ut ungues illos, feritatem atque ferociam hominis interpretemur, quos non ad tutelam sui, sed ad injuriam aliorum, in nos certè nimium expeditos atque acres feræ similior quàm pastori exercuit. Apertiora haud paulò sunt quæ Georgius Crantzius, Alberti æmulus, ne ab avunculo fortè suo historicâ fide superetur, et quantò ægrior tantò fortasse veracior ultrò nobis largitur. "Ego Mori notitiam habui et Genevæ et in Belgio; semper magnas inimicitias exercuit cum æmulis, quibus ipse locum sæpe præbuit nimia libertate loquendi." Et hoc teste, contra quàm ab altero dictum modò est, et "ungues habet" et provocat Morus. "Ferox" atque "fidens, crabronum irritator" infestissimus: Beelsebubem prope alterum dicas, nisi quod ille muscas: Laboris alioqui "intolerantior," teste etiam laudatore Salmasio; cujus et "uxorem varie læserat," et alia quædam commiserat "inconsideratione tali homine indigna." Hæc ab amicis ac testibus tuis vis ipsa veritatis expressit; quæ quamvis favore et studio dicentium in molliorem partem flectantur, ejusmodi tamen sunt quæ ingenium tuum palam omnibus faciant, et hujus testimonii totius fidem infirmare haud mediocriter atque infringere videantur: cujus altera pars probum, inoffensum, sanctum, omni labe ac vitio carentem, altera contentiosum, turbulentum, arrogantem, garrulum, ignavum, injurium, inconsideratum denique et stultum nobis exhibet Morum. Sic fuit tua fides publica, id est, nulla: reverteris nunc iterum ad privatam, quæ nulla minor est. "At vides interea," inquis, "quàm non tralatitio me dignentur affectu, quos tu vis mihi furcas comparare." Immò tu vide, si potes, ira atque amentia impeditus, quàm vehementer hallucineris, quàm nihil attentè agas. Non ego hoc "de Batavis," sed Genevensibus intelligi volebam; nec quid hi statuissent, sed quid tu meruisses. "Verba," inquis, "tua recognosce, Orestis æmule." Recognosco, inquam, Orestis æmule! Cujus flagitia si pro meritis excepisset magistratus, jamdudum adulteria patibulo pendens luisses: nimirum Genevæ, ubi adulterii delatus eras; ad alios magistratus cognitio illius facti pertinere non potuit. Quæ sequuntur porrò et luiturus propediem videris, et hæc non iratus tibi ominor, sed duntaxat jus dico, facilè demonstrant, non tum prædixisse me quid sis passurus, sed pronuntiasse quid esses meritus; idque (cùm de nobis ipse prior judicasses) pari jure meo fecisse. I nunc non conscientiæ integritate, non justa defensione, sed scelerum impunitate quod facis effer te et gloriare. "Huic," inquis, "fungo, nuper è terra nato quem aut quos opposui?" Erras More, et me non nosti: mihi lentè crescere, et velut occulto ævo satius semper fuit. Tu ille fungus qui ex ephebis modò Genevam profectus, Græcarum literarum professor subitò emersisti; et tot viris natu "grandioribus ecclesiastis, jureconsultis, medicis, illa ingenii tunc primùm efflorescentis gratia," ut tu satis fungosè narras, "palmam" præripuisti: mox inter fungos, et olera, et armamenta olitoria, fungo recens tuberante, non tu quidem Claudium extinxisti, sed Claudiam supinasti. Nunc "conciliare" me jubes mea "dicta," si possum, "et fabulas," cum magistratuum "dictis atque judiciis" abs te scilicet emendicatis: Ego verò mea dicta cum tuis factis facilè conciliavero; de ipsorum dictis atque judiciis ipsi viderint: nos ut non porticibus, ita nec iisdem judiciis fruimur. Tu tecum si potes temetipsum concilia; qui totum illud Genevense negotium, et gravissimum in te crimen adulterii, quasi fabulam de infenso erga te magistratuum animo, summa cura, summoque studio refellere conaris.

Cur illam quæ vehementissimè ad te pertinuit, tam facilè prætermittis, hanc quæ te minimè attingit corrogatis tot testibus tanta mole refutare contendis? Sanè si ipse tibimet constare vis videri, nosque tuum institutum et respondendi rationem intuemur, qui fabulas confutatione indignas esse censes, aut illud in te verum crimen, aut hoc de te non verum magistratûs judicium credamus oportebit.—At non omni ex parte vituperandus est Morus; habet suas laudes; magna vitia magnis virtutibus compensat; facit quod in homine ecclesiastico laudatissimum simul et rarissimum est, ut gratis concionetur. "Nullo," inquit, "stipendio auctoratus gratuitam ecclesiæ operam rogatus præsto:" immò verò fortuitam; ex quo videlicet ampliore mercede proposita, relicto pastoris munere, sacrarum historiarum professor factus es; id est reverà, ex sacrario in scholam ad stipendium uberius emigrasti: tum si cujus rogatu fortè concionaris, hoc tanquam beneficii loco imputas; cum assiduum pastoris ministerium deserueris, ut hanc subcisivam operam desertæ abs te ecclesiæ non sine maximo compendio tuo gratis impertire videaris. Tu verò More, si ecclesiam Medioburgensem, quæ te, ut ais, tam honorificè invitasset, tanto cum fructu audisset, tam ægrè dimisisset, sine gravissima causa reliquisses, et ad alium gregem, idemque munus pastoris te contulisses, reprehendendum meritò et levitatis arguendum existimarim. Nunc cum "Attalicis," ut ipse ais, "conditionibus" non Christianis, et "emolumenti fructu" longè uberiore adductus, non de grege in gregem desultorius tantummodo pastor transieris, sed illo munere longè potiore posthabito, ex Evangelii ministro mutatus in professorem et historicum, ex ipsis ecclesiæ adytis ad promœria regressus sis, non mercenarii solum, sed defectoris propè numero habendum te esse, si habenda veteris et sanctissimæ disciplinæ ulla ratio est, affirmare non vereor. At concionaris tamen: et strenuè quidem, nunquam "majore cum fructu" Attalico, ad Pergamenos putà, non tuum ad gregem; quibus si fortè aures vix satis teretes pruriunt, tu, vitio cantorum planè converso, rogatus nunquam desistis: et velut sacerdos Phrygiæ matris nondum exsectus, aut Curetum aliquis, moves libenter tua crotala; non ut vagitum quempiam fabulosum, sed ut rumores flagitiorum tuorum plus nimio veraces fanatica vociferatione obruas. Hoc tu septenario strepitu et doctrina fortuita, ut quivis olim cyclicus aut sophista, si rogatus recitas, desertum Pastoris munus assiduum explere te putas? At concionator est bellus et facundus. Ita, credo, ut est orator: cui proverbia si demas, et insutos versiculorum centones, orationis ipso filo atque contextu nihil inornatius, nihil incompositius, nihil verbosius atque putidius; nihil ubi venustatem, numerum, atque nervos paulò disertiore homine dignos magis requiras. Unum est in quo graviter titubatum à me esse fateor: Græcarum literarum professorem dixi, quem sacrarum historiarum dixisse debui: enimverò incredibile mihi prorsus, et portento simile videbatur, historiarum sacrarum eum esse professorem, qui tot profanarum argumentum ipse atque materies esset. Tu verò mihi rectiùs, More, non historiarum, sed calumniarum professor deinceps nominaberis. Quod ne quis à me secus atque res ipsa se habet dictum arbitretur, mea ipsa verba abs te prolata in medio ponam; tuam deinde horum interpretationem, quam dico esse calumniam: ut quàm impudenter et malitiosè agas, quod et suprà idque sæpius demonstravi, et hinc qualem te sacræ etiam literæ tortorem proculdubio sentiant, præterire neminem possit. Restat jam tibi sola Græcarum literarum professio: ergo hoc ego "crimini" tibi do, quòd Græcas literas es professus: ergo ego "Græcas literas earumque professores cogo in ordinem." Ergo ego "Græcas literas ad ima subsellia relego." Quis horum quicquam sequi præter te dixerit? ipsa malitia si operam tibi suam locasset, tale quippiam ex meis verbis ullam in partam torquendo exprimere qui tandem potuisset? tu hoc non solum pro verissimo tibi sumis, verum etiam ut non nasutum minus conjectorem te, quàm navum esse calumniatorem intelligamus, "cur Græcas" inquis "literas, earumque professores cogas in ordinem, nisi me fallit animus, olfeci fucum:" Nempè Salmasius cùm esset Græcæ linguæ callentissimus, et hujus ego authoritatem elevare statuissem, id ut quoquo modo possem, Græcas literas, "ejus," si diis placet, "regna, ad ima subsellia relegavi." Quis calumniari solertiùs, quàm hariolari te nunc dicat? Atqui non meus ille fucus, vir sagacissime, sed tuus mucus quem olfecisti, tantummodo erat. Mihi enim cum Salmasio de Græcis non magis literis quàm calendis contestata lis erat; non illum literis vel Græcis vel Latinis, sed authoritatum et rationum ponderibus, affligendum atque sternendum esse intelligebam. Hinc tu, propterea quòd omnes cupidè ambages quæris, nequid ad rem dicere cogaris, ut olim paupertatis, ita nunc Græcarum literarum in laudes ridiculè sanè transcurris. Quas ego cum neque nesciam, et, siquis alius, plurimi faciam, nihil profectò ineptius, nihil alienius fingere potuisti, quàm despectas à me esse Græcas literas: cùm non tibi illas, sed te illis probro esse dixerim. Sed hæc tua perpetua ferè ratio est; ubi non fictis criminibus urgeris, ut ne obmutuisse planè videaris, data tibi esse à me crimini quælibet fingis, aut absurda quævis et falsissima de me inseris eaque in primis quæ dicta nunquam sunt, refutanda irripis: Hic strepis, hic tumultuaris, hic te jactas. Si adulterii te postulo, paupertatem scilicet contemno; paupertas tibi contra me toto penu loculorum tuorum defendenda est: Si stupri arguo, Græcas literas nimirum vellico; Græcarum literarum obtrectator oppugnandus tibi sum: Sic tu vera fictis eludere conaris, ut hoc fumo excitato occultare turpem fugam et convictissimi sontis pudorem atque silentium possis. Vide autem, dum Græcas literas tam veteratoriè laudas, ut irascantur tibi literæ Latinæ; tuumque "jecur latinum," ut satis sanum non sit. "Quota pars hæc est, inquis, sputorum et alaporum?" Næ tu masculum tibi alapum hoc solœcismo meruisti: nam fœmineas esse alapas quas tot sensisti, mirum non est si invitus agnoscas. Verùm hæc missa faciamus; levia sunt, vetera sunt; alius repentè homo jam factus est Morus; ad sanitatem jamjamque est rediturus; gradum unum atque alterum fecit; paulò veracior, paulò candidior ab rhetorica Diaboli (sic enim calumniam supra nominat) ad rhetoricam transit Juliani. "Vicisti," inquis, "Miltone." Hanc nempe vocem, ut ille olim (ne non Apostata satis germanus per omnia videaris) veritate victus emisisti. Sed vide, ne sincerum quod est, cauponum more, mendatio statim diluas. "Confitentem," inquis, "habes reum." Ego verò reum quidem habeo; confitentem non habeo: nisi si id pro confesso est habendum quicquid tu silentio præteriisti: sic enim et libellum in nos famosum edidisse, et hosti nostro dicasse, et Anglicanam Rempublicam indignissimis modis, meque nominatim illæsus læsisse, totam denique fabulam Genevensem confiteris. Ab hac prævaricatione ad precationem quandam artificiose compositam te confers; sive ea tuæ fidei publicæ extrema confessio dicenda est; ad quam Deum testem invocas, tremendum fateor et testem et judicem. Multa confiteris, multa ploras, peccata quidem "longè gravissima," sed quæ ad nos nihil attineant, quia penitùs latent, et etiamnum inconfessa nobis sunt. Et ista quidem si in occulto, clausisque foribus, ut peccare anteà, ita nunc precari in animum induxisses, laudassem equidem te, deque benignitate et clementia divina benè sperare jussissem: nunc cum in platea media orantem te hic reperiam, ad homines potiùs quàm ad Deum concinnatas has esse preces, et quasi ultima jacentis tuæ fidei publicæ suspiria judicarim. "Te Deus, te testem invoco, an non videant homines in corde isto quæ tu non vides." O confessionem claram atque simplicem! immò verò quid obscurius, quid cautius, quid jureconsultius composuisse poteras, ut decem causidicos vel adhibuisse viderere, vel pertimuisse? Nam quid hoc est, obsecro? "an non videant homines in corde isto." Quid vident homines in corde? Urinatore hic opus est Delio. Verùm quid quis in corde videat, viderit. Ego facta palam, audita, visa, testata refero: quas nemo meas esse calumnias sine maxima calumnia dixerit. "Longè turpior sum," inquis, "re quidem vera quàm illi fingunt; ob illa tot abscondita, quorum apud te reus verè sum." Sic tu nota ignotis, clara absconditis delere atque eluere conaris: occulta, incerta, latentia confiteris, ut explorata, certa, manifesta eò impudentiùs negare possis: ad extremum eò descendis, ut confessionem hanc, quasi libellum famosum de temetipso conscribas, quò faciliùs veram accusationem aliorum possis evadere. Tu hæc atque hujusmodi valere apud Deum cave existimes; apud homines certè vel mediocriter sagaces, minimè valebunt. Quod si linguis, ut ipse ais, atque conviciis omnium jamdiu verberatus, resipuisti aliquando revera, et ad bonam frugem revertisti, gaudeo. Nos te sic veram egisse pœnitentiam arbitrabimur, si tuarum in nos injuriarum et maledicentiæ famosæ pœnituisse tandem intelligemus.

JOANNIS PHILIPPI ANGLI

[First published 1655.]

Contra famosum anonymi cujusdam libellum, in quo senatus populusque Anglicanus turpissimis convitiis lacerabatur, quem jam vulgo notum est, Salmasii grammatici infame opus fuisse, prodiit nuper Joannis Miltoni Angli pro patria sua defensio. Liber sanè probus, omniumque doctorum virorum judicio domi forisque multùm approbatus. Qui cùm talis esset, expectabatur quidem vel Salmasii ipsius, vel alius alicujus viri literati responsio. Illarum certè partium magni intererat electum aliquem et disertum virum ad causam suam jam diu laborantem et ruentem adhibuisse. Cùm ecce demum ex omnibus illis rumorem montibus, quos assiduè fama nostras ad aures afferebat, tandem prorepit exiguus iste mus, qui miserè stridens rodit tantummodò, aliud quidem nihil agit; vel, ut veriùs dicam, inanes quasdam mortiunculas captat, dentemque in dente fatigat, authorem certè non lædit, ejus autem argumentorum vim et acumen nè assequitur quidem. Mirati primùm sumus quis esset; nomen enim ignobile, futilitatis certè suæ conscius, celat. Cùm verò libellus ejus, macri nescio cujus et jejuni ingenii indicium, perlectus esset, in eo statim, tanquam in speculo, virum conspeximus. Quis igitur sit, pòst videbimus. Hoc verò jam tacere non possum, hominem quendam valdè obscurum et vilem eum esse apparere; qui tamen arrogantia sua mendaciisque fretus, ut morientem et penè defunctam regis sui causam aliquantulum resuscitare videretur, hominumque animos jam sedatos, et judiciis Dei statim acquieturos, iterum commoveret atque irritaret, Dei Omnipotentis voluntati, summæque justitiæ se opponere (quam ille tàm insignibus et mirandis iræ suæ exemplis in regem, regisque fautores editis, omnibus vult esse notam) et supremos reipublicæ nostræ Magistratus accusare, convitiisque indignissimis infamare ausus est. Veruntamen ita obtorpescit, tam insulsus est, tamque somniculosum se glirem præbet, ut certissimum causæ suæ jam languentis, et in totum penè perditæ omen præ se fert. Omnium enim debilissimam atque iniquissimam certe causam illam necesse est esse, qua in defendenda fautores ejus non solùm armis, verùm etiam ratione et argumentis inferiores sint. Meritò igitur cùm talis esset, ab ipso Miltono neglectus et contemptus est. Multò enim indignior ab omnibus existimabatur, quàm ut spectata jam facundia limati illius atque culti authoris ad eruenda sterquilinia, rabidamque loquacitatem tam effrænis atque stulti blateronis refutandam descenderet. Verùm nè inter suos perfugas inanis iste rabula se venditaret et aliquid magnum, vel quod uno sanè prandiolo dignum sit, se scripsisse crederet, equidem cùm in patriam pietate, tum instauratæ nuper libertatis apud nos amore ductus, necnon illi etiam viro mihi semper observando, quem iste insectatur, multis officiis devinctus, pati non poteram, quin hujus ineptissimi nebulonis petulantiam retundendam mihi, nè rogatus quidem, susciperem. Quemadmodum igitur Romani olim tirones in palum se primò gladiis et pilis exercebant, ita ego in hunc caudicem stylum acuere et ingenii vixdum pubescentis rudimenta deponere haud incommodè me posse confido. Cum adversario enim tam insipido et vulgari, exiguo saltem quivis ingenio, et eruditione quantumvis leviter imbutus, etiam de improviso congredi sine periculo poterit. Priùs igitur quàm opus ipsum aggrediar, operæ pretium videtur, authorem hujus Apologiæ illustrem, si diis placet, et disertum, in occulto tamen latentem, investigare. Sunt qui dicunt nomen illi Jano esse, obscuro homini et bonarum literarum rudi, ex illo grege leguleiorum quos pragmaticos vocant. Verùm cùm meminissem bifrontem esse Janum, alterum sincipitium in ejus occipitio quærendum mihi esse statui. Itaque alteri sincipitio nomen, uti ego indiciis quibusdam comperi, Bramalo est. Is librum nuper stylo atque sensu huic penè geminum scripsit Anglicè Εἰκονοκλάστην, cujus et hunc fœtum esse haud temerè plures autumant. Virum igitur, quanquam et hic vultum in occipitio gerit, si libet, cognoscite. Nam, ut ipse profitetur, theologiæ doctor est, et episcopus Hiberniensis. Is cùm ab ineunte ætate homo discinctus et ebriosus, episcoporum, qui tunc in Anglia dominabantur, luxum, opes, ambitionem ante oculos haberet, inedia pressus et latrantis stomachi instinctu, nihil sibi utilius esse duxit, quàm ut sacerdotis munere indutus, Ecclesiam, tunc quidem lupis omnibus patentem, invaderet; et conciunculis aliquot ad illorum temporum pravitatem compositis instructus, quas de scripto recitandas circumferre solebat, nobilium hominum mensas, et sacellani pinguem aliquam mercedem, siqua ejusmodi offa se obtulisset, ambiebat; ubi cœnis quàm lautissimis, precibus quàm brevissimis uterentur. Inter alios Derbiæ comiti se clanculùm offerebat.—Tandem verò nequitiis coopertus, benevolentiam et favorem comitis Straffordiæ, proregis in Hibernia, quem multiplicis nomine perduellionis totus populus ad supplicium tandem poscebat, assentationibus et impudentia turpiter aucupatus est. Ille hominem se nactum esse ratus ad omnia facinora paratum, quique populum adulatoriis et aulicis concionibus suis ad suscipiendum servitutis jugum paratiorem redderet, episcopum eum Derriensem in Hibernia creavit. Jam verò post expulsos reges et prælatos, ad priorem vitæ inopiam redactus, rursus esuriens, "Curium" nunc "simulat" qui "Bacchanalia" modò vixit; utque pietatis obtentu cunctam rabiem in eos effunderet, qui et ipsum et cæteros istiusmodi latrones ovilibus Ecclesiæ opimis expulerunt, spe etiam nonnulla ampliorem aliquem episcopatum, mendaciorum suorum et audaciæ præmium sub minore Carolo devorandi, pellem ovinam induit, nil præter pietatem et sanctimoniam præ se fert; ita tamen, ut oblonga lupi cauda infra instiam sacerdotalem facilè appareat.

En virum egregium præ cæteris qui apologiam pro rege et populo Anglicano scribendam sibi sumit! Age verò, pro "rege" ut libet. Sed quid tu pro "populo Anglicano," qui Dominum tuum Straffordium, hostem populi acerrimum meritis pœnis affecit, teque pessimum ejus in Ecclesia Hiberniensi ad omnia scelera ministrum pari supplicio affecisset, nisi aut fuga aut obscuritas tua eorum manibus, qui Dominum plectebant, te furem eripuisset. Cur etiam apologiam "pro populo?" An pro iis qui regem puniverunt? haud credo; dices, pro iis qui regi favebant periodus? At illi id non requirunt, ut qui, facta pace, modicè multati, sua jam bona securè possideant, suamque fidem reipublicæ nostræ obstrinxerint. Unde tua ista apologia aut absurda planè est, aut nimiùm intempestiva. Verùm tu is homo es, qui titulum istum libri tui, utpote speciosum, vel cum maxima quavis absurditate arripere voluisti: Contra "Joannis" scilicet "Polypragmatici" defensionem. Sic ejus nimirum contra Claudium Anonymum, satis concinnè quidem dictum, si Claudium cum Anonymo conjunxeris, insulsè imitaris. Verùm non is polypragmaticus est, qui libertatem laudat, tyrannos damnat, civium suorum rectè et decorè facta defendit; sed tu potius, tuique similes verè sic dici debent, qui cum ecclesiasticos esse vos profiteamini, et Ecclesiam vestra polypragmatica perdidistis, et rerum civilium administrationem nihil ad vos pertinentem perpetuò conturbatis. Sed causa suberat gravis cur scriberes, credo, contra "defensionem" Miltoni "destructivam."

> Non, verùm monachorum, illi sic rure loquuntur.

Cognosce jam hominem in illa nempe barbarie scholastica potius quàm in clarorum authorum puritate et sapientia versatiorem, quorum lucem vespertilio iste ferre nunquam potuit. Unde demum prodeat apologia ista videamus. "Antverpia;" hoc enim solum præclarus iste protestantium episcopus, asylum, ut videtur, invenire sibi potuit, inter jesuitarum et monachorum catervas, quibuscum tales pseudepiscopi libentissimè esse solent. Rectè igitur meo judicio et se dignè faciunt protestantes exteri, qui turbatores istiusmodi errabundos suis cœtibus abigunt. Saltem non ausus est apud ullam Batavorum civitatem hoc suum opusculum typis mandare, veritus ne illustrissimi fœderatorum ordines, ut Salmasii nuper sui libellum publicè damnarunt, ita se quoque extorrem et erraticum nebulonem multò severiùs punirent. Quod illis quidem in laudem atque honorem, huic meritò in opprobrium cedere debet.

Jam ad lectorem quædam præfatur, et pauca sanè, sed quæ stultitiam hominis et ignorantiam illiteratam plus nimio prodant. Queritur "unam tantum" Salmasii "impressionem," idque "magna cum difficultate in lucem erupisse;" ejus autem libri quem Miltonus scripsit "tot esse exemplaria, ut" nesciat "cui lectorem remitteret." Itaque nihil hic reperio, cur non amico nostro gratulemur, Salmasium salsè rideamus. Annon hæc satis ad arguendam causæ tuæ fœditatem visa sunt? Miltonum omnes cum favore et plausu teipso teste legunt; Salmasium abjiciunt, nihili faciunt. His tua pervicacia adeò non movetur, ut omnes idcirco "mortales veritatem odisse, mendaciorum et convitiorum amore flagare," impudentissimè accuses, ipse interim non apostolus, non propheta, neque evangelista, sed scortator et helluo satis notus, et ganeonum duntaxat episcopus. Vos verò lectores, quos non humaniter appellat, sed in ipso exordio tam petulanter perstringit, tam docti reprehensoris vestri imprimis sensum, deinde literas vereri jam discite; primùm enim ait Miltoni defensionem "invidiosè elaboratam," deinde tot excusis exemplaribus approbatissimam esse fatetur; hæc sanè apud omnes qui Latinè intelligunt pugnantia sunt. Tum "tot sunt," inquit, "illius exemplaria, ut nescio cui lectorem remitterem." Satiùs tu quidem, qui vel prima pagina solœcismos evitare non potes, ad Orbilii cujusvis flagra remittendus es, apud quem nulla poteris apologia uti, quin omnes te pueri virgis et ferulis pulchrè depexum atque ornatum dimittant. Verum te jam primò auguror hac in parte haud rarò peccaturum, qui tam rem manè incipis. Neque lectorem stultè alloqui satis habes, sed eò etiam ulterius audaciæ processisti (quo vitio ignorantia maximè laborare solet) ut Leidensi Academiæ celeberrimæ ineptias tuas fœtidissimas epistola etiam stultissimè scripta dedicare ausus sis. "Alumnum" te academiæ "quondam" fuisse affirmas. Tunc verò academiæ ullius unquam alumnus, cujus infantiæ propemodùm illiteratæ quemlibet vel in agris ludum literarium puderet? Leidensem autem "alumnum" fuisse unquam te dicere audere, dubium tibi ne sit, quin illa academia vehementissimè indignetur; majori enim contumelia urbem illam afficere non potes, cujus te "quondam alumnum" fuisse prædicas; quanquam illud "quondam," si unquam fuit, multorum postea annorum crapula in lustris atque popinis jam diu proluisti. Sed et tu "eorum tutelam expetis." Hominum stupidissime, tutelam tu tuæ barbariæ in musarum domicilio quæris, quarum hoc ipsum munus est, vinctam barbariem catenis in terras ultimas exterminare: nescis medios dilapsus in hostes. Saltem dum academicos alloqueris, simula te literatum quempiam esse, vel ad punctum temporis, si potes. "Salmasius," ais, "mihi ansam præbuit qui tamen omnibus arripuit:" quænam ista balbuties est? Fac modo academia, quam interpellas, te intelligat alumnum suum, vix credo annotinum. "Nec calamum," inquis, "in manum sumere auderem" (sapuisses tu quidem si ausus non fuisses) "nisi Miltoni amentia me invitum provocasset." At ille te non magis provocavit, quàm qui prætereunt importunum et improbissimi oris canem, quem inani latratu insequentem ita contemnit, ut vix fuste te dignetur aut calce. "Quid vero," inquis, "ab extero qui inter inhospitales Caucasos vitam degit, expectari poterit?" Nihil sanè: Expectationem tu nostram minimè fefellisti: neque certè erat opus ut te inter Caucasos vitam degere faterere, lingua te tua ipsique mores barbarum clamitant: Tuaque illa Caucasea "poma" si dare velles, scito omnes Alcinoos magnoperè aspernari. Ad academiam quereris inter alia quòd "Banausi et Mechanici in pulpitam ascenderunt." Perdoctus tu quidem et idoneus, qui Banausos, et Mechanicos in pulpitum ascendentes insecteris, qui pariter atque illi grammaticæ rudis, haud illis magis pulpitum declinare potes. Postremò "Alienigenam" te "Anglum" appellas. "Id" quidem rectissimè: Aliena enim sentis, aliena loqueris, quidni alienigenam te Anglum esse dicas, id est spurium, quem Angli veluti purgamentum suæ patriæ atque piaculum jure quidem ad Caucasos ablegârunt.

IN PRÆLUDIUM AD PRÆFATIONEM.

In præludiis esse se existimat vir gravis; ludos ut videtur episcopales mox editurus. Favete spectatores Ludioni episcopo. Verum putaret quis hominem non prologum agere, sed in ipso proœmio Orestem insanum aut Athamanta saltare. "Ne insaniens cacodæmon Johannes Miltonus, &c." O mitem et mansuetum! quàm non iracundè, quàm humaniter exorditur! quod aliis, quamlibet furentibus, extremum maledicentiæ est, id huic pro levi tantùm præludio habetur. Sed hoc novum non est: sic enim Pharisæi olim, veri ejus progenitores, Christum ipsum à cacodæmone agitari dicebant; ut nemo vel hoc vel pejus in se dici, præsertim ab hoc episcopo verè diabolico, molestè ferat. Offenditur imprimis quòd Miltonus reipubl. insignia, quemadmodum Salmasius regis in fronte libri posuit. Hæc ille posita ibi ait tanquam fœnum in cornu, "ut cuncti sibi caverent;" quod hoc ad alios nescio. Te verò Bramm[illegible] non miror fœnum in cornu usque adeò horrescere, quoties tot tua adulteria animo revolvis. Omitto deinde quæ de cruce furcifer atque etiam de lyta stultissimè deliras: et certè præludia professus, nihil aliud nisi nugas agis. "Parlamentum et concilium satis ætatis habent seipsos armis defendere." Atqui tuum erat potiùs cogitare, satisne ætatis haberes Latinè ut possis ad ipsum scribere. "Sed ringit illum Salmasius," vel ut posteà perdoctè sanè emendavit, "ringit ille pro Salmasio," (menda an emendatio vitiosior sit, lectorum esto judicium,) "peregrinos veretur: num tu credis quòd tot nefanda, &c." Væ tibi Prisciane! nam solœcismos hic non singulos, sed turmatim effundit. Quàm verò peregrinos vereatur Miltonus, et imprimis illum Thrasybombomachidem Salmasium, qui libros ejus perlegerit abundè norit. "Ego," inquis, "libertatem peto à libero suo populo Anglicano, ut quod in re tanti ponderis liberè proferre possim." Tunc ut quicquam quod liberum sit liberè proferre possis, mancipium aulæ fœdissimum, Straffordii famulus et minister, gulæ etiam atque inguini turpissimè serviens episcopus? Quem populus opinor universus de libertate concionantem veluti obscœnum portentum abominaretur; vel etiam lapidibus obrueret, aut siquid mitius, ecquis huc vincula et compedes, exclamarent; ut Romani olim, Claudii quodam aulico ad concionandum misso, "Io, Saturnalia!" repentè clamabant. Nam servis Romæ, nisi festis Saturnalibus, liberè loqui non licebat. "Nos," inquis, "super dejectos cantando epiniceia triumphamus." Rectè quidem super hostes qui propter commoda quædam sua cum tyranno conjurati, patriam ad servitutem redigere conabantur: et epinicia nos quidem minimè omnium superbè cantamus, Deo semper gloriam tribuimus. Verùm quid sibi volunt "epiniceia" tua, Bardocucülle? An quia tam strenuè pergræcari solitus es, Græcè idcircò intelligere te putas? "Angit" Miltonum, inquis, "quòd Salmasius extraneus aliquam notitiam caperet illarum rerum, quæ nunc fiunt in Anglia:" non quòd "notitiam caperet," sed quòd rerum nihil ad se pertinentium arbitrum se faceret, veritatem turpissimis mendaciis perverteret, quos non norat, in eos convitiis et contumeliis inveherctur. "Fures," inquis, "lucem timent." Tu igitur fur omnium pessimus, qui lucem times et nomen celas. Sacra etiam impuris manibus attrectas. Prov. 29. Cùm boni regnant, populus gaudet; cùm mali dominantur, populus dolet: ea de causa cùm Carolus dominabatur, populus dolebat. Quod omnes satis meminerunt. Neque leve signum est, eos jam gaudere, bonis remp. gerentibus; Carolum enim filium, etiam cum exercitu jam venientem, et libertatem, qua incedit, omnibus pollicentem, tanquam hostem aversantur ubique, et fugiunt, vi etiam et armis cum summa alacritate propulsant.

Quam autem sis ineptus nunquam clariùs perspicitur, quàm cùm de te loqueris, ut hic. "Fateor," inquis, "ut huic veteratori respondeam, me multò inferiorem bonis omnibus et adjumentis vitæ spoliatum." Quibusnam bonis? Si bonis animi, doctrina et ingenio sis inferior, cur non parem tubi congressum potiùs quæsivisti? Sed is puto es, qui esse doctum, esse eloquentem nihil aliud nisi esse divitem existimes:

ut bonis externis et vitæ adjumentis spoliatus si sis, doctrina quoque et ingenio spoliatus tibi videare. Ais vero tu "bonis omnibus spoliatum te esse?" Callidus nimis es et vafer, cupis celare divitias tuas, verùm non potes. Indicabo ego te et facultates tuas. Præter illa bona, quæ erepta tibi esse dicis, restat adhuc tibi, non enim celabis, ingens, eoque ingentius, quòd nemo tibi eripiet, solœcismorum peculiam; in eo genere divitiarum, neminem te locupletiorem cognovi. Extorrem præterea te esse queritaris; vah quam indigne! Ut perspicias igitur quàm sum pro te sollicitus, est in Cilicia oppidum Soli antiquum, ut perhibent, et satis amplum; illuc omnes qui solœcismos tam strenuè facere solent, coloniam ducunt; sarcinas igitur quàm primùm collige, eò enim te, tuasque omnes facultates suadeo transferas. Permagna ibi te latifundia, mihi crede, manent, immò, nisi fallor, Solœcorum omnium principatum facilè unus obtinebis. Verùm quod nullum tibi unquam fuit (si ingenium dicis quo inferiorem te factum fateris) id tibi nos scilicet eripuisse insimulas. Cùm te contrà ab adversario multas dictiones, et aptè usitata ab eo verba ineptè suffurari non pudeat. "Superbire" Miltonum ais, "nominibus suis et titulis in frontispicio suspensis." Quæ ille nomina præter suum, quos ille titulos in fronte libri suos posuit? An ideo superbus, quia se sui neque nominis neque causæ pudebat? Hæccine tibi "phylacteria" sunt? "Salmasium," inquis, Miltonus, "tanquam anonymum commitiis et scommatibus scurrilibus persequitur:" multò certè sermonis lepore et facetiis in hominem jocatur, tu scurrile quicquam ab eo dictum nequis ostendere. "Sed seculo venturo omnes Miltoni hoc nomine misere vapulabunt, ne fortè" (id est ejus loquela, nisi fortè) "judicet mundus, &c." Quicquid de Miltonis seculo venturo fiat, tu vates ventriloquus et infantissimus fide nulla es dignus. "Sed nil novi viros optimos nomina sua reticuisse." Nempe quia tu ità facis. "Sic sanctus Paulus ad Hebræos;" scripsit enim ad nationem suo nomini infensissimam, de rebus admodum novis et parum creditis; tu verò populo Anglicano, tu exteris tibi et causæ tuæ, ut ipse ais, minimè iniquis, de re notissima, et apud omnes gentes, ut idem ais, receptissima, et tamen malè tibi conscius nomen occultas. "Sic Beza." Rectè meministi, scripsit enim "Vindicias contra Tyrannos," quas tu inter "veritates" illas, "quæ, ut nunc temporis, vix hiscere audebant," recenses. "Virtus," inquis, apud nos "vitio vertitur." Quia Brammali scilicet virtutes, ebrietas, voracitas, alea, scortatio, vitia habentur. "Sed Cantabrigia et Oxonium suis invictis declarationibus se ab hoc crimine liberarunt." At invictæ illæ declarationes fatuitatis et væcordiæ facilè evincuntur: academiarum enim non erant, sed prælatorum factionis, quæ ibi reliqua erat. Rectiùs nunc sapiunt academiæ. "Genevam," inquis, "Deodatus" hoc crimine "liberavit." Solus fortasse sensum ille suum, non totius academiæ judicium explicavit. "Leydam quoque Salmasius." Non Leydensis tamen, sed externus. Leydenses libertate priùs recuperata, quàm literis clari erant.

"Tot ergò doctorum et bonorum agmine circumvallatus," vix uno videlicet atque altero, "faciam rem non difficilem, causam Dei omnipotentis dicturus." Dei nimirum tui, hoc est ventris, aut Bacchi, qui tibi omnipotens est; cujus auspiciis Brammalus

> Grammaticus, geometra, minister, alipta, sacerdos,
> Augur, scœnobates, medicus, magus, omnia novit.
> Brammalus esuriens, in cœlum, jusseris, ibit.

Sed eodem credo successu, quo grammaticatur. Nam "in tantam crevit audaciàm, ut quicquid libet dicere, licet:" hæc ejus syntaxis est. "Sed" Miltonus "monarchiam è mundo tollere laborat." Dic ubi? Omnibus enim populis semper hoc liberum reliquit, sive monarchiam vellent, sive aliam regiminis formam; tantummodò nolentibus imponi noluit. Ad solœcismos tuos redeo, qui jam vix intermittunt; "Quidni Salmasio non pepercit rabula? Videtur tamen sua canina ferocia catenis vinctus vel potiùs vinciendus, qui omnes undique mordit." Unde tibi isti nitores orationis et lumina, Brammale? Fieri non potest, quin omnes obscurorum virorum epistolas et loculos expilaveris. Crimini das Miltono, "quod is in partem adjutorii" (ejus enim barbarismis utor) "Deum vocet." Facis ut te decet episcopum atheum et prophanum. Sed miraris "qua fronte" Miltonus "ausus est dicere," se "hæc, jubente parlamento, evulgasse." Primum Miltonus hoc nusquam dicet; sed dixisse finge, ut certè fingis, quid tu contra? "Si vera," inquis, "narrat, ubi Brown, vel Elsing, vel Scobel, clerici parlamentariorum?" Næ tu homo verè minutulus es, et nullius pretii: nihilne putas jubente atque etiam libente parlamento prodire in lucem posse, nisi cui nomen clerici parlamentarii adscribatur? Mirum est tot tibi nugas cogitanti non hoc etiam in mentem venisse, quod vulgò dicitur,——

> Clericus in libro non valet ova duo.

Præsertim cujus tu farinæ clericus es, qui mediocriter saltem Latinè non intelligis; si enim intellexisses, non hæc ejus verba, "quæ authoritate parlamenti scripta et declarata sunt," de ejus libro dicta existimares, verùm de publicis parlamenti scriptis, et declarationibus passim editis. Neque te quicquam ex verbis ejus lucratum esse censisses, quamvis quod dixisse eum falsò accusas, "factionem" rempubl. dixisset; factionem enim tam in bonam quàm in malam partem olim dici vel pueris notum est. Progrederis deinde. "Una factio erat et armis se tuetur (non jure) tui." Quid tu hic tibi velis? Si capis ipse, bene est, ego quidem non capio. Ut nec sequentia tua de "parlamento supremo, concilio summo, de grammatica" denique "comparandi gradibus laborante." Id te angit potius quòd hierarchia tua gradibus laborat. "Hunc," inquis, "honorem Deo ceditis, ut dum vos vestris mundanis gaudeatis, nè minimam religionis aut animarum curam suscipere velle, palàm profitemini." En iterum fœde solœcum! Sed sane dignum est, et tu, qui animarum cura quid sit, nunquam scivisti, eam civili gladio commissam crederes. Nos verò, ais, "magno impetu prosternimus veræ religionis cultores." Hostes quidem civiles et proditores, religionis autem cultores, religionis causa non prosternimus. "Salmasium" deinde crepas: tace de Salmasio, ille suos patitur manes, et in Suecorum aula jam diu friget. Sed Miltonus, ut omnes respublicas et "illustrissimos etiam Hollandiæ ordines" in partes suas pelliceret, "illorum principi" oblatrat. Advertite Hollandi, principem nuper mortuum, vestrum principem appellat, nec vos quidem liberos esse patitur. Cavete, dum licet, ne pervagante hujusmodi aulicorum doctrina elatus, alter quispiam apud vos princeps ac dominus succrescat. Tandem "præludium" hoc grandi solæcismo pene claudit, "hæreditarium regis imperium, cui totus populus per multos annos juratus consenserunt." Vos lectores eruditi, quotquot literas humaniores amatis, præfantem hunc Bavium, immò barbarum, odio quo dignus est, et sibilo prosequimini.

CAP. I.

Præludiis amotis fabulam expectabamus, promissas nimirum illas Miltoni confutationes. Et certè hoc sensu revera fabulam agit; eorum enim quæ promisit, nihil præstat; sed partim maledictis, partim insulsis regiæ fortunæ miserationibus totum hoc caput exhaurit. "Non sum," inquit, "tam audax Phormio, ut Salmasio me compararem, quàm Miltonus, qui se Salmasio opponere auderet." Næ tu Phormio quis fuerit in comœdia parùm videris intelligere. At quid ais? "Miltonum Salmasio opponere se audere," grammaticorum Pyrgopolynici? Facinus ingens narras. "Nam si authoritate," inquis, "dirimenda lis sit, plus fidei uni Salmasio, quàm mille millenis Miltonis omnes ingenui et docti darent." At verò qui authoritatem vel Salmasio vel Miltono dant, nisi quam eorum alteruter ratione et argumentis sibi acquirit, ipsi neque docti, neque ingenui sunt. Miltonum exteris antehac ignotum veritas et ratio commendavit: Salmasium inane nomen, et multæ lectionis opinio commendare sine ratione non valuit, quin ab amicis etiam ejus, et fautoribus longè inferior in hoc certamine sit judicatus. Tu totam de patribus disputationem satis callidè abs te amoves, et quos nunquam consulueris. "Miltonum in plurimis Salmasio castigandum relinquis." Munus profectò satis arduum Salmasio reliquisti, qui Miltoni responsum cùm legeret, ita, ut videtur, perculsus est et quatefactus, ut, soluta alvo, in latrinam putem confugisse: unde scripsit ad amicos, cacabundus in hæc verba: "Ego istum Miltonum permerdabo et permingam." Balistam satis validam in postico geras oportet, Salmasi, qua merdas tam longè contorquere aut explodere te posse putas. Hinc est quòd tam fœtida meditantem jam diu in aula Sueciæ fœtere te dicant: neque mirum est, si Sueciæ regina, quamvis opinione vulgi primùm decepta, nunc suo acri judicio compertum te et cognitum tam olentem Mævium à se abjecerit. Ferunt alii, cùm paginam unam atque alteram responsi illius percurrisset, furore correptum sic subitò rodomontari cœpisse. "Ego perdam istum nebulonem et totum parlamentum." Hæc verba ipsius ad nos delata retuli; et sanè si istiusmodi homo est, non is idoneus qui castiget alios, sed qui ipse castigetur, in phreneticorum potiùs gymnasium deportandus. Progredere, "prætermissis," ut ais, "oratoriis et verisimilibus et Cicerone, Aristotele, Euripide, Sophocle, et aliis ethnicorum scriptis. Non enim Christianis necessariò recurrendum est ad ethnicos." Nescis ergò Salmasium tuum hanc priùs affectasse viam? Miltonus eò tantùm adversarium secutus est provocantem. Tu verò interim hypocrita ignaviæ tuæ consulis, qui cum nullum sanè bonum, aut facundum authorem unquam attigeris, id studio pietatis non fecisse te simulas. Miltonus aiebat, "pater nos genuit, non rex." Tu inde nomen patris à specie ad numerum detorques, ut captiones hinc quasdam et amphibolias frigidissimas consuere possis; quas ne recitatione quidem dignas existimo, adeo sunt ineptæ et mucosæ. "Si verò," inquis, "rex juvenis uxorem ambiens papam patrem sanctissimum appellaverit, non tam acri censura perstrigendus." Sic Zimri juvenis Moabissam uxorem ambiens à religione vera defecit; an excusatior idcirco est? "Probabile," verò, ais, "esse quòd literam secretariis suis scribendam commisit." Eò magis culpandus, qui rem tanti momenti, quæque religionem atque honorem suum in dubium vocare poterat, secretariis tam minimè probis commiserit. Verùm et nos "regem Hispaniarum regem Catholicum" appellamus. Istarum literarum exemplar æquum est te proferre, si potes, sicuti nos regis ad papam protulimus. "Et quidni," inquis, "papam patrem sanctissimum appellaveritis, si in politicis vobiscum sentiret." Sic scurræ solent deprehensi; quod se fecisse constat, id alios facere velle calumniantur. Hos mores scurrarum lepidissime depingit Plautus:

> Nihil est profecto stultius atque stolidius,
> Neque mendaciloquius, neque perjurius,
> Quàm urbani assidui cives, quos scurras vocant;
> Qui omnia se simulant scire, nec quicquam sciunt,
> Quod quisquam in animo habet, aut habiturus est, sciunt, > Quæ neque futura, neque facta sunt, tamen illi sciunt.

"Si hos vermes," ais, "regum auribus insidiantes, et velut intus existentes, prohibent alienum, ut neminem sibi fidelem audire poterat, rex radicitus extirpasset, &c." Credo istos vermes et auribus et cerebro tuo insidiantes, grammaticæ rudimenta, siqua tibi insculpta erant, penitùs exedisse. Rursus "Deodatum" affers, "qui regem nostrum unicum reformatæ religionis defensorem insignivit." At, inquam, longius abfuit Deodatus, quam ut Carolum in cute nosse posset; ne dicam clausisse oculos, si post Rupellenses reformatos tam à Carolo præclarè defensos hoc dixerit. Sed pergis, "vobis qui Carolum è mundo sustulistis, tandem redeundi patet via in Ægyptum, ex quo ægrè detinemini." Eja solorum decus, quàm te jam in municipio tuo solensi oblectas, à quo nemo te possit detinere, ne si furca quidem expelleret. Miltonus, ais, "nec locum, nec librum, ubi à se prolata" è summorum theologorum libris "inveniemus, exhibet." At ista loca Miltonus facilè protulisset, nisi ipse Salmasius adversos sibi plerosque reformatos theologos haud uno in loco fassus esset; quæ tamen loca eorum scripta legentibus ita passim occurrunt, ut hinc tua potiùs ignorantia constet, qui neque illos, neque ipsum Salmasium prælegisse videris. Jam "Davidis" exemplum omnibus notum narras. Rationes autem illas, quas attulit Miltonus; cur exemplum illud ad causam hanc non pertineret, non attingis; tantummodò unctum Domini, unctum Domini ingeminas. Dic sodes ergò, estne omnis rex unctus Domini? Omnis, ais, præsertim Christianus. Cur ergò dux Josua quinque unctos Domini uno die suspendit? Nam Christianos si dices non fuisse, ridiculum est; quandoquidem Christianum profiteri, cùm sit maleficus, neminem supplicio debito eximere potest. "David," inquis, "viam nobis monstravit tolerantiæ, ut Deo judici relinquetur, qui impœnitentem percutiet, ut morietur." Quid me cogis? defessus jam penè sum, solenses tuas delitias perambulando. Ad Davidem recurris; Salmasio responsum erat eadem inculcanti, Davidem privatum privatas injurias ulcisci noluisse. Tu parlamentum omne privatum esse dicis, regem Carolum, unctum Domini fuisse; nihil tamen horum probas; nihil ab adversario dictum cum ratione oppugnas. "Si ex aura populari," inquis, "diademata regibus auferenda, quis non vellet se ex infima plebe terræ filium potius esse quàm regem?" Id noli timere; utcunque non deessent reges. Neque te, credo, hoc deterrebat, quò minùs episcopatum turpiter ambires, quamvis populo invisum. "At Miltonus," ais, "dum potestatem populi in reges suos imprudenter prædicat, reges omnes esse tyrannos instruit." Sic sanè ut lex instruit homicidas, quia vetat.

> "—— Jam Troja maneret," ais,
> "Consilio Priami si foret usa senis."

At verò noster Priamus, vel Paris potiùs, non Trojæ usus consilio, sed Helenæ suæ, et se perdidit et regnum suum. Jam ordine perrupto ad nonum puto vel decimum caput excurris. Miltonum, ais, asseruisse, "nullum membrum parlamenti absque proprio consensu in judicium vocari posse, regem" autem tu saltem "membrum" parlamenti esse dicis. Præpropere tu quidem id ibas petitum, quod nusquam erat, neque à quoquam, quod memini, unquam dictum. Hoc etiam responsum tulisse regem, cùm quinque membra posceret falsissimum est, quòd ex illa re gesta satis liquet. "Nosti," inquis, "quod nisi à sicariis vestris impeditus populus esset, regem è vestris manibus eripuissent." Verum quos tu populum esse existimas, nos non putamus. An vero regiorum gregem illum perditum, toticsque domitum, populum appellas? Nos ita non existimamus: victi bello, quod ipsi intulerant, jus populi amiserunt. Miltonum gravitur accusas, quod dixerit, Salmasium regis mortem ineptè plorantem, legentium neminem pilo tristiorem reddidisse. Non ergo in Miltonum, sed in stolidissimas conducti ploratoris nænias culpam conferre debes.

> Men' moveat quippe, et cantet si naufragus, assem
> Protulerim. ——— Verum: nec nocte paratum
> Plorabit, qui me volet incurpasse querelæ.

"Majori patientia," inquis, "ferunt episcopi convitia tua." Episcoporum sanè patientia omnibus nota est. Hic verò quasi interno dolore perculsus, magno fervore et conatu, episcoporum cæremonias et ambitiones asserere contendis. Unde apertiùs licet conjicere, te Brammalum lurconem illum quem antea diximus esse, qui episcopos combibones, et commessatores tuos, belli civilis faces, tam gnaviter defendis. "Quot duxerit Hippia mœchos," inquis, "innumerabiles sunt." At multò magis innumerabiles, quot Brammulus fecerit mœchas. "Sed rex noster," ais, "templa nostra decenter ornavit et honoravit in honorem Dei, nunquam in equorum stabulos convertebat." Nunquam, mihi crede, templa vestra tàm "decenter ornavit," quàm tu Solorum templa egregiis tuis ornasti solœcismis, quorum monumenta sane sempiterna nunquam interibunt. Te Deum omnes solœci, te patronum tam præclare de illo municipio meritum colent posthac in secula, et invocabunt; in memoriam etiam eloquentiæ tuæ tam asininæ, non scholas discipulis tuis, sed "stabulos" dicabunt. Regem autem vestrum aio minimè omnium "templa" ornasse, sed ipsum potius in equorum stabula, atque in haras etiam convertisse, dum tot immundos prælatos, tot porcos episcopos, te denique spurcissimum in Ecclesiam introduxit.—"Regias" jam "partes agi," dicis, si Presbyterianos graviùs incusemus. Nec tamen Christus ipse et Apostoli, falsos Evangelii doctores, fratres subdititios, religionis prætextu Ecclesiæ insidiantes, mitiùs olim increpabant.—An ergò dicta eorum aut scripta "digladiari in se invicem" dices, quòd suos vel libentes, vel deficientes à fide atque integritate liberrimè reprehenderent? "Ubi mutatur forma reipublicæ ex monarchia in aliam, non datur successio, &c." Non hunc Miltonus solùm, sed Salmasius "obicem Carolo secundo" posuit; ejus enim verba sunt, si advertisses. Verùm tu, aut cœcus aut demens, in socios pariter ac hostes incurris. "Tanta," inquis, "illorum astutia omnia obliterata sunt, ut conclamatum est de viribus humanis; sed nos qui per fidem in Deum expectamus resurrectionem futuram, &c." Apage sis temulente. Quid tibi aut vinolentiis tuis cùm fide, quem si porcula tua majora ita consopirent, ut resurgere nunquam posses, feliciùs profecto consultum tibi foret. "Scires libenter quid per populum" velimus. Scirem ego vicissim, quid Romani per senatum populumque Romanum voluerint. Quæris "quod remedium restat populo contra tyrannidem parlamenti." Tum id quoque dicam, cùm causæ quid erit; nunc supervacua ne quære.

CAP. II.

Definierat Salmasius regem "Deo solo minorem, legibus solutum; si nostram rempub. sic definiret aliquis," consensuros nos esse ais, qui tamen regis illam definitionem oppugnavimus. Institutum hoc tuum esse video, cùm refutare nihil possis, posse saltem calumniari. "Et qui penetrabit" Miltoni "scripta," inquis, "nil præter barbariem et insaniam inveniet." Dirumpi ergo nécesse est te, qui tot viros doctos et probos de Miltoni scriptis longè aliter sentire, invitus quotidie cernis. Barbariem verò tu cuiquam impudentissime? quem præter linguæ fatuitatem, cùm sensus belluini et stupor, tum etiam mores in ipsa vastitate barbariæ natum atque nutritum clamant. Utcunque tamen siquid affers audiamus. "Petrus supremum vocat regem." Supereminentem quidem vocat; idque vulgari potiùs loquendi more, quàm verè politico, pro eorum captu ad quos scripsit. Sic consul Romanus ὕπατος est vocatus, id est supremus, quo modo et Poloniæ rex, et dux Venetiarum supremus vocari potest; qui tamen, si politicas rationes accuratiùs inire volumus, et multorum instituta regnorum, supremi non sunt. Ita igitur supremum vocâsse regem Apostolus censendus est, ut tamen leges cujusque gentis, et jura, et reipub. formam inviolatam esse vellet.—Et certè non tam supremus quis sit, docet aut disputat, quàm quas ob causas et quatenus obedientiam sive supremis, sive præsidibus præstare debeamus: id Miltonus copiosè explicuit; tu nescio an tuæ conscientia vecordiæ, consultò prætermittis. "Quasi," inquis, "triginta Athenis tyranni non plus poterant in damnum populi, quàm unus si maximè tyrannus esse voluerit." At inquam ego contrà, nullus unquam fuit unus, "si maximè tyrannus esse voluerit," quin tyrannos non triginta solùm, sed trecentos, atque etiam multò plures in damnum populi constituere soleret: frustra igitur sub uno sive monarchia, tyranno melius populo fore speras: nullus enim in republica tyrannus unquam unus fuit, quin plurimos sibi adsciscere tyrannos necesse habuerit. "Rex si abutetur," inquis, "potestate sua in regni detrimentum, à suis subditis impediri potest et debet." Rectè concedis: sed quousque impediri possit ac debeat non dicis. Potest enim tyrannus eousque procedere in detrimentum regni, ut nisi vim vi repellamus, eumque pro hoste habeamus, impedire nullo modo possimus. Concedis igitur ipse, et frustra contendis veritate victus, sed videri concedere non vis, pertinaciæ studiosior, quam veritatis; nam quod impediri ais tyrannum debere, "non in judicium trahi et capite plecti" vel "ab uno" vel "ab omnibus," sed "Dei judicio relinquendum esse," nugæ sunt, et gratis dictæ; quæ singula, non affirmanda, sed probanda tibi restant. Vis monarchiam reipublicæ forma esse perfectiorem. Id nos in præsentia non agimus. Tua tamen argumenta, quoniam vacat, videamus. "Introductam à Deo" dicis "in ultimum et præstantissimum remedium populo toties ab inimicis subacto sub judicibus."—Primùm cur illud præstantissimum remedium non primò potiùs, quàm ad ultimum adhibitum fuerit, cùm Deus rempub. suam quam præstantissimis legibus formaret; deinde cùm Israëlitæ regem peterent, pòst annos circiter quadringentos sub judicibus exactos, si monarchia præstantissimum illud remedium Deo visum est, cur ab ea dissuaserit populum suum ac deterruerit, solum. Cur denique petentes eos peccati gravissimi reos fecerint, fac quæso intelligamus: "quòd Theocratiam," inquis, "rejicerent," nempe sub judicibus. At verò illi non minùs in monarchia theocratiam retinere poterant, ac debebant; sin minùs, tu monarchiam dum præstantissimam esse dicis, non theocratiam sed atheocratiam cave dixeris; in qua Deus tam præsens regere suum populum quàm sub judicibus non potuit. Certè si gubernantibus illis theocratiam in republica fuisse dicis, ut certe fuit, haud aliam gerendæ reipublicæ formam præstantiorem, ut sunt res mortalium, invenire quisquam poterit. "Respondeat mihi," inquis, "tuus populus Anglicanus, utrùm ligneo Caroli jugo excusso, aliquam miseriarum relaxationem inveniant." Respondet itaque jugum se Caroli ferreum à conscientiis suis depulisse, jugum idem episcoporum; sua vectigalia, suosque census non nunc aulicæ luxuriæ, et libidinibus, sed vincendis hostibus et propagandis imperii finibus ultrò se impendere "Leges," ais, "Mosi et regibus à Deo datas quibus regant populum; num populo lex data, ut reges regeret?" Immò apertè leges tam Mosi et regibus, quàm cætero populo sunt datæ, ut tàm se, quàm populum regerent; sin minùs, ita ut regerentur ab aliis, ut ne lex Dei cuivis mortalium frustra daretur. "Quis gerit," inquis, "gladium? populus?" Immò populus per magistratum, quem sive unum sive plures ex omni suo numero elegerit. Neque ullas propterea confusiones, quas metuis, excitari necesse erit. "Si vel pedem," inquis, "figeres," de regibus actum erit δός ποῦ στῶ καὶ τὴν γῆν κινήσω. Utinam pedem ipse tandem figeres, Silene, si Brammalus es. Nam nos locum, ubi stes ebrius, dare non possumus, quin ea quæ fixissima sunt et firmissima, tibi in gyrum moveri, et cum cerebro tuo semper madente circumnatare videantur. "Quis te," inquis, "juramento regi præstito liberare potuit?" Juramentum ipsum, quo regi non propter regem, sed reipubl. causa, obstricti fuimus; quam cùm perditum iret, et suum ipse prius jusjurandum violavit, et nostrum solvit. Nihil enim naturæ, nihil rationi aut gentium juri contrarium magis esset, quàm si regi jusjurandum suum violare ad libidinem liceret, populus servare fidem ad perniciem suam teneretur. "Ut dicto audientes Mosi fuimus, ita erimus tibi, modo Deus tecum sit, quemadmodum fuit cum Mose." Sic Reubenitæ ad Jehosuam. "Conditionem hic nullam" vides "expressam." Ad Anticyras ergò naviga, aut domi crapulam edormisce; cras, mihi crede, nihil expressius videbis, neque tam stultè interrogabis, "quid si Deus Josuam desereret," sed quid si Josua Deum desereret: tum enim quid facturi essent Reubenitæ, tibi respondebimus. "Nutare mihi crede jus regium videtur." Hoc de jure regio, prout Salmasius describit, dictum est. Neque est hoc "monarchiam legitimam in Carolo trucidare," quod tu toties invidiosè et parasiticè vociferaris. Nunc quod minimè es, vatem scilicet et concionatorem piissimum multis deincèps verbis agere cupis; dumque adulterum videri te metuis, profers adulterinum. "Digitum Dei agnoscimus et veneramur punientem ingratum populum." At populo benè est et prosperè, quem tu nequicquam ingratitudinis accusas; tu potiùs Dei digitum agnosce, te tuosque unà cum omnibus tyranni fautoribus insigniter punientem. "Nondum," ais, "Hispania et Pontificii velum abduxerunt." Quid nobis Hispaniam et Pontificios toties immeritò objicis; qui non ignoremus Carolum tuum minorem in Belgio commorantem legatos ad Papam misisse, ut vel ab ipso Antichristo rex reformatus contra patriam et reformatos auxilium imploraret? "Persecutio," inquis, "jam in Anglia maxima est, quæ fuerat à tempore quo populus aliquis inhabitabat." An major ea quam Brammalus in Hibernia nuper excitavit, qui curiam inquisitionis, conscientiis hominum tàm infestam et tyrannicam, primus omnium in Hiberniam introduxit. Te verò illum ipsum fuisse sequentia clariùs ostendunt. In hoc enim jam totus es, ut Ecclesiasticam tyrannidem defendas. "Nam quod tanta," inquis, "jam patimur, hæc est ratio præcipua, quod in aliquibus Anabaptistarum et cæterorum omnium schismaticorum clamoribus viam concedentes, uno dato absurdo sequuntur infinita." Ipsissimus hic Brammalus ille antiquum obtines, qui reformatis omnibus schismaticorum nomine infamatis omnem conscientiæ libertatem adimere perpetuò studebas. Nunc illorum importunitati, id est, conscientiæ, etiam nonnulla unquam concessa fuisse gravitèr doles. "Reges Anglorum judicari posse à suis subditis," Miltonum ais docere, "exemplo pravorum temporum, et jure à sapientibus damnatis chartis obsoletis, et ob multas corruptiones meritò explosis." Quid isto hominum genere absurdius aut impudentius? quærunt modò quo jure, quâ lege factum quidque à nobis sit, si leges non recitamus, contra eas fecisse nos judicant; si leges nostras proferimus antiquas, ratas, atque notissimas, hi statim "obsoletas et meritò explosas" esse aiunt: nec tamen quo tempore explosæ aut abrogatæ fuerint, usquam ostendunt. Ita, dum tyrannidem sine autoritate asserere cupiunt, et vetera et nova pariter rejiciunt. "Quidni," inquis, Uzzias rex leprosus "à sacerdotibus templo deturbaretur, cum Deus lepræ probendæ, et leprosi omnis excludendi potestatem et mandatum sacerdotibus dederat." At verò idem Deus, lex eadem omnis malefici puniendi potestatem et mandatum magistratibus dederat, neque magis tamen leprosi regis exturbandi, quam malefici regis puniendi vel hîc vel illic mentio facta est. Si lepræ judicio regem eximi non vis, quia nominatim non excipitur, eadem certè ratione neque ullis aliis legibus aut judiciis regem exemeris. Sed video quid agitis, ut regem quamvis vestrâ sententiâ supremum, vobis tamen sacerdotibus subjiciatis, utque rex in populum absoluto atque supremo dominaretur imperio, vos sacrificuli supremo superiores eodem imperio dominaremini in regem. "Consensus," inquis, "populi et inauguratio tantum adjuncta necessaria fuere." Hoc in Saule, Davide, ejusque posteris concedo, de quibus nominatim creandis Dei mandatum præcesserat: tu idem de Carolo aut ullis ejus majoribus ostende. "Rex," ais, "nunquam pepigit cum populo, ut illi eum castigarent si aliter quàm bene regeret." Neque populus cum rege pepigit, se illi, quicquid collibitum est facienti, in perniciem suam obtemperaturos. Neque verò in privato quovis syngrapho, ullus unquam pepigit ut creditoribus liceret, si is debitum non solveret, lege in eum agere, et in carcerem conjicere, ejusque bona possidere, quoad plenè sibi satisfactum esset. Hæc et istiusmodi quæ accidere nollemus, in pactionibus et fœderibus vel honoris causâ vel boni ominis consulto non exprimimus; quia cum paciscimur, talia nunquam eventura optamus; quæ etiam sine monitis intelligere per se quisque et cavere debet. Tu hic tritum illud ingeris; "per me reges regant;" fatemur, sicut et per eum sunt, agunt, et moventur omnia: tu "modo peculiari," inquis. Tu, inquam, de tuo hoc dicis, autoritatem verbi divini nullam affers. Subjicis, "alioqui cui fini illa præcepta obedientiæ in Novo Testamento?" Quoties tibi respondebitur, obedientiam absurdam et irrationabilem in Novo Testamento non præcipi; sed qualis ea, et quibus, et quam ob causam præstanda sit, luculentissimè doceri. Qui habet aures, audiat. "Qui repugnant," inquis, "damnabuntur, quod proculdubio nunquam minaretur Apostolus, si privatorum tantum rationem vel paucorum habuerat." Quasi verò multi privati sine magistratuum authoritate seditiosi esse non possint; quid hoc ad populum cum magistratibus et Parlamento contra tyrannos arma sumentem? "Hoc honore Deus dilectos suos decoravit, ut gentium reges vinculis coercerent, &c." Id fieri dicis "Evangelicis non legalibus catenis." Insipidè prorsus. An vindicta ergò sic exercetur in gentes? An ferreas compedes Evangelii vincula sunt, quas Psalmus ille regibus et proceribus minatur? Tu hoc, ut soles, de sacerdotibus, non de bonis magistratibus et populo intelligi vis, qui pontificale quoddam regnum tuorum in omnes Laïcos futurum somnias, "Israelitæ," inquis, "quia regem rejecêre, à Salmansore in captivitatem sunt abducti. Judæi, qui regi Rehoboamo fideles manserant, sub illius tutela securi vivebant." Historiam sacræ Scripturæ si consuluisses, non nescires Hierosolymas sub ipso statim Rehoboamo à Sesako Ægyptiorum rege captas, et thesauris suis spoliatas, longè priùs quàm Israelitæ in captivitatem abducerentur. "Jeroboamo Deus decem tribus assignavit, quod de vestra repub. nobis non constat." Tam nobis, inquam, de nostra repub. quàm vobis de vestro Carolo: immò longè plùs. "Vestros," inquis, "Capnomantes et Entheos pro Dei vatibus non recipimus." Neque nos te præsertim aleatorem, ebriosum, et scortatorem episcopum: cujus vaticinia hoc capite solœcorum floribus ornatissima in gratiam tui studiosorum, nequid tàm emuncti authoris desideraretur, huc in fine congessimus. "Aristocratia nonnunquam cachistocratia dicenda." Tàm orthographicè hoc abs te quàm etymologicè est dictum, siquidem duo contraria simul vera esse possunt. "Spes nulla restat ut in pristinam felicitatem restituamur. Nec dubitamus quin plus apud Deum valebunt miseriæ nostræ. Regibus potius mandâsset Apostolus populo obedire, ne solio suo dejiciantur. Non dicimus quin reges tenentur. Velut defessi reformatæ religionis; in aliquibus illis viam concedentes, uno dato absurdo sequuntur infinita, &c."

CAP. III.

"Duobus capitibus à tergo relictis." Etiamne à fuga incipis, tergiversator? At nos non tergum, sed frontem, sed nomen etiam tuum fronti inscriptum maluimus. Manedum igitur, obverte faciem illam insignem Brammaleam, non ferri, sed vini vulneribus sauciam, gemmulis cœruleis, rubeolis, purpureis et purulentissimis bullatam atque distinctam; nam quibus te quisquam felis, nisi si rapinis fugientem insequatur mœchum, nescio. Sed fortasse more Parthico fugiens soles tela conjicere. Conjice ergo. "Qui populo," inquis, "potestatem gladii ascribit, populum impunem relinquere necesse habet; quis enim populum puniret leges transgredientem?" Fateor, siquidem universus peccat, nam universum punire populum, ne rex quidem aut solet aut potest. Non magis ergò necesse est populum impunem relinquere, si populus, quàm si rex potestatem gladii solus habeat; cùm in statu populari pœnis æquè obnoxius quisque sit atque in monarchiâ. "Liturgiam profligavimus." Missale scilicet Papisticum, paucis admodum mutatis, ex Latino duntaxat Anglicè editum, unà cum episcopis qui tam fraudulenter eam et papisticè concinnârunt, quid ni profligaremus? nam et aliam, ut fateris ipse, substituimus, magis videlicet orthodoxam, et verbo Dei consentaneam, ut, qui requirit, habeat, si necesse est, qua salubriter possit uti. "Subjecti estote propter dominum, quamobrem? quia constituitur potestas à Deo ad ultionem facinorosorum, &c." At "Rex, cui subjecti esse jubentur, erat Nero vel Claudius." Generalem doctrinam de magistratu, quis sit aut esse debeat, tradit Apostolus, deque obedientia, quare magistratui præstanda sit, quod tibi satis sit. Nero an Claudius regnaverit, nihil refert; desine tandem nugis istis nos obtundere. "Judæorum," inquis, "cæremoniis et lege judiciaria liberamur." Incassum igitur tu tantoperè laboras, ut nos regii apud illos imperii exemplo in servitutem regibus addicas. "Utcunque," inquis "de Dei instinctu gloriamini, ad tribunal divinum sistendi, respondebitis, &c." Quid alii tunc responsuri sitis, ne sit tibi curæ. Tu, quid de alea, de scortis, de ebrietate episcopali respondebit Brammalus, ipse cogita. Potestates non legitimas, sed quascunque intelligi, ais, ab Apostolo, quia Deus præfecit Saulem et cæteros malos reges Judæis. At verò Paulus de potestate loquitur, quam et summè legitimam describit; non loquitur de viro, qui, à Deo licet electus, si postea nequissimus evadit, et potestatem exercet longè aliam, atque à Deo accepit, et cui duntaxat nos illic obedire jubemur, id sibi, non Deo imputandum erit. "Verisimilius," inquis, "quòd Anglia Carolo filio debellandi, tandem in crepitum putidissimum et ridiculum erupturi sint." Videsne jam ut Deus, omnium rerum arbiter, omen hoc tuum, ventriloque, in te tuosque avertit? Videsne ut ipse tuus Carolus in crepitum evanuit, immò ipse crepitus fieri putidissimus optaret, dummodò ex hostium manibus hoc pacto elabi queat. "Supponemus," inquis, "tuam rempubl. in tyrannidem degenerare, non teneris obedire illorum potestati?" Concede tu priùs, si rex in tyrannum degeneraret, non teneri te regi obedire; tum nos satis maturè tibi de republica respondebimus. "Potuit," inquis, "Apostolus dixisse bonos magistratus." At verò ita dixisse, ex descriptione magistratûs quam ibi posuit, apertè liquet. "Sed nullo," inquis, "argumento fortius evincitur regis potestas, quàm quod Apostoli mandant nullis conditionibus limitatam." At rursus inquam, ipsa potestatis descriptio, quæ copiosissima ibi est, conditiones sapienti abundè suppeditat. "Rex," inquis, "à Deo missus quantumvis malus ferendus, cætera mala in pœnam veniunt." Quasi verò rex etiam malus in pœnam non veniret, quod tibi toties in ore est, "remediis" idcirco vel tuo judicio "auferendus. Multum," inquis, "Miltono debent orthodoxi, quòd tam ridiculam opinionem iis assignaret, populum scilicet universum regi ignavissimo esse parem." Magno sanè acumine mendacium hoc vibras; sed parum inde lucraris. Miltonus enim populum non solùm parem regi, sed superiorem semper affirmavit. Hoc loco sententiam suam non profert, Salmasium tantummodo perstringit, quod ex Sorbonistarum scriptis populum regi vel parem esse negaverit, quem superiorem dixisse oportuerit. Verùm ità miserè cæcutire soles, ut in Salmasium pro Miltono impetum sæpiusculè facias. Hæc præter ineptias densissimas, quas infra omne responsum esse judico, confutationum tuarum in hoc capite summa est; unde otium nobis hic etiam tàm pingue accidit, ut rursus vacet elegantias hominis nitidissimas gleba solorum ubere natas ad ornandas Solœcorum porticus et spatia decerpere. "Tuba sonitum incertum edit, ut nemo se ad colendum Deum præparare potest. Non dubitamus quin multi religionem Christianam amplexi sint. Tanquam nulla erat malorum principum potestas. Non quin Deus omnia ita disposuit. Si enim ad populum provocandum (ut vos primò fecistis ut omnia confundaretis) nemo per diem integrum imperare poterat. Omnes patres nullius æstimat. Sed utinam tam humaniter cum Carolo agere voluistis. Populum contra regem defendere suscipis." Et alia hujusmodi.

CAP. IV.

"In præcedentibus Miltonus leo rugiens, qui reges omnes devoraret, hic draco occultè insidians, et vulpeculam agit, nam quo lapidem non potest, vota jacit." Aut insanit hic homo, aut versus facit, novas chimæras, novas metamorphoσας fingit sibi lymphatus. Certè Miltonus si leo rugiens vobis est visus, facitis haud absurdè, ut id sponte fateamini. Te contrà asinum rudentem prima voce agnovimus, teque risu perinde et fustibus excipimus. "Semper," inquis, "populum in adjutorium vocat Priapus in horto." Quod Priapus in horto, id Brammalus in sacello. Verissimum hoc esse tota ferè Hibernia non ignorat. "Quos populus," inquis, "creat, si nulla Dei ratio habeatur, potiùs obedientiam ab iis postularet, quàm illis præberet." Præter illa quæ prius respondi, qualem requirat obedientiam Apostolus, scias insuper, Apostolos non toti Romano senatui et consulibus, neque magno ullius gentis concilio, aut ullius regni ordinibus conventus legitimos peragentibus obedientiam præcepisse, sed privatis et singulis. Rex verò, ut nosti, singulis quidem major, universis verò minor est. Beneficia deinde Caroli in populum enumeras, quæ nulla unquam exstitere, sed damna potius et detrimenta, et summa planè dedecora. "Unctum Domini," inquis, "vel Christum Domini si dicas Christianum non tam interest." Atqui Salmasius Saulem Christum Domini nuncupaverat. Tibi ut videtur, Saul non solùm inter prophetas sed inter Christianos est Dicitur autem, 1 Reg. 11. Salomon obdormivit, et Rehoboamus regnavit loco ejus. Et hoc, inquis, dicitur, "antequam populus Sechem venit ut illum regem facerent." Hoc verò non aliter dictum fuisse, quàm ut historiæ series manifestior esset, ex primo sequentis capitis versu apparet. Populus enim Sechemum venit, ut Rehoboámum regem constituerent, vel regnare facerent, ut est Hebraïcè; ergo antea certè aut non regnavit, aut in Judæa tantum. "Populum," inquis, "per incendiarios fuisse incitatum, videlicet Jeroboamum et comites suos." At verò Jeroboamus non populum, sed populus illum incitavit. Jeroboamus enim, audita Salomonis morte, adhuc in Ægypto morabatur. Sed Israëlitæ mittentes accersiverunt eum, 1 Reg. 12. Miraris "impudentiam" ejus qui affirmaret, "non vocari rebelles qui in Roboamum arma sumpserunt." Tuam potius non impudentiam solùm, sed impietatem demiror, qui eos rebelles appellare ausus sis, quos Deus eo ipso loco fratres sui populi nominavit. At instas, ibidem etiam dictum esse, "sic rebellavit domus Israel à domo David." At verò verbum hic "rebellavit" mitiùs intelligi pro quacunque defectione, neque in malum sensum rapi debet. Propterea vertunt alii "defecit," non "rebellavit;" cujus enim defectionis authorem se Deus ipse profitetur, scriptura malam et illicitam proculdubiò non dicit. Sic Ezechia verbo non minus duro rebelâsse in regem Assyriæ dicitur; quod tamen ejus factum Deus etiam auxilio cœlitùs misso approbavit. Deus Israëlitis regem petentibus graviter iratus est, quamvis regis petendi, si vellent, ex lege Mosis jus habuerit? Tu, "num irascitur Deus," inquis, "populo petenti quod ad illos jure pertinet." Id, inquam, facilè potest fieri; nihil enim obstat quo minus id ad populum jure pertineret, et tamen irasci Deus illis meritò potuit, quod cùm in eo quod optimum erat acquievisse penes ipsos esset, deterius quod erat anteponebant. Affirmas "Deum graviore pœna puniise rebelles Israëlitas," quippe "veram sui cognitionem ab iis abstulisse." At ubi id unquam legisti, nugator, Israëlitas illam defectionem idololatria fuisse, cùm Deus ipse Jeroboamo mox rebellaturo bona omnia pollicitus sit, seque illi Israëlitas traditurum esse, si ejus præceptis auscultasset, 1 Reg. 11. Sed orthodoxi, inquis, "semper cùm Carolo fuere, nam quicquid moribus peccant nonnulli, inopia coacti, religionem tamen reformatam non deseruerunt." Num verò vestros orthodoxos, cum rege suo, inopia coëgit gentes vicinas ebrio agmine, blasphemo, libidinosissimo ac ferocissimo oberrare, omnique impietatis genere omnes Anglos, tanquam sui similes, infames reddere? "Nobiscum" tua sententia "vitulæ aureæ; vobiscum mensa dominica, oratio dominica, symbolum Apostolorum, decem mandata." Atqui ea ipsa sacra quæ apud vos solos esse inaniter jactas, vobis, pro more vestro, superstitiosè et hypocriticè abutentibus, nihil aliud profecto quàm vitulæ aureæ sunt. "Deum," inquis, "sibi contrarium statuimus." Quidni? An quod argumentum Salmasii nihil valere ostendit Miltonus, idcirco ne Deum sibi contrarium statuit. Dixerat Salmasius, omnes reges esse à Deo; Miltonus non omnes reges, sed omnes regendi formas, salutis causa adhibitas, cujus etiam causa populi conventus, comitia, et consilia habentur. Ergo vel ipsius argumento non magis regi licet resistere populo propter rempubl. convocato, quàm populo licet resistere regi à Deo ordinato, quandoquidem et populi conventus legitimi à Deo quoque sunt ut Sechemi olim contra Roboamum fuisse testificatur ipse Deus. "Utrum," inquis, "ille tyrannus, qui viginti tribus annis regnans, neminem pro sua voluntate mori coëgit; an vos qui inter decem annos regem ipsum et plus quàm quingentos mille hominum trucidastis?" Quid ais, mille quingentos? numerum sane perexiguum narras; neque ullus unquam, credo minori jacturà bellum tàm sævum confecit. Profectò si tam scires latinè quam sis malitiosè loqui, non quingentos mille, sed quingenta millia, opinor te dicere voluisse. Quis verò Carolo pejor tyrannus, quis pœna dignior, qui per tria regna plus decies centena hominum millia partim laniena illa Hibernica, partim bello iniquissimo occidit. Negas quod superiore argumento dictum est, regem non debere populo resistere: negas populum quicquam posse in regem, quia populus "inferior est," rex "superior." At memineris regem naturâ superiorem non esse, sed consensu tantùm est suffragiis populi ad eam esse dignitatem evectum, publicæ salutis causâ; quo ab officio si planè desciveret, superior esse desinit; quia cur esset superior causa nulla ampliùs est. Cùm munus regium perperam administraverat, ob quod munus duntaxat, cum unus è multis primò fuerit, factus omnium supremus est. Ad id quod dixerat Miltonus, non quod Deus jussit tyrannum interimi, ideo bonum erat, sed quod bonum erat, idcirco Deus jussit, tu respondes, "cujus contrarium verum est. Nam quicquid Deus jubet, bonum est, et ideo bonum, quòd Deus jubet." Doctum verò neminem hoc latet, bonum in positivum et morale divisum esse. Positivum est, quod antè indifferens, bonum tunc incipit esse, cum à Deo jubetur. Morale verò bonum, æternum et immutabile manet, sive Deus jusserit, sive non jusserit; bonum hujusmodi est tyrannum perimi: ad quod facinus præclarum ducem illum Jehu, tum fortè nihil tale cogitantem, præ ceteris incitavit. Quod autem ais, "bonitatem à divina voluntate pendere," erras, ut cætera; bonitas enim non minùs de essentia Dei est, quàm ipsa Dei voluntas. Verùm de his nimis multa cùm stolido et idiota. Percurrimus in hoc capite quicquid argumenti vim ullam in se habere videatur, ut bonis viris et intelligentibus quàm maximè satisfiat: cæteris ejus ineptiis et nugamentis qui movetur, eum neque moramur, neque retinemus quo minùs in castra adversarii nostri tàm diserti atque eruditi transire possit; his etiam floribus, sapientiæ et judicii ejus causâ, coronatus, quos hortorum Solensium custos iste ficulneus suorum fautorum capiti nectendos largiter paravit. Olfaciant modo priùs quàm suave olent. "Nil tam horrendum excogitari possit quin laudabile fiet. Populi conventus, comitia, plebiscitus pariter à Deo. Non dicimus quin tyrannus impedire debet. Tu ad Antipodas ablegandus, Londini Constantinopolim. Coronam ad se jure pertinentem poposcivisse. Passa marem, miramur hyænam. Quos tamen rectius sentiisse judicas," cum multis aliis.

CAP. V.

Omissis quæ initio hujus capitis trita jam et toties refutata stupidissimè regeris, venio nunc ad id, in quo levitatis arguis qui dixerit, jus successionis naturâ nullum esse, eo quod "lex Dei primogenituræ legem tulit;" cùm divina autem lege consentire legem naturæ dictum est. Tuum verò erat, non nescivisse quantum inter se differant successio in regnum, et successio in patrimonium: principio enim regnorum, regnandi successio non filio sed dignissimo cuique semper delata est; mox regum usurpatio, non populi consensus filios regum dignioribus prætulit. Hoc etiam turpe et servile est, libera hominum capita inter possessiones numerare, qui profectò dum liberi sunt, hæreditate nemini obvenire possunt. Tuque jus hæreditarium, quicquid garris, ex lege Dei nunquam ostenderis. Nam quod soli testatur Deus Davidi ejusque posteris dedisse se, id universis accommodari regnis aut regibus nullo jure potest. "Jus," inquis, "successionis pacem et concordiam inter homines nutrit; est maxime naturale, ne continuis litibus mundus flagraret." Historias ergo omnium gentium percurre; invenies in monarchia discordias tetriores, bella sæviora, idque sæpius accidisse, quam in repub. Haud raro ipsi regum filii de summa rerum inter se bello acerrimo, mutuaque cæde contendunt. Unde apud Turcas, ubi jus successionis absolutissimum est, nihil ad pacem publicam magis conducere putatur, quàm filio natu maximo regnum ineunte, cæteros fratres interfici. Nonnunquam de successionis jure manifestò non constat, hinc etiam bella sævissima et maximè diuturna, quarum sub regno calamitatum nostra imprimis Anglia testis esse potest. Ità neque monarchia per se neque respub. concordiæ parens est; sed moderatus ubique civium animus et ambitione vacuus. Sed summa authoritas "uni contigit ordinis servandi gratia." At si tyranno, pessimus ille ordo qui omnem ordinem, jura omnia divina et humana pervertit. "Christus," inquis, "suos deputatos et vicegerentes in terris reges posuit." Fatemur, si bonos, tyranni autem quo possunt modo Christi vicem gerere? Interea non nos "contumaciæ," quod ais, sed tu impietatis tuæ Christum vindicem expecta; qui regnum Christi in terris violentum et tyrannicum blasphemus audes existimare: Vicarius enim, non Christi, qui ejus exemplum non imitatur, sed diaboli est. Quod regem deinde confers cum patrefamilias, satis clarè ostensum est à Miltono, jus patris diversissimum esse, et longè antiquius. Cùm autem non solum reges mali, sed mala omnia "in scelerum pœnam, vel ad probandam patientiam nostram à Deo data sint:" eaque omnia justis remediis ab hominibus summa cùm prudentiæ laude amoveri et possint et debeant, solos reges vel pœnæ causa, vel patientiæ ferre, et turpe et ridiculum et extremæ esset insaniæ. "Sed variis morbis laborantibus rex manus imposuit et sanavit; angelum aureum cuilibet ægroto dedit." Sive sanavit, sive excantavit nihil nunc refert; medendi enim dono nunc infideles, ut Vespasianus olim, sæpiùs hypocritæ præditi fuere. Illum angelum aureum, quem singulis ægrotis dedit, non illum fuisse, qui Bethesdæ aquas commovit; nec sanandi vim ullam habuisse, sat scio; quo te aureo scilicet angelo sic opinor stupere, ut ante te Salmasius cœlum illud Caroli aureum et sericum obstupuit, neque hoc cœlo quicquam altius cernere uterque videmini, aut de eo quicquam sublimius cogitare, quàm aureum esse. "Florentissima," inquis, "Romanorum respubl. exactis regibus, nunquam subsistere potuit donec in monarchiam redintegrata fuerit." Quod contra omnium historiarum fidem planè est, quæ testantur omnes, Romanam rempub. sub consulibus et senatûs authoritate ad illam magnitudinem crevisse: sub imperatorum verò luxuria, tyrannide, atque inertia statim consenuisse, imperiumque simul et gloriam belli atque justitiæ in illa libera civitate olim partam sub imperatoribus citò amisisse. "Sed quod Anglia," inquis, "nimio luxu et libertate perdita fuit, non Caroli tyrannidi, sed vestræ nequitiæ attribuendum est." Immo aulæ fœdissimæ, regisque voluptarii atque ignavissimi exemplo rectè attribuimus, ad cujus vitæ rationem quamplurimi sese composuere. Jam regem defendis, qui Ducem Buckinghamiæ veneficii suspectum "legibus eripuit; quasi," inquis, "hoc regibus crimini datetur, quod omnibus natura concedit, ut suos familiares amarent." Itane carnifex? satisne regem excusari putas, quod familiarem illum et amicissimum habuerit, qui patris ejus veneno sublati à supremo regni concilio postulatus esset? At quid poteras in regem atrocius dixisse? "Sed credibile non fuit ducem Buckinghamiæ Jacobo insidias struere velle, qui illum in tantam potestatem evexit." Quin immo satis notum est, mores Buckinghamii Jacobo tandem graviter displicuisse, unde is magnum malum sibi metuens, duas maximè res deinceps agere instituit, ut et patri necem strueret, et filio os sublinirct, ejusque gratiam omni studio captaret; quod sanè, objectis juveni mollissimo voluptatùm omnium illecebris, statim perfecit. Reprehendis, quòd Carolus Neroni collatus sit. "Nam," inquis, "Metropolim vestram non diripuit," scilicet quia non potuit; at qui nunc Scotis, nunc sicariis suis, morem sibi modò gererent, haud semel diripiendam obtulit. Restat ut rosarum hujus Solensium fasciculum in fine exhiberem; et possem quidem ubertim, sed cum viam jam toties digito monstraverim, ubi germinant, ubi crescunt, jucundius fortasse cuique erit proprio ungue decerpere.

CAP. VI.

"Regum et bonorum omnium hoste prostrato (suis telis in faciem suam resilientibus) recurrere coactus est ad elumbes aliquot argutias, et trita argumenta." Prostrato hoste, quis sodes est coactus, egregie solœcista? nomen enim licet attuleris nullum, cognomen certe hoc apud omnes in posterum reportabis. Ain' verò "suis telis in faciem resilientibus?" Si sua sponte, Dedalea pro facto narras, aut Vulcania quædam nova automata? An vero, te retorquente, resiliunt tela illa? Tene ergo illum prostravisse hostem, asine, cujus argumentum vel levissimum omni mole concutere, aut movere loco non vales? Exultantem asinum in apologo herus verberibus malè multavit, quid triumphante hoc asino faciamus? præsertim qui neque purpuram indutus, neque pellem leoninam, sed propria palam scabritie notus, rictu isto asinino, istoque miserrimo clangore atque ridiculo triumphum canere audeat. "Omnes," inquis, "in suis regnis monarchæ absoluti παμβασίλειας exercent, quòd et Galli de suo rege multum gloriantur." Ad scriptores Gallos si recurrisses, Girardum, Hottomannum, Sesellium, plurimosque alios, nunquam id affirmares. Galli liberos se, et verè Francos passim gloriantur: ab omni memoria penes se fuisse, regum salutis omnium causâ, vel eligere vel abjicere. Hac ratione Pipino, necnon post eum aliis imperium Galliæ delatum: quod vulgo notum est. Hac etiam ætate cum multæ civitates, tum etiam Burdegalenses idem sentire sese factis ostenderunt, dum vi et armis vel sui regis vel ejus præsidum παμβασίλειαν et tyrannidem strenuè propulsant. "Si cui Deus vult," inquis, "populus regnum tradit, jam dic aliud de tribus capellis, unde tot quæstiones et lites?" Unde nisi à te, tuique similibus, qui id perpetuo contenditis, ut regnum iis tradatur, quibus populus non vult, ac proinde nec Deus. Deus enim, si cui regnum vellet, facilè perficeret, ut regnum illi traderet populus. Jam tu dic aliquid de tribus capellis. "Quantumvis," inquis, "nummi nobis desint, nunquam tamen deerunt parati ad tuendam veritatem." Nummi quidem vobis et merito desunt, et tamen longe major apud vos virtutis, honestatis, sapientiæ, pudoris penuria est, quàm nummorum. Id quod mores vestri perditissimi exteris jam passim graves et odiosi testantur. Deesse autem non magis nummos quàm ad causam vestram tuendam paratos, argumento ipse maximo es, qui homo indoctissimus cum sis et inertissimus, primus omnium et adhuc ferè solus, ad hoc te munus accinxeris. Dixerat Salmasius, quamvis id falso, "regiminis Anglorum formam non popularem sed militarem esse." Tu hoc Miltonum "concedere coactum esse," dicis: "nec tamen ab Aristotele talem regiminis formam recensitam usque meministi." Vel hinc constat te neque Miltonum attentè satis, neque Aristotelem omnino forsan legisse. Apud Miltonum enim concessionem illam nusquam invenies. Apud Aristotelem στρατηγῶ αΐδίῳ, id est "ducis perpetui," qui in quibusdam civitatibus summæ rerum præficeretur, mentionem sæpè factam esse meminisses. Jam de "diabolo porcos tondente" stolidè nugaris, "ubi ingens clamor, sed nulla lana;" parciùs itaque diabolus porcos suos tondebat, quàm Brammalus oves Hibernicas deglubere consuevit; à quibus et lanam et pellem multo cum clamore populi detrahere solebat. "Scoti," inquis, "inaudito ostracismo Montisrossanum interfecere." Inauditus ille quidem ostracismus qui patibulo homines affigit. Nam vel sciolos non fugit, ostracismum non mortis, sed relegationis genus fuisse. "Reges," inquis, "sub potestate populi collocatos pejori conditione nobis repræsentas, quam ex populo universo perditissimus." At vel ista conditione noli metuere ne qui reges in posterum esse velint; utcunque enim non deerunt reges. Cætera hujus capitis, quà seria, quà ludicra, insulsa adeo et inficeta sunt, ut quamvis nihil mihi tribuam, quod non admodum exiguum sit, pœniteat tamen nonnunquam et penè suppudeat, cum adversario tamen nihili manus conseruisse. Postremò casus sui regis graves sanè et tragicos ad comœdiam redigit. "Jovem" adulterum, "Amphytrionem" maritum, "Mercurium et Sosiam" servos, "super mundi theatrum" agit. Nil possum rectiùs facere quam ut istius modi phrases prætercam: nam in hominem tam stultum et nullius pretii quicquid aut seriò dixeris aut joco, et operam perdideris et salem. Præstat tamen hunc vel incassum defricare, quam responsione licet indignum, nostro tamen silentio tumentem et jactabundum dimittere.

CAP. VII.

Hactenus opusculi tui futilissimi dimidium percurrimus, et quanquam te plùs satis indoctum, insipidum, solœcum, arrogantem, et languidum jamdudum invenimus, tamen quò longiùs procedimus, eo inanior, eoque jejunior semper occurris, et præter adagia quædam et disticha vulgata, quæ memoriter, credo, elementarius puer didiceras, quæque ne negent forte lectores vel semidoctulum te esse, per fas et nefas inserere laboras, cæteram omnem argumentorum, sensûs, Latinitatis perpusillam annonam exhausisse videris. Nihil est igitur in hoc capite quod agam, quàm ut captiunculas quasdam tuas, et gryphos dissolvam, quibus dum adversarium capere te existimas, teipsum capi ostendam. Dixerat Miltonus jure naturali regem quemque bonum senatum vel populum habere sibi semper et parem et superiorem. Ad hæc tu, "quis unquam," inquis, "talia ἀσύστατα audivit? Si par est, non est superior: si superior, non par." Quis plumbeo potuit gladio quicquam acutius? At nescin' quid Lælius ille sapiens apud Ciceronem? Maximum est in amicitia superiorem parem esse inferiori. Quin hic quoque vociferare, "quis unquam talia ἀσύστατα audivit?" Disputatum est à multis, sitne par regi populus vel senatus. Infit Miltonus, utrumlibet regi et parem esse et superiorem. Cur ista negas posse consistere? Certè si juxta regulam, omne majus in se continet minus, superior qui est, nihil obstiterit, quò minùs idem par sit. Jam eccum tibi "nodum hunc sine Œdipo solutum," Dave. Nunc ad secundam hominis tendiculam venio. "Si Davidi privato non licuit Saulem tyrannum interficere, quomodo jam unicuique concedis, si viribus plus valet." Sumis quæ nemo est largitus, tyrannum fuisse Saulem. Non enim qui facta quædam tyrannica in unum atque alterum per iram aut libidinem perpetrat, is statim est tyrannus; ut nec injustus, qui injusta quædam. Sed qui consilio, instituto, viribus, dolis hoc solum studet atque molitur, ut potentiam legibus majorem sibi arripiat, jus omne populi et libertatem subvertat, vindicare se conantibus vim atque bellum inferat, is verè atque propriè tyrannus est; quo in genere nullus unquam Carolo pejor fuit. Qui igitur Davidem privatas adversùm se regis injurias ulcisci noluisse dixit, potuit idem nihil sibi repugnans dicere, tyrannum interficere cuivis licere qui viribus plus valeat. Dixerat Miltonus ad servitutem natas istas nationes quæ talem dominum agnoscant, cui se sine assensu suo hæreditate obvenisse credant. "Ergo," inquis, "tu ad servitutem natus qui Carolum hæreditarium multos annos agnoscebas, aut cum multis aliis dissimulabas." Hanc tu sententiam detruncas, ejus loco subdititia ponis, "quæ regem hæreditarium agnoscunt." Parlamenta autem Angliæ, præterito sæpè hæreditatis obtentu, diadema, cui visum est, suis liberis suffragiis, imponere consueverunt; quod multis exemplis demonstrari potest. Non ergo Angli ad servitutem nati, quod tu nequiter probare niteris, verna Canopi. Quartum hoc est, in quo adversarium cepisse te somnias. Ob eam causam affirmaverat ille, homines in unum primò convenisse, non ut unus omnes insultaret, sed ut quocunque alterum lædente, ne lex deesset neve judex inter homines, quo læsus defendatur, aut vindicetur. Ad hæc tu, "Nemo," inquis, "à te plus petiit quàm tu per lucida intervalla tua sponte concedis." Lucidum certe intervallum vel ad punctum temporis contigisse unquam tibi vix reor, ita semper falleris. Quæ enim petis, non regibus solùm sed magistratibus omnibus concessimus; quorum nihil est quod in tyrannum convenire possit. Legem enim primo constituimus, deinde judicem ex lege rectum et incorruptum. Horum quodcunque petis et impetraveris, tuam causam minimè juvabit.

CAP. VIII.

Quod superiùs prædixi fore, ut post tritas argutias quasdam potius quàm argumenta & aulicorum velitationes toties profligatas, ad summam inopiam homuncio iste redigeretur, neque reliquum ei quicquam fore præter maledicta et rabiem, id hoc capite manifestius liquet. Et sanè ad priora illa quæ attulit, quamquam primò statim conspectu sensûs et ingenii inanissima ubique apparuêre vestigia, tamen quia quandam rationis et argumenti speciem præ se ferebant, utcunque paucis respondimus. In hoc autem capite cùm Miltonus antiquas Anglorum leges ac monumenta regiæ causæ passim tàm adversa diligentissimè protulisset; iste è contrà, cùm neque doctrinam, neque antiquitatem, neque acumen, neque authoritatem ullam, quâ suam tueatur causam, afferre possit, hoc tantùm habet quod respondeat, miserè balbutiens jura illa nostra notissima, vetustissima, et maximè rata, "obsoletâ jam et tineis comesta esse." Verùm non tam dubito quin omnes docti et intelligentes viri huic fatuanti non responderi oportere judicent, quàm vereor ne reprehendant, si insanienti et rabioso operam dedero. Qui verò hujus mendaciis et maledicentiâ à veritate abduci se patiuntur, eos profectò tam parvi pendimus, ut quamcunque ad partem accesserint, susque deque nobis sit; immo contra nos isto animo quàm nobiscum stare malumus.

CAP. IX.

Huic etiam capiti prioris haud absimili responsum prorsus idem conveniet. Nam qui contra legem Dei et naturæ dilucidè explicatam, contra rationes evidentissimas, juraque gentium plurimarum, tum nostræ etiam firmissima, contra testimonia denique optimorum virorum uberrima nihil præter commenta tantùm sua, atque deliria opponere, aut in medium proferre potest, ejus profectò ita disputantis rationem ullam siquis habuerit, certè non doctus, non disertus, non diligens, non acutus, sed malè feriatus duntaxat meritò videatur. Quod autem nos impudentissimè accusare non dubitat, quasi Papæ authoritatem in Angliam reducere meditemur, à quo et dictis et factis abhorruisse semper nos tam palàm omnibus existit, id sanè et ridendum maximè est, tum etiam ostendit quanta cæteroqui cum malitia, quàm nulla cum fide in accusandis nobis versetur, qui crimen omnium judicio à nobis alienissimum, cunctis absolventibus, imputare atque affigere non vereatur.

Ad CAP. X. XI.

De duobus quæ sequuntur capitibus, idem quod de præcedentibus duobus dicendum est. Tenuissimus modò et inanissimus qui fuit, nunc est planè nullus, aut siquid nihilo minus est: hujus igitur inanitati respondere si vellem, responderem certè nemini: quidni igitur conticescam?

CAP. XII.

Jam ad metam enervis et languidus properans solœcista, tamen ut ultimo conatu erigere se paululùm videatur, ad priorem verborum sine rebus prolixitatem et tædium redit. Quare ne quis nos propter virium aut rationis defectum priora capita tanta brevitate percurrisse existimet, aut per ignaviam quicquam remisisse, quæ alicujus modò momenti videantur, non sum arbitratus prætereunda esse, "Parlamentum," inquis, "perpetuum est instar nullius parlamenti; hoc enim est funditùs parlamentum tollere." Ecquem tu jam nisi Carolum ipsum criminaris? Qui ipse parlamentum hoc perpetuum esse jussit, et facto gloriatus, inter ea quæ vocare acta gratiæ solebat, sæpissimè recensuit, non ut populum beneficio aliquo afficeret, sed arte quadam tyrannica dum perpetuum esse juberet, ut quod ex temet ipso jam accipimus, funditus tolleret. Cùm autem "catharticum remedium sit," quemadmodum ais, tolli certè aut dissolvi non debet; donec morbi, quorum remedium est, tollantur, et libertati sua firmitas bonaque valetudo redeat. Siquid nos Carolum peccâsse dicimus; tu verbis totidem, velut amœbæa canens lyturgica, paria commisisse parlamentum accusas, deque Carolo nihil non verum esse concedis, dummodò idem de parlamento occinere tibi liceat: verùm hoc non est Caro-lum purgare, aut noxa eximere, quò minùs meritas pœnas dederit. "Sed antequam parlamentum hoc incœpit, nè verbum," inquis, "vel minima scintilla de Caroli scilicet malefactis eluxit." At verò populi clamores, gemitus et suspiria, partim propter gravissimas tributorum exactiones, partim propter episcoporum persecutiones, tam acerbas, ut multi patriam deserere cogerentur, regia item consilia, edicta, facta, ab ipsis regni ejus initiis, et parlamentorum omnium quæ convocavit intempestiva semper et infensa dissolutio rem longè aliter se habere declarant; adeo ut hac de causa populus, sive prudentiæ regis, sive voluntati diffisus, unicam sibi in parlamento spem, præsidium, refugium, salutem reliquam esse palàm testaretur; unde rex irâ et livore prorsus tyrannico exardescens, ut populi gemitus per vim etiam comprimeret, crudelissimo edicto sanxit, nequis parlamenti convocandi mentionem faceret, donec tandem metu populi ob hæc minimè quiescentis parlamentum invitissimus convocaret. Multa, inquis, "à vobis fingi quis non credet ut crimen vestrum in regem exonerare possitis, numquid tale apparet in ejus libro divinitus scripto?" Malo te libri illius admiratorem esse, quàm me; quid enim habet præter fucos et jactationes inanissimas? Diceres & tu idem, si epistolas ejus prælio Nasibiensi captas, manu propria scriptas et obsignatas, incorrupto et integro judicio perlegisses, ubi se suasque artes tyrannicas non celat. "Independentes" Jesuitis similes esse ais, "qui regem abrogârunt, statum reipub. mutarunt, et tamen professi sunt nunquam sibi in animo fuisse hæc facere." Quid ad nos Jesuitæ? Quasi verò prudentiæ non esset, non Jesuitismi, posteriora sæpè consilia prioribus anteferre, siquidem meliora esse postmodùm didiceris. Primò nobis prodire tenus aliquid visum est, immo magnum tàm ad ecclesiæ quàm reipub. restitutionem; cum à Deo ultra dari sentiremus, an ejus nos præsentiam, et providentiam ad facta tam egregia præeuntem aspernaremur, aut sequi nollemus, ne progressus nostros felices et planè inopinatos, hostis et invidus levitatis et inconstantiæ nomine perstringeret? Sæpè arguis quod parlamentum pro "corpore solo" sine capite sumamus. Verum si metaphoras amovere malles, rectiùs continuò saperes, sciresque parlamentum ejusmodi corpus esse, cui caput adjungi non sit necesse; neque enim vel caput vel cauda, sed commune ac liberum gentis concilium facit, ut parlamentum sit atque dicatur. "Vi," inquis, "hanc infamiam et calumniam apud exteras nationes nobis exulantibus amoveam," scilicet eorum ex numero non esse qui causam regiam latinè sciret defendere, "huic rabulæ respondeo." Egregium sanè responsorem! Tune vero lucifuga verberabilissime præ ceteris electus, qui nos ex latebris aggrederere, et pro tuis omnibus unus responderes? Doctum proculdubio gregem, præclara ingenia necesse est esse, quorum tu ductor es, tam grandis non Arcadicus aut Reatinus, sed solœcus asinus. Latinè tu ut responderes, cujus barbarismis et solœcismis omnes paginæ, ut priorum capitum, sic hujus ultimi, refertæ sunt? "Tam castus ut exemplum præbuit. Tu hæc refricas ut regi convitiare. A famulis rimari. Nisi fulcientur. Tanta caligine, ut justitiam causæ metiuntur. Ne millesima pars petitionum ad eam deferrerentur. Toties purgatum ut nil præter nomen manere potest. Tanto acumine ut maxima pars mundi mirantur ac stupent. Tanto strepitu ut cætera theatra pro tempore silent. Non quin indies precamur. Non mitius eorum consilium interpretarer. Carolum filium reum causatis." Digni profecto regii tam stupido propugnatore, qui, cùm causam nequissimam susceperis tuendam et literas professus, tam illiteratus sis, ab ipsis clientibus tuis quos tui pudeat, ad illa gurgustia et tenebras, unde tam stolidè emersisti cum sibilo et flagris reducendus es; aut certè carnifici potiùs in disciplinam crucis tradendus, ut cum nihil aliud percipere possis, elementa discas patibularia. "Quicquid," inquis, "erravero in hac apologia meæ tenuitati imputandum est." Ita prorsus existimo: at pessimè interim meo quidem judicio consuluit tibi tenuitas tua, quæ te impulit, ut, cui par non eras, oneri succedere auderes, sub quo prætumidum et inflatum eo faciliùs comminui te et frangi necesse erat. Ego certè tenuem te magis an crassum dixerim vixdum scio, ita omni planè dimensione et forma rudis indigestaque moles, vacare mihi videris. Jam te aulici, qui "regis auro vescuntur," si priùs neglexerint, quod miserò quereris, et fame perire sinant, post causam eorum tàm malè et ridiculè abs te defensam multo justius oderint, atque contempserint; nisi fortè periscelide illa regia, quam tanti facis, fauces tuas de rege tam nequiter meritas elidendas potiùs quàm offis aulicis, quas esuris, farciendas putant. Jam præsertim cum à regis laude ad regis et regiorum gravem vituperationem transeas, et nobis ex adversario percommodus repente homo factus sis; testis enim ipse novus accedis, regem suo officio vel imparem fuisse, vel minimè intentum, quod "petitiones" nimirum subditorum raro legeret. "Quod nemo ausus esset de proditoribus queri, proditorum metu," quibus maximè auscultabat: quod "cameraris et famulis" omnia crederet, otio ipse deditus. Unde libet profecto exclamare cum illo sene in fabula:

> "Ita me dii amabunt ut hunc ego ausculto lubens; > Nimis lepidè facit verba" de regiis suis.
> "Neque compellare volo illum, ne desinat > Memorare mores" regis et regiorum.

Eorum enim plurimos qui quidem regis gratia maximè pollebant, eos fatetur fuisse qui commodorum potissimum suorum et libidinum causa regem sequerentur, vel mente captum potiùs, quo vellent, ducerent. Sinam itaque et præteribo, ut et regis perjuria haud minori impietate atque inscitia excusantem, et statim tam acriter damnantem. Neque occurrit præterea quod refutatione illa indigeat. Ad ultimum enim, consumptis in nos maledictis, diris execrationibus, charitatem nescio quam suam ostentare cupit. Verum nos cujus convitia et imprecationes non veremur, etiam vota pro nobis et preces haud pluris æstimamus. Finiam itaque certamen hoc, haud libenter quidem à me cum isto nugigerulo susceptum; solum hoc est in quo si non aliis, at mihimet saltem aliquâ ex parte placeo, eam mihi scribendi occasionem primam oblatam esse, ex qua et patria in se rectum atque pium, et amici gratum senserint.

QUAM diù, quàmque multis de causis instituta à majoribus nostris cum amplissima vestra civitate amicitia in hunc usque diem permanserit, et vobiscum una libenter agnoscimus, et sæpius etiam recolere non est molestum. De eo autem quod ex literis vestris 25 Junii datis intelligimus, homines quosdam nostros non ea qua soliti sunt fide ac probitate in suis apud vos negotiis versari, nos quidem ad certos ejusmodi rerum peritos statìm retulimus, ut in lanarios, cæterosque panni opifices acriùs inquirerent; eamque porrò operam daturos nos esse pollicemur, ut et æqui bonique studium apud nos, et nostra omnia erga vos officia constare sentiatis. Verùm et quiddam est quod etiam à vobis vicissim non nos duntaxat, sed ipsum jus et fas omne postulat; ut nostræ gentis mercatoribus, vestris hospitibus et sua privilegia conservare, et eorum vitam, atque fortunas, prout ea civitate dignum est, vestris opibus defendere velitis. Quod, ut prioribus literis enixè petivimus, ita nunc etiam ut vehementiùs efflagitemus, faciunt quotidianæ mercatorum querelæ, quas ad nos deferunt; suam nimirùm salutem atque rem omnem rursus apud vos in dubio esse Quamvis enim literarum nostrarum quas pridem ad vos dedimus fructum aliquem ad tempus percepisse se fateantur, et ab injuriis nefariorum hominum aliquantùm respirasse, nunc tamen post adventum Cochrani illius in urbem vestram (de quo etiam priùs questi sumus) qui mandatam jam sibi à Carolo defuncti nuper regis filio legationem nescio quam prædicat, se omnibus contumeliis, minis, armis etiam Sicariorum petitos solita vestra defensione atque tutela caruisse. Adcò ut cum unus atque alter è mercatoribus cum ipso etiam societatis præfecto, in navem quandam prædatoriam per insidias abducti essent, cæterique vestram fidem implorarent, à vobis tamen nullum auxilium impetrare potuerint, donec ipsi suo marte mercatores, non sine magno suorum discrimine captos in eo flumine, cujus vestra urbs domina est, ex latronum manibus eripere cogerentur. Quos cum illi bonis auspiciis domum reduxissent, et ab indigna servitute veluti manu asseruissent, captos ètiam piratas ipsos in custodiam dedissent, Cochranum illum perfugam et perduellem eò audaciæ processisse accipimus, ut et prædatores dimitti liberos, et mercatores tradi sibi vinctos postulet. Vos autem etiam atque etiam hortamur et obtestamur, si pactiones, et fœdera, et pervetustum utriusque gentis commercium, id quod petitis, inviolatè servari studetis, ut nostri certum aliquod atque firmum sibi præsidium in vestra fide, prudentia, authoritate collocare demum possint; vos autem uti eos his de rebus benignè audiatis; tàm de Cochrano, cæterisque sceleris illius sociis, quàm de iis qui nuper in concionatorem, impunè adhuc, impetum fecerunt supplicium sumere velitis, aut è finibus exire jubeatis. Neque pulsos atque exules Tarquinios amicitiæ atque opibus populi Anglicani anteferendos existimetis. Si enim per vos non steterit quo minùs reipub. nostræ hostes quidvis licere sibi contra nos in urbe vestra confidant, quàm non tuta aut honesta amplius nostrorum ibi commoratio sit, vos cum animis vestris cogitate. Hæc vestræ prudentiæ et æquitati; vos ipsos Divino Numini commendatos volumus. Valete.

Westmonasterio, dat. Aug. 10, 1649.

Senatui HAMBURGENSI.

PERSPECTA nobis æquanimitas vestra dubiis in rebus nostris, facit nunc ut sanè prosperis, ac benè gestis, de vestra voluntate, et amico in nos animo nequaquam dubitemus. Nos quidem, confecto jam pænè bello, et profligatis ubique patriæ hostibus, nihil æquius, aut ad pacem, remque publicam stabiliendam firmius esse duximus, quam ut illi qui vel libertatem, ductore semper Deo, per nos adepti sunt, vel vitam atque fortunas post belli civilis facinora, nostro dono atque gratia receperunt, nobis vicissim suis magistratibus fidem et officium, solenni, si opus esset, more testarenter, atque præstarent. Præsertim cum tot homines inquieti et inimici, semel atque iterum in fidem accepti, nullum neque domi neque foris perfidiosè agendi, novasque turbas excitandi finem faciant. Itaque formulam quandam sponsionis perscribendam curavimus, qua omnes qui aut munus aliquod in repub. sustinerent, aut legum præsidio muniti incolumitate, otio, cæterisque vitæ commodis fruerentur, conceptis verbis se obstringerent. Hanc etiam per omnes Colonias et quacunque gentium nostri cives negotiandi causa agerent, mittendam censuimus; ut eorum quibus præficimur, fidem, prout decet atque necesse est, explo[illegible]tam et cognitam habeamus. Quo magis mirari subit quod ex urbe vestra mercatores nostri scribunt, sibi mandata nostra per unum atque alterum vestri ordinis exequi non licere. Sanè quod potentissimæ fœderatorum in Belgio provinciæ suarum rerum et rationum consultissimæ, nihil ad se pertinere existimaverunt, si peregrini scilicet Angli debitam suis domi magistratibus in hæc vel illa verba fidem astringant, id quo pacto vestræ civitati suspectum aut molestum esse possit, fatemur planè nos nescire. Verum hoc à privato quorundam sive studio sive formidine profectum, quos errabundi quidam et pulsi patria Scoti, minis dicuntur impulisse, ut mercatores nostros a fide sua nobis obliganda deterrerent, civitati non imputamus. Interea tamen summo vos opere hortamur atque etiam rogamus (non enim mercatura jam, sed respub. ipsa agitur) ut ne quenquam apud vos patiamini, cujus hoc nihil potest interesse, authoritati quam nos in nostros populares, non exterorum arbitrio aut judicio, sed jure patrio obtinemus, suam quamcunque authoritatem interponere. Quis enim non ægrè ferat, si nos vestris hîc Hamburgensibus sua erga vos fide interdiceremus. Valete.

ANTONIUM Aschamum virum probum, eruditum, et luculenta familia ortum, de rebus in commune, tam Hispanorum, quàm Anglorum genti, ut spes est, valde utilibus, ad majestatem vestram legamus. Quamobrem ut ei honestum iter, atque tutum in urbem regiam, sicut moris est, necnon et reditum concedere, et præstare velis, parem referre gratiam parati, officiosè petimus. QUIS rerum nostrarum status sit, quamque atrocibus injuriis subacti, sumptis tandem armis, capessendæ libertatis consilium ceperimus, constituta qua nunc utimur republicæ forma, neque majestatem vestram potest latere, neque alium quemvis, qui evulgata super hac re scripta nostra æquo animo perlegerit. Nobis profecto fidem nostram, æquitatem, patientiam, testatam cunctis et probatam reddere, authoritatem etiam, honorem et decus nostrum adversus infames exulum et perfugarum linguas tueri, apud idoneos rerum æstimatores difficile non debet esse. Nunc quod exterarum nationum magis interest, deletis, aut depressis patriæ hostibus, Deo nempe mirificè adjuti, ad pacem et amicitiam omni imperio potiorem cum vicinis gentibus habendam, paratos nos esse palam atque ex animo profitemur. Has ob causas spectatæ solertiæ et probitatis virum Antonium Aschamum in Hispaniam ad majestatem vestram misimus; qui de amicitia deque solito inter utramque gentem commercio cum majestate vestra agat; vel etiam ad novas pactiones, si ita visum fuerit, de integro sanciendas viam muniat. Huic igitur vestræ majestatis adeundi copiam ut faciatis, ejusque incolumitati, necnon etiam honori, quoad isto apud vos munere perfuncturus est, velitis prospicere rogamus: ut et ea quæ à nobis mandata habet, utrique genti, ut speramus, profutura, liberè exponat; et mentis vestræ qui sensus his de rebus sit, nos quam primùm certiores faciat.

MULTA nos et infidæ pacis, et intestini belli mala ultima perpessos, eò demùm loci redactos fuisse, ut si salvam rempubl. vellemus, ejus administrandi ratio magna ex parte immutandi esset, ex iis quæ à nobis hac de re scripta publicè et declarata sunt, majestati vestræ jam pridem notum esse arbitramur. Quibus, ut par est, si fides potius haberetur, quàm improbissimis perditorum hominum calumniis, sanè qui foris de rebus nostris pessimè jam sentiunt, iis fortasse multò æquioribus uteremur. Nam quod nos jure nostro, proque gentilitia Anglorum libertate, rectè et majorum more fortiter fecisse contendimus, de eo pravas et obstinatas nequissimorum hominum opiniones ex animis evellere, humanæ opis aut ingenii certè non est. Nunc autem quod nobis cum nationibus externis commune, et in rem utrinque magis existit, amicitiam et commercium quod nostris hominibus, cum vicina quacumque gente consuevit esse, non imminutum, sed auctum atque ratum magnoperè cupimus. Cumque vestro in regno populares nostri permagna et per utrique genti quæstuosa habeant negotia, iis ne impedimentum aliquod aut incommodum afferatur, quantum in nobis est, curabimus. Id verò prædicimus frustrà fore, dum piratis et defectoribus nostris perfugium sibi vestris in portubus reperire, et onerariis Anglorum navibus, vi captis atque direptis, bona civium nostrorum sub hasta vendere Olissipone, ut nuntiatur, permissum est. Huic malo quo maturiùs occuratur, et de ea, quam petimus, amicitia clariùs ut constet, nobilissimum virum Carolum Vane, oratoris munere præditum, cum mandatis atque diplomate, commissi sibi muneris teste, ad majestatem vestram legavimus. Eum itaque benignè audire, fidem ei adhibere, ejus denique incolumitati atque honori, per omnes regni vestri fines, ut velis consulere obtestamur. Hæc omnia et nobis pergrata, et majestati vestræ, si fortè usus venerit, nostra omnium officia mutua fore pollicemur.

Quotidiani ferè, et perquàm graves afferentur ad nos nuntii, classiarios quosdam nostros, et gubernatores, qui, abductis per scelus atque proditionem, quibus præerant, navibus, superiore anno à nobis defecerant, elapsos demùm ex eo portu Hiberniæ, in quo æstate fermè tota obsessi, vix pœnam suis flagitiis dignam effugerant, ad Lusitaniæ nunc oram, Tagique fluminis ostium se recepisse: Ibi captis atque direptis quæ ad mercaturam ultrò citròque commeant Anglorum navigiis, piraticam strenuè facere, et vicina quæque maria, fretumque omne Gaditanum latrociniis infestum atque infame reddidisse. Cui malo nisi primo quoquo tempore obviàm eatur, actum esse de commercio, quod nostris hominibus cum Lusitanis peramplum et per utrique genti quæstuosum est, quis non videt? Quamobrem à vestra majestate etiam atque etiam petimus, ut piratas nostros et defectores, Portugalliæ finibus exire jubeas; et siqui à Carolo Stuarto pseudolegati adsunt, eorum uti rationem ne habere digneris; nosque potius agnoscas, ad quos Anglicarum jam summa rerum, Deo planè aspirante, rediit; utque nostræ amicorum classi, non minus vestris quam Anglorum commodis inservienti, Lusitaniæ portus, atque flumina præcludi ne sinas. * * *

Philippo Quarto Hispaniarum Regi.

Quam gravitèr quàmque acerbè tulerit majestas vestra nefariam illam Antonii Aschami oratoris nostri cædem, et quid puniendis ejus interfectoribus hactenus effectum sit cum ex literis vestris, tum ex Domino Alphonso de Cardenas legato vestro percepimus. Veruntamen facinoris illius atrocitatem quoties nobiscum reputamus quæ et ipsam vel habendi vel conservandi commercii rationem funditùs tollit, si legatorum jus apud omnes nationes sanctissimum impunè tanto scelere violabitur, non possumus quin majestatem vestram summa instantia iterùm efflagitemus ut supplicium de illis parricidis primo quoque tempore debitum sumatur, utque justitiam ulla mora aut obtentu religionis frustrari diutiùs ne sinat. Et quanquam potentissimi regis amicitiam plurimi certè facimus, tamen ut tam infandi parricidii authores dignas suo scelere pœnas persolvant omnem dare operam debemus. Humanitatem quidem illam, quam jussu vestro in Hispaniæ portubus nostri homines persensêre, præclaram etiam vestræ majestatis in nos voluntatem, quam nuper amplissimis verbis vestro nomine legatus nobis exposuit, grato animo agnoscimus, neque non voluptati nobis erit eadem pariter officia, si quis usus venerit, vestræ majestati et Hispanorum genti reddere. At nisi justitiæ sine mora satisfiat quod jamdiu petimus, quo niti fundamento amicitia sincera ac diuturna possit non videmus, cujus tamen conservandæ à nobis quidem nulla honesta occasio facilè omittetur, cui etiam fini præsentiam legati apud nos vestri conducere existimamus.

Legato Hispanico.

Excellentissime Domine,

Concilium Status, quam primùm per gravissima reipub. negotia licuit, in parlamentum attulit quatuor illa scripta quæ visum est excellentiæ vestræ undevigesimo proximi Decembris cum concilio communicare, concilium à parlamento in mandatis habet, quod ad primum scriptorum illorum caput, de nuperi scilicet residentis sui Dom. Aschami nefariis interfectoribus, responsum hoc reddere:

Parlamentum tamdiu, totiès, tamque meritò, debitum eorum supplicium postulasse ut ampliùs dicere opus non sit in re tanta, ubi (ut excellentia vestra pulchrè meminit) regiæ majestatis ipsa agitur authoritas: Et sine qua re omnis ratio societatis humanæ et conservandæ inter gentes amicitiæ tolli necesse erit. Neque sane ullo ab religione petito argumento intelligere possumus, innocentium sanguinem scelestissima cæde effusum non esse vindicandum. Etiamnum itaque instat parlamentum et ab regia majestate expectat, ut, juxta priora sua postulata, satisfactio sibi re ipsa atque effectu detur.

Ut primùm ad nos non sine gravissima querela perlatum est, Janam Puccheringam illustri et opulenta familia puellam hæredem, cum adhuc propter ætatem sub tutoribus esset, haud procul ea domo, in qua tum fortè Grenovici agebat, de manibus et complexu famularum raptam fuisse, et parato ad id navigio in Flandriam subitò deportatam, Walcii cujusdam insidiis, qui per fas et nefas omni molitus est, ut pupillam locupletem, vel ostenso mortis metu, ad nubendum sibi adigeret, huic tàm atroci tàmque inaudito sceleri primo quoque tempore occurrendum esse rati, dedimus quibusdam negotium, ut cum præfectis Neoporti et Ostendæ (nam in ea fortè loca infelix illa dicebatur appulsa) agerent de ingenua raptoris manibus eripienda. Qui utrique pro sua singulari humanitate et honesti studio, captivæ, perque latrocinium domo abductæ opem libenter tulerunt; illa verò ut prædatorum vim quoquo modo effugeret, in cœnobium votarum virginum veluti sequestrò deposita est. Quam ut ille Walcius inde abduceret, actionem in foro ecclesiastico Iprensis episcopi de contracto secum matrimonio instituit. Veruntamen, cum et raptor et rapta nostrates omninò sint, ipsum etiam facinus in nostra ditione perpetratum, quod juratis testibus abundè liquet, hæreditas denique tam lauta, quam illum imprimis inhiasse constat, in nostra potestate sit, hujus propterea causæ cognitionem totam, atque judicium ad nos duntaxat pertinere arbitramur. Veniat huc igitur qui se sponsum nominat, suam hic litem instruat, quamque jure suam contendit esse uxorem, tradi sibi postulet. Hoc interim a vestra celsitudine vehementèr petimus, quod et per nostrum internuntium Bruxellis commorantem jam aliquoties petivimus, ut afflictam et indignis modis habitam puellam, honestis parentibus ortam, sua ex patria prædatorium in modum abductam, quoàd potes, liberam et incolumem redire domum sinas. Hoc abs te non nos tantùm, siquam vestræ celsitudini parem à nobis gratiam, parque beneficium reddi posse acciderit, sed ipsa etiam humanitas, ipse pudor qui ad tuendum sexus illius honorem et pudicitiam viris bonis atque fortibus inesse debet, junctis unà precibus afflagitare videntur. Vale.

Westmonasterio, Martii 28, 1650.

Serenissimo Principi Joanni Quarto Lusitaniæ Regi.

Quod Oratorem nostrum et honorificè acceperit majestas vestra, et benignè statim audierit, nullam interponendam esse moram statuimus, quin alteris quam primùm literis nostris intelligeres, gratissimum id nobis accidisse; nosque nihil sanctius decrevisse, quàm pacem, amicitiam, commercium, quod nobis cum nationibus plerisque exteris, et inter eas cum Lusitanis jam diù est, nullo nostro dicto aut facto, non prius lacessiti, violare; nec alia mente aut consilio classem Anglicanam Tagi fluminis ad ostium misisse, quàm hostes jam totiès fugatos persequendi, resque nostras repetendi, quas per vim et proditionem suis dominis ablatas, colluvies ista perfugarum vestras in oras, ipsamque etiam Olissiponem, tanquam ad certissimas latrocinii sui nundinas, asportavit. Verùm isti homines cujus audaciæ, furoris, et insaniæ sint, ex ipsorum moribus flagitiosissimis omnes jam penè Lusitanos abundè perspexisse arbitramur. Quo faciliùs à majestate vestra impetraturos nos esse confidimus, primùm ut illustrissimo viro Odoardo Poppamo, quem huic novæ classi præfecimus, quibus potes rebus ad prædatores hosce debellandos adjumento esse velis, utque eos cum duce suo, non hospites, sed piratas, non mercatores, sed commercii pestes, jurisque gentium violatores, intra regni vestri portus, et munimenta diutiùs consistere ne sinas; sed qua patent Lusitaniæ fines, terra marique pelli jubeas: sin hoc minùs, ut nobis saltem pace vestra liceat defectores nostros, et prædones propriis duntaxat viribus aggredi, et, si Deus dederit, in nostram potestatem redigere. Hoc ut prioribus literis vehementer petivimus, sic jam idem studio maximo atque opere ab majestate vestra contendimus. Hac sive æquitate, sive beneficio, non justitiæ solùm tuæ famam per omnes gentes benè moratas adauxeris, sed et nos imprimis, populumque Anglicanum Lusitanis jam ante à minime adversum, tibi tuoque populo majorem in modum devinxeris. Vale.

De controversiis mercatorum, nonnullis etiam aliis de rebus quæ Reipubl. nostræ dignitatem aliquanto propriùs attingere videntur, scriptum inter nos haud semel, atque responsum est. Cum verò istiusmodi negotia solis literis confici vix posse intelligamus, esse autem à Carolo Stuarto immissos in urbem vestram seditiosos quosdam, nulla re magis quàm scelère atque audacia instructos, qui id agunt, ut nostrorum hominum, quorum præsertìm fides in patriam perspectior sit, commercium tàm vetustum in civitate vestra funditùs tollant, idcircò virum nobilem et spectatissimum Richardum Bradshaw nostrum apud vos internuntium esse jussimus: qui secundùm ea quæ à nobis mandata habet, de rebus iis atque negotiis quæ cum utriusque reipubl. utilitatibus conjuncta sunt, vobiscum uberiùs communicare, et transigere possit. Hunc igitur ut benevolè quam primùm audiatis rogamus; utque ei per omnia fides ea, isque honos habeatur, qui hujusmodi munus rectè obeuntibus ubique gentium haberi solet. Valete.

Idque eò vehementiùs, quòd perlatum ad nos est, exules illos nostros, de quibus jam sæpe scripsimus, efferre se solito insolentiùs in urbe vestra, nec contumelias solùm, sed et minas quasdam atrocissimas in oratorem nostrum palàm projicere. Hujus itaque salutem atque etiam debitum honorem hisce rursùs literis commendatissimum vobis esse volumus. In illos autem perfugas et sicarios, tàm veteres quàm recentes, si maturiùs animadvertetis, et nobis gratissimum, et authoritate vestra atque prudentia dignum feceritis. Valete.

ACCIPIMUS ab ornatissimis viris quos nuper in Portugalliam ad persequendos proditores, resque nostras repetendas cum classe misimus, se ab Amplitudine Vestra, quoties contigit ut Gallæciæ oram legerent, quæ præfectura vestra est, et perhumaniter illis portubus exceptos fuisse, et iis rebus omnibus adjutos, quæ navigantibus usui solent esse. Ei vestra humanitas, cum pergrata nobis omni tempore fuisset, tum est nunc præcipuè, cum aliorum iniquum in nos animum nullo merito nostro aliquibus in locis experimur. Petimus itaque abs te, "Illustrissime Domine," ut in eadem erga nos voluntate ac benevolentia permanere velis: utque nostris hominibus, quoties ad ea littora naves appulerint, pro solita humanitate tua, favere et adjumento esse pergas; tibique persuadeas nihil nos beneficii loco abs te petere quod non eodem studio vel tibi vel tuis reddere, si quando similis occasio nobis dabitur, parati erimus.

Magnifici atque Amplissimi Domini, Amici Charissimi;

FREQUENTES ad nos literæ mercatorum nostrorum, qui Borussiæ per oram negotiantur, allatæ sunt, quibus tributum grave quoddam et insolitum nuper in magno Polonorum concilio imponi sibi queruntur: ut decimam scilicet facultatum suarum omnium partem sublevando Scotorum regi, nostro hosti, suppeditarent. Quod cum juri gentium contrarium planè sit, tractari hunc in modum hospites et mercatores, iniquissimum etiam, ut cujus tyrannide sint domi, divina ope, liberati, iidem in aliena republica stipendia persolvere cogerentur, non dubitamus quin pro illa libertate, qua frui vos intelligimus, tam grave onus mercatoribus imperari in urbe vestra pati nolitis; in qua amicitiam et commercium, nec sine magno vestræ civitatis emolumento, per tot annos habuere. Si est igitur ut nostrorum hominum apud vos mercaturam facientium tutelam suscipere velitis, quod quidem cùm ab æquitate et prudentia vestra, tum etiam à dignitate splendidissimæ urbis haud dubitantèr expectamus, eam operam dabimus, ut gratissimum id esse nobis omni tempore sentiatis; quotiès in ditione nostra Gedanenses vel negotia habuerint, vel naves, quod sæpè fit, ad portus nostros appulerint.

certis verbis mandavit, ut contra quosdam vestræ ditionis justitiam efflagitaret, qui societatis Anglicæ concionatorem interficere sunt conati, quique deputato illius societatis impias manus injecêre, et mercatoribus quibusdam ejus societatis præcipuis impias manus injecêre, eosque in navem prædatoriam abduxerant, et quamvis prædictus residens, cum exciperetur primum et audiretur, accepta ab hac republica mandata illa sigillatìm vobis nota fecerit, quibus justitiæ vestræ exemplum in maleficos illos edendum expectabatur, tamen cùm expectationi nostræ responsum non esse intelligeremus, illud nobiscum cogitantes quanto in periculo et nostri homines et illorum facultates versarentur, si de incolumitate illorum et tutela adversus hostium malitiam et iniquos oppugnatores non satis provisum esset, rursùs prædicto residenti in mandatis dedimus, ut nostrum ejus rei sensum representaret: utque hujus reipublicæ nomine vos ut amicitiam et necessitudinem inter hanc rempub. vestramque civitatem initam magnumque usum qui huic reipub. cum vestra civitate intercedit conservare, adeoque mercatores nostros cum eorum privilegiis sine ulla violatione protegere velitis hortaretur; utque nominatìm in quemdam, cui nomen Garnes est, qui se in hanc rempublicam contumeliosè gessit, certosque ex societate mercatorum Anglica, vestra in urbe commorantes, ad contumeliam hujus reipublicæ magnamque nostrorum mercatorum molestiam, in Spirensem cameram publicè citavit: quare reparationem ejusmodi expectamus quæ æquitati et justitiæ consentanea est.

De hisce capitibus, et si quid amplius ad hujus reipub. cum vestra civitate amicitiam pertinuerit, prædictum residentem hujus reipublicæ nomine ad vos jussimus accedere: cui, ut fidem amplam in iis quæ huc spectantia proposuerit habeatis, rogamus.

Serenissima Regina;

MAJESTATIS vestræ literas ad parlamentum reipub. Angliæ 26 proximè elapsi Septembris Stockholma datas per Petrum Spiering Silvercroon accepimus, et perlegimus: et veterem quidem amicitiam, nec non commercium magnumque usum, qui Anglis cum Suecorum gente antiquitùs intercedit, permanere atque indies augere vehementer atque ex animo cupimus: Neque dubitamus, quin legatus à majestate vestra ampliter instructus venerit ad ea maximè proponenda, quæ in rem atque decus genti utrique futura imprimis fuissent, quæque nos audire ex eo paratissimi fuissemus, et quod utrinque potissimum salubre atque utile videretur, id primo quoque tempore effectum reddidisse. Verùm summo rerum moderatori Deo ita visum est, ut is antequam audiri ac petiisset de iis quæ parlamento exponenda ab majestate vestra in mandatis habebat, evenit ut ex hac vita excederet (cujus quidem desiderium ita ægrè atque acerbè tulimus, ut qui simul in divina voluntate acquiescere debeamus) unde et majestatis vestræ quæ mens esset adhuc scire nequeamus, ejusque rei progressibus in presens injecta mora sit: quocircà optimum nobis visum est hisce literis, quas, misso hac ipsa de re nuntio nostro, dedimus, significare vestræ majestati, quam gratæ literæ vestræ quamque acceptus vester publicus minister parlamento reipub. Angliæ fuerit; simulque vestræ majestatis amicitiam quantoperè expectamus; quàmque etiam, ut par est, tantæ principis amicitiam plurimi faciemus: deque illo quod inter hanc rempub. et majestatis vestræ regnum est commercio exaugendo, ita existimabimus quemadmodum de re maximi utrobique momenti existimare debemus: quod et ea de causa parlamento reipub. Angliæ acceptissimum erit. Adeoque vestram majestatem divinæ tutelæ recommendare volumus: Quorum nomine et authoritate.

LITERAS celsitudinis vestræ 22 Aprilis 1651, Florentia datas, et à residente vestro domino Almerico Salvetti nobis redditas accepimus; in quibus Anglico nomini quantopere faveat celsitudo vestra, gentemque eam quanti faciat, facile perspicimus: id quod non solùm mercatores nostri, qui in portubus vestris multos jam annos negotiantur, verum etiam adolescentes quique nostræ nationis nobilissimi atque honestissimi, qui vestras per urbes aut iter fecere, aut excolendi ingenii causa commorati sunt, testantur atque confirmant. Quæ cum nobis pergrata sane sunt et acceptissima, tum hoc etiam atque etiam petimus, ut quo animo quoque studio in nostros mercatores, aliosque nostræ reipublicæ cives Hetruscam ditionem peragrantes serenitas vestra consuevit esse, in eo velit perseverare: nosque vicissim pollicemur atque recipimus, quod ad parlamentum attinet, nihil defuturum, quod et commercio et amicitiæ mutuæ, quæ inter utramque rempub. tam diu inveteravit, firmandæ ac stabiliendæ possit conducere: quam quidem omnibus utrinque humanitatis officiis, mutuaque observantia, in perpetuum conservari cupimus atque optamus.

PERMAGNAS nobis querelas deferunt hujus reipub. mercatores, qui in ditionibus vestræ majestatis mercaturam faciunt, de vi multa atque injuriis sibi allatis, deque novis etiam tributis sibi impositis à prefectis aliisque officialibus vestrorum portuum et locorum, ubi negotia habent, et nominatim in insulis Canariis, idque contra fœderis articulos, quos commercii causa utraque natio inter se sanxit. Quas eorum querelas veras esse jurejurando confirmavere. Nobisque demonstrant, nisi jus suum obtinere possint, suaque damna resarciantur, nisi denique contra vim istiusmodi atque injurias præsidium aliquod certum, atque tutelam et sibi et fortunis suis habituri sint, non posse se amplius iis in locis negotiari. Quibus eorum querelis graviter à nobis perpensis, cumque facta illorum ministrorum iniqua, aut non omnino aut secus quàm res se habet ad notitiam vestræ majestatis pervenisse existimemus, visum est nobis ipsas eorum querelas cum hisce litteris ad majestatem vestram unà mittere; nec dubitamus quin majestas vestra, cum ipsius justitiæ amore, tum etiam commercii causa, quod vestris haud minus quam nostris hominibus fructuosum est, suis præcipere velit, ut ab iniquis illis nostrorum vexationibus abstineant, utque hujus gentis mercatores expeditam justitiam obtinere queant, necnon debitam earum injuriarum reparationem, quæ à domino Petro de Carillo de Guzman, atque aliis, allatæ sibi sunt, contra prædictos fœderis articulos, utque perficere velit majestas vestra, ut prædicti mercatores fructum illorum articulorum percipere queant, in eaque vestra tutela sint, ut tam ipsi quam fortunæ suæ ab omni injuria liberæ et incolumes esse possint. Hoc autem magna ex parte consecuturos se esse putant, si ademptam sibi illam de judice conservatore schedulam, qui eos à novo quodam consulatu in se quidem iniquiore defendat, majestas vestra rursus concesserit; ne si nullum ab injuria refugium sibi detur, abrumpi illud commercium, quod utrique genti commoda haud parva attulit, violatis hunc in modum fœderis articulis, necesse sit.

Serenissime Princeps, celsissime Senatus,
Amici charissimi;

MERCATORES quidam nostri, quorum alteri Joannes Dickons, alteri Job Throckmorton nomen est, simulque alii apud nos questi sunt, quòd cum Novembris octavo et vigesimo 1651, ex jure et authoritate curiæ nostræ ammiralatus occupassent in navi Hirundine vulgo nuncupata, cui in Dunis consistenti Isaacus Taylor magister erat, centum dolia caveari vulgò dicti, quæ sua propria bona essent, inque sinu Moscovitico Archangeli dicto eadem in navem imposita; atque in ea curia, prout lege agitur, decretum obtinuissent, quo dicta caveari dolia sibi traderentur, fide sua prius interposita, se in illius curiæ sententia acquieturos; quodque eadem curia, quo lis illa ad exitum perduceretur, cum pro more scripsisset ad magistratus judicesque Venetos, literas, quibus petebant uti Joannem Piattum (Veneta sub ditione degentem, qui cavearum illum sibi vendicat) citarent quo re per procuratorem in ammiralatus curia Anglica se sisteret, ubi lis ista pendet, jusque suum probaret, tamen idem Piattus, et quidam David Rutts Hollandus, dum causa hæc in nostro hic foro pendet, multum supradicto Joanni Dickons, aliisque illis mercatoribus de caveare isthoc negotium facessit; eorumque bona et facultates nexu occupandas Venetiis curat: quæ omnia singulatim, et quid hactenus in predicta nostra curia sit actum in literis illis requisitoriis fusiùs exponitur; quas postquam à nobis inspectæ essent, ad serenissimam Venetiarum rempub. ut mercatoribus in hac causa adjumento esse possint, transmittendas censuimus; atque ab ea vehementèr petimus, ut non solum illæ literæ vim suam atque pondus illic habere queant, sed etiam ut bona illa et facultates mercatorum, quas prædictus Piattus et David Rutts nexu illigandas curarunt, liberentur; dictique rei ad nostram hic curiam remittantur, quid sui sit juris in hoc caveare sibi vendicando lege experturi. Excellentissime Domine, CONCILIUM Status cum ex mandato parlamenti secundo die mensis Martii accepto de charta excellentiæ vestræ 17 Feb. commissariis hujus concilii exhibita deliberationem seriam habuerit, in qua excellentiæ vestræ visum est, proponere uti duobus capitibus illis nominatis quasi præviis responderetur, responsum hoc excellentiæ vestræ reddendum censet.

Parlamentum, ubi ad ea respondit, quæ ab excellentia vestra cum primum audiretur proposita sunt, tum etiam in iis literis quas ad Serenissimum Hispaniarum Regem scripsit, quàm sibi grata quamque accepta illa fuerit amicitia, ususque mutuus qui et ab illius regia majestate et à vobis ejus nomine oblatus est, quam denique deliberatum sibi fuerit, parem amicitiam quod ad se attinet, pariaque officia reddere uberius declaravit.

Exinde visum vestræ excellentiæ, cum primum audita in concilio est Decembris 19 styli veteris, huic concilio proponere, veluti rationem quandam auspicandæ arctioris hujus amicitiæ, cujus facta tum à vobis mentio erat, uti certi ex suo corpore nominarentur, qui ea quæ attulisset excellentia vestra audirent, iis perpensis de eorum utilitate ad concilium referre quam primum possint, cui vestro postulato ut satisfieret certos ex suo numero concilium nominavit, qui excellentiam vestram convenirent, quod et proinde factum est eorumque loco quæ proponenda expectabantur, chartam illam supradictam congressio ea protulit, ad quam responsum hoc concilii est.

Cum parlamentum ea declaraverit, vestraque excellentia progressum eum fecerit qui supradictus est, paratos nos esse, cum excellentia vestra in colloquium venire iis de rebus, quas domini regis vestri nomine proposueritis, tam de amicitia jam pridem inita, quam de arctiore ineunda, aut si quid à nobis hujus reipub. nomine in medium proferetur; cumque ad singula ventum erit, ita respondebimus, ut par est, naturaque rei postulabit.

Excellentissime Domine,

CONCILIUM Status, deliberatione habita de illa chartula quam 27/6 Maii/Junii, 1652, ab excellentia vestra accepit, tum etiam de illa quam in concilio status cum audiretur 6/16 hujus mensis vestra exhibuit excellentia, ad binas illas chartulas responsum hoc reddit: parlamentum reipubl. Angliæ firmam amicitiam bonamque pacem, quæ huic repub. est cum Hispaniarum regia majestate, conservandi percupidum, ex quo idem primùm regis prædicti animum eodem inclinare excellentia vestra significavit, paratum semper fuisse eam utriusque gentis bono quam maximè firmare ac stabilire. Idque concilium status parlamenti nomine atque mandato suis chartulis aliquoties excellentiæ vestræ demonstravit; et speciatim, prout excellentia vestra petiverat, commissarios delegit, quæ et excellentiam vestram convenirent, ab eaque acciperent, quæ ad predictum finem conducentia proponerentur; quo in conventu eorum loco proponendorum visum est nobis generatim quædam, quasi futuro prævia colloquio, exhibere, de quibus concilio videbatur, parlamentum qui suus esset sensus chartis prioribus planum fecisse: tamen quo cumulatiùs satisfieret, utque excellentiæ vestræ nequa dubitatio restaret iis de rebus quæ tum proposuerat, concilium in ea chartula quæ 31/10 Martii/Aprilis, data est, paratum se esse ostendit cum excellentia vestra in colloquium venire iis de rebus quæ à parte regiæ majestatis prædictæ in mandatis haberet, tàm de pristina amicitia quàm de actione futura, de iis etiam quæ à nobis hujus reipub. nomine exhiberentur; cumque ad singula veniretur ea, quæ par esset, resque postularet, responsa dare: ad quæ visum est excellentiæ vestræ nihilum respondere neque per duos pene menses in ea re ulterius progredi. Vestramque chartulam 27/6 Maii/Junii, 1652, datam concilium ex eo tempore primam ab excellentia vestra accepit, in eaque hoc solum proponitis, uti pacis atque fœderis articuli inter Carolum regem nuperum vestrumque Dominum 6/15 Novembris 1630, pacti denuò percurrantur, utque ejus capita quæque vel amplificentur vel immutenter pro temporum et rerum alio nunc statu, necnon regendæ reipublicæ forma immutata, quod cum nihil amplius esset, quàm quod et nos in prædicta nostra chartula 31/10 Martii/Aprilis summatim atque dilucidè significaveramus, expectabat concilium quosdam speciatim articulos ex eo fœdere ab excellentia vestra propositum iri, cum ea amplificatione, iisque mutationibus, quarum facitis mentionem, cum alioqui nobis impossibile sit ullum aliud responsum hac de re dare, quàm quod jam dedimus. Verùm cum excellentia vestra ex charta sua novissima dilationem in nos conferre videatur, concilium idcircò chartulam vestram prædictam 27/6 Maii/Junii datam, quodque in ea propositum erat denuò inspexit, seque de eo quod illic est propositum, priore illa chartula excellentiæ vestræ plenè satisfecisse arbitratur, cui et hoc solum potest adjicere, se, cum excellentiæ vestræ videbitur, vel ex fœderibus jam factis vel alio quovis modo ejusmodi ferre conditiones, quæ ad præsentem rerum ac temporum statum erunt accommodatæ, quibus à parte vestra fundari amicitiam vultis, ea vobis responsa exinde redditurum, quæ ab se ad ea reddi æquum erit, quæque parlamentum in eodem perseverare studio testentur, illibatam atque firmam cum rege vestro domino amicitiam conservandis. Eaque ut augescat etiam, parlamentum omnem honestam seque dignam operam pro se quidem dabit.

Concilium prætcrea sui officii ducit esse, excellentiam vestram illius nostræ chartulæ Januarii 30, 1651, ad vos datæ admoneri, cui cum excellentia vestra responsum nondum dederit, instamus proinde atque expectamus, ut parlamento, de qua illic re facta mentio est, satisfactio detur.

PRÆDICTIS Dominis Legatis ut satisfiat de responso concilii ad quintum, sextum, septimum, octavum, et nonum articulum, assentitur concilium huic sequenti clausulæ suo responsorum fine adjiciendæ. Videlicet, præter illas colonias, insulas, portus et loca in partis alterutrius ditione, ad quæ loca ne quis negotiandi aut commercii habendi causa accedat, lege cautum est, nisi impetrata prius ejus partis licentia speciali, ad quam illa colonia, insula, portus, aut loca pertinuerint Receptio cujusquam in navem quæ in flumina, portus, aut sinus alterutrius partis compulsa erit navem illam ulli exhibendæ molestiæ aut perscrutationi ex responso concilii ad articulum undecimum obnoxiam non faciet, quemadmodum prædicti domini legati in replicatione sua videntur intellexisse, præterquam ubi illa receptio contra leges, statuta, aut morem illius loci est, in quo illa navis portum capesserit, qua in re videtur concilio nihil statui quod durius sit, sed quod utriusque reipub. saluti sit æquè conducibile.

Quod ad probandum cujusnam propriè naves et bona illa erunt, quæ in naufragio ejici acciderint, concilium existimat necesse esse jusjurandum dari in illis curiis, quæ ad hujusmodi causas aut jam sunt constitutæ aut erunt constituendæ, ubi qua illa sibi vendicant audiri singuli possint, et cujusque jus cognosci ac dijudicari, quod scriptis testimoniis, quæ vulgo "certificata" nuncupantur, tam clarè atque distinctè fieri non potest, unde multi scrupuli ac dubitationes existere poterunt, multæ etiam fraudes ac doli in illud genus probationis irrepere, quod ne eveniat utriusque partis interest providere. Concilium etiam æquum esse arbitratur, definiri certum tempus, ante quod tempus qui justum earum rerum dominum se esse non probaverit, excludetur ad evitandas sine fine lites. Quod autem ad modum venundandi ea bona quæ ejecta in naufragio facile corrumpuntur, visum est concilio eum modum proponere qui ad lucernam dicitur, ut qui sit modus maximè probabilis verum bonorum pretium eliciendi ad dominorum emolumentum; tamen si prædicti domini legati inventam aliam rationem attulerint quæ huic fini magis conducere videbitur, per concilium non stabit quo minus id fiat quod æquum erit: neque intelligitur ob hanc rem huic tractationi moram afferendi occasio ulla præbeatur.

Ad clausulam articuli quarti decimi extremam quod attinet respondere, non expedire censemus illis fœderibus ac societatibus, quarum in prædictis responsis facta est mentio, quæque generatim duntaxat proponuntur assensum nostrum exhibere antequam quales illæ sint, exploratius nobis fuerit, de quibus cum excellentiis vestris visum erit concilium certius facere, responsum expressius ad id reddere poterimus.

Replicatio Concilii Status ad responsum prædictorum Dominorum Legatorum quod ad senos articulos à prædicto Concilio nomine Reipub. ANGLIÆ exhibitos est redditum.

CONCILIUM, inspectis prædictorum dominorum legatorum diplomatis quibus collata in eos potestas est transigendi cum parlamento aut ejus commissariis de iis omnibus quæ transigi expediverit, fœderaque vetusta renovandi novaque jungendi, existimabat quidem prædictos dominos legatos ea authoritate esse præditos, ut et responsa dare possent, et omnia transigere, tam quæ à parte hujus reipub. quàm quæ à parte Regis Daniæ et Norwegiæ ferrentur, adeoque responsa quæ prædictis dominis legatis ad primam, secundam, tertiam et quintam concilii postulationem dare libuit haud expectabat, quo factum erit, ut huic præsenti tractationi necessario more afferatur, cum et in se æquissimum sit, et in concilio deliberatum, fœdus integrum tractando simul complecti tam de iis quæ ad hanc rempublicam quam quæ ad regna Daniæ et Norwegiæ spectant. Quapropter concilium enixè flagitat, ut excellentiæ vestræ respondere ad predictum nostrum primum, secundum, tertium, et quintum postulatum velint.

Ad quartum articulum de portoriis Gluckstadii cum ea jam antiquata sint, quemadmodum excellentiæ vestræ in responso meminerunt, instat concilium uti eorum illa antiquatio etiam per hoc fœdus rata habeatur, ne forte in posterum revocentur.

Quod ad sextum articulum, qui de pyratica est, eum quidem inseruit concilium ut qui ad utriusque commoda æquè pertineret, et ad commercium in commune stabiliendum, quod à pyratis atque prædonibus perquàm turbatur atque interrumpitur; cumque responsum dominorum legatorum de hoc articulo ad hostes tantùm referatur, mentionem piratarum nullam faciat, concilium idcirco expressius responsum ad id petit.

Cumque prædicti domini legati in sua replicatione ad responsum concilii et decimum suum articulum, et ad eum concilii responsum prætermiserint, concilio necessarium visum est prioribus suis postulatis sequentem hunc articulum adjungere.

Populum et incolas reipub. Serenissime Princeps, Amice Charissime, CONSILIUM Status, cognito tàm per oratorem celsitudinis vestræ hic commorantem, quam per Carolum Longlandum mercatorum Anglicorum negotia Liburni procurantem, quanta cum benevolentia ac fide celsitudo vestra navium Anglicarum in Liburnensem portum se recipientium tutelam susceperit, contra Belgarum naves prædatorias exitium illis atque direptionem minitantes, literis undetrigesimo Julii datas (quas ad celsitudinem vestram, jamdudum pervenisse sperat) significavit quam id sibi gratum acceptumque accidisset, eodemque tempore scriptum parlamenti reipublicæ Angliæ de controversiis inter hanc rempublicam et Fœderatas Belgii Provincias in præsentia exortis ad serenitatem vestram unà misit. Cumque rursus per eundem Carolum Longlandum concilium intellexerit, quæ ulterius mandata dederit celsitudo vestra de incolumitate atque tutela navibus Anglicis præstanda, etiam Belgis, ne id fieret, importunè contra nitentibus, ne hanc quidem occasionem prætereundam esse censuit, significandi rursus celsitudini vestræ se vestram justitiam et singularem in tutandis navibus suis constantiam cum plurimi facere tum sibi etiam gratissimam habere. Quod cum solidæ amicitiæ studiique vestri in hanc rempub. haud leve indicium sit, persuadere sibi poterit celsitudo vestra paria officia atque studia in nobis erga vestram celsitudinem nunquam se esse desideraturam. Quæque declarare possint quàm nobis deliberatum sit eam amicitiam, quæ huic reipub. cum vestra serenitate est, quàm constantissimè atque diutissimè pro virili nostra parte conservare. Nos interim navibus nostris omnibus, quæ vestros portus intraverint, disertis verbis mandavimus, ut salutationes explosione tormentorum consuetas, omnemque honorem debitum vestræ celsitudini exhibere meminerint.

LITERAS vestras, illustres domini atque amici charissimi, Decembris 24, 1652, ad nos datas, accepimus, omni humanitate, benevolentia, studioque erga nos nostramque rempub. egregio refertas; quodque nobis semper majus et antiquius debet esse, charitatem fraternam et verè christianam spirantes. Verùm cum denuò prædictus Noellus unà cum illa societate graviter queratur, quamvis literæ nostræ Marchioni redditæ fuerint, et mercatores illi ab eo tempore se Brugas ad maritimarum causarum curiam contulerint, ibique jus suum suæque causæ veritatem probaverint, justitiam tamen sibi denegari, tamque iniquè secum agi, ut quamvis per tres amplius menses cognitioni matura res fuerit, tamen ab illa curia se impetrare non posse ut sententiam tandem ferat; quin navis eorum et bona nihilo minus retineantur, seque per hanc moram in persequendo jure suo magnos sumptus fecisse. Non ignorat amplitudo vestra et juri gentium et commercii et amicitiæ, quæ inter Anglos et Flandros est, contrarium esse, ut navis aliqua Ostendensis navem aliquam Anglicam caperet, si quidem mercibus Anglicis onusta Angliam petat; quæque ab illo præfecto in nautas Anglicos inhumaniter ac barbarè commissa sunt pœnam gravem mereri. Concilium itaque hanc rem amplitudini vestræ commendat, petitque ut de ea in Flandriam scribere velitis, eamque operam primo quoque tempore dare, ut ne hoc negotium diutiùs extrahatur, sed uti ea justitia fiat, ut prædicta navis et bona, unà cum damnis, sumptibus et fœnore quæ Angli isti propter illam injustam interceptionem sustinuerunt, authoritate curiæ maritimæ Brugensis, aut alio modo bono iis reddantur, utque curetur nequa ejusmodi interceptio deinceps fiat, quin amicitia quæ nostris hominibus cum Flandris intercedit sine ulla violatione conservetur.

Obsignatum nomine et jussu concilii status parlamenti authoritate constituti.

Illustrissime Domine,

GRAVES ad nos allatæ sunt querelæ, à Philippo Noello, et Joanni Godallo, et societate mercatorum Foyensium, de nave quadam sua, cui nomen Anna Foyensis, quæ cum esset navis Anglica, ab illis instructa, et ipsorum solummodo mercibus onusta, circiter festum Michaelis Archangeli ad portum suum renavigans, à nave præsidaria quæ ad Ostendam pertinebat, cujus erat præfectus Erasmus Bruerus, de improviso capta fuit. Nuntiatum porrò est, Ostendenses, cum in sua potestate navis esset, nautas omnes nimis inhumaniter tractasse, accenso fune digitis admoto, et navis magistrum undis immersisse, atque pœne suffocasse, ut minimè veram ab ipso confessionem extorquerent, de navi atque mercimoniis illis, quasi Gallorum essent. Quod tametsi magister ille cæterique socii navis firmiter pernegabant, Ostendenses tamen, et navim et merecedes in portum suum abduxerunt. Hæc in curia navali Angliæ, inquisitione facta, testibusque adhibitis, vera esse apparuere, ut ex autographis testimoniorum quæ cum his literis simul misimus manifesto liquebit. Cum itaque illa navis, Anna Foyensis dicta, atque mercimonia omnia peculiariter verè ac propriè ad Anglos pertineant, adeo ut nulla causa appareat cur Ostendenses vel illam vel ea vi caperent, multò minùs auferrent navis magistrum, aut societatem tam durè tractarent; cumque secundùm leges nationum atque amicitiam inter Anglos Flandrosque, navim illam atque mercimonia reddi oporteat, magnoperè petimus ab excellentia vestra, ut jus suum Anglicani maturè obtineant, atque illis satisfiat qui damnum acceperunt, utque commercium, et amicitia quæ inter Anglos Flandrosque est, diù atque firmitèr conservetur.

LITERÆ OLIVERII PROTECTORIS

NOMINE SCRIPTÆ.

Comiti Oldenburgico.

Illustrissime Domine;

Per literas vestras Januarii die vigesimo 1654 datas, certior sum factus, nobilem virum Fridericum Matthiam Wolisogum secretarium vestrum, et Christophorum Griphiandrum, cum certis mandatis ab illustrissima dignitate vestra in Angliam missos fuisse. Qui cùm ad nos accessissent, et susceptam Anglicanæ reipublicæ administrationem nobis vestro nomine gratulati sunt; et uti vos vestraque ditio in hanc pacem, quam cum fœderatis Belgii ordinibus proxime fecimus, assumeremini: ut denique salvam-guardiam illam quam vulgo vocant, à parlamento nuper vobis concessam, nostra nunc authoritate confirmaremus, petiverunt: ob istam itaque gratulationem tam amicam maximas, ut æquum est, gratias agimus: et illa duo postulata libenter concessimus; nulli etiam occasioni in posterum defuturi, quæ studium in vos nostrum poterit ullo tempore declarare. Idque ex supradictis oratoribus vestris pleniùs vos arbitror intellecturos; quorum fides, ac diligentia, in hoc vestro apud nos negotio præclarè constitit. Quod reliquum est, vobis, rebusque vestris felicitatem, atque ex voto pacem omnem exopto.

Comiti Oldenburgico.

Illustrissime Domine;

Literas vestras Maii secundo die Oldenburgo datas accepi haud uno nomine gratissimas; cùm quòd essent ipsæ singulari erga me humanitate ac benevolentiâ refertæ; tum quòd illustrissimi Domini Comitis Antonii perdilecti filii vestri manu redditæ. Id quod eò magis honorificum mihi duco, ex quo illius virtutes tanta stirpe dignas, moresque eximios, studium denique in me egregium, non tam acceptum ab aliis, quàm re ipsâ cognitum atque perspectum, jam habeo. Neque dubium esse pôtest, quin eandem quoque suis domi spem faciat, fore se patris optimi præstantissimique simillimum; cujus præclara virtus atque prudentia perfecit, ut tota illa ditio Oldenburgica permultis ab annis, et summa pace frui, et pacis commoda percipere, inter sævissimos undique circumstrepentium bellorum tumultus, potuerit. Talem itaque amicitiam quidni ego quam plurimi facerem, quæ potest inimicitias omnium tam sapienter ac providè cavere? Pro munere denique illo magnifico est, Illustrissime Domine, quòd gratias habeo; pro jure est ac merito tuo, quòd ex animo sum

Serenissime Rex;

Cum Succorum regnum per hosce dies summis populi studiis, omniumque ordinum suffragiis liberrimis, translatum ad vos esse, toto orbe terrarum percrebuerit, id maluisse majestatem vestram suis literis amicissimis, quàm vulgata fama nos intelligere, et summæ benevolentiæ erga nos vestræ, et honoris inter primos attributi, argumentum haud leve esse ducimus. Illam itaque vestris meritis egregiis accessionem dignitatis, præmiumque virtute tanta dignissimum, et sponte et jure vobis gratulamur: idque ut majestati vestræ, Suecorumque genti, reique toti christianæ, bonum atque faustum sit, quod et vobis maximè in votis est, junctis precibus Deum oramus. Quòd autem fœderis inter hanc rempublicam Sueciæque regnum recens icti conservationem majestas vestra, quod ad se attinet integerrimam, usque eò curæ sibi fore confirmat, ut quæ nunc intercedit amicitia, non permanere solum, sed, si id fieri potest, augescere etiam indies possit, id vel in dubium vocare nefas esse, tua tanti principis fide interposita, cujus eximia virtus non solùm in peregrina terra regnum tibi hæreditarium peperit, sed tantùm etiam potuit, ut augustissima regina, Gustavi filia, cui parem omni laude heroinam multa retrò secula non tulêre, possessione imperii justissima inopinanti tibi ac nolenti ultrò cederet. Vestrum denique tam singulare erga nos studium, tamque præclaram animi significationem nobis esse gratissimam, omni ratione persuasum esse vobis cupimus; nullumque nobis pulchrius certamen fore, quàm ut vestram humanitatem nostris officiis nullo tempore defuturis, si id potest fieri, vincamus.

Illustrissimo Domino Ludovico Mendezio de Haro.

Quod accepi ex literis suis, illustrissime Domine, constitutum ac nominatum jam esse ab serenissimo Hispaniarum rege legatum, qui de suscepta à me Anglicana republica gratulatum huc primo quoque tempore veniret; cùm est meritò per se gratum, tùm tu id, qui ex te imprimis hoc me cognoscere voluisti, ut esset mihi aliquanto gratius atque jucundius, singulari tuo studio atque officii celeritate effecisti. Sic enim diligi atque probari me abs te, qui virtute tua atque prudentia tantam apud regem tuum authoritatem tibi conciliasti, ut vel maximis illius regni negotiis par animo præsis, haud minori profectò mihi voluptati debet esse, quàm judicium præstantissimi viri ornamento mihi intelligo fore. De meo autem in serenissimum Hispaniarum regem propenso animo, et ad amicitiam cum isto regno conservandam, atque etiam indies exaugendam, promptissimo, et huic qui nunc adest legato satisfecisse me spero, et alteri, cum advenerit, cumulatè satisfacturum. De cætero, illustrissime Domine, qua nunc flores apud regem tuum dignitate ac gratia, eam tibi perpetuam exopto; quasque res geris bono publico et administras, volo tibi prosperè feliciterque evenire.

Cum de voluntate vestræ majestatis in me singulari ex vestris sim nuper literis persuasus, quibus et ipse pari studio rescripserim, videor mihi ex ratione prorsus amicitiæ nostræ deinceps facturus, si quemadmodum quæ grata acciderint ad lætitiam mutuam communicem, ita quæ contraria, de iis vobis tanquam amicissimis, animi mei sensum doloremque aperiam. De me quidem sic existimo, eo me in loco reipub. jam esse constitutum, ut communi Protestantium paci imprimis, et quantum in me est, consulere debeam. Quo gravius necesse est feram quæ de Bremensium et Suecorum præliis mutuisque cladibus ad nos perferuntur. Illud primum doleo, amicos utrosque nostros tam atrociter, tamque Protestantium rationibus periculosè, inter se decertare; pacem deinde illam monasteriensem, quæ reformatis omnibus summo præsidio credebatur fore, ejusmodi peperisse infœlix bellum: ut nunc arma Suecorum in eos conversa sint, quos inter cæteros paulo ante religionis causâ acerrimè defenderent: idque potissimum hoc tempore fieri, cum pontificii per totam fere Germaniam reformatos ubique rursus opprimere, et ad intermissas paulisper injurias, vimque pristinam, redire palam dicantur. Cum itaque intelligerem dierum aliquot inducias ad Bremam urbem jam esse factas, non potui sane quin majestati vestræ, occasione hac data, significarem quàm cupiam ex animo, quamque enixè Deum pacis orem, uti istæ induciæ utrique parti feliciter cedant; utque in pacem firmissimam ex compositione utrinque commoda possint desinere: quam ad rem si meam operam conferre quicquam, aut usui fore, majestas vestra judicaverit, eam vobis libentissimè, ut in re Divino Numini proculdubio acceptissima, polliceor atque defero. Interea majestatis vestræ consilia omnia ut ad communem christianæ rei salutem dirigat Deus atque gubernet, quod idem non dubito quin et vos maximè velitis, animitùs exopto.

Alba Aula, Oct. 26, 1653.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,
Oliverius Prot. Reip. Angliæ, &c.

Magnificis amplissimisque Consulibus ac Senatoribus Civitatis Bremensis.

Ex literis vestris per oratorem vestrum Henricum Oldenburgum ad nos datis, coortum civitati vestræ cum vicino potentissimo dissidium, quasque exinde ad angustias redacti sitis, eò majore cum molestia ac dolore intelligo, quo magis Bremensem civitatem, præter cæteras orthodoxa religione præstantem, diligo atque amplector; neque in votis quicquam habeo antiquius, quàm ut universum Protestantium nomen fraterno consensu atque concordia in unum tandem coalescat. Lætari interim communem reformatorum hostem hisce nostris contentionibus, et ferocius passim instare, certissimum est. Ipsa autem controversia, cum decisionis nostræ non sit quæ vos jam nunc exercet, Deum itaque oro ut quæ cœptæ sunt induciæ possint fœlicem exitum sortiri. Equidem quod petistis, ad Suecorum regem ea de re scripsi suasor pacis atque concordiæ, Deo nimirum imprimis gratæ, meamque operam ut in re tam pia libens detuli, vos uti æquum animum, neque ab ullis pacis conditionibus, honestis quidem illis, abhorrentem suadeo geratis; vestramque civitatem divinæ tutelæ ac providentiæ commendo.

Perspectus ex literis tuis ad me datis religionis amor tuus, et in ecclesias reformatas pietas eximia, studiumque singulare, in ista præsertim generis nobilitate ac splendore, eoque sub regno in quo deficientibus ab orthodoxa fide tot sunt nobilissimis quibusque spes uberes propositæ, tot firmioribus incommoda subeunda, permagno me planè gaudio ac voluptate affecit. Nec minus gratum erat placuisse me tibi eo ipso religionis nomine, quo tu mihi dilectus atque charus imprimis esse debes. Deum autem obtestor ut quam de me spem ecclesiarum et expectationem esse ostendis, possim ei aliquando vel satisfacere, si opus erit, vel demonstrare omnibus, quàm cupiam non deesse. Nullum equidem fructum laborum meorum, nullum hujus quam obtineo in repub. meâ sive dignitatis sive muneris, nec ampliorem existimarem, nec jucundiorem, quàm ut idoneus sim, qui ecclesiæ reformatæ vel amplificationi vel incolumitati, vel quod maximum est, paci inserviam. Te verò hortor magnopere ut religionem orthodoxam, qua pietate ac studio à majoribus acceptam profiteris, eadem animi firmitate atque constantia ad extremum usque retineas. Nec sanè quicquam erit te tuisque parentibus religiosissimis dignius, nec quod pro tuis in me meritis quanquam tuâ causâ cupio omnia, optare tibi melius aut præclarius queam, quàm si sic te pares atque instituas, ut ecclesiæ, præsertim patriæ, quarum in disciplina tam felici indole tamque illustri loco natus es, quanto cæteris præluces, tanto firmius in te præsidium suis rebus constitutum esse sentiant. Vale.

Serenissime Princeps;

Redditæ sunt nobis Genevâ, necnon ex Delphinatu aliisque multis ex locis ditioni vestræ finitimis literæ, quibus certiores facti sumus, regalis vestræ celsitudinis subditis reformatam religionem profitentibus, vestro edicto atque authoritate imperatum nuper esse, uti triduo quàm hoc edictum promulgatum erit suis sedibus atque agris excedant pœnâ capitis, et fortunarum omnium amissione proposita, nisi fidem fecerint se, derelicta religione sua, intra dies viginti catholicam religionem amplexuros: Cumque se supplices ad celsitudinem vestram regalem contulissent, petentes uti edictum illud revocetur, utque ipsi, pristinam in gratiam recepti, concessæ à serenissimis majoribus vestris libertati restituantur, partem tamen exercitus vestri in eos impetum fecisse, multos crudelissime trucidâsse, alios vinculis mandâsse, reliquos in deserta loca montesque nivibus coopertos expulisse, ubi familiarum aliquot centuriæ eo loci rediguntur, ut sit metuendum ne frigore et fame brevi sint miserè omnes perituræ. Hæc cum ad nos perlata essent, haud sane potuimus quin, hujus afflictissimi populi tanta calamitate audita, summo dolore ac miseratione commoveremur. Cum autem non humanitatis modo, sed ejusdem religionis communione, adeoque fraterna penitus necessitudine cum iis conjunctos nos esse fateamur, satisfieri à nobis neque nostro erga Deum officio, neque fraternæ charitati, neque religionis ejusdem professioni posse existimavimus, si in hac fratrum nostrorum calamitate ac miseria solo sensu doloris afficeremur, nisi etiam ad sublevanda eorum tot mala inopinata, quantum in nobis est situm, omnem operam nostram conferamus. Itaque à vestra imprimis celsitudine regali majorem in modum enixè petimus et obtestamur, ut ad instituta serenissimorum majorum suorum, concessamque ab iis omni tempore et confirmatam subditis suis Vallensibus libertatem, velit animum referre. In qua concedenda atque confirmanda, quemadmodum id præstiterunt, quod Deo per se gratissimum proculdubio est, qui conscientiæ jus inviolabile ac potestatem penes se unum esse voluit, ita dubium non est quin subditorum etiam suorum meritam rationem habuerint, quos et in bello strenuos ac fidelissimos, et in pace dicto semper audientes, experti fuissent. Utque serenitas vestra regalis in cæteris omnibus et benignè et gloriosè factis avorum suorum vestigiis optimè insistit, ita in hoc nolit ab iisdem discedere etiam atque etiam obsecramus; sed et hoc edictum, et si quod aliud inquietandis reformatæ religionis causâ subditis suis rogatum sit, uti abroget; ipsos patriis sedibus atque bonis restituat; concessa jura ac libertatem pristinam ratam iis faciat; accepta damna sarciri, et eorum vexationibus finem imponi jubeat. Quod si fecerit regalis celsitudo vestra, et rem Deo acceptissimam fecerit, miseros illos et calamitosos erexerit et recreârit, et à suis omnibus vicinis, quotquot reformatam religionem colunt, maximam gratiam inierit; nobisque potissimùm, qui vestram in illos benignitatem atque clementiam obtestationis nostræ fructum arbitrabimur. Quod et ad omnes officiorum reddendas vices nos obligaverit; nec stabiliendæ solùm verum etiam augendæ inter hanc remp. vestramque ditionem necessitudinis et amicitiæ fundamenta firmissima jecerit. Neque verò hoc minus ab justitia vestra et moderatione animi nobis pollicemur: quam in partem Deum Opt. Max. oramus uti mentem vestram et cogitationes flectat: vobisque adeo vestroque populo pacem, ac veritatem, et successus rerum omnium felices, ex animo precamur.

Alba Aula, Maio, 1655.

Serenissime Princeps;

Ex literis vestris sexto-decimo Novembris 1654, ad nos datis, singularem erga nos benevolentiam vestram atque studium perspeximus; et internuntius vester, qui illas nobis literas dedit, de contrahenda nobiscum societate et amicitia voluntatem vestram ampliùs coram exposuit. Nos certè occasionem hanc esse datam, unde nostrum quoque erga vos animum, et quanti celsitudinem vestram meritò faciamus, declarare atque ostendere possimus, haud mediocriter sanè gaudemus. Cum autem vestra in rempublicam christianam præclara merita laboresque suscepti ad nos usque famâ pervenerint, et hæc omnia certiùs, et quæ amplius rei christianæ vel defendendæ vel promovendæ causâ in animo habeatis, celsitudo vestra suis literis communicata nobis amicissimè voluerit, ea uberiorem insuper lætandi materiam nobis attulere: Deum nempe iis in regionibus excitâsse sibi tam potentem atque egregium suæ gloriæ ac providentiæ ministrum; qui, cum virtute atque armis tantum possit, de religione communi Protestantium tuenda, cui nunc undique malè et dictum et factum est, nobiscum unà sociare consilia cupiat. Deus autem, qui utrisque nobis, tametsi locorum intervallo tam longè disjunctis, eundem religionis orthodoxæ defendendæ studium atque animum injecit, dubium non est quin earum præcipue rationum author nobis futurus sit, unde et nobis, et inter nos, et reformatorum reliquis principibus ac civitatibus, hac in re maximo esse adjumento atque usui possimus, occasionibus certè omnibus intenti, si quas Deus obtulerit, iis quod ad nos attinet, eodem Deo benè juvante, non deerimus. Interea celsitudini vestræ sine summo dolore commemorare non possumus, quantâ inclementiâ dux Allobrogum subditos suos Alpinarum quarundam vallium incolas, orthodoxam religionem retinentes, persequutus sit. Quos non solùm severissimo edicto, quotquot Romanam religionem suscipere recusârunt, sedes avitas bonaque omnia relinquere coëgit; verùm etiam suo exercitu adortus est, qui multos crudelissime concidit, alios barbarè per exquisitos cruciatus necavit, partem verò maximam in montes expulit fame et frigore absumendam, exustis domibus, et siqua eorum bona ab illis carnificibus non sint direpta. Hæc ut ad vos jamdudum nuntiata sunt, et celsitudini vestræ tantam crudelitatem graviter displicuisse, et vestram opem atque auxilium, quantum in vobis est, illis miserrimis, siqui tot cædibus atque miseriis adhuc supersunt, non defuturum, nobis facilè persuadetur. Nos literas duci Sabaudiæ, ad deprecandum ejus infensum in suos animum, jam scripsimus; sicut et Gallorum regi, idem ut is etiam velit facere; vicinis denique reformatæ religionis principibus, uti de illa sævitia tam immani quid nos sentiamus intelligere possint: quæ quanquam in illos inopes primum cœpta est, idem tamen omnibus eandem religionem profitentibus minatur: eoque majorem illis prospiciendi sibi in commune suisque omnibus consulendi necessitatem imponit: quam et nos eandem rationem, prout Deus nobis in animum induxerit, semper sequemur. Id quod celsitudo vestra persuadere sibi poterit quemadmodum et de singulari nostro erga se studio atque affectu, quo prosperos rerum omnium successus vobis animitus exoptamus; et vestra incœpta omnia atque conatus, quibus Evangelii cultorumque ejus libertati studetis, fœlicem exitum sortiri volumus.

Alba Aula, Maio, 1655.

PERVENISSE nuper in regna vestra illius edicti acerbissimi famam, quo dux Sabaudiæ subjectos sibi Alpinos incolas, reformatam religionem profitentes, funditùs afflixit, et nisi religione Romana suam mutare fidem à majoribus acceptam intra dies viginti velint, patriis sedibus exterminari jussit, unde multis interfectis, cæteri spoliati, et ad interitum certissimum expositi, per incultissimos montes hyememque perpetuam, fame et frigore confecti, cum conjugibus ac parvulis jam nunc aberrant; et hæc graviter tulisse majestatem vestram nobis persuasissimum est. Nam Protestantium nomen atque causam, tametsi inter se de rebus non maximis dissentiunt, communem tamen et penè unam esse, adversariorum par in omnes Protestantes odium facilè demonstrat. Et Suecorum reges suam eum reformatis conjunxisse semper causam, illatis etiam in Germaniam armis ad Protestantium religionem sine discrimine tuendam, nemo est qui ignoret: petimus imprimis igitur, idque majorem in modum, à majestate vestra (nisi id jam fecerit, quod et reformatorum aliæ respublicæ et nos fecimus) ut cum Sabaudiæ duce per literas velit agere; suaque authoritate interposita, et hanc tantam edicti atrocitatem ab hominibus cum innocuis tum religiosis deprecando, si fieri potest, avertere conetur: etenim hæc initia tam sæva quo spectent, quid nobis omnibus minentur, admonere vestram majestatem supervacuum esse arbitramur. Quòd si is iræ suæ, quam nostris omnium precibus, auscultare maluerit: nobis profecto, siquod est vinculum, siqua religionis charitas aut communio credenda atque colenda est, communicato prius vestra cum majestate cæterisque reformatorum primoribus consilio, alia quamprimùm ineunda ratio erit, qua provideri maturè possit, nè tanta innocentissimorum fratrum nostrorum multitudo omni ope destituta miserrimè pereat. Quod idem quin majestati vestræ visum jam sit atque decretum cum nullo modo dubitemus, nihil consultius, ut nostra quidem fert sententia, esse poterit quam ut gratiam, authoritatem, consilia, opes, et siquid aliud necesse est, in hanc rem primo quoque tempore conferamus. Interea majestatem vestram Deo Opt. Max. commendatam ex animo volumus.

EDICTUM ducis Sabaudiæ nuperrimum in subjectos sibi Alpinos incolas, orthodoxam religionem antiquitus profitentes, quo illi edicto, ni intra dies viginti fidem Romanam amplectantur, exuti fortunis omnibus, patriæ quoque sedes relinquere jubentur, et quanta crudelitate in homines innoxios atque inopes, nostrosque, quod maximè refert, in Christo fratres, illius edicti auctoritas grassata sit, occisis permultis ab exercitûs parte contra eos missa, direptis reliquis atque domo expulsis, unde illi cum conjugibus ac liberis fame et frigore conflictari inter asperrimos montes nivesque perpetuas jamdiu coacti sunt, rumore et vicinis undique ex locis creberrimis literis ac nunciis cognovisse vos jamdudum existimamus. Qua autem animi commotione, quo sensu fraternæ calamitatis, hæc vos affecerint, facilè ex dolore nostro qui certe est gravissimus intelligere videmur. Qui enim eodem religionis vinculo conjuncti sumus, quidni iisdem plane affectibus in tam gravi atque indigna fratrum nostrorum commoveremur? Et vestra quidem in orthodoxos, ubicunque locorum disjectos atque oppressos, spectata pietas atque in multis ecclesiarum difficultatibus et adversis rebus jam sæpe cognita est. Ego certe, nisi me fallit animus, quavis in re potius, quàm studio et charitate erga fratres religionis causâ violatos atque afflictos, vinci sustineam: quandoquidem ecclesiarum salutem atque pacem incolumitati etiam propriæ libens prætulerim. Quod igitur hactenus potuimus, ad Sabaudiæ ducem scripsimus; suppliciter penè rogantes, ut in hos homines in-nocentissimos et subditos et supplices suos placatiorem animum ac voluntatem suscipiat, suas sedes atque fortunas miseris reddat, pristinam etiam in religione libertatem concedat. Scripsimus præterea ad summos Protestantium principes et magistratus, ad quos hæc maximè pertinere judicavimus, ut in Sabaudiæ duce exorando suam conferre operam nobiscum unà velint. Hæc eadem, et plura, forsitan vos quoque fecistis. Nam exemplum hoc tam periculosum, et instaurata nuper in reformatos tanta crudelitas, si auctoribus bene cedat, quantum in discrimen adducta religio sit vestram commonefacere prudentiam nihil attinet. Et is quidem si flecti nostris omnium precibus et exorari se passus erit, præclarum nos atque uberem suscepti hujus laboris fructum ac præmium reportabimus. Sin ea in sententia perstiterit, ut apud quos nostra religio vel ab ipsis evangelii primis doctoribus tradita per manus et incorruptè servata, vel multo antè quàm apud cæteras gentes sinceritati pristinæ restituta est, eos ad summam desperationem redactos, deletos funditùs ac perditos velit, paratos nos esse commune aliquod vobiscum cæterisque reformatis fratribus ac sociis consilium capere, quo et saluti pereuntium justorum consulere commodissimè queamus, et is demum sentiat orthodoxorum injurias atque miserias tam graves non posse nos negligere. Valete.

Civitatibus Helvetiorum Evangelicis.

Non dubitamus quin ad aures vestras aliquanto citius quàm ad nostras illa nuper calamitas pervenerit Alpinorum hominum religionem nostram profitentium, qui Sabaudiæ ducis in fide ac ditione cùm sint, sui principis edicto patriis sedibus emigrare jussi, ni intra triduum satisdedissent se Romanam religionem suscepturos, mox armis petiti et ab exercitu ducis sui occisi, etiam permulti in exilium ejecti, nunc sine lare, sine tecto, nudi, spoliati, afflicti, fame et frigore moribundi, per montes desertos atque nives cum conjugibus ac liberis miserrimè vagantur. Multo est minus cur dubitemus quin hæc, ut primum vobis nuntiata sunt, pari atque nos tantarum miseriarum sensu, eoque fortasse graviore quo illorum finibus propiores estis, dolore affecerint. Vestrum enim in primis orthodoxæ fidei studium egregium, summamque in ea cum retinenda constantiam tum defendenda fortitudinem, abundè novimus. Cum itaque religionis arctissimâ communione fratres, vel potius unum corpus, cum his miseris vos pariter nobiscum sitis, cujus membrum nullum affligi sine sensu, sine dolore, sine detrimento atque periculo reliquorum potest, scribendum ad vos hac de re et significandum censuimus, quanti nostrum omnium interesse arbitremur, ut fratres nostros ejectos, atque inopes communi ope atque auxilio, quoad fieri potest, juvemus et consolemur; nec eorum tantummodo malis et miseriis removendis, verum etiam nequid serpat latius, nequid periculi exemplo atque eventu vel nobis omnibus creari possit, maturè prospiciamus. Literas nos quidem ad Sabaudiæ ducem scripsimus, quibus, uti cum subditis suis fidelissimis pro clementiâ suâ lenius agat, eosque jam prope perditos suis sedibus ac bonis restituat, vehementer petivimus. Et his quidem nostris, vel nostrûm potius omnium conjunctis precibus, exoratum iri principem serenissimum, quodque ab eo tanto opere petivimus, facile concessurum speramus. Sin illi in mentem secùs venerit, communicare vobiscum consilia parati sumus, qua potissimum ratione oppressos tot injuriis atque vexatos innocentissimos homines, nobisque charissimos in Christo fratres, sublevare atque erigere, et ab interitu certissimo atque indignissimo conservare, possimus. Quorum salutem atque incolumitatem pro vestra pietate vobis quam maxime cordi esse confido: Ego eam certe vel gravissimis meis rationibus, immò incolumitate propriâ, potiorem habendam esse existimem. Valete.

Serenissime potentissimeque Rex;

Ex literis majestatis vestræ, quibus illa ad meas quinto et vigesimo Maii proximi datas rescribit, facilè intelligo nequaquam fefellisse me eam opinionem, qua mihi quidem persuasum erat, cædes illas immanissimas, barbaramque eorum hominum stragem, qui religionem reformatam in Sabaudia profitentur, à cohortibus quibusdam vestris factam, neque jussu vestro neque mandato accidisse. Quæ quantum majestati vestræ displicuerit, id vos vestris militum tribunis, qui hæc tam inhumana suo solo impetu injussi perpetraverant, ita maturè significâsse, deque tanta crudelitate ducem ipsum Sabaudiæ monuisse, pro reducendis denique istis miseris exulibus unde pulsi sunt, vestram omnem gratiam, necessitudinem, authoritatem tanta cum fide atque humanitate interposuisse, majorem equidem in modum sum lætatus. Ea nempe spes erat, illum principem voluntati ac precibus majestatis vestræ aliquid saltem hac in re fuisse concessurum. Verùm cum neque vestro, neque aliorum principum rogatu atque instantia, in miserorum causa quicquam esse impetratum perspiciam, haud alienum ab officio meo duxi, ut hunc nobilem virum, extraordinarii nostri commissarii munere instructum, ad Allobrogum ducem mitterem; qui tantæ crudelitatis in ejusdem nobiscum religionis cultores, idque ipsius religionis odio adhibitæ, quo sensu afficiar, uberiùs eidem exponat. Atque hujus quidem legationis eo feliciorem exitum speravero, si adhibere denuò et adhuc majore cum instantia suam authoritatem atque operam majestati vestræ placuerit; et quemadmodum fideles fore illos inopes dictoque audientes principi suo ipsa in se recepit, ita velit eorundem incolumitati atque saluti cavere, ne quid iis hujusmodi injuriæ et calamitatis atrocissimæ innocentibus et pacatis deinceps inferatur. Hoc cum in se justum ac verè regium sit, necnon benignitati vestræ atque clementiæ, quæ tot subditos vestros eandem illam religionem sequentes ubique salvos et incolumes præstat, summè consentaneum, à majestate vestra, ut par est, non possumus quin expectemus. Quæ hac simul operâ, cum universos per sua regna Protestantes, quorum studium erga vos summaque fides maximis in rebus perspecta jam sæpe et cognita est, arctiùs sibi devinxerit, tum exteris etiam omnibus persuasum reddiderit, nihil ad hoc facinus contulisse regis consilium, quicquid ministri regii atque præfecti contulerunt. Præsertim si majestas vestra pœnas ab iis ducibus ac ministris debitas repetiverit, qui authoritate propria, suaque pro libidine, tam immania patrare scelera sunt ausi. Interea cum majestas vestra factum hoc inhumanissimum, quo dignum est odio, aversari se testetur, non dubito quin miseris illis atque ærumnosis ad vos confugientibus, tutissimum in regno suo receptum atque perfugium sit præbitura; nec subditorum suorum cuiquam, ut contra eos duci Allobrogum auxilio adsit, permissura. Extremum illud est, ut majestatem vestram, quanti apud me sua amicitia sit, certiorem faciam: Cujus rei neque fructum ullo tempore defuturum confirmo.

Alba Aula, Julii 29, 1655. Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus, OLIVERIUS Prot. Reip. Angliæ, &c.

Eminentissimo Domino Cardinali MAZARINO.

Eminentissime Domine Cardinalis;

Alba Aula, Julii 29, 1655. Eminentiæ vestræ studiosissimus, OLIVERIUS, Prot. Reipub. Angliæ.

OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ, Serenissimo Principi FREDERICO III. Daniæ, Norwegiæ, &c. Regi, Salutem.

QUAM severo nuper et inclementi edicto, Allobrogum dux Immanuel suos ipse subditos Alpinarum vallium incolas, innoxios homines et religionis cultu purioris jam multis ab seculis notos ac celebres, religionis causâ finibus patriis exegerit, et, occisis permultis, reliquos per illa desertissima loca malis omnibus et miseriis inopes ac nudos exposuerit, et audisse jamdudum arbitramur majestatem vestram, et gravissimum ex ea re, prout tantum reformatæ fidei defensorem ac principem decuit, dolorem percepisse. Siquidem pro institutis christianæ religionis quæ mala atque miserias pars aliqua nostrorum patitur, earum sensu penitus eodem tangi omnes debemus; et sanè omnibus nobis et universo Protestantium nomini hujus facti eventus atque exemplum, quid periculi ostendat, nemo vestra majestate, si nos ejus pietatem atque prudentiam rectè novimus, melius videt. Scripsimus itaque libenter, ut quem dolorem ob hanc fratrum innocentissimorum calamitatem, quam sententiam, quod judicium de re tota vestrum esse speramus, idem planè et nostrum esse significemus. Itaque ad ducem Sabaudiæ literas dedimus, in quibus uti miseris atque supplicibus parcat, illudque atrox edictum porrò esse ratum ne sinat, magnopere ab eo petivimus. Quod si majestas vestra cæterique reformatorum principes fecerint, ut jam fecisse credimus, spes est leniri posse serenissimi ducis animum, et hanc iram suam tot saltem vicinorum principum intercessioni atque instantiæ condonaturum; sin perseverare in instituto suo maluerit, paratos nos esse testamur, cum majestate vestra, cæterisque religionis reformatæ sociis, eam inire rationem, quâ tot miserorum hominum subvenire quamprimum inopiæ, providere saluti ac libertati, pro virili parte nostra possimus. Vestræ interea majestati bona omnia atque fausta à Deo Opt. Max. precamur.

Westmonasterio, Maio, 1655.

OLIVERIUS Prot. Reipub. Angliæ, &c. Amplissimis Consulibus et Senatoribus Civitatis Genevensis, Salutem.

SUMMUM dolorem nostrum quem ex maximis et inauditis Protestantium calamitatibus valles quasdam Pedemontanas incolentium percepimus, quos Allobrogum dux tanta crudelitate persequutus est, jampridem vobis exposuissemus, nisi id magis operam dedissemus, ut eodem tempore intelligeretis tantis eorum miseriis non affici nos solum, verum etiam de sublevandis iis atque solandis, quantum in nobis est, prospicere. Quapropter eleemosynas per hanc totam rempublicam colligendas curavimus: quas ejusmodi fore haud immeritò expectamus, quæ nationis hujus affectum erga fratres suos tam immania perpessos demonstrare possint, et quemadmodum religionis eadem utrinque communio est, ita sensum quoque eundem calamitatum esse; interea dum pecuniæ collectio maturatur, quod sine spatio temporis fieri nequit, et miserorum istorum egestas atque inopia pati moram non potest, necessarium duximus duo millia librarum Anglicarum, quanta fieri potuit celeritate, præmittere inter eos distribuenda qui præsentissima ope atque solatio indigere maximè videbuntur. Cum autem nescii non simus innocentissimorum hominum miseriæ atque injuriæ quantopere vos affecerint, nec vobis quicquam labori aut molestiæ fore quod illis adjumento atque auxilio esse possit, prædictam pecuniæ summam illis calamitosis curandam ac numerandam ad vos transferre non dubitavimus; idque vobis negotii dare, ut pro vestra pietate ac prudentia providere velitis qua ratione æquissima quam primum illa pecunia egentissimis quibusque distribui queat, ut quamvis summa sane exigua sit, aliquid tamen sit saltem, quo illi inopes recreari ac refici in præsens aliquantum possint, donec uberiorem iis copiam suppeditare poterimus: vos hanc vobis datam molestiam æqui bonique consulturos esse cum non dubitemus, tum etiam Deum Opt. Max. oramus, uti populo suo religionem orthodoxam profitenti det animum sui in commune defendendi, sibique mutuò opem ferendi contra hostes suos immanissimos; qua in re

Junii 8, 1655. Mille quingentæ libræ de prædictis bis millibus à Gerardo Hensh Parisiis, quingentæ reliquæ per literas à Domino Stoupio, curabuntur.

OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ, Serenissimo Principi Venetiarum Duci.

Serenissime Princeps;

CUM rebus vestris omnibus contra hostem præsertim christiani nominis prospere gestis lætari semper consuevimus, tum et illo navalis prælii novissimo successu nequaquam sanè dolemus, quamvis id aliquo nostrorum cum detrimento accidisse intelligamus. Ostenderunt enim nobis, per libellum supplicem, negotiatores quidam nostri, Gulielmus et Daniel Gulielmi necnon Edoardus Bealus, navem suam, cui nomen Princeps Magnus, Constantinopolim ab se commercii causâ missam nuper fuisse: eam navem ab aulæ Turcicæ ministris ad commeatum et milites in Cretam insulam deportandos retentam, dum in illa classe Turcarum coacta eo navigaret, quæ à classe Venetorum oppugnata in itinere et superata est, captam et Venetias abductam, ab maritimarum causarum judicibus adjudicatam publicò fuisse. Cum itaque, inscientibus dominis et nullo modo probantibus, navis illa Turcis operam dare invitissima coacta sit, seque ex ea pugna explicare militibus referta non potuerit; serenitatem vestram magnopere rogamus, ut sententiam illam maritimæ curiæ velit nostræ amicitiæ condonare, navemque illam suis dominis, de vestra republica nullo suo facto malè meritis, restituendam curare. Qua in re impetranda, nobis præsertim petentibus, cum mercatores ipsos de vestra clementia benè sperare videamus, nos utique de ea dubitare non debemus: qui et præclara vestra concilia remque Venetam terrâ marique maxime uti pergat fortunare Deus omnipotens ex animo optamus.

Serenitatis vestræ Venetæque Reip. studiosissimus,

OLIVERIUS Prot. Reip. Angliæ, &c. Serenissimo Principi LUDOVICO Galliarum Regi.

Serenissime Rex;

MERCATORES aliquot nostrates, quorum nomina sunt Samuel Mico, Gulielmus Cocainus, Georgius Poynerus, aliique complures, per libellum supplicem nobis ostenderunt se, anno 1650, in navem quandam, cui insigne unicornus erat, permagnas rationes suas contulisse: eam navem bombyce, oleo, aliisque mercibus onustam, quæ, plus minus, triginta quatuor millibus librarum nostrarum ab iisdem æstimata sunt, ab nave prætoria et proprætoria majestatis vestræ in Mediterraneo Mari Orientali oppressam atque captam fuisse: nostros autem illa in navi, propterea quod nobis eo tempore cum Gallis illibata pax erat, cum contra naves regias vi se defendere noluissent, promissis Pauli et Terrerii navarchorum inductos, qui velle se nostros dimittere aiebant, prolatis onerum libellis, maritimis legibus paruisse: mercatores proinde suprà dictos procuratorem suum, qui navem illam ac bona restituenda sibi peteret, in Galliam misisse: ibi post triennium eoque amplius consumptum, cum ad sententiam de restitutione ferendam perventum jam esset, cardinalis Mazarini eminentiam eorum procuratori Hugoni Morello factam mercatoribus istis injuriam agnovisse; datumque iri satisfactionem, ut primùm confirmata pax inter utramque gentem, fœdusque, quod tum agitabatur, confectum atque ratum esset, in se recepisse: immò recentiùs majestatis vestræ apud nos legatum excellentissimum dominum de Bordeaux, ex mandato vestro vestrique concilii, disertis verbis confirmâsse, hujus navis atque bonorum peculiari exceptione habitum iri rationem, etiam seorsim ab iis controversiis, de quibus in commune decidendis ex fœdere provisum est: hujus promissi legatum ipsum, qui nunc percommodè negotiorum quorundam suorum causâ ad vos transmeavit, testem esse posse locupletem. Quæ cum ita sunt, jusque horum mercatorum in repetendis rebus suis tam præclare constet, à majestate vestra majorem in modum petimus, ut in eo obtinendo nulla iis mora diutiùs afferatur, velitque nostro rogatu has nobis redintegratæ amicitiæ et instaurati recèns fœderis esse primitias. Quod et fore confidimus, vobisque fausta omnia vestroque regno à Deo Opt. Max. precamur.

Civitatibus Helvetiorum Evangelicis.

Ex vestris ad nos tam actis publicis per commissarios nostros Genevâ transmissis, quàm literis 27 Decembris Tyguri datis, quo in loco res vestræ sint, cum non sint optimo, satis superque intelligimus: In quo etsi pacem vestram, tamque diuturnum sociale fœdus ruptum, dolemus, tamen cum id vestra culpâ nequaquam accidisse appareat, novam hinc vobis ex adversariorum iniquitate et pertinacia illustrandæ fortitudinis, constantiæque vestræ in evangelica fide jam olim cognitæ, parari rursus materiem confidimus. Nam Suitenses, qui, religionem nostram si quis amplectatur, capitale censent, quid moliantur, quibus hortatoribus tam hostiles spiritus in orthodoxam religionem susceperint, latere neminem potest, cui modò indignissima illa fratrum nostrorum in Pedemontio facta strages animo nondum excidit. Quapropter, dilectissimi amici, quod soletis esse, aspirante Deo fortes estote; jura vestra atque fœdera, immo conscientiæ libertatem, religionemque ipsam idolorum cultoribus obculcandam, concedere nolite; vosque ita parate, ut non propriæ duntaxat libertatis atque salutis propugnatores esse videamini, sed ut fratribus quoque vicinis, Pedemontanis præsertim illis ærumnosissimis, quibus potestis rebus, opitulari atque adesse possitis: hoc certò persuasi per illorum corpora ac neces ad vestra latera illum nuper aditum fuisse patefactum. De me scitote, incolumitatem vestram resque prosperas non minùs mihi curæ ac solicitudini esse, quàm si in hac nostra Rep. coortum hoc incendium, quàm si in nostras cervices expeditæ Sultensium secures illæ (sicuti revera sunt in omnes reformatos) strictique enses essent. Ut primum itaque à vobis de statu rerum vestrarum, et obstinato hostium animo, certiores facti sumus, adhibitis in concilium viris quibusdam honestissimis, et ecclesiæ aliquot ministris pietate spectatissimis, de subsidio vobis mittendo, quantum quidem rationes nostræ in præsentia ferre possunt, ea decrevimus, quæ commissarius noster Pellus vobiscum communicabit. De cætero vestra omnia consilia, causamque imprimis hanc vestram justissimam sive pace sive bello tuendam, Deo Opt. Max. fautori commendare non desinimus.

Vestrarum amplitudinum ac dignitatum studiosissimus,

OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ, &c. Serenissimo Principi CAROLO GUSTAVO, Dei Gratia Suecorum, Gothorum, Vandalorumque Regi, Magno Principi Finlandiæ, &c.

Serenissime Rex;

CUM amicorum inter se mutua omnia, tam adversa quam prospera, atque communia debere esse nemo non intelligat, quòd jucundissimam amicitiæ partem majestas vestra, gaudium nempe suum impertitum nobis, per suas literas voluerit, non potest id quidem nobis non esse longè gratissimum: quandoquidem et hoc singularis indicium humanitatis verèque regiæ est, ut nec vivere, ita ne gaudere quidem sibi soli velle nisi amicos quoque et fœderatos eâdem, quâ se, lætitiâ affectos esse sentiat. Itaque regi tam præstanti et natum esse filium principem, quem paternæ virtutis atque gloriæ speremus hæredem, meritò gaudemus, et idem quod regi olim fortissimo, Philippo Macedoni, sive felicitatis sive decoris, domi simul et foris, contigisse gratulamur: Cui eodem tempore et natus Alexander filius, et Illyricorum gens potentissima subacta, memoratur. Nam et Poloniæ regnum vestris armis ab imperio papano, quasi cornu quoddam, avulsum, et cum duce Brandenburgico pax piorum votis omnium exoptata, frendentibus licèt adversariis, facta, quin ad ecclesiæ pacem atque fructum permagnum sit momentum habitura non dubitamus. Det modò finem Deus tam præclaris initiis dignum; det modò filium, virtute, pietate, rebusque gestis patri similem: id quod et auguramur sanè, et à Deo Opt. Max. tam vestris rebus jam antè propitio, ex animo precamur.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,
OLIVERIUS Prot. Reip. Angliæ, &c.

Westmonasterio, Feb. 1655.

Daniæ Regi.

Serenissime ac potentissime Princeps;

QUESTI sunt per libellum supplicem, suo aliorumque mercatorum Londinensium nomine nobis exhibitum, Joannes Fremannus et Philippus Travesius, hujus reip. cives, se circiter mensem Octobris 1653, cum in navem quandam Sunderburgensem, cui nomen Salvatori, Nicolao Weinshiuks magistro, merces varias, pannum laneum, aliamque vestem textilem ac mercimonia plus tribus millibus librarum æstimata imposuissent, magistro mandasse, ut per fretum Balticum recto cursu Dantiscum navigaret, utque ad Elsenorum vectigal solveret, eique etiam pecuniam ad eam rem curasse: supradictum tamen magistrum perfidiosè, et contrà quàm ipsi à mercatoribus mandatum erat, prætervectum Elsenorum nullo portorio soluto Balticum pernavigasse. Navisque per hanc causam cum toto onere, non sine magno mercatorum damno, publicata atque retenta est. Quorum in gratiam jampridem ad legatum majestatis vestræ, Londini tunc temporis commorantem, scripsimus; qui, ut ipsi aiunt, pollicitus est, ut primum ad majestatem vestram rediisset, daturum operam, uti ratio mercatorum haberetur. Verum cum is postea aliis in regionibus majestatis vestræ negotia obiret, et ante discessum ejus et postea frustra se cum adiise ostendunt: unde procuratorem suum mittere coacti sunt, qui jus suum Hafniæ persequeretur, navemque illam ac bona liberari, sibique reddi, flagitaret: verum exinde nullum se fructum percepisse, nisi ut ad damna vetera novas impensas, et susceptum frustra laborem, adjungerent: cum fisco damnata, et retenta hactenus sint bona, tametsi ex lege Daniæ, quemadmodum ipsi in libello suo demonstrant, magister quidem navis ob suum delictum est ipse puniendus, navisque, non bona proscriptioni sunt obnoxia: eoque gravius accidisse sibi hoc malum existimant, quòd, sicuti nobis pernotum est, vectigal illud, quod Elsenoræ solvere debuisset, est admodum exiguum. Quapropter, cum mercatores nostri nullam proscriptioni causam præbuisse videantur, confessusque ipse magister paulo ante obitum sit, suo solùm delicto illatum hoc mercatoribus detrimentum esse, cumque pater defuncti jam magistri ipse per libellum supplicem majestati vestræ exhibitum, sicuti nos accepimus, culpam omnem in filium suum contulerit, mercatores absolverit, haud sane potuimus quin navis illius bonorumque retentionem iniquissimam esse arbitraremur; adeoque confidimus, simulatque majestas vestra hac de re certior facta erit, fore ut non modo has ministrorum suorum injurias improbet, verum etiam ipsos rationem reddere, bonaque illa suis dominis eorumve procuratoribus quamprimum restitui, damnaque inde data sarciri, jubeat. Quod et nos à majestate vestra majorem in modum petimus, utpote rem usque adeo æquam et rationi consentaneam, ut æquiorem petere aut expectare in causa tam justa nostrorum civium non posse videamur, haud minus æqua vestris subditis, quoties data occasio erit, reddituri.

Serenissime Rex;

QUAM pacem et amicitiam cum Anglicana republica majestas vestra, legatione amplissima ac splendidissima jampridem ad nos missa, expetivit, eam à parlamento, quæ tum potestas rebus præfuit, inchoatam, et à nobis summo semper studio exoptatam, Deo imprimis favente, proque ea quam accepimus reipublicæ administratione, feliciter tandem confecimus, et in perpetuum, uti spes est, sanximus. Itaque legatum vestrum extraordinarium dominum, Joannem Rodericum de Saa Meneses, comitem Pennaguiadanum, virum cum majestatis vestræ judicio comprobatum, tum humanitate, ingenio, prudentiâ, fide, præstantissimum à nobis repertum, cum expleti muneris egregia laude, et reportata secum pace, vobis reddimus. Quòd autem, per literas secundo die Aprilis Ulyssipone datas, majestas vestra quanti nos faciat, quamque impensè dignitati nostræ faveat, nósque rempublicam suscepisse gubernandam quantopere lætata sit, haud obscuris indiciis singularis benevolentiæ testatur, id vero mihi gratissimum esse, ex meis in majestatem vestram paratissimis omni tempore officiis, dabo operam ut facilè posthac omnes intelligant. Neque segniùs interea pro incolumitate vestra, vestrique regni felici statu, rerumque prospero successu, conceptis ad Deum precibus contendo.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,
Oliverius Reipub. Angliæ, Scotiæ, Hiberniæ, &c. Protector.

Excelsi et præpotentes Domini, amici charissimi;

Ostendunt nobis mercatores quidam, cives nostri, Thomas Busselus, Richardus Bearus, aliique socii, navem quandam suam, Edmundi et Joannis nomine insignitam, dum ab ora Brasiliana Olyssiponem contenderet, ab navi quadam prædatoria Flissengensi, cui nomen Rubro Leoni, magister Lambertus Bartelsonus, oppugnatam se dedidisse; verum ea lege et pacto (id quod ipsum Lamberti chirographum obsignatum testabitur) ut navis, et quæcunque in illa fuissent Anglorum bona, Flissingæ restituerentur: eò cum appulsum est, navem quidem et nauticorum peculia reddita, mercatorum Anglicorum bona adempta, eorumque auctionem statim esse factam: se, mercatores nempe quibus hoc damni datum est, cum in foro Flissingensium suas res repeterent, iniquissima sententia lata, litem cum grandibus impensis post quinquennium perdidisse, ab iis nimirum judicibus abjudicatam, quorum nonnulli, cum in illa navi prædatoria suas rationes collatas habuissent, et judices et adversarii et rei simul erant: nihil jam sibi superesse spei nisi in vestra æquitate et incorrupta fide, ad quam nunc demum confugiunt: eam sibi fore propensiorem existimârunt, si nostra commendatio accessisset. Et hominibus condonandum hoc sane est, si in hac tanta fortunarum suarum dimicatione omnia timentibus, quid ab summa auctoritate atque potentia vestra sibi metuendum, quam quid apud integros præsertim judices de sua causa sit bene sperandum, sæpius in mentem veniat: nos quin religione, justitia, integritate vestra potius quam rogatu nostro adducti, quod æquum, quod justum, quod vobis denique dignum est judicaturi sitis, non dubitamus. Deus vos vestramque rempub. ad gloriam suam, suæque ecclesiæ præsidium, conservet!

Serenissime Princeps;

Perfunctus legatione sua apud nos Petrus Julius Coictus, atque ita perfunctus ut sua debita laude non inornatus à nobis dimittendus sit, ad majestatem vestram revertitur. Fuit enim cùm vestro præcipuè nomine, quod jure apud nos plurimi esse debet, nobis gratissimus, tum suo etiam merito, suo nempe munere diligentissimè obito, haud parum acceptus. Quam igitur commendationem vestram de eo accepimus, eam (si quid ad eam accedere testimonio ullo potest) et ab ipso impletam, et à vobis meritissimè datam, libentes utique testamur: quemadmodum et is poterit nostrum erga majestatem vestram singulare studium et observantiam, eadem fide atque integritate ad vos referre, verissimeque exponere. Extremum illud est ut majestati vestræ felicitatem omnem victoriarumque cursum contra omnes hostes ecclesiæ perpetuum, à Deo Opt. Maximoque optemus.

Serenissime Princeps;

Adierunt ad nos, per libellum supplicem, Joannes Dethic urbis Londini in hunc annum præfectus, et Gulielmus Wakefield mercator, conquesti, se anno 1649, Calendas circiter Octob. navem quandam, cui nomen Jonæ Londinensi, Jona quoque cognomento Lighthaghe magistro, suis mercibus, quæ Ostendam mitterentur, onerâsse: eam navem à prædone quodam Barkingensi, cui nomen White, (is filii regis Caroli defuncti nomine piraticam faciebat,) in ipso Thamesis ostio oppressam, atque inde Dunkirkam, quæ eo tempore in ditione Gallorum erat, fuisse abductam: cum autem edicto majestatis vestræ ann. 1647, et ann. rursus 1649, aliquot etiam consilii regii decretis, in gratiam parlamenti Anglicani, cautum esse intelligerent, ne naves ullæ aut merces, illius belli tempore, quoquo obtentu Anglis ereptæ, in majestatis vestræ portus quoscunque asportarentur, venalesve essent, misisse se statim Dunkirkam procuratorem suum, Hugonem Morellum negotiatorem, qui à domino Lestrado, illius oppidi per id tempus præfecto, reddi sibi suam navem cum mercibus postularet, cum eas præsertim magna ex parte adhuc integras, neque dum permutatas aut divenditas, in ipso oppido deprehendisset. Respondit præfectus, se regis Galliæ dono, ob navatam reipub. operam, præfecturam eam accepisse: curaturum proinde, uti ea sibi pretium operæ sit. Hoc responso frustratus, post magnum cum temporis tum pecuniæ dispendium, procurator domum revertitur. Petitores, quæ restat sibi spes, eam in vestra sola clementia atque justitia repositam esse vident; ad quam per nostras literas faciliorem sibi aditum fore crediderunt: ea ne desit hominibus, contra jus omne et repetita vestra interdicta spoliatis, rogamus. Quod tamen si impetrabimus, quandoquidem hoc sanè æquissimum videtur, ab insita æquitate vestra, potius quam rogatu nostro, impetratum id esse statuemus.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,
OLIVERIUS, Protector Reip. Angliæ, &c.

Excelsi et præpotentes Domini, amici charissimi;

DEMONSTRÂRUNT nobis, per libellum supplicem, Joannes Brunus, Nicolaus Gulielmus, aliique Londinenses, se, cum in navem, cui Bonæ Esperantzæ Londinensi nomen inditum erat, in Orientalem Indiam navigaturam, sortem quisque suam contulisset, procuratori suo negotium dedisse Februario mense 1644, ut bis mille quadringentas libras Belgicas ad illius navis periculum præstandum Amsterodami curaret: ea navis cum in itinere, ad oram ipsam Indiæ, ab Hollandica quadam, quæ ex navibus orientalis illius societatis erat, capta esset; qui præstando periculo se obligaverant, pactam pecuniam numerare recusâsse; et sextum jam annum posse nostros, qui summa cum assiduitate maximisque impensis jus suum persecuti sunt, dilationibus variis eludere. Quod cum petitoribus grave admodum atque iniquum videatur, et nonnulli ex iis qui se obligârunt vel jam diem obierint vel solvendo non sint, nequid fortè ad priora damna summi discriminis accedat, magnopere à vobis petimus, ut per tot annos in foro jactatis ac propriè naufragis istis vestram æquitatem portum esse atque perfugium velitis; utque de causa sua, quam illi justissimam esse confidunt, primo quoque tempore judicium fiat. Vobis interim omnia ad Dei gloriam, ecclesiæque præsidium, faustè atque feliciter evenire volumus.

Excelsi et præpotentes Domini, amici charissimi;

CONQUERUNTUR apud nos graviter iidem, de quibus antea circa idus Septemb. superioris anni literas ad vos dedimus, Thomas et Gulielmus Lower, defuncti Nicholai Lower hæredes legitimi, se adversariorum suorum sive gratiâ sive opibus oppressos, quamvis causa sua imprimis optima, et, cum id satis non esset, literis etiam nostris ter deinceps commendati fuissent, impetrare hactenus nullo modo posse ut relictam testamento hæreditatem adire sibi liceat: Ab Hollandiæ foro, ubi primùm actio instituta erat, vestram ad curiam, rejecti, inde in Zelandiam transmissi, (quæ tria in loca totidem nostras literas attulerunt,) ab Zelandia nunc rursus ad vestrum summum judicium haud inviti remittuntur: ubi enim potestas summa est, ibi æquitatem quoque summam esse sperant: si ea spes fallat, elusi atque irriti, post hanc tantam juris obtinendi causâ concursationem suam, quem demum consistendi locum habituri sint, nesciunt: nam de literis nostris, si his jam quartis nos viderint nihil proficere, non est ut in posterum quicquam sibi polliceantur. Nobis certè gratissimum erit, si post tot rejectiones, facto sine mora judicio, hæredes plurimum quidem in æquitate atque justitia vestra, aliquid etiam in authoritate apud vos nostra præsidii sibi fuisse intellexerint. Quorum de altero non dubitamus, alterum vel amicitiæ nostræ daturos vos esse confidimus.

Excelsarum et præpotentium dominationum
vestrarum studiosissimus,
OLIVERIUS Protector Reipub. Angliæ, &c.
Westmonasterio, Maio, 1656.

Serenissime Rex;

CUM mercatoribus quibusdam Anglis, à nonnullis mercatoribus Lusitanis ex societate Brasiliensi, vecturæ commorationisque nomine, ann. 1649, et 1650, grandis pecunia debeatur, quæ pecunia à supradicta societate jussu majestatis vestræ retinetur, expectabant quidem dicti mercatores uti ea pecunia ex conditionibus proximi fœderis jampridem sibi numerata esset. Verùm ne amputetur sibi spes omnis ac ratio recuperandi sua debita verentur, ex quo intelligunt statuisse majestatem vestram ut quam pecuniam Brasiliensis societas ipsis debuisset in ærarium vestrum inferretur, utque portorii dimidia pars solvendis iis debitis impenderetur; atque hoc pacto mercatores legitimum duntaxat lucrum, sive fœnus pecuniæ suæ, accepturi essent; ipsa forte interim funditùs intereunte. Quod nos nobiscum reputantes quàm durum sit, eorumque justissimis precibus victi, has nostras ad majestatem vestram literas ipsis concessimus: hoc potissimum à vobis postulantes, uti præstandum curetis, ut supradicta societas Brasiliensis hujus reipub. mercatoribus quamprimum satisfaciat, tam de summa pecuniæ cuique eorum debita, quam de fœnore quinquennali: cum hoc et per se justum sit, et fœderi nuper vobiscum inito consentaneum: quod et nos eorum nomine à majestate vestra peramicè petimus.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,

Serenissime Rex;

CUM amicitiam majestatis vestræ, tanti principis rebusque gestis tam clari, meritò plurimi faciamus, tum is, cujus operâ fœdus inter nos arctissimum sancitum est, illustrissimus dominus Christiernus Bondus, legatus vester extraordinarius necesse est gratus nobis et commendabilis hoc nomine imprimis fuerit. Hunc itaque hac legatione laudatissimè perfunctum, non sine summa cæterarum etiam virtutum egregiarum laude, ad vos dimittendum censuimus: ut qui antea in pretio apud vos atque honore fuit, nunc uberiores assiduitatis atque prudentiæ suæ fructus ex hâc nostra commendatione percepisse se sentiat. Quæ reliqua transigenda sunt, de iis legationem brevi mittendam ad majestatem vestram decrevimus: quam interim Deus incolumem defendendæ ecclesiæ suæ reique Succiæ columen conservet.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,

Serenissime Rex, amice ac fœderate charissime;

DETULERUNT ad nos, per libellum supplicem, mercatores quidam Londinenses, Richardus Baker ejusque socii, navem quandam Anglicanam ab se conductam, cui nomen vernaculum The Endeavour, magister Gulielmus Joppus, trecentis atque tredecim vini optimi culeis ex Tenariffa insula Londinum advehendis onustam, dum inter Palmam et supradictam insulam cursum teneret, à quatuor navibus Gallicis, in speciem quidem onerariis, sed prædatorium in modum armatis, quibus Ægidius de la Roche navarchus erat, primo ac vigesimo Novembris die, An. Dom. 1655, occupatam fuisse, atque in Orientalem Indiam, quo is iter sibi esse prædicabat, cum omni onere ac plerisque nautarum abductam; reliquis quatuordecim ad Guineam Nigritarum in littus quoddam expositis. Quod eo consilio Ægidius fecisse se dictitabat, nequis eorum, ex terra tam longinqua et inhumana forte elapsus, testimonio læderet. Fatebatur enim, se neque mandatis instructum, ut Anglorum naves caperet, neque alias quas poterat antea cepisse, ut propterea quod inter Gallos nostramque remp. per eos ipsos dies convenisse pacem non ignorabat: sed cum in Portugallia constitutum sibi esset commeatus accipere, et ab adversis ventis rejectus attingere ea loca non potuisset, coactum se, ad supplendum quæ opus sibi essent, iis uti quæ in ista nave reperisset: credere se proinde, illarum navium dominos de damno satisfacturos. Damnum autem constat supra sedecim mille libras Anglicas, id quod ex juratis testibus facile apparebit, mercatoribus nostris datum. Verùm si tam levibus de causis temerare acta principum religiosissima, et quasi ludibrio habere, negotiatoribus quibusvis ob sua commoda licuerit, concidet profecto omnis posthac fœderum sanctitas, omnis principum fides atque authoritas obsolescet, proque nihilo habebitur. Quapropter non rogamus tantum, sed majestatis vestræ quàm maximè interesse arbitramur, ut qui regis sui fœdus, jusque jurandum sanctissimum, primi omnium tam facile violare sunt ausi, quamprimum dent pœnas tantæ perfidiæ atque audaciæ debitas; utque illarum interea navium domini de damno, etiam ipso suorum præjudicio, mercatoribus nostris summam per injuriam illato, satisfaciant. Deus majestatem vestram diutissimè conservet, remque Gallicam contra communem utriusque nostrum hostem tueatur atque sustineat.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,
OLIVERIUS Protector Reip.

die Augusti An. Dom. 1656.

OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ Eminentissimo Domino Cardinali MAZARINO.

Eminentissime Domine;

CUM dandæ mihi literæ ad regem essent, eandem quoque ad eminentiam vestram scribendi occasionem arbitrabar mihi oblatam: cujus enim unius viri prudentia singularis Gallorum res maximas, summaque regni negotia, pari fide, consilio, ac vigilantia, moderatur, eum celari qua de re scriberem non convenire existimabam. Fœdus enim à vobis, quod dubitare nefas esset, sanctissime percussum, eodem penè die spretum ac violatum à Gallo quodam Ægidio, quatuor navium præfecto, ejusque sociis nequaquam inscientibus, querimur: quemadmodum et ex literis nostris ad regem datis, et ex ipsis mercatorum nostrorum postulatis, facile poterit cognoscere eminentia vestra; quam præter cæteros non fugit, quanti non magistratuum duntaxat, verum etiam ipsius regiæ majestatis, intersit violatores fœderum primos eos severiùs puniri. Verum illi fortasse, quo tendebant, in Orientalem Indiam jam nunc appulsi, nostrorum bona, contra jus omne atque fidem in recentissimo fœdere erepta, veluti prædam ab hostibus captam sibi habent. Illud est interea quod eminentiam vestram rogamus, ut quæ ab navium præfecto, tanquam itineri suo necessaria, nostris ablata sunt, ea ab illarum navium dominis, id quod ipsi prædatores æquum esse censebant, restituantur: qua in re vestram eminentiam, qua valet authoritate, plurimum posse intelligimus.

Eminentiæ vestræ studiosissimus,

Excelsi et præpotentes Domini, amici ac fœderati charissimi;

NON dubitamus nos quidem quin omnes testimonium hoc nobis perhibituri sint, nullas in contrahendis externis amicitiis rationes defendenda religionis veritate potiores unquam nobis fuisse, nec conjungendis eorum animis, qui Protestantium vel amici ac defensores, vel saltem non hostes essent, antiquius nos quicquam habuisse. Quo graviore animi dolore commovemur, quoties annuntiatum est, Protestantium principes ac civitates, quæ sibi mutuo amicissimæ summeque concordes esse deberent, suspectos inter se esse et non optimè animatos; vos præsertim, regemque Sueciæ, quibus fortiores orthodoxa fides defensores non habet, neque socios nostra respub. sibi conjunctiores, videri non æquè ac consuevistis vobis invicem confidere, immo indicia quædam vel nascentis inter vos dissidii, vel vacillantis amicitiæ, haud obscura apparere. Causæ quæ fuerint utrinque, et usque quo progressa animorum alienatio sit, ignotum esse nobis profitemur: veruntamen haud potuimus quin gravem sane molestiam animo caperemus ex ipsis initiis vel minimæ dissensionis inter fratres coortæ, ex qua tantum creari Protestantium rebus discrimen necesse sit; quæque si ingravescerit (quod Deus ne siverit) quantum inde Reformatis Ecclesiis periculum impenderet, quanta triumphandi materies inimicis nostris, et Hispanis potissimum, daretur, latere vestram prudentiam usumque rerum solertissimum non potest. Hispano certe tantum hinc fiduciæ, tantum spiritûs, accessit, ut non dubitaverit, per legatum suum apud vos commorantem, sua vobis consilia, idque de summa Reip. vestræ, audacissimè obtrudere: et partim injecto renovandi belli metu terrere, partim ostentata utilitatis falsa specie sollicitare vestros animos est ausus, ut relictis ejus hortatu amicis vetustis ac fidelissimis, Gallo, Anglo, atque Sueco, arctissimam cum hoste ac tyranno quondam vestro, pacato nunc scilicet, et, quod maxime metuendum est, blandiente, coire societatem velletis. Sane qui ex hoste inveteratissimo, arrepta tam levi occasione pro consiliario repente vestro se gerit, quid est quod iste sibi non sumeret, quò non audaciæ progrederetur, si cernere id semel oculis posset, quod nunc animo duntaxat concipit atque molitur, discordiam nempe inter Protestantes ac bellum intestinum. Nescii non sumus, vos, pro sapientia vestra, qui sit Europæ universæ status, quæ Protestantium præsertim conditio, sæpius cum animis vestris cogitare; Helvetiorum pagos, orthodoxam fidem sequentes, novorum motuum à popularibus suis fidem papæ sequentibus jam jamque ciendorum expectatione suspensos teneri, ex eo vix dum bello emersos, quod religionis planè causâ ab Hispano, qui hostibus eorum et duces dederat et pecuniam suppeditaverat, conflatum est atque accensum; vallium Alpinarum incolis consilia Hispanorum eandem rursus machinari cædem atque perniciem, quam superiore anno crudelissimè intulerunt; Protestantes Germanos sub ditione Cæsaris gravissimè vexari, sedesque patrias ægrè retinere; regem Sueciæ quem Deus, uti speramus, fortissimum religionis orthodoxæ propugnatorem excitavit, cum potentissimis reformatæ fidei hostibus bellum anceps atque asperrimum totis regni viribus gerere; vestris provinciis infesta vicinorum papistarum, quorum princeps Hispanus est, nuper icta fœdera minitari; nos denique indicto Hispanorum regi bello esse occupatos. In hac rerum inclinatione siqua inter vos regemque Sueciæ discordia existeret, reformatarum totius Europæ ecclesiarum quam miseranda conditio esset, quæ immanium hostium crudelitati ac furori objicerentur? Hæc nos cura haud leviter tangit; eundemque vestrum esse sensum confidimus, proque vestro in communi Protestantium causa præclaro semper studio, utque pax inter fratres eandem fidem, eandem spem sequentes intemerata servetur, vos vestra consilia ad has rationes esse accommodaturos, quæ cæteris quibuscunque anteponendæ sunt, nec quod paci inter vos Sueciæque regem stabiliendæ possit conducere, quicquam esse omissuros. Qua in re si nos usûs ullius esse possumus, quantum apud vos vel authoritate vel gratia valemus, nostram vobis operam libentissimè profitemur, Sueciæ quoque regi eandem deferre paratissimi, ad quem etiam legationem quamprimùm mittere in animo habemus, quæ hac de re quid nostræ sententiæ sit exponat. Deumque vestros utrinque animos ad moderata consilia flexurum esse speramus, vosque cohibiturum, nequid ab alterutra parte fiat quod irritare possit, remque ad extrema deducere: sed ut, contrà, pars utraque removere velit quicquid alterutri offensum aut suspiciosum esse queat. Id si feceritis, et hostes frustrabimini, et amicis solatio eritis, et vestræ denique saluti reipubl. quàm optimè prospicietis. Hoc etiam uti persuasissimum sit vobis rogamus, daturos nos esse operam, quoties facultas oblata erit, uti nostrum erga fœderatas Belgii provincias summum studium benevolentiaque appareat. Deum proinde assiduis precibus obtestamur, ut vestram remp. pace, opibus, libertate, atque imprimis Christianæ fidei amore ac vero cultu, florentissimam conservare perpetuò velit.

Ex Palatio nostro Westmon. die Aug. 1656.

Serenissime Rex;

DIE undecimo Julii proximi, stylo veteri, sanctionem pacis à majestate vestra jam ratæ, à legato vestro extraordinario Londini transactæ, necnon arcanorum et præliminarium articulorum, per Thomam Maynardum accepimus: perque literas à Philippo Meadow, nostro Olyssipone internuntio, eodem tempore datas, nostram etiam dictæ pacis et articulorum sanctionem, pro iis mandatis quæ à nobis ea de re acceperat, majestati vestræ ab ipso redditam intelligimus: cum supradicta sanctionis instrumenta ineunte Junio proximo vicissim data acceptaque fuissent, adeo ut nunc inter utramque gentem pax firmissima sancita sit. Qua ex pace nos quidem voluptatem haud mediocrem percipimus; propterea quòd eam et communi utriusque gentis utilitati fore arbitramur, hostiumque communium haud levi detrimento: qui ut prioris fœderis turbandi rationem aliquam primò invenerunt, ita nunc, ne idem instaurari fœdus posset, intentatum nihil reliquerunt. Neque dubium nobis est, quin suspicionum utrinque offensionumque inter nos materiam creandi occasionem nullam prætermissuri sint. Quas nos quidem, quantum in nobis est, quàm longissimè amovere animo nostro ita constanter decrevimus, immo ut majorem indies mutuam fiduciam hæc nostra pariat necessitudo, tam vehementer cupimus, ut eos pro hostibus habituri simus, qui ullis artibus amicitiam nostram imminuere conabuntur, inter nos nostrosque populos hac pace stabilitam; eundemque esse majestatis vestræ animum ac voluntatem facilè nobis persuademus: Cumque placuerit majestati vestræ suis in literis ad nos quarto et vigesimo Junii, stylo novo, datis, et diebus aliquot post instrumentum confirmatæ pacis datum atque acceptum nostro internuntio traditis, clausularum quarundam hujus fœderis mentionem facere, quas aliquantum immutatas velit, ut quæ huic reipublicæ, quemadmodum majestas vestra censet, levis admodum sint momenti, Portugalliæ regno maximi, peculiari tractatione agere iis de rebus quæ à majestate vestra proponuntur, et si quid præterea fœderi stabiliendo, vel etiam arctiùs obstringendo, conducere alterutri parti videbitur, parati erimus: in qua majestatis vestræ, suique populi haud secus atque nostri, ut utrisque æquè satisfiat, rationem habebimus: atque hæc omnia Olyssipone an Londini agitanda ac transigenda sint, vestra optio erit. Verùm hoc fœdere jam rato, signisque gentis utriusque ritè obsignato, dato denique vicissim atque accepto, immutare partem ejus ullam idem esset atque totum rescindere; quod majestatem vestram minimè velle pro certo habemus. Majestati vestræ fausta omnia ac prospera exoptamus.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,
OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ, &c.

Serenissime Rex;

PERLATUM ad nos est facinus illud inhumanum ac nefarium, quo cædes Philippi Meadowes, internuntii apud vos nostri, transigendæ pacis causâ à nobis missi, attentata est: cujus atrocitas tanta fuit, ut divino plane numini atque tutelæ ejus conservatio attribuenda sit. Nosque ex litteris majestatis vestræ, sexto et vigesimo Maii proximi ad nos datis, perque Thomam Maynardum nobis redditis, permotam facti indignitate majestatem vestram de authoribus jussisse quæri intelligimus, ut supplicium de iis, pro eo ac meriti sunt, sumatur. Verùm comprehensos esse ullos ex iis, aut jussa vestra hac in parte quicquam effecisse, nondum accepimus. Quapropter nostrum esse duximus palam significare, tentatum illud facinus barbarum, et partim commissum, quàm indignè feramus: atque adeo à majestate vestra postulamus, ut ab illius facinoris authoribus, sociis, administris, supplicium debitum repetatur: Et quo hoc maturiùs fiat, ut honestissimi integerrimique viri, quique gentis utriusque paci quàm maximè student, huic quæstioni præficiantur, quò res penitùs investigari, tamque in authores sceleris quam in ministros severiùs animadverti possit. Id nisi fiat, neque majestatis vestræ justitia, neque nostra hujusque reipub. existimatio, vindicari, neque conservandæ inter utramque gentem amicitiæ ulla ratio firma esse, poterit. Majestati vestræ fœlicia faustaque omnia precamur.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,

Ex Palatio nostro Westmonasterii,

Illustrissime Domine;

SINGULARE tuum erga me atque hanc rempub. studium haud mediocriter nos demeruit, tibique devinxit: id vestris ex literis, 25 Junii proximi ad me scriptis, facile perspexi, tum etiam ex iis, quas ab internuntio nostro Philippo Meadowes, conficiendæ pacis causâ ad Lusitaniæ regem à nobis misso, accepi: quibus is de eximio vestro studio atque opera in hac pace transigenda abundè nos docuit: hujus novissimam sanctionem et accepi libentissimè, mihique persuadeo fore, ut neque collatæ in hanc pacem operæ tuæ, neque in Anglos benevolentiæ, neque fidei erga regem hac in re spectatæ, unquam te pœniteat: quandoquidem, annuente Deo, sperandum est, hanc pacem et utrique genti permagna emolumenta, et hostibus incommoda haud exigua, esse allaturam. Quod solum in hoc negotio triste atque infaustum accidit, fuit illud facinus in internuntium nostrum Philippum Meadowes nefariè susceptum atque tentatum: Cujus in occultos auctores haud segnius inquiri oportuit, quam in manifestos sceleris ministros: neque de regis vestri justitia ac severitate in tanto scelere puniendo, neque de tua cum primis ad eam rem opera, ut qui fas piumque colas, et pacis inter utramque nationem studiosus fueris, dubitare possum: quæ quidem stare nullo modo potest, si facta hujusmodi nefaria impunita atque inulta ibunt. Verùm tua facinoris illius nota detestatio facit, ut necesse mihi non sit plura de hac re in præsentia dicere. Cum itaque de mea erga te benevolentia, quam et rebus omnibus demonstrare paratissimus ero, certiorem te fecerim, extremum illud est, ut te tuaque omnia divinæ benignitati ac tutelæ à me scias esse commendatissima.

Serenissime Rex, amice ac fœderate charissime;

CÙM eundem nobiscum animum, idem consilium, in majestate vestra inesse animadvertam, Protestantium fidei defendendæ contra hostes ejus, hoc tempore, si unquam aliàs, infestissimos, unde est quòd tam prosperis successibus vestris victoriarumque nuntiis penè quotidie lætemur, tum illud sanè vehementer doleo, quòd unum lætitiam hanc nostram turbat atque corrumpit, perferri ad nos, inter læta cætera, vestram cum fœderatis Belgii provinciis amicitiam pristinam non satis con-stare; remque eo deductam inter vos, in mari præsertim Baltico, ut ad discordiam spectare videatur. Cujus causas quidem ignorare me fateor; eventum certe (nisi Deus avertat) Protestantium summæ rei periculosissimum fore facile perspicio. Quapropter pro illa artissima necessitudine, quæ cum utrisque vestrûm nobis intercedit, proque eo, quo duci omnes imprimis debemus, religionis reformatæ studio atque amore, nostrum esse censuimus, quemadmodum fœderatos Belgii ordines ad pacem et æquanimitatem magnopere hortati sumus, ita nunc majestatem vestram hortari. Satis superque hostium Protestantibus ubique est: nunquam acrioribus odiis inflammati conspirâsse in exitium nostrum undique videntur. Testes Alpinæ valles, haud ita pridem miserorum cæde ac sanguine redundantes; testis Austria, edictis nuper et proscriptionibus Cæsariis concussa; testis Helvetia; quid enim attinet pluribus verbis tot calamitatum recentium memoriam luctumque revocare? Hæc omnia loca quis nescit Hispanorum et Romani pontificis consilia incendiis, cladibus, vexationibus orthodoxorum, per hoc biennium miscuisse? Si ad hæc tot mala Protestantium fratrum inter se dissensio accesserit, inter vos præsertim, quorum in virtute, opibus, constantia, præsidium ecclesiis reformatis constitutum est maximum, quantum humanæ opis est, periclitari religionem ipsam reformatam, atque in summo discrimine versari, necesse erit. Quod contra, si universum Protestantium nomen ea qua decet inter se fraterna consensione perpetuam pacem coluerit, nihil omnino erit quod pertimescamus, quid hostium vel artes vel vires incommodare nobis possint, quos sola nostra concordia vel propulsabit vel frustrabitur. Quapropter majestatem vestram majorem in modum oro atque obsecro, ut ad confirmandam cum fœderatis provinciis amicitiam pristinam, si qua in parte collapsa est aut imminuta, propensum atque benignum animum afferre velit. Siquid est in quo mea opera, fides, diligentia, ad compositionem usui esse possit, eam omnem vobis profiteor atque defero. Deus modò aspiret, faustumque esse jubeat, quod cum summa felicitate cursuque perpetuo rerum prosperarum majestati vestræ exopto.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,

Excelsi et præpotentes Domini, amici charissimi;

Demonstratum est nobis à Gulielmo Coopero, pastore Londinensi, civeque nostro, Joannem le Maire Amsterodamensem, socerum suum, ante annos circiter triginta-tres rationem quandam excogitâsse, qua reip. vestræ reditus, sine ullo populi onere, multo auctiores fierent; factaque cum Joanne Van den Brook societate partiendi inter se præmii, quod ex illo invento suo reportâssent, (id autem erat parvi sigilli in provinciis constitutio,) ob hoc celsitudines vestras præpotentes supradicto Van den Brook ejusque posteris tria millia geldricorum (quæ trecentas libras valent) in singulos annos pensitanda spospondisse: jam verò, etsi inventa illa parvi sigilli ratio facilis admodum et expedita reperta est, magnosque ex eo tempore reditus celsitudinibus præpotentibus vestris, nonnullisque vestris provinciis, retulit, tamen ad hodiernam usque diem, quamvis multa sollicitatione petitum, illius pacti præmii nihildum adnumeratum esse: unde postquam supradictis Van den Brook et le Maire longarum dilationum pertæsum est, actionem illam in supradictum Gulielmum Cooperum civem nostrum jure esse translatam: qui, cum fructum industriæ soceri sui percipere cupiat, ad nos per libellum supplicem se contulit, ut hanc ejus postulationem celsitudinibus vestris præpotentibus commendare vellemus; quod ei non esse denegandum censuimus. Quapropter celsitudines vestras præpotentes amicè rogamus, uti petitionem supradicti Gulielmi Cooperi ea de re benignè audire velitis, pactumque industriæ præmium, atque stipendium tam justum, et pro numero tot annorum præteritorum et annua deinceps pensione solvendum curare. Quod cum non dubitemus quin celsitudines vestræ præpotentes libenter facturæ sint, utpote et justum, et munificentia vestra dignum, parati et nos vicissim erimus, vestris quoque popularibus in postulatis suis, quoties nobis edentur, æquè propenso animo favere.

Serenissime Rex, amice ac fœderate charissime;

Inviti facimus ut majestatem vestram de suorum injuriis, post pacem instauratam, toties interpellemus: verùm et vos factas nolle confidimus, et nos nostrorum querimoniis deesse non possumus. Navem Antonium Diepensem ante fœdus jure captam ex judicum sententia, curiæ nostræ maritimæ præsidentium, facile constat. Ejus prædæ partem, quatuor millia plus minus coriorum, Robertus Brunus, mercator Londinensis, ab iis qui auctioni præfuerunt, quod et ipsi testantur, coëmit: ex iis circiter ducenta cùm Diepam advecta post ratam pacem coriario cuidam Diepensi vendidisset pecuniamque redegisset, ea pecunia in manibus procuratoris sui occupata atque retenta, litem sibi impingi, suumque jus illo in foro se obtinere non posse, queritur. Quocirca majestatem vestram rogandum censuimus, ut ad consilium suum de re tota referri velit, pecuniamque illam iniquissima lite extricari. Etenim si ante pacem facta et judicata, post pacem rursus in controversiam atque judicium vocabuntur, quis sit fructus fœderum futurus, non videmus. Verùm hujusmodi querelarum nullus finis erit, nisi in fœdifragos hosce tam frequentes exemplum aliquod severitatis maturè statuatur; id quod majestati vestræ quamprimùm curæ fore speramus: Quam Deus interim tutela sua sanctissima dignetur.

Serenissime Rex;

TRANSACTA jam feliciter inter hanc rempub. Lusitaniæque regnum pace, necnon ad commercium quod attinet recte atque exordine cautum atque sancitum cùm sit, necessarium esse duximus Thomam Maynardum, à quo hæ literæ perferuntur, ad majestatem vestram mittere; qui consulis munere negotiatorio, vestra in ditione, ad mercatorum res rationesque ordinandas, fungatur. Cùm autem hoc sæpius usu venire possit, ut adeundi majestatem vestram fieri sibi copiam nonnunquam postulet, tam de commercio quam aliis de rebus quæ nostra hujusque reip. interesse possint, à majestate vestra petimus, ut illi, quoties audito opus sit, benignum velitis aditum atque aurem præbere; id vestræ erga nos benevolentiæ pro argumento singulari atque indicio habebimus: interim majestati vestræ Deum Opt. Serenissime potentissimeque Rex;

TAMETSI ea est solita majestatis vestræ et spontanea in viros bene meritos benevolentia, ut omnis eorum commendatio supervacanea possit videri, tamen nobilem hunc virum Gulielmum Vavasorem, equitem auratum, majestatis vestræ sub signis merentem, et ad vos jam proficiscentem, noluimus sine nostris ad majestatem vestram literis dimittere. Quod eo libentius fecimus, posteaquam significatum nobis est, jampridem eum, majestatis vestræ auspicia secutum, multis in præliis vestra causa suum sanguinem profudisse: adeo ut Suecorum reges proximi ob militarem ejus peritiam, operamque sæpe in bello strenuè navatam, cum agro et annuis pensionibus, veluti virtutis præmio, remuneraverint. Neque verò dubitamus quin majestati vestræ in hodiernis bellis permagno sit usui futurus, cum sit fide ac bellicarum rerum scientia jamdiu spectata. Eum itaque majestati vestræ, pro eo ac meritus est, commendatum cupimus; simulque rogamus, ut quæ illi præterita stipendia processerint solvantur. Hoc nobis erit gratissimum; nec gratificari vicissim majestati vestræ, quoties facultas erit, gravabimur; cui fausta omnia ac prospera exoptamus.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,

OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ, &c.

Serenissime Rex, amice ac fœderate charissime;

EXHIBUIT nobis libellum supplicem Thomas Evans nauclerus, civis noster, in quo ostendit, se an. 1649, et 1650, cum navi sua, cui nomen Scipioni, quadringentarum amphorarum, et cui ipse præfuit, societati Brasiliensi operam navâsse: eam navem, cum onere toto et apparatu, majestatis vestræ jussu ereptam sibi esse: unde damnum homini factum, præter amissum ex tanta sorte sexennii lucrum, commissarii, ex fœdere ad decidendas controversias utrinque dati, plus septem millibus librarum nostrarum, sive bis totidem milreis Lusitanicis, æstimârunt; quemadmodum et ad nos retulerunt. Quod detrimentum tam grave cum supradictum Thomam vehementer afflixerit, coactus ad repetendas ex fœdere res suas Olyssipponem navigare, petiit suppliciter à nobis, ut literas nostras hac de re ad majestatem vestram sibi daremus: nos, tametsi in communi causa mercatorum, quibus à societate Brasiliensi debebatur, superiore anno scripsimus, tamen ne cui nostram opem poscenti defuisse videamur, majestatem vestram pro amicitia rogamus, ut hujus nominatim hominis ratio habeatur; utque velit majestas vestra suis omnibus ita præcipere, ut ne quid obstare possit, quo minus is in ea urbe, quod sibi à societate Brasiliensi vel aliunde debetur, sine ullo impedimento exigere, et sine mora possit recuperare. Deus majestatem vestram perpetua felicitate augeat; nostramque amicitiam faxit quàm diuturnam.

Majestatis vestræ studiosissimus,

Amplissimi, magnifici, et spectabiles viri, amici charissimi;

GRAVEM detulerunt ad nos querimoniam Jacobus et Patricius Hays, cives hujus reip. sc, sui fratris Alexandri, qui intestatus diem obiit, hæredes legitimi cum sint, atque ita ipsius curiæ vestræ sententia, ante annos duodecim secundùm se lata, contra fratris viduam pronuntiati fuissent, bonaque defuncti fratris cum fructibus, excepta solùm viduæ dote, adjudicata sibi ex eo judicio essent, non potuisse tamen hactenus, neque pro suo jure, neque literis Caroli olim regis eadem de re scriptis, ullum laborum suorum ac sumptuum ex ea sententia fructum consequi: obesse sibi scilicet potentiam atque opes Alberti van Eizen, decurionis apud vos primarii, apud quem bonorum pars maxima deposita est; eum agere omnia, ne ea bona hæredibus restituantur. Elusi, ac dilationibus confecti, summam denique ad inopiam redacti, supplicant nobis ne se negligamus tantis injuriis, fœderata in civitate, oppressos. Quod nos cum officii imprimis nostri intelligamus esse, ut nequis civis noster præsidium suis rebus, atque susceptum patrocinium in nobis requirat, petimus quod à civitate vestra videamur facile impetrare posse, ut sententiam ipsimet vestram hisce fratribus ratam esse velitis; neque per causam provocationis ad Spirensem Cameram, vel primò simulatæ vel nunc irritæ, moram justitiæ fieri diutiùs patiamini. Nam de summa ipsius causæ jurisperitorum nostrorum sententias requisivimus; unaque descriptas obsignatasque ad vos misimus. Quod si rogando nihil proficitur, erit necessariò, idque ex consueto jure gentium, quod tamen minimè vellemus, ad reciproca deveniendum: id ne accidat, vos pro vestra prudentia provisuros esse confidimus.

Amplitudinum vestrarum studiosissimus,
OLIVERIUS Protector Reipub. Angliæ, &c.

Serenissime potentissimeque Rex, amice ac fœderate charissime;

PERVENISSE ad majestatem vestram literas nostras arbitramur, Maii quarto-decimo superioris anni datas: in quibus Joannem Dethicum, eodem anno Londini urbis præfectum, et Gulielmum Wakefeild, mercatorem, per libellum supplicem nobis ostendisse scripsimus, navem Jonam suis mercibus onustam, quæ Ostendam veherentur, Dunkirkam, quæ tum temporis in Gallica ditione erat, à prædone quodam Caroli Stuarti filii auspiciis piraticam faciente ex ipso Thamesis ostio fuisse abreptam: se, cum ex edictis vestris vestrique consilii decretis, quibus erat cautum, nequa navis Anglorum, ab hostibus parlamenti capta, vestris portubus reciperetur, venalisve esset, à domino Lestrado, illius oppidi præfecto, postulâssent, ut reddi sibi navem suam atque bona juberet, responsum ab eo tulisse, sanè neque viro primario dignum, neque eo qui regi suo satis dicto audiens videretur, se scilicet ab rege Galliæ, ob navatam in bello operam, hanc præfecturam præmio accepisse; curaturum proinde uti ea quàm maximè quæstui sibi sit; per fas videlicet ac nefas: id enim minime laborare videbatur. Quasi verò hanc præfecturam atque provinciam majestatis vestræ dono accepisset, ut socios juxtà spoliaret, vestraque edicta in eorum gratiam promulgata pro nihilo haberet. Quod enim rex Galliæ, si maximè ab hostibus factum contra nos voluisset, facti tamen participes suos esse vetuit, id regius præfectus, contra regium interdictum, non modo fieri est passus, ut nos vestris in portubus diriperemur, prædæque essemus, verum etiam ipse diripuit, ipse prædæ habuit, seque facti authorem palam professus est. Hoc itaque responso mercatores, infecto negotio, irriti atque elusi discessere: nosque hæc itidem superiore anno majestati vestræ per literas significavimus, successu licèt haud multo meliore; nihildum enim responsi ad eas literas habuimus. Quod non habuerimus accidisse id credimus, propterea quòd eo tempore præfectus ille apud exercitum in Flandria fuit; nunc in urbe ipsa Parisiorum degit, vel potius per urbem, perque aulam, nostrorum spoliis locupletatus impunè volitat. A majestate igitur vestra nunc denuò id petimus, quod ipsius majestatis vestræ interest in primis providere, nequis ad sociorum injurias edictorum regiorum contemptionem audeat adjungere: sed neque ad legatos sive commissarios de controversiis communibus utrinque dandos rejici propriè hæc causa poterit; quandoquidem hìc non sociorum jus duntaxat, sed auctoritas ipsa vestra, regiique nominis reverentia, agitur. Illud enim mirum sit, si mercatores damna sua molestiùs quàm majestas vestra sui ferat imminutionem. Eam si non ferat, eadem opera simul perficiet, ut neque amicissimorum de repub. nostra edictorum pœnituisse, neque in suorum injuriis connivisse, neque nostræ postulationi non tribuisse quod par sit, videatur.

Majestati vestræ voluntate, amicitia, fœdere, devinctissimus,

OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ, &c. Serenissimo potentissimoque Principi FREDERICO III. Daniæ, Norvegiæ, Vandalorum, Gothorumque Regi; Duci Slesvici, Holsatiæ, Stormariæ, et Dithmarsiæ; Comiti in Oldenburgh et Delmenhorst, &c. S. D.

Serenissime potentissimeque Rex, amice ac fœderate charissime;

LITERAS majestatis vestræ sexto-decimo Februarii Hafniâ datas ab ornatissimo viro Simone de Petkum, oratore apud nos vestro, accepimus. Iis perlectis, et voluntatis erga nos vestræ præclara significatio, et ipsius rei, de qua scriptum erat, pondus usque eò nos permovit, ut statim ad majestatem vestram mittere qui, mandatis nostris instructus, nostra consilia vobis hac de re plenissime exponeret, in animo haberemus. Et quanquam idem nobis etiamnum animus manet, hactenus tamen idoneum aliquem cum iis mandatis dimittere, quæ gravissimum hujusmodi negotium postularet, non potuimus; quemadmodum jam brevi facturos nos esse speramus. Interea non omittendum diutiùs existimavimus majestatem vestram certiorem facere, præsentem rerum in Europa statum haud mediocri nos cura ac cogitatione sollicitos tenuisse: cum ab aliquot jam annis summo cum dolore videamus Protestantium principes, ac civitatum primores, (quos, ex communi religionis atque salutis vinculo, omnem sese mutuò confirmandi ac defendendi inire rationem oporteret,) inter se indies magis magisque infirmè animatos, quid quisque moliatur, quidve struat, suspectum habere; metum amicis, spem hostibus præbentes, inimicitias atque dissidia potius hac rerum inclinatione portendi, quam firmum invicem animorum consensum, ad præsidium mutuum ac defensionem. Atque hæc quidem sollicitudo eo altiùs animo nostro insedit, quo magis in majestate vestra regeque Sueciæ adhuc aliquid residere mutuæ suspicionis videtur; vel saltem non eam existere voluntatum conjunctionem, quam communis nostrum omnium in orthodoxam religionem amor ac studium flagitaret; dum majestati vestræ injecta forte aliqua suspicio est, fore ut ab rege Sueciæ detrimentum aliquod ditionis vestræ commerciis afferatur; suspicante vicissim Suecorum rege, ne, per vos, et bellum quod nunc gerit difficilius et contrahendarum societatum ratio impeditior, sibi reddatur. Non præterit majestatem vestram, pro ea summa prudentia, quam adhibere suis omnibus in rebus solet, quantum discriminis Protestantium summæ rei impendat, si istiusmodi suspiciones inter vos diu versen-tur; quanto magis, quod Deus avertet, siquod hostilitatis indicium erumperet. Utcunque hæc se habeant, nos, quemadmodum et Suecorum regem, et fœderati Belgii ordines, ad pacem et moderata consilia magnopere hortati sumus, (adeoque redintegrari inter eos pacem atque concordiam vehementer gaudemus, nam et capita quoque illius fœderis à dominis Ordinibus transmissa ad nos sunt,) ita nostras esse partes duximus, nostræque amicitiæ quam maxime convenire, ut qui sensus noster his de rebus sit, majestatem vestram ne celaremus, (præsertim cùm, ut ita faciamus, majestatis vestræ literis amicissimis tam studiose invitemur; id quod etiam benevolentiæ erga nos vestræ pro argumento singulari sanè habemus atque amplectimur,) vestræque majestati ante oculos poneremus, quantum nobis necessitatem, qui Protestantium religionem sequimur, divina providentia imposuerit colendi inter nos pacem, idque nunc maximè, cum hostes nostri acerrimè, si unquam alias, rem gerere, et conjùrâsse undique in perniciem nostram, videntur. Valles Alpinas, miserorum nuper incolarum cæde ac sanguine madentes, commemorare nihil attinet; nec conquassatam per eosdem dies Cæsareis proscriptionibus atque edictis Austriam; nec denique contra Helvetios Protestantes Helvetiorum Papistarum infestos impetus. Quis nescit Hispanorum dolos ac machinationes per hosce aliquot annos hæc loca omnia incendiis, ruinis, cladibus Protestantium, permiscuisse? Si ad hæc mala reformatorum fratrum inter se dissensio velut cumulus accedat, inter vos præsertim, qui nostrarum virium tanta pars estis, et in quibus tantum præsidii ac roboris Protestantium dubiis temporibus comparatum atque repositum est; quod ad opem humanam attinet, pessùm ire Protestantium res, et in extremo discrimine atque occasu versari, necesse erit. Quod contra, si pax constet inter vos vicinos, cæterosque orthodoxos principes, si concordiæ fraternæ omni ex parte studeatur, non erit cur, Deo bene juvante, vel vim vel versutiam nostrorum hostium pertimescamus; quorum conatus nostra sola consensio vel dissipabit vel frustrabitur. Neque vero dubitamus quin majestas vestra ad hanc pacem beatam impertiri suam operam, quam potes maximam, et libens velit, et velle desitura non sit. Qua in re ipse etiam communicare consilia cum majestate vestra, atque conjungere, paratissimus ero; utpote et veram amicitiam professus, et cui non solum pactam inter nos tam auspicatò servare pacem deliberatum omnino sit, verum etiam necessitudinem hanc, quæ nunc intercedit, prout Deus facultatem dabit, arctiori vinculo constringere. Idem Deus interim majestati vestræ secunda ac prospera omnia concedat.

OLIVERIUS Protector Reipub. Angliæ, &c.

OLIVERIUS Protect. Reipub. Angliæ, &c. Serenissimo illustrissimoque Principi ac Domino, Domino GULIELMO, Hassiæ Landgravio, Principi Herefeldiæ, Comiti in Cattimeliboco, Decia Ligenhain, Nidda et Schaumburgo, &c.

Serenissime Princeps;

AD literas celsitudinis vestræ non sic altero pòst anno, quod prope jam pudet, rescripsissemus, nisi nos admodum invitos permulta sanè, eaque gravissima, quorum curam, pro nostro in repub. munere, differre non potuimus, interpellâssent. Quæ enim literæ debebant esse nobis gratiores, quàm quæ à principe religiosissimo, majoribus quoque religiosissimis orto, de pace religionis, deque concordia ecclesiarum concilianda, sunt scriptæ; quæ etiam literæ eundem planè animum, idem pacis christianæ promovendæ studium, non solum suo, verum etiam universi ferò orbis christiani opinione ac judicio, et ipsæ nobis tribuunt, et universim attributum esse gratulantur? Et nos quidem per tria hæc olim regna quid hac in parte simus conati, quidque hortando, ferendo, præeundo, divino maxime auxilio, effecerimus, et norunt nostri plerique, et in summa conscientiæ tranquillitate sentiunt. Eandem præsertim Germaniæ totius ecclesiis, ubi acriùs ferè, jamque diu nimis dissidetur, pacem optavimus; perque nostrum Duræum, hoc idem multos jam annos frustra molientem, siquid eam in rem nostra opera conferre posset, ex animo detulimus. In eadem nos etiamnum sententia permanemus; eandem illis ecclesiis fraternam inter se charitatem optamus: sed quam sit hoc arduum conciliandæ pacis negotium inter ipsos pacis, ut præ se ferunt, filios, summo cum dolore satis superque intelligimus. Nam, ut utrique Reformati nempe et Augustani in unius ecclesiæ communionem aliquando coalescant, sperandum vix est; suam utrique sententiam ne possint vel voce vel scriptis defendere, prohiberi sine vi non poterunt; vis autem cum pace ecclesiastica consistere non potest: hoc tantùm se sinant exorari qui dissentiunt, ut humanius saltem et moderatius velint dissentire, nihiloque minus inter se diligere; utpote non hostes, sed fratres in levioribus licet dissentientes, in summa tamen fidei conjunctissimos. Hæc nos inculcando, hæc suadendo nunquam defatigabimur; quod ultrà est, humanis neque viribus neque consiliis datur: Deus quod suum solius est suo tempore perficiet. Tu interim, serenissime princeps, præclaram in ecclesias declarationem animi tui, sempiternum sanè monumentum et majoribus tuis dignum et omnibus posthac principibus imitandum reliquisti. Nos celsitudini vestræ, pro eo ac merita est, felicitatem cæteris in rebus quantum ipsa cupit, mentem, ea quam nunc habes, haud meliorem (quid enim potest esse melius?) à Deo optimo maximo precamur.

Westmonasterio, die Martii, an. 1656.

OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ, &c. Serenissimo Principi Duci Curlandiæ.

Serenissime Princeps;

DE benevolentia celsitudinis erga nos vestræ et aliàs, et tum quidem aliunde nobis constitit cùm orationem nostram ad Moscoviæ Ducem iter facientem, et in ditione vestra per aliquot dies commorantem hospitio benignè accepisti: nunc justitiæ et æquitatis suæ haud leviora indicia daturam esse celsitudinem vestram et suopte ingenio et nostro rogatu confidimus. Cum enim Joannes Jamesonus, Scotus, navis cujusdam vestræ magister, fidelem naucleri operam septennioque cognitam vobis navaverit, seque illam navem Balenam sibi commissam, in ostio fluminis, ut mos est, gubernatori vestro appellendam in portum tradidisset, eumque imperitè suo munere fungentem quod solum potuit sæpius monuisse multis testibus probaverit, non ejus profecto culpa, sed gubernatoris vel imperitia vel pervicacia fractam esse navem nemini non liquet. Quod cum ita sit, à celsitudine vestra majorem in modum petimus, ut supradicto Joanni magistro neque illud naufragium imputare, neque eam idcirco stipendio debito velit privare; cujus spe sola jam altero naufragio bonis omnibus amissis, se utcunque in extrema inopia sustinet et solatur.

Amplissimi, magnifici viri, amici charissimi;

Urbem vestram industria, opibus et optimarum artium studiis florentem cum nobilissimis quibusque urbibus semper esse duximus conferendam: nunc posteaquam in hoc bello, quod vestris jamdiu in finibus geritur, Polonorum sequi partes quam Suecorum maluistis, sanè et religionis causa quam colitis, et commercii quod cum Anglis vetustum jam habetis, optavimus ut ea vobis maxime consilia placerent, quæ cum Dei gloria urbisque vestræ dignitate ac splendore viderentur esse conjunctissima. Quocirca petimus pro amicitia, quæ vobis cum Anglorum gente multo usu firmata jamdiu constat, et siqua in gratia apud vos nostrum quoque nomen est, ut insignem inter primos Suecorum duces Conismarcum, egregium præsertim bello virum, casu et suorum proditione mari interceptum belli lege, non acerbissimè adhuc gesti, dimittere velitis, sin id minus vestris rationibus convenire arbitramini, ut leniore saltem ac liberiore custodia habendum censeatis. Utrum horum vobis faciendum decreveritis, id profecto imprimis quod existimatione urbis vestræ dignum est decernetis; deinde ab omnibus præclaris belli ducibus magnam gratiam inibitis; nos denique, quicquid id vestra interesse putatis, haud mediocri sanè beneficio devincietis.

Vir nobilissimus Gulielmus Jepsonus, militum tribunus, et parlamenti nostri senator, cui hoc munus honori erit, quod majestati vestræ hasce literas dabit, certiorem eam faciet, quanta cum perturbatione ac dolore nuntium accepimus belli illius funesti inter majestatem vestram Daniæque regem coorti; quamque nobis cordi ac studio sit, nullam nostram operam aut officium prætermittere, quoad Deus facultatem dederit; ut huic ingruenti malo remedium aliquod maturè afferatur, cæque simul calamitates avertantur, quas inferri ex hoc bello religionis causæ communi necesse erit; hoc præsertim tempore, quo adversarii nostri contra orthodoxæ fidei professionem et professores cùm consilia perniciosissima tùm vires arctissimè conjungunt. Excellentissimo Domino, DOMINO de BOURDEAUX, Serenissimi Regis Galliarum Legato extraordinario.

Excellentissime Domine,

MERCATORES quidem Londino-derrienses Samuel Dausonus, Joannes Campsejus, et Joannes Nevinus, per libellum supplicem, Serenissimo Domino protectori ediderunt, se, posteaquam fœdus inter hanc rempub. regnumque Galliæ redintegratum intellexerant, an. Dom. 1655 navem quandam, cui nomen Anglicè The Speedwell, melioris ominis causa, quam eventus ferebat, impositum, cujus Joannes Ker magister erat, mercibus quibusdam ex portu Derriensi Burdegalam convehendis onerasse; eam navem illic onere exposito, vinoque aliisque mercibus inde impositis, captam in reditu die 24 Novembris anni supra dicti à duabis Brestensum navibus armatis, quarum alteri Adrianus Vindmian Swart, alteri Jacobus Jonsonus, præfuit, ab iisdem etiam in portum Brivatem, vulgo Brestensem, fuisse abductam; ibique et jure captam judicatam esse, et auctione venditam, cum mille centumque libras nostras æstimatione justa valuisset, extra damnum mille librarum præterea datum: de quibus recuperandis omni se honesta ratione cum illius loci præfectis egisse: id sibi hactenus frustra fuisse: se etiam moribus edictum curiæ maritimæ consecutos esse, quo citarentur in judicium qui navem illam cepissent, autem jure esse captam defendere statuissent. Edictum hoc et recte atque ordine promulgatum et redditum: idque ab ejusdem curiæ ministris publicis maturè Domino legato Galliæ significatum esse: cum nemo contra comparuisset, testes aliquot juratos de re judicanda interrogatos esse. Quæ res cum à petitoribus ad celsitudinem Domini protectoris delata sit, ab eaque cognitioni atque sententiæ concilii mandata, cumque de facto et testimoniis juratis libello supplici adjunctis abunde constet, petitoribusque liberum commercium Burdegalæ sit datum, mercesque illic emptæ atque impositæ vi sint in reditu ereptæ et occupatæ contra fœderis fidem, ut supra demonstratum est, quis non videt hoc esse æquissimum, aut navem cum onere petitoribus restitui, aut de damno cùm captæ navis tum juris persequendi plene satisfieri? Peto igitur ab excellentia vestra, atque etiam serenissimi domini protectoris nomine peto, omnem velit operam dare, omnique operæ authoritatem etiam sui muneris adjungere, ut primo quoque tempore horum alterutrum fiat. Cum neque in causa æquiore laborare possit, neque mihi gratiore; qui eo diligentius curasse quod mandatum mihi est videbor, quo excellentia vestra maturius quod suum est præstiterit.

Missus à nobis vir domi nobilis Gulielmus Jepsonus, militum tribunus, et parlamenti nostri senator, ad serenissimum Suecorum regem, quod paci communi reique Christianæ felix faustumque sit, legationem obit. Ei inter alia negotium dedimus, ut cum in itinere salutem plurimam serenitati vestræ nostro nomine, dixisset, pristinamque nostram benevolentiam et constantissima studia significasset, ab eo quoque peteret, ut authoritate vestra munitus iter tutum atque commodum habere per vestram ditionem possit. Serenissime Dux magne, amice charissime, Ostendit nobis per libellum supplicem societas mercatorum nostrorum, qui ad oras Mediterranei maris orientalis negociantur, præfectum quendam navis Lodoviculi, sive Anglicè The Little Lewis, nomine Gulielmum Ellum, cum Alexandræ in Egypto esset, conductum à Satrapa Memphitico ut oryzam, saccharum et caphiam, ipsius Turcarum principis in usum, Constantinopolim aut Smyrnam comportaret, classi se Ottomanicæ in itinere subduxisse, et, contra datam fidem, navis totum onus Liburnum avertisse: ibi præda potitum nunc agere. Quod facinus, pessimi sanè exempli, cùm Christianum nomen probro, mercatorum fortunas degentium sub Turca direptionis periculo objiciat, petimus à celsitudine vestra, ut illum hominem comprehendi et in custodiam tradi, navemque et bona retineri, jubeat, quoad significatum à nobis erit curasse nos res illas Turcarum principi reddendas. Vestræ celsitudini sicubi nostris officiis usus vicissim erit, paratissima omni tempore fore profitemur.

Serenissime Princeps, amice ac fœderate charissime,

Alteris ad celsitudinem vestram literis per oratorem nostrum, Gulielmum Jepsonum, aut redditis aut brevi redditis legationis ipsi à nobis mandatæ fidem fecimus; idque sine vestrarum virtutum aliqua mentione, nostræque erga vos benevolentiæ, significatione facere non potuimus. Verum nequis vestra de rebus Protestantium egregiè merita, quæ summa omnium prædicatione celebrantur, nos obitu tetigisse tantùm videamur, resumendum nobis nunc idem argumentum, nostraque officia non libentiùs quidem aut animo propensiore, aliquanto tamen prolixius deferenda serenitati vestræ censuimus. Et meritò sanè, cum ad aures nostras quotidie perferatur, fidem vestram atque constantiam omnibus tentatam machinis, solicitatam technis, labefactari tamen, et ab amicitia fortissimi regis ac socii, nullo modo posse dimoveri; idque cum eo loco Suecorum res nunc sint, ut in retinenda eorum societate celsitudinem vestram reformatæ potius religionis causa communi, quàm suis commodis duci manifestum sit; cumque hostibus vel occultis vel jam prope imminentibus cincta undique et penè obsessa sit, copiæ ut sint validæ non tamen sint maximæ, ea tamen firmitate animi ac robore esse, eo consilio ac virtute imperatoria, et unà vestra voluntate niti totius rei summa ac moles, bellique hujus maximi exitus pendere videatur. Quapropter nihil est quod dubitet celsitudo vestra, quin de amicitia nostra summoque studio polliceri omnia sibi possit: qui vel ipsi ab omni laude derelicti nobis videremur, si præclara ista fide atque constantia cæterisque vestris laudibus minùs delectaremur, aut vobis ipsis communi religionis nomine minus deberemus. Quòd si rebus ab ornatissimo viro Joanne Frederico Schlezer consiliario et oratore apud nos vestro propositis respondere, pro eo ac studemus, hactenus non potuimus (quanquam is omni assiduitate ac diligentia id agit atque contendit) conditioni rerum nostrarum hoc velit imputare celsitudo vestra rogamus; sibique imprimis persuadere nihil nobis esse antiquius aut optatius, quam ut vestris rationibus cum religionis causa tam conjunctis usui quam plurimùm atque subsidio esse possimus. Interim tam clara virtus ac fortitudo ne ullo tempore deficiat aut opprimatur, dignave laude aut fructu careat Deum opt. max. precamur.

Excellentissime Domine,

POSTULAVIT a serenissimo Domino protectore, Lucas Lucius mercator Londinensis de sua quadam navi, cui nomen Maria, quæ cum ab Hibernia Bajonam peteret, vi tempestatis ad fanum Divi Joannis de Luz, appulsa, ibi retenta et occupata est actione Martini cujusdam de Lazon; nec restituta donec à procuratoribus mercatoris illius satisdaretur, se de illa navi atque onere cum Martino lege experturos. Tulit enim præ se Martinus deberi sibi grandem à parlamento Angliæ pecuniam, mercium quarundam suarum nomine, quæ in navi quadam Sancta Clara anno 1642 parlamenti auctoritate sunt retentæ. Verum cum satis constaret, Martinum illum earum mercium verum dominum non esse, sed cum Antonio quodam Fernandez verorum dominorum Richaldi et Iriati jus persequi, dissidentibusque inter se Martino et Antonio, decreverit parlamentum uti merces illæ retinerentur quoad lege esset decisum utri eorum reddendæ essent, paratusque fuerit semper Antonius lege agere; contrà, neque Martinus neque pro eo quisquam in judicio hactenus comparuerit, quæ omnia ex Lucæ petitoris libellis libello supplici annexis liquent; iniquissimum sanè est, ut is, qui jus suum suppositium cum Antonio collega suo de alienis bonis experiri apud nos recusat, cogeret nostros homines verosque dominos de suis bonis in aliena ditione contendere: Quin idem æquitati vestræ atque prudentiæ videatur, non dubitat serenissimus dominus protector; à quo sum jussus, hanc Lucæ Lucii causam æquissimam excellentiæ vestræ singularem in modum commendare: ne Martino, qui jus alienum apud nos persequi negligit, eo obtentu aliis eripiendi jus suum apud vos potestas detur.

Serenissime Dux atque Senatus, Amici charissimi;

NUNCII rerum vestrarum contra Turcas felicissimè gestarum tam crebri ad nos perferuntur, ut nobis non sæpius ulla de re ad vos scribendum, quam de insigni aliqua victoria gratulandum sit. Hanc recentissimam, et reipublicæ vestræ quam maxime lætam atque opportunam cupimus, et quod gloriosissimum est, christianorum omnium sub Turca servientium quam maxime liberatricem. Nominatim Thomam Galileum navis, cui nomen The Relief, olim præfectum, serenitati vestræ ac senatui, tametsi non nunc primum, nunc tamen eo libentiùs quo latiori tempore, quinquennalem captivam commendamus. Ei cùm à vobis imperatum esset, ut cum navi sua reipublicæ vestræ operam navaret, solus cum multis hostium triremibus congressus, nonnullas depressit, magnamque stragem edidit; tandem combusta navi captus vir fortis, deque Veneta rep. tam benè meritus, quintum jam annum in misera servitute barbarorum degit. Unde se redimat facultatum nihil est; nam quicquid erat, id à celsitudini vestra et senatu, vel navis vel bonorum vel stipendii nomine debere sibi ostendit. Verùm ut facultates non deessent; hostes tamen non alia lege dimissuros se eum profitentur, quam si suorum aliquis, qui illis in pretio æquè sit, permutetur. Petimus itaque magnopere à vestra atque senatus celsitudine serenissima, petit per nos senex miserrimus, captivi pater, mœroris et lachrymarum plenus, quæ nos quidem permoverunt, ut primùm quoniam ex tot prosperis prœliis Turcarum tanta copia captorum vobis est, unam aliquem ex eo numero, quem illi recipiant, hostem vestro milite fortissimo, nostro cive, senis mœstissimi filio unico commutare velitis. Deinde, ut quod stipendii, vel aliis nominibus ipsi à repub. debetur, id quam primùm velitis patri aut procuratori ipsius annumerandum curare. Priori quidem rogatu nostro, vel potius æquitate vestra effectum est, ut statim re cognita, putatisque rationibus constitutum esset quid debeatur: verum illum supputationem ingentibus fortasse aliis negotiis, nulla solutio secuta est. Nunc miseri conditio dilationem salutis diutiùs non fert: eum, si omnino salvum vultis, danda opera est, ut squalore illo carceris teterrimo quam primùm liberetur. Id sine mora, sine hortatu etiam nostro humanissima voluntate vestra facturos vos esse confidimus: quandoquidem justitia, moderatione, atque prudentia non minus quam belli

REDIT ad vos vir illustrissimus Gulielmus Nuport legatus vester annis jam aliquot apud nos extraordinarius: sed ita redit, petito ad tempus duntaxat à vobis commeatu, ut eum brevi reversurum speremus. Ea enim est fide, vigilantia, prudentia, æquitate apud nos in suo munere versatus, ut majorem in unoquoque genere virtutem ac probitatem neque nos desiderare in legato, viroque optimo, neque vos possitis; eo animo ac studio ad pacem inter nos et amicitiam sine fuco et fraude conservandam, ut, illo hanc legationem obeunte, quid inter nos offensionis aut scrupuli suboriri queat aut pullulare, non videamus. Et discessum sanè ejus molestiore animo ferremus, hac præsertim rerum ac temporum inclinatione, nisi persuasissimum nobis hoc esset, neminem melius posse aut fidelius vel rerum utrobique statum, vel nostram erga celsitudines vestras benevolentiam studiumque integrum coràm exponere. Quapropter hunc ut virum undiquaque præstantissimum, deque rep. et sua et nostra optime meritum, accipere redeuntem velitis rogamus: sicuti et nos verissimo nostrarum laudum testimonio ornatum abeuntem dimisimus prope inviti. Serenissime Dux Magne, amice noster plurimum colende, PERMAGNAM nobis attulere voluptatem literæ celsitudinis vestræ decimo Nov. Florentia datæ; in quibus benevolentiam erga nos vestram eo vidimus perspectiorem, quanto res ipsæ verbis, facta promissis certiora benevolentis animi indicia sunt: quæ nempe rogavimus celsitudinem vestram, juberet illum navis Lodovici parvi præfectum Gulielmum Ellum, qui fidem Turcis datam turpissimè fregerat, et ipsum comprehendi, et navem cum mercibus in portu retineri, quoad Turcarum quæ essent redderentur, ne nomen Christianum per istiusmodi furta labem aliquam susciperet, ea omnia, et summo quidem studio, quod satis intelligimus, scripsit celsitudo vestra se præstitisse. Nos itaque cum pro accepto beneficio gratias agimus, tum hoc porrò nunc petimus, quandoquidem satisfactum iri Turcis mercatores in se receperunt, ut et præfectus ille custodia liberetur, et navis cum mercibus quamprimum dimittatur; ne Turcarum forte rationem potiorem, quam nostrorum civium habuisse videamur. Interim celsitudinis vestræ spectata voluntate erga nos singulari, et sanè gratissima sic libenter fruimur, ut ingratitudinis notam non recusemus, nisi pari promptitudine vobis vicissim gratificandi occasionem quam primum dari nobis exoptamus, ex qua nostram quoque in reddendis

MULTA simul attulere nobis literæ majestatis vestræ 21 Feb. in castris Selandicis datæ, cur, et privatim nostra, et totius reipub. Christianæ causa, lætitia haud mediocri afficeremur: primum quod rex Daniæ, non sua credo voluntate aut rationibus, sed hostium communium artibus factus hostis, repentino vestro in intimum ejus regnum adventu, sine multo sanguine, cò sit redactus, ut, quod res erat, utiliorem sibi pacem bello contra vos suscepto tandem judicaverit: deinde cum is eam nulla se ratione citius posse consequi existimaret, quam si delata sibi jamdiu ad conciliandam pacem nostra opera uteretur, quod majestas vestra solis internuntii nostri literis exorata, tam facili pacis concessione ostenderit, quantum nostra amicitia atque gratia interposita apud se valeret: meumque imprimis in hoc tum pio negotio officium esse voluerit, ut pacis tam salutaris protestantium rebus, uti spero, mox futuræ ipse potissimum unus conciliator atque auctor propemodum essem. Cum enim religionis hostes conjunctas opes vestras alio pacto frangere se posse desperarent, quàm si vos inter vos commisissent, habebunt nunc, profectò quod pertimescant, ne armorum animorumque, ut spero, vestrorum hæc inopinata conjunctio ipsis belli hujus conflatoribus in perniciem vertat. Tu interim, rex fortissime, macte tua egregia virtute; et quam felicitatem in rebus tuis gestis victoriarumque cursu contra regem nunc socium hostes ecclesiæ nuper admirati sunt, eandem in sua rursus clade, Deo benè juvante, fac sentiant.

Serenissime Princeps,

QUOD satisfacturum arbitramur celsitudini vestræ de nostro classis præfecto qui ad portus vestros nuper est delatus, vestro apud nos oratori respondimus: interim per libellum supplicem nobis ostendit Joannes Hosierus Londinensis, cujusdam navis, cui Dominæ nomen, magister, se, cùm anno 1656, mense Aprili, navem suam ex syngrapha (chartam partitam jus nostrum vocat) Josepho Armano Italo cuidam locasset, isque factas in syngrapha pactiones ter apertè fregisset, coactum esse demùm, ne navem suam, totumque onus ejus, sortem deniquè totam amitteret, more mercatorio, declarata publicè ejus fraude, et in tabulas publicas relata, Liburni in jus eum vocare: eum autem, ut fraudem fraude tueretur, adhibitis in societatem duobus aliis negotiatoribus litigiosis, de pecunia Thomæ cujusdam Clutterbuxi sex mille octonos, conficto quodam obtentu, petitoris hujus nomine occupasse: se. post multas impensas consumtumque tempus, jus suum Liburni obtinere non posse; ne audere quidem, propter adversariorum minas atque insidias, in judicio illic comparere. Petimus itaque à celsitudine vestra, ut cùm huic homini oppresso subvenire, tum hujus adversarii insolentiam pro consueta sua justitia velit coercere: frustra enim authoritate principum leges essent civitatibus latæ, si vis atque injuria, cùm, ne omnino sint leges, efficere non possint, possint efficere terrore ac minis, ne quis ad eas audeat confugere. Verum in hujusmodi audaciam quin maturè animadversura sit celsitudo vestra, non dubitamus; cui pacem prosperaque omnia à Deo opt. max. precamur.

Serenissimo Potentissimoque Principi LUDOVICO Galliarum Regi.

Serenissime potentissimeque Rex, amice ac fœderate augustissime;

MEMINISSE potest majestas vestra quo tempore inter nos de renovando fœdere agebatur; quod optimis auspiciis initum multa utriusque populi commoda, multa hostium communium exinde mala testantur, accidisse miseram illam Convallensium occisionem, quorum causam undique desertam atque afflictam vestræ misericordiæ atque tutelæ summo cum ardore animi ac miseratione commendavimus. Nec defuisse per se arbitramur majestatem vestram officio tam pio, immo verò tam humano, pro ea qua apud ducem Sabaudiæ valere debuit vel auctoritate vel gratia: nos certè aliique multi principes ac civitates, legationibus, literis, precibus interpositis, non defuimus. Post cruentissimam utriusque sexus omnis ætatis trucidationem, pax tandem data est, vel potius inducti pacis nomine hostilitas quædam tectior: conditiones pacis vestro in oppido Pinarolii sunt latæ; duræ quidem illæ, sed quibus miseri atque inopes dira omnia atque immania perpessi facilè acquiescerent, moda iis, duræ et iniquæ ut sint, staretur; non statur; sed enim earum quoque singularum falsa interpretatione variisque diverticulis fides eluditur ac violatur; antiquis sedibus multi dejiciuntur, religio patria multis interdicitur, tributa nova exiguntur, arx nova cervicibus imponitur, unde milites crebro erumpentes obvios quosque vel diripiunt vel trucidant: ad hæc nuper novæ copiæ clanculum contra eos parantur; quique inter eos Romanam religionem colunt, migrare ad tempus jubentur; ut omnia nunc rursus videantur ad illorum internecionem miserrimorum spectare, quos illa prior laniena reliquos fecit. Quod ergo per dextram tuam, rex christianissime, quæ fœdus nobiscum et amicitiam percussit, obsecro atque obtestor, per illud christianismi tituli decus sanctissimum, fieri ne siveris: nec tantam sæviendi licentiam non dico principi cuiquam (neque enim in ullum principem, multo minus in ætatem illius principis teneram, aut in muliebrem matris animum tanta sævitia cadere potest) sed saccrrimis illis sicariis ne permiseris; qui cum Christi servatoris nostri servos atque imitatores sese profiteantur, qui venit in hunc mundum ut peccatores servaret, ejus mitissimo nomine atque institutis ad innocentium crudelissimas cædes abutuntur: eripe qui potes, quique in tanto fastigio dignus es posse, tot supplices tuos homicidarum ex manibus, qui cruore nuper ebrii, sanguinem rursus sitiunt; suæque invidiam crudelitatis in principes derivare consultissimum sibi ducunt. Tu verò nec titulos tuos aut regni fines ista invidia, nec evangelium Christi pacatissimum ista crudelitate fœdari te regnante patiaris. Memineris hos ipsos avi tui Henrici protestantibus amicissimi dedititios fuisse; cum Diguierius per ea loca, qua etiam commodissimus in Italiam transitus est, Sabaudum trans Alpes cedentem victor est insecutus: deditionis illius instrumentum in actis regni vestri publicis etiamnum extat; in quo exceptum atque cautum inter alia est, ne cui postea Convallenses traderentur, nisi iisdem conditionibus quibus eo avus tuus invictissimus in fidem recepit. Hanc fidem nunc implorant, avitam abs te nepote supplices requirunt: tui esse, quàm cujus nunc sunt, vel permutatione aliqua, si fieri possit, malint atque optarint: id si non licet, patrocinio saltem, miseratione atque perfugio. Sunt et rationes regni quæ hortari possint ut Convallenses ad te confugientes ne rejicias: sed nolim te, rex tantus cum sis, aliis rationibus ad defensionem calamitosorum quàm fide a majoribus data, pietate, regiaque animi benignitate ac magnitudine permoveri. Ita pulcherrimi facti laus atque gloria illibata atque integra tua erit, et ipse patrem misericordiæ ejusque filium Christum regem, cujus nomen atque doctrinam ab immanitate nefaria vindicaveris, eo magis faventem tibi atque propitium per omnem vitam experieris. Deus opt. max. ad gloriam suam, tot innocentissimorum hominum christianorum tutandam salutem, vestrumque verum decus majestati vestræ hanc mentem injiciat.

Civitatibus Helvetiorum Evangelicis.

Illustres atque amplissimi Domini,
amici charissimi;

De Convallensibus vicinis vestris afflictissimis, quàm sint à principe suo gravia et intoleranda religionis causa passi, cùm propter ipsam rerum atrocitatem horret prope animus recordari, tum ad vos ea scribere quibus notiora multo sunt, supervacuum duximus. Exempla etiam literarum vidimus quas legati vestri pacis jamdudum Pinarolianæ hortatores atque testes ad Allobrogum ducem illiusque Taurinensis consilii præsidem scripserunt; in quibus ruptas esse omnes pacis conditiones, illisque miseris fraudi potiùs quàm securitati fuisse singulatim, ostendunt atque evincunt. Quarum violationem ab ipsa statim pace data in hunc usque diem continuatam, et indies graviorem nisi æquo animo patiuntur, nisi se conculcandos planè et pessumdandos prosternunt atque abjiciunt, religione etiam ejurata, impendet eadem calamitas, eadem strages, quæ ipsos cum conjugibus ac liberis tertio abhinc anno sic miserabilem in modum attrivit atque afflixit, et subeunda iterum si est, funditus eradicabit. Quid agant miseri? quibus nulla deprecatio, nulla respiratio, nullum adhuc certum perfugium patuit; res est cum feris aut cum furiis, quibus priorum cædium recordatio nullam pœnitentiam, aut suorum civium miserationem, nullum sensum humanitatis aut fundendi sanguinis satietatem attulit. Hæc ferenda planè non sunt, sive fratres nostros Convallenses orthodoxæ religionis cultores antiquissimos, sive ipsam religionem salvam volumus. Et nos quidem locorum intervallo plus nimio disjuncti, quod opis aut facultatis nostræ fuit, et præstitimus ex animo, et præstare non desinemus. Vos qui non modo fratrum cruciatibus ac penè clamoribus, verum etiam eorumdem furori hostium proximi estis, prospicite per Deum immortalem, idque maturè, quid vestrarum nunc partium sit; quid auxilii, quid præsidii vicinis ac fratribus, alioqui mox perituris, ferre possitis ac debeatis, prudentiam vestram ac pietatem, fortitudinem etiam vestram consulite. Causa certè eadem est religio, cur iidem hostes vos quoque perditos velint, immo cur eodem tempore, eodem superiore anno, fœderatorum vestrorum intestino marte perditos voluerint. Vestra duntaxat in manu post opem divinam videtur esse, ne purioris ipsa stirps religionis vetustissima in illis priscorum fidelium reliquiis excindatur: quorum salutem in extremum jam discrimen adductam si negligitis, videte ne vosmetipsos paulò post proximæ vices urgeant. Hæc dum fraternè ac liberè hortamur, ipsi interea non languescimus: quod solum nobis conceditur tam longinquis, cùm ad procurandam periclitantium incolumitatem tùm ad sublevandam egentium inopiam, omnem operam nostram et contulimus et conferemus. Deus det utrisque nobis eam domi tranquillitatem ac pacem, eum rerum ac temporum statum, ut omnes nostras opes atque vires, omne studium ad defendendam ecclesiam suam contra hostium suorum furorem ac rabiem, convertere possimus.

Westmonasterio, ex Aula nostra,

Eminentissimo Domino Cardinali Mazarino, Salutem.

Eminentissime Domine,

Illatæ nuper protestantibus, qui valles quasdam Alpinas in ditione ducis Sabaudiæ incolunt, gravissimæ calamitates cædesque cruentissimæ fecère, ut inclusas has literas ad majestatem regiam, hasque alteras ad eminentiam vestram scripserim. Et quemadmodum de rege serenissimo dubitare non possum, quin hæc tanta crudelitas, qua in homines innoxios atque inopes tam barbarè sævitum est, vehementer ei displiceat atque offensa sit; ita mihi facilè persuadeo, quæ ego à majestate regia illorum causa miserorum peto, ad ea impetranda vestram quoque operam atque gratiam, velut cumulum, accessuram. Cum nihil planè sit, quod Francorum genti benevolentiam apud suos omnes vicinos reformatæ religionis cultores majorem conciliaverit, quam libertas illa ac privilegia, quæ ex edictis suis atque actis publicis permissa protestantibus atque con-cessa sunt. Et hæc quidem respublica cùm propter alias tum hanc potissimum ob causam Gallorum amicitiam ac necessitudinem majorem in modum expetivit. De qua constituenda jamdiu cum legato regio apud nos agitur, ejusque tractatio jam penè ad exitum perducta est. Quid! quod etiam singularis benignitas eminentiæ vestræ, ac moderatio, quam in summis regni rebus gerendis erga protestantes Galliæ semper testata est, à prudentia vestra et magnitudine animi ut hoc sperem atque expectem, facit; qua ex re et fundamenta arctioris etiam necessitudinis inter hanc rempublicam, regnumque Gallicum eminentia vestra jecerit, meque sibi privatim ad officia omnia humanitatis ac benevolentiæ vicissim reddenda obligaverit: adeoque hoc velim eminentia vestra sibi persuasissimum habeat.

Eminentiæ vestræ Studiosissimus.

Serenissime potentissimeque Rex, amice ac fœderate augustissime,

THOMAM Vicecomitem Falconbrigium generum meum in Galliam proficiscentem, et ad testificandum obsequium suum et observantiam, qua majestatem vestram colit, venire in conspectum vestrum, regiam manum osculari cupientem, tametsi propter consuetudinem ejus jucundissimam invitus dimitto, tamen cùm non dubitem quin ab aula tanti regis, in qua tot viri prudentissimi fortissimique versantur, multo instructior ad res quasque laudatissimas, et quasi consummatus ad nos brevi sit reversurus, obsistendum esse ejus animo ac voluntati non sum arbitratus. Et quanquam is est, nisi ego fallor, qui per se satis commendatus, quocunque accesserit, videri possit, tamen si se mea gratia majestati vestræ aliquanto commendatiorem fuisse senserit, eodem me quoque beneficio affectum atque devinctum arbitrabor. Deus majestatem vestram incolumem, nostramque amicitiam firmissimam communi orbis christiani bono quam diutissimè conservet.

OLIVERIUS Protector Reip. Angliæ, &c. Eminentissimo Domino Cardinali MAZARINO.

Eminentissime Domine,

CUM Thomam Vicecomitem Falconbrigium generum meum proficiscentem in Galliam serenissimo regi commendaverim, non potui quin ea de re eminentiam vestram certiorem facerem, nec non vobis etiam eundem commendarem: id quantum ponderis atque momenti ad superiorem quoque commendationem allaturum sit non nescius. Quem certè fructum commorationis apud vos suæ, sperat autem non mediocrem hunc fore, percepturus est, ejus maximam partem favori vestro ac benevolentiæ non poterit non debere; cujus prope sola mens ac vigilantia res tantas eo in regno sustinet ac tuetur. Quicquid ei gratum eminentia vestra fecerit, id mihi fecisse se existimet; id ego in multis vestris erga me humaniter et amicè factis numerabo.

Westmonasterio, Maii. an. 1658.

OLIVERIUS Protect. Reipub. Angliæ, &c. Eminentissimo Domino Cardinali MAZARINO.

Eminentissime Domine,

CUM illustrissimum virum Thomam Bellassisum Vicecomitem Falconbrigium generum meum serenissimi regis adventum in castra ad Dunkirkam gratulatum mitterem, eidem præcepi, ut vestram quoque eminentiam adiret, meoque nomine et plurimam salutem dicat, et gratias vobis agat, cujus potissimum fide, prudentia, vigilantia perfectum est, ut res Gallica tam diversis in partibus, et præsertim in vicina Flandria contra Hispanum hostem communem tam prosperè geratur: à quo nunc celeriter, uti spero, fraudum et insidiarum, quibus se maxime tuetur, aperta atque armata virtus pœnas reposcet: quod uti fiat quàm citissimè, nos certe neque copiis, quantum possumus, neque votis deerimus.

Serenissime potentissimeque Rex, amice ac fœderate augustissime,

UT nuntiatum est venisse in castra majestatem vestram, tantisque copiis infame illud opidum piratarum atque asylum Dunkirkam obsedisse, et magnam cepi voluptatem, et spem certam, fore nunc brevi, Deo bene juvante, ut infestum minùs posthac latrociniis mare tutiùs navigetur; fore ut Hispanicas fraudes, ducem alterum ad Hesdenæ proditionem auro corruptum, alterum ad Ostendam dolo captum, virtute bellica majestas vestra nunc brevi vindicet. Mitto itaque nobilissimum virum Thomam Vicecomitem Falconbrigium generum meum, qui et adventum vestrum in tam propinqua nobis castra gratularetur, et coràm exponat quanto nos studio majestatis vestræ res gestas non junctis solum viribus nostris, sed votis etiam omnibus prosequamur, uti Deus opt. max. et ipsam incolumem, et nostram amicitiam firmissimam communi orbis Christiani bono quam diutissimè conservet.

Serenissime Dux Magne,

CUM celsitudo vestra in omnibus quidem literis suis summam erga nos benevolentiam suam nobis semper significaverit, dolemus id præfectis vestris ac ministris aut tam obscurè significatum, aut tam male esse intellectum, ut in portu Libernensi, ubi maximè quæ vestra sit erga nos benevolentia intelligi oporteret, nos nullum ejus fructum aut indicium percipere queamus; immo alienum potius et hostilem vestrorum in nos animum indies experiamur. Quàm enim non amicis nostra classis Liburnensibus usa nuperrime sit, quàm nullis adjuta rebus, quàm hostiliter denique accepta bis ab illo oppido discedere coacta sit, cum ex eo ipso loco multis testibus fide dignis, tum ex ipso navarcho nostro, cui cùm classem credamus, narrandi fidem derogare non possumus, satis videmur nobis nimisque certò cognovisse. Priore ejus adventu cal. Jan. post redditas celsitudini vestræ literas nostras, vestraque omnia humanitatis officia nostris hominibus ultro delata, petentibus ut portus Ferrarii commoditate uti liceret, responsum est, id concedi non posse, ne rex Hispaniæ scilicet noster hostis offenderetur. Et tamen quid est quod princeps amicus amico præbere communius possit, quàm littoris ac portus aditum? quid est quod nos expectare ab hujusmodi amicitia possimus, quæ hostium nostrorum animum ne offendat, incommodare nobis quàm commodare, aut vel minimis rebus subvenire paratior sit? Et primo quidem ex singulis navibus duobus vel tribus nautis duntaxat excensus in terram, sive commercium (quam vos practicam vocatis) est datum: mox ut auditum est in oppido, navem quandam Belgicam, quæ frumentum in Hispaniam portabat, à nostris esse interceptam, quod erat antea commercii statim adimitur; Longlandius, qui nostris illis mercatoribus præsidet, classem adire non permittitur; aquatio, quæ omnibus non planè hostibus libera est, non sibi nisi sub armatis custodibus iniquo pretio, et quidem egerrimè præbetur: tot nostris mercatoribus, qui non sine maximo vestrorum emolumento illic versantur, suos ne invisant populares aut ulla re adjuvent interdicitur. Posteriore ejus adventu, sub exitum mensis Martii, egressus ex navibus nemini datur: quinto post die cùm naviculam quandam Neapolitanam prætoria navis nostra incidentem in nos fortè excepisset, ducenta plus minus tormenta ab oppido classem versus displodantur, quorum nullum ictu nos læsit ne attigit quidem: quod argumento esse potest quàm longe hæc à portu atque castelli ditione in alto gererentur, quæ vestros quasi portu violato sic sine causa irritarunt: confestim aquatorum nostrorum scaphæ intra portum oppugnantur; una capitur, detinetur; reposcentibus neque scapham neque homines redditum iri respondetur, nisi capta illa navis Neapolitana reddatur, quam constat libero mari captam, ubi capi licuit. Ita nostri multis modis incommodati sine illo commeatu, quem numerata pecunia coëmerant, abire denuo coguntur. Hæc si celsitudinis vestræ voluntate ac jussu quod speramus non fiunt, petimus id ostendat præfecti illius supplicio, qui amicitias domini sui violare tam facile in animum induxit: sin est ut sciente ac volente vestra celsitudine commissa hæc sint, cogitet nos, ut benevolentiam vestram plurimi semper fecimus, ita apertas injurias à benevolentia dignoscere didicisse.

Serenissime potentissimeque rex, amice ac fœderate augustissime,

QUOD tam celeriter illustri missa legatione majestas vestra meum officium cumulo rependit, cùm singularem benignitatem, animique magnitudinem testata est suam, tum meo etiam honori ac dignitati quantopere faveat, non mihi solùm declaravit, verum etiam universo populo Anglicano: quo nomine majestati vestræ, pro eo ac de me merita est, gratias et ago et habeo maximas. De victoria quam conjunctis nostris copiis Deus contra hostes felicissimam dedit, vobiscum unà lætor; nostrosque in eo prœlio neque subsidiis vestris, neque majorum suorum bellicæ gloriæ, neque suæ denique virtuti pristinæ defuisse, perquàm etiam gratum est. De Dunkirka, quam deditioni proximam majestas vestra sperare se scribit, eam nunc deditam tam citò posse me rescribere insuper gaudeo: neque unius urbis jactura duplicem perfidiam Hispanum propediem esse luiturum spero; quod capta urbe altera effectum esse, velim majestas etiam vestra tam citò possit rescribere. Quod reliquum pollicetur meas rationes curæ sibi fore, de eo regi optimo atque amicissimo pollicenti, ejusque legato excellentissimo atque ornatissimo viro duci Crequiensi idem confirmanti, non diffido; Deumque opt. max. majestati vestræ reique Gallicæ domi bellique propitium exopto.

Eminentissime Domine,

CUM regi serenissimo per literas gratias agam, qui honoris et gratulationis reddendæ causa, suæque lætitiæ de nobilissima recenti victoria mecum communicandæ legationem splendidissimam misit, ingratus tamen sim, nisi eminentiæ quoque vestræ debitas simul gratias per literas persolvam; quæ ad testandam suam erga me benevolentiam, meique rebus omnibus quibus potest ornandi studium, nepotem suum præstantissimum atque ornatissimum adolescentem unà misit, et siquem haberet apud se propinquiorem aut quem pluris faceret, eum potissimum fuisse missurum scribit: addita etiam ratione, quæ ab judicio tanti viri profecta ad meam haud mediocrem laudem atque ornamentum pertinere existimo; nempe ut qui sanguine conjunctissimi sibi sunt in me honorando atque colendo eminentiam suam imitarentur. Et humanitatis quidem, candoris, amicitiæ vestrum in me diligendo exemplum haud postremum fortasse habuerint; summæ virtutis summæque prudentiæ alia in vobis longe clariora; quibus regna resque maximas summa cum gloria administrare discant. Qua res uti possit eminentia vestra quam diutissimè quamque felicissimè gerere ad totius regni Gallici, immo totius reip. Serenissime potentissimeque Rex, amice ac fœderate charissime, Quoties communium religionis hostium importuna consilia variasque artes intuemur, toties nobiscum reputamus, quàm necessarium orbi Christiano, quàmque salutare sit futurum, quò faciliùs adversariorum conatibus iri obviàm possit, protestantium principes inter se, et potissimùm majestatem vestram cum repub. nostra arctissimo fœdere conjungi. Id à nobis quantopere fit, quantoque studio expetitum, quàm denique gratum nobis accidisset, si Suecorum nostræque res ea conditione ac loco fuissent, ut fœdus illud ex utriusque animi sententia sanciri, alterque alteri opportunissimo auxilio esse potuisset, oratoribus vestris, ex quo primùm illi hoc apud nos egerunt, testatum reddidimus. Neque vero illi suo muneri defuerunt; sed quam cœteris in rebus consueverunt, eandem hac quoque in parte prudentiam ac diligentiam adhibuerunt. Verùm ea nos domi improborum civium perfidia exercuit qui in fidem sæpius recepti, res novas tamen moliri, et cum exulibus, etiam cum hostibus Hispanis discussa jam sæpe et profligata consilia repetere non desinunt, ut in propulsandis periculis propriis occupati, neque curam omnem, neque integras opes quod in votis erat, ad communem religionis causam tuendam convertere hactenus potuerimus. Quod licuit tamen, quantumque in nobis situm erat, et anteà studiosè præstitimus, et siquid in posterum majestatis vestræ rationibus conducere videbitur, id non velle solùm, verùm etiam summa ope vobiscum unà agere per occasiones non desistemus. Interea majestatis vestræ rebus prudentissimè fortissimèque gestis gratulamur atque ex animo lætamur: eundemque uti velit Deus felicitatis atque victoriæ cursum esse quam diuturnum ad sui numinis gloriam assiduis precibus exoptamus.

Serenissime Rex, amice ac fœderate, Ostendit nobis per libellum supplicem Joannes Buffield, mercator Londinensis, se anno 1649, merces quasdam Antonio Joanni et Manueli Ferdinando Castaneo Tamirensibus tradidisse, ut iis divenditis earum rationem mercatorum more sibi redderent: tum in Angliam dum navigaret, in piratas incidisse, spoliatumque ab iis damnum haud mediocre accepisse: hoc audito, Antonium et Manuelem eò quod hunc interfectum credebant, traditas sibi merces statim pro suis habuisse, adhuc etiam retinere, rationemque omnem de iis recusare; atque huic fraudi subsecutam paulo post Anglicarum mercium proscriptionem obtendere; coactum se demum superiore anno, hyeme media in Lusitaniam redire, sua repetere; sed frustra; hos enim neque bona neque rationem ut reddant adduci posse; et quod mirum sanè videatur, privatam illarum mercium possessionem proscriptione publica defendere: cùm videret se hominem longinquum deteriore conditione cum Tamirensibus in sua patria contendere, ad majestatem vestram se confugisse; conservatoris judicium, qui judicandis Anglorum causis constitutus est, supplicem poposcisse; à majestate vestra rursus ad forensem illam cognitionem, unde confugerat, rejectum esse. Quod etsi per se iniquum non est, tamen cùm perspicuum sit Tamirenses istos vestro edicto publico ad suam privatam fraudem abuti, à majestate vestra majorem in modum petimus, ut causam hujus multis casibus afflicti, ad inopiamque redacti, ad conservatorem potius judicem proprium velit pro sua clementia integram remittere: quo possit inops fortunarum suarum quod superest ab illorum hominum infida societate recuperare: id, re cognita, quin majestati vestræ nobiscum unà maximè placeat non dubitamus.

Serenissime Domine,

Carolus Harbordus, vir equestris apud nos ordinis, per libellum supplicem ad nos detulit, se bona quædam et suppellectilem cum ex Hollandia Brugas in ditionem vestram asportasset, de iis, ne sibi per vim atque injuriam eripiantur, inopinatò periclitari. Ea nempe, cum à Comite Suffolchiensi pro quo se grandi ære alieno obstrinxerat, ex Anglia an. 1643. missa ad se idcirco fuissent, ut haberet, quo sibi satisfaceret, siquid pro illo dissolvere cogeretur, a Richardo Grenvillo, qui et ipse equestris ordinis esse fertur, occupari, et quo in loco custodiebantur, effractis foribus atque articulis possideri: hoc solo titulo, deberi sibi nescio quid à Theophilo Suffolchiensi comite defuncto, ex quodam nostræ curiæ Cancellariæ decreto, eaque proinde bona quasi Theophili Comitis essent, eique decreto obnoxia, se referenda in tabulas curasse: cùm ex nostris legibus neque ipse comes, qui nunc est, et cujus hæc bona sunt, eo decreto teneatur, neque bona ejus occupari aut retineri debeant: id quod ex sententia ejusdem curiæ unà cum hisce literis ad vos missa, declaratur, quas quidem literas supradictus Carolus Harbordus à nobis petiit, uti per eas celsitudinem vestram rogatam vellemus, ut bona illa et recensione omni, et iniqua ista Richardi Grenvilli actione, primo quoque tempore liberentur: cùm hoc contra morem jusque gentium planè sit, at cuiquam in aliena ditione ea de re actio detur, quæ in ea regione, ubi causa actionis orta est, legitimè dari non possit. Hanc causam ut celsitudini vestræ commendaremus, et ipsa justitiæ ratio, et prædicata passim vestra æquanimitas permovit. Quod siquo tempore usus venerit, ut de jure aut commodis vestrorum apud nos agatur, haud remissa profecto nostra studia, immo omni tempore propensissima experturos vos esse polliceor.

Serenissime ac potentissime Rex, amice ac fœderate,

Cum serenissimus pater meus gloriosæ memoriæ Oliverius reip. Angliæ protector, omnipotente Deo sic volente, supremum jam diem tertio Septembris obierit, ego successor ejus in hoc magistratu legitimè declaratus, tametsi in summo mœrore ac luctu, non potui tamen quin de re tanta primo quoque tempore majestatem vestram per literas certiorem facerem, quam et mei patris et hujus reip. amicissimam hoc nuntio repentino haud lætaturam esse confido. Meum nunc est à vestra majestate petere, de me sic velit existimare, ut qui nihil deliberatius in animo habeam, quàm societatem et amicitiam quæ gloriosissimo meo parenti vestra cum majestate fuit, summa fide atque constantia colere; ejusque fœdera, consilia, rationes vobiscum institutas eodem studio ac benevolentia observare ratasque habere: legatum proinde apud vos nostrum eadem qua prius potestate præditum volo: quicquid id nostro nomine vobiscum egerit, ita accipere velitis rogo quasi à me ipso actum id esset. Vestræ denique majestati comprecor fausta omnia.

Eminentissimo Domino Cardinali Mazarino.

Eminentissime Domine,

Quanquam nihil mihi acerbius accidere potuit, quàm de serenissimi et præclarissimi patris mei obitu scribere, tamen cum sciam quanti ille fecerit eminentiam vestram, quanti vos illum, neque dubitem quin eminentia vestra, cui summa rei Gallicæ commissa est, amici ac fœderati tam constantis tamque conjuncti mortem molestissime latura sit, permagni referre arbitratus sum, ut eam quoque, simul cum rege, de hoc casu gravissimo per literas monerem; vobisque etiam, quoniam id æquum est, confirmarem, me ea omnia sanctissimè præstiturum ad quæ præstanda vobis, rataque habenda serenissimæ memoriæ pater meus fœdere tenebatur: perficiamque ut illum, utpote vobis amicissimum omnique laude florentem, cùm amissum meritò doletis, quàm minimè tamen quod ad servandam societatis fidem attinet, desideretis: cui etiam ad utriusque gentis commune bonum vestra quoque ex parte servandæ Deus eminentiam vestram quàm diutissimè conservet.

Serenissime potentissimeque rex, amice ac fœderate,

Cum videar mihi paternam virtutem vix satis posse imitari, nisi easdem quoque amicitias colam et retinere cupiam, quas ipse et virtute sibi quæsivit, et sibi esse maxime colendas ac retinendas judicio singulari duxit, non est quod dubitet majestas vestra, quin eodem se prosequi studio ac benevolentia debeam, qua pater meus memoriæ serenissimæ est prosecutus. Tametsi igitur in hoc magistratus ac dignitatis initio non eo loco res nostras reperiam, ut in præsentia possim ad quædam capita respondere, quæ oratores vestri in medium protulerunt, tamen et institutum à patre fœdus cum majestate vestra continuare, et arctius etiam conjungere, mihi quidem magnopere placet; rerumque utrinque statum simul ac plenius intellixero, ad ea transigenda quæ cum utriusque reip. commodis potissimum conjuncta esse videbuntur, ero equidem semper, ad me quod attinet, promptissimus. Deus interim majestatem vestram, ad gloriam suam et orthodoxæ ecclesiæ tutelam atque præsidium, quam diutissimè conservet.

Serenissime, potentissime rex, amice ac fœderate,

Binas accepi à majestate vestra literas; alteras per nuncium suum, alteras legato nostro D. Philippo Mea-

Ex quibus non solum dolorem suum de obitu patris mei serenissimi veris animi sensibus expressum, deque ipso majestas vestra quàm preclarè senserit, verum etiam de me quoque ejus in locum suspecto quantam spem ceperit cognovi. Et ad paternæ quidem laudis cumulum nihil posthac amplius aut illustrius tanto authore accedere potest, meis certe in capessenda repub. auspiciis nihil felicius tanto gratulatore, ad virtutes denique patrias tanquam hæreditatem optimam adeundas nihil quod accendat vehementius tanto hortatore potuit accidere. Ad rationes majestatis vestræ de communi Protestantium causa nobiscum initas quod spectat, sic velim existimet, me quidem ex quo ad hæc gubernacula accessi, quanquàm eo loco res nostræ sunt, ut summam diligentiam, curam, vigilantiam domi potissimum requirant, nihil tamen antiquius aut deliberatius habuisse aut habere, quam paterno fœderi cum majestate vestra percusso quantum in me erit non deesse. Classem itaque in mare Balticum mittendam cum iis mandatis curavi, quæ internuncius noster, quem ad hoc totum negotium amplissimè instruximus, majestati vestræ communicabit. Quam Deus opt. max. incolumem, prosperisque rerum successibus fortunatissimam, ad orthodoxam fidem tutandam diutissime conservet.

Serenissime, potentissimeque rex, amice ac fœderate,

MITTO ad majestatem vestram, quo nihil dignius aut præstantius possum mittere, virum verè egregium, vereque nobilem Georgium Aiscoum, equitem auratum, non solùm belli, et navalis præsertim scientia multis ex rebus fortiter gestis cognitum jam sæpe atque spectatum, verum etiam probitate, modestia, ingenio, doctrina præditum, moribus suavissimis nemini non charum, et, quod nunc caput rei est, sub signis majestatis vestræ virtute bellica toto orbe terrarum florentissimæ jam diu mereri cupientem. Velimque sic habeat majestas vestra, quicquid huic viro muneris commiserit, in quo fides, fortitudo, experientia constare vel etiam prælucere possit, neque fideliori neque fortiori, nec facile peritiori posse se quicquam committere. Quæ autem ego illi negotia dedero communicanda vestræ majestati, in iis expeditum aditum, aurem benignam velit rogo præbere, eamque fidem, quam nobismetipsis coràm fuisset habitura; eum denique honorem, quem tali viro et suis meritis et nostra commendatione ornatissimo convenire judicaverit. Deus res vestras ad gloriam suam et orthodoxæ ecclesiæ præsidium felici exitu fortunet.

Serenissime potentissimeque rex, amice ac fœderate charissime,

DETULIT ad nos per libellum supplicem Samuel Piggottus, Londinensis mercator, se nuper naves duas (quarum alteri nomen Postæ, magister Tiddeus Jacobus; alteri The Water-Dog, magister Garbrand Peters) Londino in Galliam negotiandi causa misisse; eas inde sale onustas Amsterodamum petisse; Amsterodamo alteram saburra tantùm, alteram halece impositas cujus cum Petro quodam Heinsbergo societas erat in mare Balticum Stetinum usque Pomeraniæ, quæ in vestra ditione est, ad exponendam illic halecem navigasse; verùm utrasque hasce naves accepisse se alicubi maris Baltici à copiis quibusdam vestris detineri; tametsi ut huic malo occurreret cum utraque nave syngrapham sigillo curiæ maritimæ obsignatam unà curaverit mittendam, qua et navium harum et mercium, excepta halecis parte supradicta, unum se esse ac legitimum dominum demonstraret. Cujus rei cùm fidem apud nos plenam fecerit, peto magnopere à majestate vestra (quandoquidem duarum navium jactura sine summo hominis detrimento fortunarumque forte omnium naufragio vix posse accidere videtur) uti mandet suis atque imperet illarum navium liberam primo quoque tempore dimissionem. Deus majestatem vestram, ad gloriam suam ecclesiæque orthodoxæ præsidium, quàm diutissimè servet incolumem.

GRAVEM ad me detulit querelam per libellum supplicem Maria Grinderia vidua, cùm sibi à Thoma Kilegræo vestro milite pecunia bene magna ante annos octodecim debeatur, se eum ne nullo modo adducere per procuratorem posse, neque ut debitum solvat, neque ut de jure suo, si quid sit, velit lege experiri; id ne à procuratore viduæ cogi possit, petisse eum à celsitudinibus vestris per libellum supplicem, ne cui liceat eum lege persequi ullius pecuniæ ab se in Angliæ debitæ. Ego verò si celsitudinibus vestris hoc tantum significavero, viduam esse, egenam esse, multorum matrem parvulorum, cujus iste omnes prope fortunas avertere conatur, non committam ut apud vos, quibus divina præcepta atque adeo de viduis pupillisque non opprimendis notissima esse confido, graviore ulla utendum cohortatione putem, ne hoc fraudandi privilegium petitioni istius concedere velitis: id quod nunquam concessuros vos esse mihi persuadeo.

Serenissime potentissimeque rex, amice ac fœderate augustissime,

ACCEPIMUS, idque non sine dolore, quasdam in provincia protestantes ecclesias ab homine quodam male feriato ita indignè fuisse in sacris concionibus interpellatas, ut ea res magistratibus, ad quos hujus causæ cognitio Gratianopoli ex lege pertinebat, gravi animadversione digna censeretur: sed conventum Cleri, qui iis in locis proximè habebatur, à majestate vestra impetrasse, ut res integra Parisios ad concilium regium revocaretur: à quo dum nihil hactenus decernitur, ecclesias illas et præsertim Aquariensem, convenire ad colendum Deum prohiberi. Vehementer itaque à majestate vestra etiam atque etiam peto, primùm, ut quorum preces ad Deum pro salute sua rebusque regni prosperis non interdicit, eorum coitus publicos ad precandum interdicere ne velit: deinde ut in illum hominem rei divinæ interpellatorem ex sententia illorum judicum, quibus hujusmodi causarum legitima atque consueta cognitio Gratianopoli data est, animadvertatur. Deus majestatem vestram quàm diuturnam atque incolumem conservet; ut si hæc nostra vota vobis accepta sunt, Deoque grata esse existimatis, eadem ab illis etiam protestantibus ecclesiis quibus nunc interdicitur, pro vobis publice fieri, sublato illo interdicto, quàm primum velitis.

Eminentissimo Domino Cardinali MAZARINO.

Eminentissime domine cardinalis,

Serenissime potentissimeque rex, amice ac fœderate,

TAMETSI multa sunt quæ ad regem amicum et reip. nostræ conjunctissimum necessariò scribam, nihil est tamen quod faciam libentius quàm quod nunc facio, ut majestati vestræ, regnoque Portugalliæ insignem hanc proximam de communi hoste Hispano victoriam gratulér: qua non ad vestram tantummodo, verum etiam ad Europæ totius pacem ac respirationem, permagnum, atque in multos fortasse annos, allatum esse momentum nemo est quin intelligat. Alterum est in quo victoriarum certissimum pignus justitiam majestatis vestræ agnoscam, qua ex articulo fœderis 24, per arbitros Londini datos, mercatoribus nostris est satisfactum, quorum naves onerarias Brasiliensis societas conduxit. Unus est Alexander Bencius, mercator Londinensis, cui, cùm navis ejus, quæ Tres Fratres vulgo nominatur, magistro Joanne Wilkio, duas navigationes conducta onerataque navaverit, pactum stipendium persolvere societas recusat: cùm cæteris qui semel tantùm navigarunt, jampridem persolutum sit. Quod cur sit factum non intelligo, nisi si eorum judicio mercede dignior est, qui semel quàm qui bis meruerit. Vehementer itaque peto à majestate vestra, ut huic uni Alexandro, cui duplum debetur, debita navatæ operæ sàtisfactio ne desiat; velitque pro authoritate sua quàm brevissimum solutionis diem damnique simul sarciendi sociis Brasiliensibus constituere: quorum dilationibus effectum est, ut datum inde mercatori damnum mercedem ipsam jam pene superat. Deus majestatem vestram lætis rerum successibus contra hostem augere indies et fortunare pergat.

RICHARDUS Protect. Reip. Angliæ, &c. Eminentissimo Domino Cardinali MAZARINO.

Eminentissime domine,

PER literas ad eminentiam vestram octo circiter abhinc mensibus Jun. 13 datas, causam Petri Petti, viri et singulari probitate præditi et egregiis artibus in re navali nobis reique publicæ utilissimi, commendavimus. Ejus nave Edwardo anno 1646 à quodam Gallo, cui nomen Basconi, Thamesis in ostio, ut scripsimus, capta, et in portu Bononiensi vendita, quanquam rex in concilio regio 4 Novemb. anno 1647 decreverat, ut quam censuisset consilium pecuniæ summam damni accepti loco dandam, satisfactioni daretur, is tamen ex eo decreto nihildum se fructus percepisse ostendit. Cùm autem dubium mihi non sit, quin eminentia vestra meo rogatu id omne mandaverit quod ad decretum illud primo quoque tempore exequendum pertineret, denuo nunc majoremque in modum peto, ut videre velit quid impedimento sit, cujusve negligentia aut contumacia factum, ut decreto regio post annos jam decem non obtemperetur; velitque pro sua authoritate instare, ut decreta illa pecunia, quam irrogatam jamdiu existimamus, et exigatur quamprimum, et petitori nostro solvatur. Ita rem justitiæ imprimis gratam eminentia vestra fecerit, et à me singularem præterea gratiam inierit.

Duæ sequentes Literæ, RICHARDO abdicato, Restituti Parlamenti nomine scripti sunt.

Serenissime potentissimeque rex, amice charissime,

CUM visum sit Deo optimo atque omnipotenti, penes quem solum conversiones omnes regnorum, rerumque publicarum sunt, nos pristinæ auctoritati summæque rerum Anglicarum administrandæ restituere, et majestatem vestram ea de re certiorem esse faciendam imprimis duximus, et vobis porro significandum, nos cùm majestatis vestræ utpote Protestantium principis potentissimi tum pacis inter vos Danisæque regem, et ipsum quoque Protestantium principem præpotentem, non sine nostra opera atque officio benevolentissimo reconciliandæ, quantum in nobis situm est, esse studiosissimos. Volumus itaque ut internuntio nostro extraordinario, Philippo Meadowes, quo munere ab hac repub. apud majestatem vestram hactenus fungitur, idem omnino munus nostro nunc nomine prorogetur: eique adeo his nostris literis potestatem proponendi, agendi, transigendi cum majestate vestra facimus planè eandem quæ ei proximis literis commendatitiis facta est: quicquid ab eo transactum nostro nomine atque conclusum erit, id omne ratum nos esse habituros, Deo bene juvante, nostra fide spondemus. Deus ille majestatem vestram quam diutissime conservet, rebus Protestantium columen atque præsidium.

Parlamentum Reipub. Angliæ Serenissimo Principi FREDERICO Daniæ Regi.

Serenissime rex, amice charissime,

CUM voluntate ac nutu summi rerum omnium moderatoris Dei opt. max. factum sit ut nos demùm restituti, pristinum locum atque munus in republica gerenda obtineamus, placuit imprimis ea de re nec majestatem vestram, utpote vicinum nobis et amicum regem, esse celandam, et quem ex adversis rebus vestris capiamus dolorem simul esse significandum: id quod ex eo studio eaque diligentia nostra facile perspicietis quam ad pacem inter majestatem vestram regemque Sueciæ reconciliandam et adhibemus nunc, et, quoad opus erit, adhibebimus. Quapropter internuntio nostro ad serenissimum Suecorum regem extraordinario Philippo Meadowes negotium dedimus, ut majestatem vestram his de rebus nostro deinceps nomine adeat, ea communicet, proponat, agat atque transigat, quæ commissa sibi à nobis et mandata esse ostendet. Quam ei fidem majestas vestra hoc in munere habuerit, eam nobismetipsis habere se credat, rogamus. Deus majestati vestræ ex istis omnibus rerum suarum difficultatibus, in quibus tamen forti et magno animo versatur, felicem lætumque exitum primo quoque tempore concedat.

SCRIPTUM

DOM. PROTECTORIS REIPUBLICÆ ANGLIÆ, SCOTIÆ, HIBERNIÆ, &c.

EX CONSENSU ATQUE SENTENTIA CONCILII SUI EDITUM

IN QUO HUJUS REIPUBLICÆ CAUSA CONTRA HISPANOS JUSTA ESSE DEMONSTRATUR

Quibus causis adducti, quasdam insulas in Occidentali India, ab Hispanis jam antea occupatos, adorti nuper simus, eas et justas esse et rationi quam maximè consentaneas nemo est quin facile intelligat, qui modò secum reputaverit, quemadmodum rex ille, ejusque subditi erga gentem Anglicanam in illo tractu Americano semper se gesserint; non alium nempe ad modum nisi perpetuò planè hostilem; qui modus sese gerendi ab ipsis et initium habuit injustissimum, et ab eo tempore contra gentium commune jus, contra fœderum peculiares inter Anglos atque Hispanos leges eadem est prorsùs ratione continuatus.

Fatendum quidem est Anglos, his annis proximis, vel iniqua æquo animo ferè pertulisse, vel se duntaxàt defendisse; unde forsitan potest fieri, ut nonnulli de illa nuper in Occidentalem Indiam nostræ classis profectione ita sentiant, quasi de bello à nobis ultrò incœpto atque illato, non quasi de eo, quod re quidem vera ab Hispanis ipsis et primò ortum atque conflatum, et (quanquam hæc respublica, quod in se erat, confirmandæ pacis, et commercii iis in locis habendi causa nihil prætermisit) ab iisdem hactenus continuatum summoque studio gestum reperietur: qui quoties oblata sibi occasio est, nullam omnino justam ob causam, nulla injuria lacessiti, occidere, trucidare, imo sedatis nonnunquam animis obtruncare nostros illic homines, quos visum est, bonis etiam atque fortunis direptis, coloniis habitationibusque deletis, navibus, si quas per illa maria offendunt, captis, hostium imò prædonum in numero habere non desinunt. Illius enim nominis opprobrio omnes cujuscunque gentis, præter se solos, afficiunt, qui illa maria navigare audeant. Neque hoc alio jure aut meliore se facere intelligunt, quam Papæ nescio qua donatione nixi, et quod partes quasdam illius occidentalis plagæ ipsi primi omnium scrutati sunt: quo nomine ac titulo novi illius orbis jus omne, ac ditionem universam ad se solos pertinere contendunt: de quo titulo sane quàm absurdo copiosiùs dicendi locus erit, cùm ad expendendas eas causas veniemus, cur Hispani exercere omne genus hostilitatis in nostros illic homines usque eo licere sibi arbitrentur, ut qui illas in oras aut tempestate appulsi, aut naufragio ejecti, aliove simili casu delati sunt, eos non ut captivos ad vincula solùm, sed in servitutem etiam redigunt, ipsi tamen ruptam sibi pacem etiam in Europa, et gravissimè violatam existiment, si Angli vicissim, paria reddendi, resque suas repetendi causa, quicquam iis in locis contra eos moliuntur.

Verum, etiamsi Hispaniæ regis apud nos legati, Hispanica factione, quæ semper in consilio regis proximi, patrisque ejus plurimum potuit, confisi, siquid Angli hoc in genere fecissent, levissimis de causis querimonias et postulationes iniquas et ridiculas afferre non dubitarint; illi tamen reges, Hispanis licet nimium addicti, suorum subditorum constringi noluerunt manus, ubi Hispani suas esse solvendas existimarunt: imò vim vi propulsare, et Hispanos, qui ad pacem iis in locis servandam perduci nullo modo potuerunt, in hostium numero habere suis permiserunt. Adeò ut anno circiter millesimo sexcentesimo et quadragesimo cum hæc res in concilio regis proximi agitata esset, postularetque Hispanorum legatus ut naves quædam in Americam profecturæ, et in ostio fluminis vela jam facere paratæ prohiberentur, propterea quòd hostilitatis in Hispanos illic exercendæ potestate essent instructæ, simulque ipse jus commercii in Occidentali India habendi postulantibus per consiliarios quosdam regis, ad eam rem constitutos, Anglis denegaret, placuit ut illæ naves institutum iter suum persequerentur, quod et factum est.

Hactenus prædicti reges subditis suis, bellum iis in locis ob rationes suas privatim suscipientibus, non defuerunt: tametsi, propter potentiam Hispanicæ factionis supradictæ, publicè, pro eo ac debuerant, et existimatione gentis pristina dignum erat, causam eorum suscipere noluerunt. Et nobis certè contumeliosum æquè et indignum fuisset, quibus largiente Deo, tot naves ad omnem maritimi belli usum ornatæ atque instructæ in promptu erant, si eas carie potius corrumpi otiosas domi voluissemus, quam ad ulciscendum Anglorum, quidni etiam dicam, Indorum sanguinem, ab Hispanis tam injustè tam inhumanè totiesque fusum, illis in locis usui esse: quandoquidem "Deus fecit ex uno sanguine totam gentem hominum ut habitaret super universa superficie terræ, definitis præstitutis temporibus, et positis terminis habitationis eorum." Et certè Deus, quocunque id tempore, cujuscunque id manu administrandum sit, tanti sanguinis innocentissimi, tantarum cædium, quibus tot millia Indorum ab Hispanis tam barbarè occisa sunt, tantarum denique injuriarum, quibus illæ gentes miserè sunt ab iisdem vexatæ atque oppressæ, certissimas aliquando pœnas repetiturus est.

Verum ad communem hominum inter se necessitudinem, quæ fraterna sanè est, quæque facit ut gravissimæ et atrocissimæ quorumvis mortalium injuriæ ad reliquos omnes pertinere quodammodò videantur, necesse non est ut recurramus: cum ipsorum hominum nostrorum factæ cædes ac spoliationes satis causæ quamobrem à nobis illa nuper expeditio suscepta sit, satisque justam vindicandi materiam dederint: ut nequid præterea nostrarum in præsentia rationum, ut ne in futurum etiam nostram ipsam sociorumque incolumitatem, eorum præsertim qui orthodoxam religionem colunt, consideremus; ut alias denique causas, quæ illam nobis expeditionem suaserunt, quasque nunc sigillatim enumerare consilium non est, omittamus: cum non causæ singulæ, sed ipsius rei jus atque æquitas declaranda nobis proponatur. Quod ut clarius faciamus, et generatim dicta particulatim explicemus, ad præterita referre oculos paulisper oportebit: quæque inter Anglos atque Hispanos transacta sint, quo statu res eorum utrinque, ad se mutuò quod attinet, fuerint, ex quo et perlustrata primò Occidentalis Indiæ ora, et reformata religio est, strictim percurrere. Quæ duæ res maximæ, cùm eodem ferè tempore accidissent, permagnas ubique conversiones orbis terrarum rebus attulere; ad Anglos præsertim et Hispanos quod spectat, qui diversam ab eo tempore et penè contrariam res suas agendi rationem secuti sunt. Tametsi enim rex proximus, ejusque pater, adversis fermè totius populi Anglicani studiis atque sententiis, duo fœdera cum Hispanis quoquo modo sarserunt, diversi tamen illi utrorumque sensus ac studia ex diversa religione nata, perpetuæque in Occidentali India controversiæ, et Hispanorum simul, dum suis illic thesauris metuunt, suspiciones de Anglis ab initio conceptæ, cum hujus reipublicæ conatus in assequenda æquis atque honestis conditionibus pace inutiles nuper reddidere, tum præcipuas re vera causas Philippo secundo præbuere, ut, regnante Elizabetha, antiquum illud diuque inviolatum fœdus, quod huic genti cum majoribus ejus, tam Burgundici quam Castellani generis intercesserat, rumperet, et illato illi reginæ bello, nationem hanc totam subigendam sibi proponeret, idque ipsum anno supra millesimum quingentesimo octuagesimoque octavo (dum interea de pace stabilienda agebatur) omni impetu aggrederetur: quod quidem in Anglorum animis necesse est adhuc altè residere, neque inde posse facilè evelli. Et quanquam postea pax quædam et commercium in Europa fuit (quamvis ejusmodi nunquam ut Anglorum quisquam suam profiteri religionem in Hispanica ditione, aut sacra Biblia habere domi, ne in navi quidem ausus fuerit) in Occidentali tamen India Hispanus nunquam ex eo tempore, aut pacem esse aut commercium est passus; etiamsi in illo fœdere Henrici octavi regis Angliæ, cum Carolo quinto imperatore anno millesimo quingentesimo quadragesimo secundo de utraque illa re disertis verbis convenisset; in quo fœdere nominatim pax atque liberum commercium inter utrosque et utrorumque populos per omnem alterutrius ditionem, portus, et territoria quæcunque sancitum est, sine ulla Occidentalis Indiæ exceptione, quamvis illam tunc temporis imperator ille obtineret.

Quod autem ad articulum pacis per universum terrarum orbem colendæ, is quidem articulus in omnibus pacis fœderibus, quæ inter utramque gentem unquam extitere, dilucidè continetur, neque ulla de commercio ullo in fœdere exceptio habetur ante illud anni millesimi sexcentesimi quarti, cum quo fœdus illud postremum anni millesimi sexcentesimi trigesimi hac de re per omnia consentit. In quibus duobus proximis fœderibus, per omnes atque singulos utriusque imperii fines commercium convenit, "Quibus in locis ante bellum" inter Philippum secundum Hispaniæ regem, et Elizabetham Angliæ reginam "fuit commercium juxta et secundum usum et observantiam antiquorum fœderum et tractatuum ante" id tempus initorum.

Hæc ipsa fœderum verba sunt; quæ rem dubiam relinquunt, atque ita rex Jacobus pacem cum Hispanis quoquo modo conficere satis habuit, cùm eandem de pace tractationem resumeret, quæ paulò antè mortem Elizabethæ inchoata fuerat, in qua etiam tractatione suis illa deputatis inter cætera mandaverat, ut de commercio libero in Occidentali India habendo instantèr agerent.

Verum rex Jacobus (qui pacis cum Hispanis faciendæ admodùm erat cupidus) ita istam clausulam relinquere contentus erat, ut utrique parti eam suo modo interpretandi facultas esset; quanquam si illa verba, "usus et observantia antiquorum fœderum et tractatuum," sic intelligenda sunt (ut par est) juxta et secundum id quod jure fieri debuit, non juxta et secundum quod ex parte Hispanorum ad manifestissimam eorum violationem factum est, quæ Anglis querimoniarum, utrisque dissidiorum materia perpetua erat, ex ipsis antiquorum fœderum disertis verbis clarissimum est, per omnem Hispanorum ditionem, quæcunque illa esset, tam commercii quam pacis jus Anglis fuisse.

Cæterùm si antiqua fœdera et pactiones servandi ratio ab eorum manifesta violatione petenda est, habent Hispani obtentum aliquem sic interpretandi illam in postremis fœderibus clausulam, quasi commercium illis in locis exciperet. Et tamen ad dimidiam usque illius temporis partem quod inter supradictum fœdus 1542, et initium belli à Philippo secundo contra Elizabetham suscepti intercessit, quantum ipsis ex rebus gestis intelligi potest, haud minus permitti illis in locis quam prohiberi commercium apparet. At posteaquam Hispani commercium omnino recusarunt, à permutandis mercibus ad alternandos ictus ac vulnera deventum est, tam ante bellum inter Philippum et Elizabetham ortum, quam post pacem ab Jacobo rege anno 1604 factam; alteramque ab ejus filio anno 1630, ita tamen ut hinc commercium per Europam non interpellaretur; tametsi nunc primum Hispaniæ rex, post hanc nuper nostrarum rerum retentionem, eorum locorum controversias ad hæc etiam Europæ loca propagandas interpretatus est.

Verùm neque in fœderum interpretatione, neque in jure commercii ex illis fœderibus, aliave ratione habendi insistimus; quasi in iis fundamenta hujus dissidii jacienda necessariò sint, cum id clarissimis atque evidentissimis rationibus nitatur, quod statim planum faciemus. Sunt tamen ejusmodi nonnulla, quæ, etsi bellum iis fundari non ita necesse est, possunt, neque injuria, impedimenta esse sanciendæ pacis, aut instaurandi saltem fœderis, in quo ea non conceduntur, vel quæ in prioribus pactis concessa sunt, vel non immeritò expectari queunt. Quod etiam pro responso esse potest ad id quod quæritur, quare, quandoquidem antiqua fœdera cum aliis omnibus populis redintegravimus, idem cum Hispaniæ rege non fecimus; neque continuò nos in conditionibus fœderis dextrum ejus oculum, multoque minùs ambos (quod objicitur) ejus oculos postulasse, si crudelissimæ inquisitioni obnoxii esse, ubi commercium permissum est, noluimus, dandum que nobis commercium institimus, unde, neque per antiqua fœdera, neque communi jure, excludendi sumus. Tametsi enim rex Hispaniæ id sumpsit sibi ut nobis commercii leges finesque præscriberet, Romani pontificis lege quadam fretus, qua is omne commercium cum Turcis, Judæis, aliisque infidelibus vetat,* eoque nomine etiam pacis tempore naves ejus bellicæ aliis etiam in locis præterquam in India Occidentali nostras naves ceperunt et expilarunt, et quanquam simili papæ authoritate ejusque donationis titulo jus in Indos sibi vendicat, perinde quasi sibi jure essent subjecti, etiam illi, qui neque in potestate neque in fide ejus sunt, nos tamen authoritatem ejusmodi nullam neque in papa, neque in Hispaniæ rege agnoscimus, ut possit vel Indis jus libertatis suæ, vel nobis concessum naturæ gentiumque legibus jus versandi cum illis, et commercium habendi adimere, cum iis præsertim, ut supra diximus, qui in potestate ac ditione regis Hispaniæ non sunt.

Alterum impedimentum renovandi fœderis cum Hispanis manifestum est atque insigne, nec non ejusmodi, ut legatis ac ministris publicis in Hispanicam ditionem vel de amicitia vel de alio quovis inter utramque rempublicam negotio missis, fiduciam omnem incolumitatis præcidat, ubi rex opinionibus ejusmodi obstrictus est, ut per eas, legatis et ministris publicis, ne in summo vitæ periculo versentur, incolumitatem à sicariis præstare non possit: quorum jus, ut principum rerumque publicarum usus inter se, et amicitia conservetur, gentium jure semper inviolabile est existimatum, iisque asylis multo sanctius, quorum privilegia (authoritate pontificis et Romanæ ecclesiæ fundata) adhibita hactenus fuere ad eludendam vim legum atque justitiæ, quam exequendam subinde poposcimus in interfectores Dom. Antonii Aschami, qui idcircò missus ab hac republica in Hispaniam fuit, ut usum et amicitiam inter utramque gentem procuraret ac stabiliret. Cujus barbaræ cædis nulla satisfactio, nullum supplicium neque sumptum est, neque impetrari unquam potuit, quamvis à † parlamento postularetur, ejusque nomine a concilio status vehementer ac sæpius esset flagitatum. Quod quidem fœderis inter utramque gentem renovandi continuatum hactenus impedimentum atque justissimum fuit, immò verò (pro eo quod ab aliis nationibus factitatum est) justa belli causa censeri potuit.

Quod autem ad controversias in Occidentali India exortas, cum tam in ipsa continente quam in insulis coloniæ nobis quoque sint Americanæ, easque jure non deteriore, immo meliore possideamus quam Hispani suarum ullas obtineant, parique jure ea maria navigare nobis liberum sit, sine ulla tamen causa, nulla prorsus injuria læsi (idque ubi de commercio controversia nulla versata est) tamen perpetuò colonias nostras hostiliter invaserant, nostros homines interfecerunt, naves ceperunt, bona diripuerunt, ædificia stationesque vastarunt, nostros populares captivos in servitutem abduxerunt; atque hæc facere non destiterunt ad illud usque tempus in quo hanc nuper expeditionem contra eos suscepimus.

Ob quam causam, contra quàm antehac in hujusmodi occasione fieri consuevit, ubique ferè ditionis Hispanicæ naves nostras negotiatoresque omnes retinuerunt, eorumque bona proscripserunt; adeo ut, sive ad Americam, sive ad Europam oculos convertamus, belli authores ipsi soli existimandi sunt, quæque ex eo cædes atque incommoda sequi poterunt iis omnibus causam ipsi præbuisse.

Exempla perpetuæ crudelissimæque hostilitatis in Occidentali India, etiam pacis tempore ab Hispanis in Anglos edita, et ab anno 1604, cum ab Jacobo rege coagmentata pax est, usque dum rursus bellum erupit, et ab ea pace quæ anno 1630, proximè facta est, ad hanc usque diem permulta sunt perque inhumana et cruenta:‡ pauca attulisse satis habebimus.

* Gulielmus Stephanus Bristolensis, aliique mercatores aliquot Londinenses anno 1606 et 1607, cùm per oram Mauritaniæ tribus cum navibus commercium cum illis populis haberent, Hispaniæ regis naves, quæ per illa litora prædabantur, eas nactæ in Saphio et Sanctæ Crucis statione, dum in anchoris ibi stabant, diripuerunt; hac sola ratione reddita, "Nolle regem dominum suum cum infidelibus commercium permittere:" quorum damna amplius duobus millibus librarum æstimata sunt.

‡ Navis quædam Ulyssis nomine insignita, cum per oram Guianæ mercaturam faceret, et mercatores ac nautæ adducti fide ac jurejurando Berrei illius loci præfecti, in terram exissent, eorum tamen triginta capti et in custodiam traditi sunt: scribit deinde ad mercatorem præfectus se quidem triginta ex suis nautis cepisse, ideo quod nonnulli exteri, qui mercandi causa illuc appulerant, viginti millibus ducatis ipsum fraudaverant; quos nummos si sibi misisset, remissurum se ei omnes suos juravit, et commercii potestatem facturum. Mercator partim numeratò, partim mercium æstimatione optatam ei summam mittit: quam cum præfectus Berreus accepisset, alligatos ad arbores illos homines triginta strangulari jussit, excepto solo chirurgo qui ad sanandum præfecti morbum asservatus est. Hæc redemptio aliis cum damnis ibi datis septem millibus librarum æstimata est.

Post factam pacem anno 1604, navis Maria dicta, Ambrosio Birch magistro, ad septentrionalem Hispaniolæ oram in Occidentali India mercaturam faciebat; magister, cum à sacerdote quodam patre Joanne, sic enim nominabatur, cum sex sociis, tutis et liberi commercii promissis allectus esset ut in terram videndarum mercium quarundam causa egrederetur, et Hispani duodecim ad Anglicanas merces inspiciendas in navem ascenderent, dum Angli suas merces ostendunt nihil doli metuentes, dante signum ab littore sacerdote, Hispani, educta quisque sica, omnes in navi Anglos jugularunt, præter duos duntaxat qui in mare desiluerunt; cæteri in terra exquisitis cruciatibus necati sunt; magister ipse exutus vestibus et ad arborem alligatus, nudus muscarum morsibus expositus est; ubi post horas viginti Nigrita quidam, audito hominis ejulatu, accedens, jam antè moribundum lancea transfixit: navis hæc cum mercibus quinque milibus et quadringentis libris æstimata est.

Alia navis, cui nomen Arcuariæ, eodem anno ad Sanctum Dominicum capta est, nautæque omnes interfecti: hæc navis mille trecentis libris æstimata est.

Alia navis dicta Amicitia Londinensis, cum navigio suo, à Lodovico Fajardo, classis regiæ Hispaniensis navarcho, capta est, navis cum bonis omnibus publicata, mercatores ac nautici in mare demersi, præter unum puerum, qui ad serviendum est servatus: hæc navis cum navigio quinquies mille et quingentis libris æstimata est.

Ex alia navi, cui nomen The Scorn, cum omnes nautæ, Hispanorum dejerationibus confisi, in terram egressi essent, omnes tamen alligati ad arbores et strangulati sunt. Ubi mercatores et navem et bona omnia amiserunt, mille quingentis libris æstimata.

* Anno 1606 navis, cui nomen Neptunus, ad Tortugam ab Hispanorum navibus prædatoriis capta est, quatuor millibus et trecentis libris æstimata.

Eodem anno navis alia, quæ Alauda nominata est, a Lodovico Fajardo capta, et cum toto onere publicata est; quæ quatuor millibus quingentis et septuaginta libris est æstimata.

† Navis alia, cui nomen Castor et Pollux, ab Hispanis ad Floridam capta est, qui et eam publicarunt, nautasque omnes vel necaverunt, vel in servitute retinuerunt, nihil enim de iis postea est auditum: hæc navis cum suo onere quindecim mille libris æstimata est.

Anno 1608, navis Plimouthensis Richarda nominata, cujus præfectus erat Henricus Challins, domini Popbami, summi Angliæ justiciarii, Ferdinandi Gorges, ordinis equestris, aliorumque sumptibus instructa, ut Virginiam peteret, ad australem Canariarum insularum partem vi tempestatum delata, cum indè cursum ad destinatam oram tenuisset, sub latitudine 27 graduum in undecim naves Hispanicas ab Sancto Dominico redeuntes fortè incidit; quæ ipsam ceperunt, et quanquam præfectus navis diploma regium protulit, quo se expediret, tamen navis cum bonis publica facta est, ipse crudeliter habitus, et ad triremes missus. Unde amplius duo mille et quingentæ libræ sunt amissæ.

* Simile quiddam navi alteri, cui nomen The Ayde, factum est a Lodovico Fajardo captæ, obtentu amicitiæ; hæc item cum bonis publicata est, omnesque nautæ ad triremes abducti; ubi nonnulli fustibus ad necem pulsati sunt, quòd remigium recusassent. Quæ navis et bona, Hispanis ipsis æstimantibus, septem millibus librarum æstimata sunt.

Eodem anno navis alia, Anna Gallant appellata, magistro Gulielmo Curry, cum ad Hispaniolam mercaturas faceret, similiter et navis et bona publica facta sunt, omnesque nautæ suspendio necati, assutis unicuique ad ludibrium chartulis, in quibus erat scriptum, "Cur huc venistis?" Hæc navis cum onere octo millibus librarum æstimata est.

Hæc exempla satis ostendunt, cujusmodi nobis pacem Hispani in Occidentali India temporibus Jacobi servarunt; qui rex diligentissimè curavit vel potius pertimuit ne pax cum iis dirimeretur. Ejusmodi hostilia plenè et cruenta vestigia, ab illa etiam proxima pace, quæ anno 1630 confecta est, ad hanc usque diem, persequi licet.

De iis coloniis, quæ, ab hujus nationis nobilibus quibusdam viris, in insulam Catelinam (ab his Providentiæ dictam) et in insulam Tortugam (ab iisdem Associationis dictam) deductæ sunt, primum dicemus. Hæ autem anno circiter 1629, cum essent incolarum et pecorum omnino vacuæ, indicto inter Anglos et Hispanos tunc temporis bello, ab Anglis occupatæ sunt atque possessæ. Sequente anno pace inter utramque gentem facta, cum de iis insulis haudquaquam ab Hispanis in fœdere exciperetur, Carolus rex, non impediri se hac pace arbitratus, suo diplomate, quod et magno sigillo Angliæ signatum erat, supradictam insulam Providentiæ, simul et alias vicinas ditionis esse suæ declaravit; easque nobilibus quibusdam viris eorumque hæredibus possidendas concessit; et sequente anno ad Tortugam usque insulam concessionem illam extendit.

Et quanquam supradicti coloni, ejusdem regis concessione in earum insularum possessionem venerant, eaque concessio jure optimo fundata erat, primum naturæ, eò quòd neque Hispani, neque alii quicunque in eorum locorum possessione essent, deinde belli, quandoquidem belli tempore occupatæ sunt, et in pacis articulis nequaquam exceptæ, unde extingui jus Hispanorum (si quod illic juris habuissent) ipsorum assensu, ex secundo proximi fœderis articulo, sequitur; quanquam etiam neque supradicta colonorum societas, nec suorum quisquam ullo suo facto justam offensionis causam vel Hispaniæ regi, vel Hispanorum cuiquam præbuerat, donec priores ipsi naves nostras atque colonias vi invasissent, et Anglorum haud paucos, incensis etiam eorum ædificiis ac sedibus, interfecissent; Hispani tamen, cum nullam iis in locis pacem servare statuissent, circa 22 Januarii 1632, nulla injuria lacessiti, navem quandam societatis, cui nomen Flos Marinus, ab insula Providentiæ redeuntem, inter Tortugam et

Post hæc anno circiter 1634, Tortuga insulà ab Hispanis cum quatuor navibus oppugnata est, cum ab Anglis nulla injuria exorta esset: in qua oppugnatione sexaginta vel amplius occisi sunt, multi sauciati ac capti, sedes deletæ, domus incensæ, bona haud parvi pretii ab Hispanis asportata, Angli penitus ex ea insula dejecti, quorum alii suspendio sublati, alii Havanam abducti in servitute miserrima retenti sunt; unus præ cæteris, cui nomen Grymes, qui in Tortuga bombardarius fuerat, crudeliter est trucidatus; pars ad desertam quandam insulam confugiens, cui Sanctæ Crucis nomen est, ab Hispanis, qui eo etiam cum tribus navibus longis fugientes persequebantur, oppugnata mense Martio 1636, quadraginta occisi, reliqui capti et crudelissimè accepti.

Anno 1635 Julii 24, Hispani duabus navibus magnis unaque longa advecti in Providentiæ quoque insulam impetum fecerunt, compluriumque horarum spatio prælium ibi commiserunt; et tum quidem rejecti sunt, et ab incœpto desistere coacti; donec idem rursus tentantes circa annum 1640, cum duodecim navibus magnis et minoribus, quarum prætoriæ Armadillo Carthaginensi nomen erat, ex majoribus regiæ classis argentariæ triremibus, cum magnum militum numerum in terram exposuissent, totius insulæ expugnationem polliciti sibi sunt, verum, haud parvo accepto incommodo, repulsi denuò recesserunt. Altera tamen classe instructa paulò post cum revertissent, coloni dissidiis laborantes, non tam qua se ratione defenderent, quam quibus conditionibus commodissime se dederent, cogitarunt, quas, tradita demum insula, facile impetraverunt. Sed insula hoc modo et colonis erepta est, et reipublicæ, illis octoginta amplius millium librarum damno dato, huic detrimento et ignominia publica simul accepta. Ita in Hispanorum potestatem cum esset redacta, navis quædam, quæ vectores aliquot ab Nova Anglia in eam insulam transmigrantes advexerat, intra ictum bombardarum callidè perducta est (ignorabat enim eam insulam in Hispanorum potestate jam esse) nec sine permagno discrimine ac difficultate se extricavit, amisso etiam navis magistro, viro probissimo, quem ictus tormenti ab insula displosi transverberavit.

Nec contenti intra fines Americanos hostilitati suæ in illius coloniæ socios modum statuere Hispani, in his etiam partibus Europæ eandem in eos exercuerunt: anno enim 1638 Decembris 25, navis quædam ejusdem societatis, Providentiæ nomine insignita, cui Thomas Newman præfectus erat à promontorio Dengioleucis duabus in ipsa Angliæ ora à Sprengfeldio Dunkirkanæ navis prædatoriæ præfecto oppugnata atque capta est; Dunkirkam deinde adducta; ubi navis onera retenta sunt; (quæ multorum etiam illic æstimatione triginta millium librarum summam conficere existimabantur;) Anglorum autem partìm occisi, partim vulnerati, cæteri postquam in ipsa navi sua barbare atque inhumanè essent habiti, Dunkirkam abrepti haud melius accepti sunt, donec rationem aliquam profugiendi invenissent. Et quamvis supplices socii satisfactionem omnibus modis postulassent, eoque proximus per residentem suum Dom. Balthasarum Gerberium, perque literas tam sua manu, quam à Secretario Coco scriptas, eorum nominè reparationem poposcisset, nullam tamen neque bonorum restitutionem, neque ob ea ut compensatio ulla fieret, impetrare potuerunt.

Sunt et alia recentioris et acerbioris etiam memoriæ exempla, illud nempe Sanctæ Crucis ab Hispanis à Portorico provectis oppugnatæ anno circiter 1651, insulæ quidem antea non habitatæ; illo autem tempore colonia Anglorum, duce Nicolao Philips, eam tenuit; qui cum centum circiter colonis ab Hispanis crudelitèr occisus est; qui etiam naves in portu occuparunt, sedes diripuerunt, vastarunt, et funditùs exciderunt. Cumque plures quos occiderent invenire non possent (cum incolarum pars alia in silvas profugisset) Hispani Portoricum reversi iis miseris, et fame propemodum confectis reliquiis ad alias vicinas insulas recipiendi sese, illamque Sanctæ Crucis penitus deserendi, spatium dedere. Sed brevi post tempore Hispani ad pervestigandum et quasi venandum eos qui in silvas sese abdiderant, reverterunt: verum illi ex manibus eorum effugiendi, et in alias insulas dilabendi, rationem aliquam invenerunt.

Eodem anno 1651, navis quædam Joannis Turneri, cum esset in portum Cumanagotæ vehementioribus ventis appulsa, ab illius loci præfecto occupata, et cum omni onere in fiscum redacta est.

* Similiter factum est navi et bonis capitanei Craulei.

Et anno 1650 navis quædam Samuelis Wilson, quæ Barbados insulas petebat, equis onusta, in alto capta et Havanam abducta est; navis et bona publicata, nautarum plerique in custodiam traditi, et mancipiorum more in munimentis operas dare coacti.

Similia experti sunt nautæ cujusdam navis Barnstapulensis, annis abhinc circiter duobus, quæ navis cum prope Hispaniolam, dum a coloniis quibusdam nostris in insulis Caribiis reverteret, rimas agere cœpisset undamque accipere, nautæ ejus in scapha sibi consulere coacti ad littus evaserunt, ubi omnes captivi facti, mancipiorum ritu, in munimentis operas dare cogebantur.

His, aliisque permultis hujusmodi exemplis, quæ omnia recitare nimis longum esset, manifestissimum est Hispaniæ regem eique subjectos arbitrari, se nulla pacis conditione nobis præstanda illis in regionibus obligari: cum et omne genus hostilitatis in nos exercere, immò graviora hostilitate, consueverint, eaque inhumanitas, qua illic Anglos tractare solent, usque eò à pacis legibus aliena sit, ut ne belli quidem legibus non internecini convenire videatur. In illo tamen Hispaniæ regis embargo, quo mercatorum nostrorum naves ac bona proscribi ac retineri imperat, in Anglos culpa omnis confertur; quasi "fœdifragos" nimirum "et sacrosanctæ pacis atque commercii liberi violatores, tam religiose," ut ipse ait, "ab se servati; idque tam inopinata atque professa hostilitate fecisse nos, ut urbem Sancti Dominici in Hispaniola insula oppugnare ado-riremur." Quod solùm causæ affertur, quamobrem Anglorum bona in Hispania proscribantur, negotiatoresque retineantur: quanquam et hoc prædicata ejus humanitate exaggeratum est, "Se nostras classes in * portus suos, quoscunque ingredi aut attingere commodum nobis fuisset, amicè recepisse; neque ministros suos exegisse rigidè a nobis illos pacis articulos inter utramque coronam sancitos, qui cum amplius sex vel octo navibus bellicis intrare portus utrinque vetant."

Verùm quemadmodùm ipse, dum hæc dicit, classes nostras omni commisso ac fœderis violatione illis in portubus absolvit, cùm, siquid ejusmodi, quod objicitur, factum et condonatum sit, id ipsius et ministrorum suorum permissu ac bona venia sit factum, et quemadmodùm luce clarius est non eum gratuitò tam facilem fuisse, si, quanta à classibus nostris momenta suis rationibus accesserint, secum cogitet, ita è contrario rex ille ejusque ministri, quas ipse commemorat, pactiones minimè sanè observarunt; quarum articulo vigesimo tertio tam disertè cautum est, "Si contingat ut displicentiæ" inter utramque rempublicam "oriantur, ut subditi hinc inde ita ea de re admoneantur; ut sex menses à tempore monitionis habeant ad transportandas merces suas, nulla interea arrestatione, interruptione, aut damno personarum aut mercium suarum faciendis vel dandis." Qua in re rex ille exiguam sanè pactionum illarum, quas contra nos profert, in illa nuper nostrarum rerum proscriptione rationem habuit. Quod autem in eo edicto declarat, hostilitatem in Occidentali India exortam, his in partibus violationem pacis liberique commercii habendam esse, nova, adeòque alia plane interpretatio est, atque hactenùs ab utravis republica in medium unquam allata est: tametsi hoc declarandi occasiones utrinque non defuere.

Verùm cùm Hispaniæ rex ipse et verbis et re ipsa declaraverit pacis articulos intelligi sic debere, efficitur hinc ut tot contra Anglos iis in regionibus hostilitèr factis et ab ipso primum exortis, et ab ipso tempore proximè percussi fœderis, ut supradictum est, huc usque continuatis, ab se primo soluta sacra amicitiæ vincula ipse se coarguisse videatur. Quæ res tam clara per se et manifesta est, ut adversarios nostros certè ipsos puduerit in hac controversia factum negare, de jure potius nobiscum disceptaturos; quemadmodùm scilicet Hispaniæ rex, inter titulos suos, regis Indiarum titulum sibi sumpsit, ita universam Indiam, mareque Indicum tam Boreale quam Australe suam esse propriam ditionem, hostesque omnes et piratas esse, qui ejus injussu illuc accesserint. Quod si ita esset, et nos et omnes cæteræ nationes, quicquid iis in locis possidemus, ei relinquere ac reddere, et, reductis coloniis nostris, injuriæ sibi factæ veniam petere deberemus. Verum si rationem ac veritatem illius tituli altiùs inspiciamus, tenui admodum atque infirmo eum niti fundamento comperiemus, quo tanta contentionum ac belli moles superstruenda sit, quantam hanc verisimile est futuram.

Duplex titulus præfertur, papam videlicet ea loca donasse, eoque primos omnium perlustrasse: ad primum quod attinet, scimus papam in donandis regnis ac regionibus liberalissimum semper fuisse, illi intereà dissimillimum cujus vicarium se esse profitetur, qui ne hoc quidem tantulum sibi sumere volebat, ut in dividendis hæreditatibus constitui se judicem pateretur, nedum ut suo arbitrio cuiquam donaret, quemadmodum Angliam, Hiberniam, aliaque regna papa largitus est. Verùm nos authoritatem in eo istiusmodi nullam agnoscimus, neque gentem ullam usque adeo mentis inopem existimamus, ut in eo tantam authoritatem inesse credat; vel Hispani ipsi ut credant, aut essent assensuri, si ab iis papa tantum abjudicasset quantum largitus est. Quod si Galli atque alii, qui authoritatem papalem in ecclesiasticis rebus agnoscunt, hunc Hispanorum titulum pro nihilo habent, nos ut de eo alitèr sentiamus non est expectandum, adeoque hoc relinquimus, responso ampliore prorsus indignum.

Sed neque alter titulus majoris est ponderis; quasi verò, si Hispani paucas quasdam Americæ partes primi perscrutati sunt, insulisque aliquot, fluminibus, ac promontoriis nomina imposuere, idcircò novi illius orbis dominium jure sibi acquisivissent. Verùm imaginarius ejusmodi titulus tali præscriptione nixus sine possessione jus aliquod verum aut legitimum creare non potest. Jus optimum tenendi Americanis in locis quod quisque habet, est coloniarum deductio, et possessio vel ubi nulli omnino incolæ fuere, vel, sicubi fuere, eorum assensu, vel saltem in desertis quibusdam suarum regionum et incultis locis, quibus vel colendis vel habitandis ipsi non sufficiant; quandoquidem Deus terram hominum usibus creavit, præcepitque iis ut universam implerent.

Hoc si verum est, quemadmodum Hispani iniquissimo jure parta illic obtinere invenientur; cum omnia invitis incolis, et quasi ex ipsis eorum visceribus sibi acquisiverint, quorum sanguine suum imperium illic fundarunt, magnasque insulas et regiones totas non reperere quidem desertas sed reddidere, indigenis omnibus eradicatis, ita Angli, quæ illic habent, jure optimo possederint; easque nominatim insulas in quibus Hispani colonias eorum oppugnarunt atque delerunt; quæ aut incolas omnino non habuere, aut si ab Hispanis interfectos, desertæ etiam ab iisdem et sine cultoribus relictæ sunt: adeo ut naturæ gentiumque jure occupantibus quibusvis eas et possidentibus cedant; juxta illud in legibus notissimum, "Quæ nullius sunt et pro derelictis habentur, cedunt occupanti." Quanquam si Hispanos expulissemus iis locis in quæ nostras colonias deduximus, unde ipsi priùs incolas radicitùs exturbaverunt, nos tanquam occisionum et injuriarum illius populi ultores meliore jure regiones illas obtinuissemus, quam oppressores ejusdem et interfectores. Cum autem nostræ coloniæ iis in locis fuerint, ubi neque indigenæ neque Hispani possessionem ullam tenuerunt, neque habitationes ullas aut pecora post se reliquerant, aliamve rem, quæ possit ullo modo jus possessionis retinere, tanto evidentius jus nostrum iis in locis fuit, et Hispanorum injuriæ nobis illatæ tantè apertiores; iis præsertim in locis quæ indicti utrinque belli tempore occupata sunt (quo in genere Providentiæ insula atque Tortugæ fuit) quas si Hispani suas esse ullo priore titulo necdum prolato ostendere potuissent, tamen cum in pacis proximæ tractatione id non fecerint, per secundum ejus articulum talem omnem prætextum ipsi sibi in posterum amputarunt, jusque ipsi suum, si quod erat, extinxerunt.

* At vero navarchus noster Swanleius in Sicilia non ita est amicè in portu Drepani acceptus, ubi anno 1653, circa mensem Junium navis ejus, cui nomen Henricus Bonaventura, unà cum Hollandica navi magna et opulentissima, cui nomen Petro, quam ceperat, proditione Hispanici præfecti, qui ei loco præerat, a septem navibus Hollandicis junioris Trumpii ductu, in ipso portu, non longiùs a munimentis quam sclopi minoris ictus ferri potuit, oppressa est; unde mercatores, quorum illa navis fuit, plus sexaginta tribus millibus librarum amiserunt.

Hoc argumentum copiosiùs tractare nihil attinet; neque est quisquam rerum peritus quin facilè perspiciat, quàm inanes atque infirmæ sint istæ rationes, quibus innixus Hispanus tam immensi tractus imperium arrogare sibi soli non dubitat. Verùm id egimus, ut obtentuum istorum debilitatem paucis aperiremus, quibus Hispani, quicquid in nos indignè atque atrociter in Occidentali India commiserunt, defendere conantur; mancipationes, suspendia, demersiones, cruciatusque nostrorum hominum ac neces, navium ac bonorum spoliationes, coloniarum summa in pace depopulationes, idque nulla prorsus injuria affecti, ut Anglicana gens, quoties hæc tam acerba atque atrocia in suum sanguinem, et ejusdem orthodoxæ fidei cultores, perpetrata meminerit, non naves bellicas sed decus suum omne obsolescere et interire cogitet, si his indignissimis modis tractari sese diutiùs æquo animo patiatur; neque solum tanta ac tam opulenta orbis terrarum parte contra jus legesque gentium communes ab omni libero commercio excludi, verùm etiam pro piratis atque prædonibus haberi, eodemque supplicio plecti, si illa maria navigare, si vel aspicere vel aspirare, si denique vel cum nostris ibi coloniis usum aliquem aut commercium habere ausa fuerit.

De inquisitione Hispanica sanguinaria nihil dicimus, inimicitiarum causa universis protestantibus communi; neque de tot seminariis sacerdotum ac jesuitarum Anglicorum sub Hispanico patrocinio nidulantium, offensionis causa et periculi gravissimi huic reipublicæ propria; cum propositum nobis potissimum sit controversiarum in Occidentali India nostrarum causas et rationes exponere. Hoc verò æquioribus cunctis et incorruptis rerum æstimatoribus planum fecisse confidimus, necessitatem, existimationem, justitiam ad hanc nuper susceptam expeditionem nos evocasse; necessitatem, bellandum enim necessariò est, si per Hispanos pacem colere non licet; existimationem atque justitiam, neutra enim harum nobis constare poterit, si injurias tam inhumanas atque intolerandas impunè civibus nostris ac popularibus inferri desides patiemur, quales in Occidentali India illatas iis esse demonstravimus.

Et certè parum vident, qui de consiliis ac rationibus Hispanicis conjecturam capiunt ex ea persona ac specie quam in præsentia suarum rerum inclinatio induere versùs nos in his orbis terræ partibus coegit; quasi non nunc mens eadem, iidem sensus animorum ac rationum suarum sint, qui tum fuere, cùm anno 1588 subjugare hanc totam insulam suumque sub imperium ac ditionem subjungere affectabant, immò quasi ex hoc immutato apud nos rerum statu formaque reipublicæ non accensa potius eorum in nos odia auctæque suspiciones sint. Quòd si hæc opportunitas, quæ, propter nunnulla quædam quæ nuper acciderunt, ineundi rationem aliquam, qua ab hoc tam vetere et implacato religionis nostræ ac patriæ hoste nobismetipsis (Deo bene juvante) consulere possimus, occasionem fortè suppeditaverit, prætermissa fuerit, fieri poterit ut eas vires facilè sit recuperaturus (animus enim certè illi neque unquam deerit neque deesse poterit) ex quibus intolerandus æquè et formidabilis reddi possit atque antea fuerit. Nos interea si injurias tam immanes in Occidentali India sine satisfactione ulla aut vindicta nostris fieri, si excludi nos omnes ab illa tam insigni orbis terrarum parte, si infestum atque inveteratum hostem nostrum (pace præsertim cum Batavis jam facta) ingentes illos ab Occidentali India thesauros, quibus præsentia incommoda sarcire possit, nostra pace domum deportare, resque suas in eum rursus locum restituere patiemur, quò eandem iterum possit deliberationem suscipere, quam anno 1588 habuit, "Utrum fuisset consultius ad recuperandas Belgii fœderatas provincias initium facere ab Anglia, an ab illis ad subigendam Angliam," proculdubiò non minus multas immò plures causas excogitabit, cur potius ab Anglia initium sit faciendum: Quem finem ut assequantur ullo tempore ea consilia, si Deus permitteret, expectare meritò possemus, ut in nos primos, in omnes deñique ubicunque protestantes, exerceatur quod restat occidionis illius immanissimæ, quam fratres nostri in Alpinis vallibus passi nuper sunt: quæ, si illorum miserorum editis querimoniis orthodoxorum credendum sit, per illos fraterculos, missionarios quos vocant, Hispanicæ aulæ consiliis informata primitùs ac designata erat.

His omnibus animadversis, speramus quidem fore, ut omnes Angli, præsertim sinceri, privatas adversùs se mutuò inimicitias deposituri sint, suisque propriis commodis potius renunciaturi quàm propter cupiditatem lucri, haud ita multi, ex mercaturis illis faciendi (quod non nisi inhonestis conditionibus et quodammodo improbis parari, et aliundè etiam suppeditari poterit) multorum adolescentiam negotiatorum animas, ex iis conditionibus quibus nunc in Hispania negotiantur et degunt, summo periculo, sicuti faciunt, objecturi, vitamque et fortunas multorum in America fratrum Christianorum, hujus denique nationis totius agi existimationem passuri; quodque gravissimum est, oblatis sibi à Deo ad gloriam ipsius, regnumque Christi amplificandum opportunitates præclarissimas ex manibus dimissuri. Quæ quidem non dubitamus quin, remotis quæ veritati penitus inspiciendæ officiunt, expeditionis nuper nostræ in Occidentalem Indiam contra Hispanos susceptæ potissimum fuisse finem appareat.

THOMÆ JUNIO Præceptori suo.

1. QUANQUAM statueram apud me (præceptor optime) epistolium quoddam numeris metricis elucubratum ad te dare, non satis tamen habuisse me existimavi, nisi aliud insuper soluto stylo exarassem; incredibilis enim illa et singularis animi mei gratitudo, quam tua ex debito vendicant in me merita, non constricto illo, et certis pedibus ac syllabis augustato dicendi genere exprimenda fuit, sed oratione libera, immò potius, si fieri posset, Asiatica verborum exuberantia. Quamvis quidem satis exprimere quantum tibi debeam, opus sit meis viribus longè majus, etiamsi omnes quoscunque Aristoteles, quoscunque Parisiensis ille dialecticus congessit argumentorum τόπους exinanirem, etiamsi omnes elocutionis fonticulos exhaurirem. Quereris tu vero (quòd merito potes) literas meas raras admodum et perbreves ad te delatas esse; ego vero non tam doleo me adeo jucundo, adeoque expetendo defuisse officio, quam gaudeo et pene exulto eum me in amicitia tua tenere locum, qui possit crebras à me epistolas efflagitare. Quod autem hoc plusquam triennio nunquam ad te scripserim, quæso ut ne in pejus trahas, sed pro mirifica ista tua facilitate et candore, in mitiorem partem interpretari digneris. Deum enim testor quam te instar patris colam, quam singulari etiam observantia te semper prosecutus sim, quamque veritus chartis meis tibi obstrepere. Curo nempe cum primis, cùm tabellas meas nihil aliud commendit, ut commendet raritas. Deinde, cùm ex vehementissimo, quo tui afficior desiderio, adesse te semper cogitem, teque tanquam præsentem alloquar et intuear, dolorique meo (quod in amore fere fit) vana quadam præsentiæ tuæ imaginatione adblandiar; vereor profecto, simulac literas ad te mittendas meditarer, ne in mentem mihi subito veniret, quam longinquo à me distes terrarum intervallo; atque ita recrudesceret dolor absentiæ tuæ jam prope consopitus, somniumque dulce discuteret. Biblia Hebræa, pergratum sane munus tuum, jampridem accepi. Hæc scripsi Londini inter urbana diverticula, non libris, ut soleo, circumseptus: si quid igitur in hac epistola minus arriserit, tuamque frustrabitur expectationem, pensabitur alia magis elaborata, ubi primum ad musarum spatia rediero.

Londino, Martii 26, 1625.

ALEXANDRO GILLIO.

2. ACCEPI literas tuas, et quæ me mirifice oblectavere, carmina sane grandia, et majestatem vere poeticam, Virgilianumque ubique ingenium redolentia. Sciebam equidem quam tibi tuoque genio impossibile futurum esset, à rebus poeticis avocare animum, et furores illos cœlitus instinctos, sacrumque et æthereum ignem intimo pectore eluere, cum tua (quod de seipso Claudianus) "———— totum spirent præcordia Phœbum." Itaque si tua tibi ipse promissa fefelleris, laudo hic tuam (quod ais) inconstantiam, laudo, siqua est, improbitatem; me autem tam præclari poematis arbitrum à te factum esse, non minus glorior, et honori mihi duco, quam si certantes ipsi dii musici ad meum venissent judicium; quod Tmolo Lydii montis Deo populari olim contigisse fabulantur. Nescio sane an Henrico Nassovio plus gratuler de urbe capta, an de tuis carminibus: nihil enim existimo victoriam hanc peperisse poematio hoc tuo illustrius, aut celebrius. Te vero, cum prosperos sociorum successus tam sonora triumphalique tuba canere audiamus, quantum vatem sperabimus, si forte res nostræ demum feliciores tuas musas poscant gratulatrices. Vale, vir erudite, summasque à me tibi gratias carminum tuorum nomine haberi scias.

Eidem.

3. PRIORI illa epistola mea non tam rescripsi tibi, quam rescribendi vices deprecatus sum, alteram itaque brevi secuturam tacite promisi, in qua tibi me amicissime provocanti latius aliquanto responderem; verum ut id non essem pollicitus, hanc utcunque summo jure deberi tibi fatendum est, quandoquidem singulas ego literas tuas non nisi meis binis pensari posse existimem, aut si exactius agatur, ne centenis quidem meis. Negotium illud de quo scripsi subobscurius, ecce tabellis hisce involutum, in quo ego, cum tua ad me pervenit epistola, districtus temporis angustia magno tum primum opere desudabam: quidem enim ædium nostrarum socius, qui comitiis his academicis in disputatione philosophica responsurus erat, carmina super quæstionibus pro more annuo componenda, prætervectus ipse jamdiu leviculas illiusmodi nugas, et rebus seriis intentior, forte meæ puerilitati commisit. Hæc quidem typis donata ad te misi, utpote quem norim rerum poeticarum judicem acerrimum, et mearum candidissimum. Quod si tua mihi vicissim communicare dignaberis, certè non erit qui magis iis delectetur, erit, fateor, qui rectius pro eorum dignitate judicet. Equidem quoties recolo apud me tua mecum assidua pene colloquia (quæ vel ipsis Athenis, ipsa in academia, quæro, desideroque) cogito statim nec sine dolore, quanto fructu me mea fraudarit absentia, qui nunquam à te discessi sine manifesta literarum accessione, et ἐπιδόσει, planè quasi ad emporium quoddam eruditionis profectus. Sane apud nos, quod sciam, vix unus atque alter est, qui non philologiæ, pariter et philosophiæ, prope rudis et profanus, ad theologiam devolet implumis; eam quoque leviter admodum attingere contentus, quantum forte sufficiat conciunculæ quoquo modo conglutinandæ, et tanquam tritis aliunde pannis consuendæ: adeo ut verendum sit ne sensim ingruat in clerum nostrum sacerdotalis illa superioris sæculi ignorantia. Atque ego profecto cum nullos fere studiorum consortes hic reperiam, Londinum recta respicerem, nisi per justitium hoc æstivum in otium alte literarium recedere cogitarem, et quasi claustris musarum delitescere. Quod cum jam tu indies facias, nefas esse propemodum existimo diutius in præsentia tibi interstrepere. Vale.

Cantabrigia, Julii 2, 1628.

THOMÆ JUNIO.

4. INSPECTIS literis tuis (preceptor optime) unicum hoc mihi supervacaneum occurrebat, quòd tardæ scriptionis excusationem attuleris; tametsi enim literis tuis nihil mihi queat optabilius accedere, qui possim tamen, aut debeam sperare, otii tibi tantum à rebus seriis, et sanctioribus esse, ut mihi semper respondere vacet; præsertim cum illud humanitatis omnino sit, officii minime. Te vero oblitum esse mei ut suspicer, tam multa tua de me recens merita nequaquam sinunt. Neque enim video quorsum tantis onustum beneficiis ad oblivionem dimitteres. Rus tuum accersitus, simul ac ver adoleverit, libenter adveniam, ad capessendas anni, tuique non minus colloquii, delicias; et ab urbano strepitu subducam me paulisper. Stoam tuam Icenorum, tanquam ad celeberrimam illam Zenonis porticum, aut Ciceronis Tusculanum, ubi tu in re modica regio sane animo veluti Serranus aliquis aut Curius in agello tuo placide regnas, deque ipsis divitiis, ambitione, pompa, luxuria, et quicquid vulgus hominum miratur et stupet, quasi triumphum agis fortunæ contemptor. Cæterum qui tarditatis culpam deprecatus es, hanc mihi vicissim, ut spero, præcipitantiam indulgebis; cum enim epistolam hanc in extremum distulissem, malui pauca, eaque rudiuscule scribere, quam nihil. Vale vir observande.

Cantabrigia, Julii 21, 1628.

ALEXANDRO GILLIO.

5. SI mihi aurum, aut cælata pretiose vasa, aut quicquid istiusmodi mirantur mortales, dono dedisses, puderet certe non vicissim, quantum ex meis facultatibus suppeteret, te aliquando remunerasse. Cum vero tam lepidum nobis, et venustum Hendecasyllabon nudiustertius donaveris, quanto charius quidem auro illud est merito, tanto nos reddidisti magis solicitos, qua re conquisita tam jucundi beneficii gratiam rependeremus; erant quidem ad manum nostra hoc in genere nonnulla, sed quæ tuis in certamen muneris æquale nullo modo mittenda censerem. Mitto itaque quod non plane meum est, sed et vatis etiam illius vere divini, cujus hanc oden altera ætatis septimana, nullo certe animi proposito, sed subito nescio quo impetu ante lucis exortum, ad Græci carminis heroici legem in lectulo fere concinnaram: ut hoc scilicet innixus adjutore qui te non minus argumento superat, quam tu me artificio vincis, haberem aliquid, quod ad æquilibrium compensationis accedere videatur; si quid occurrit, quòd tuæ de nostris, ut soles, opinioni minus satisfecerit, scias, ex quo ludum vestrum reliquerim hoc me unicum atque primum græce composuisse, in Latinis, ut nosti, Anglicisque libentius versatum. Quandoquidem qui Græcis componendis hoc sæculo studium atque operam impendit, periculum est, ne plerumque surdo canat. Vale, meque die lunæ Londini (si Deus voluerit) inter bibliopolas expecta. Interim si quid apud illum doctorem, annuum collegii præsidem, qua vales amicitia, nostrum poteris negotium promovere; cura quæso, ut mea causa quam cito adeas; iterum vale.

E nostro Suburbano, Decemb. 4. 1634.

CAROLO DIODATO.

6. JAM isthuc demum plane video te agere, ut obstinato silentio nos aliquando pervincas; quod si ita est, euge habe tibi istam gloriolam, en scribimus priores: quanquam certe si unquam hæc res in contentionem veniret, cur neuter alteri οὕτω δία χρόνυ scripserit, cave putes quin sim ego multis partibus excusatior futurus: δηλον ὅτι ὡς βραδὺς καὶ ὀκνηρός τις ὢν φύσει πρὸς τό γράφειν, ut probe nosti, cum tu contra sive natura, sive consuetudine, ad hujusmodi literarias προσφωνήσεις haud ægre perduci soleas. Simul et illud pro me facit, quod tuam studendi rationem ita institutam cognovi, ut crebro interspires, ad amicos visas, multa scribas, nonnunquam iter facias; meum sic est ingenium, nulla ut mora, nulla quies, nulla ferme illius rei cura, aut cogitatio distineat, quoad pervadam quo feror, et grandem aliquam studiorum meorum quasi periodum conficiam. Atque hinc omnino, nec aliunde, sodes, est factum, uti ad officia quidem ultro deferenda spissius accedam, ad respondendum tamen, O noster Theodote, non sum adeo cessator; neque enim commisi ut tuam epistolam unquam ullam debita vice nostra alia ne clauserit. Quid! quod tu, ut audio, literas ad bibliopolam, ad fratrem etiam sæpiuscule; quorum utervis propter vicinitatem satis commode præstitisset, mihi, si quæ essent, reddendas. Illud vero queror, te, cum esses pollicitus ad nos fore ut diverteres cum ex urbe discederes, promissis non stetisse: quæ promissa abs te præterita si vel semel cogitasses, non defuisset prope necessarium scribendi argumentum. Atque hæc habui quæ in te merito, ut mihi videor, declamitarem. Tu quæ ad hæc contra parabis ipse videris. Verum interim quid est quæso? recteue vales? ecquinam iis in locis eruditulі sunt quibuscum libenter esse, et garrire possis, ut nos consuevimus? quando redis? quamdiu tibi in animo est apud istos ὑπερβορέιὡς commorari? tu velim ad hæc mihi singula respondeas: sed enim ne nescias non nunc demum res tuæ cordi mihi sunt, nam sic habeto me incunte autumno ex itinere ad fratrem tuum eo consilio deflexisse, ut quid ageres, scirem. Nuper etiam cum mihi temere Londini perlatum esset à nescio quo te in urbe esse, confestim et quasi αὐτοβοει proripui me ad cellam tuam, [illegible]ud σκίας ὄναρ, nusquam enim compares. Quare quod sine tuo incommodo fiat, advola ocyus et aliquo in loco te siste, qui locus mitiorem spem præbeat, posse quoquo modo fieri ut aliquoties inter nos saltem visamus, quod utinam nobis non aliter esses vicinus, rusticanus atque es urbicus, ἀλλὰ τοῦτο ὥσπερ Θεῶ φίλον. Plura vellem et de nobis, et de studiis nostris, sed mallem coram; et jam cras sumus rus illud nostrum redituri, urgetque iter, ut vix hæc propere in chartam conjecerim. Vale.

Londino, Septemb. 2. 1637.

Eidem.

7. Quod cæteri in literis suis plerunque faciunt amici, ut unicam tantum salutem dicere sat habeant, tu illud jam video quid sit quod toties impertias; ad ea enim quæ tute prius, et alii adhuc sola afferre possunt vota, jam nunc artem insuper tuam, vimque omnem medicam quasi cumulum accedere vis me scilicet intelligere. Jubes enim salvere sexcenties, quantum volo, quantum possum, vel etiam amplius. Næ ipsum te nuper salutis condum promum esse factum oportet, ita totum salubritatis penum dilapidas, aut ipsa proculdubio, sanitas jam tua parasita esse debet, sic pro rege te geris atque imperas ut dicto sit audiens; itaque gratulor tibi, et duplici proinde nomine gratias tibi agam necesse est, cum amicitiæ tum artis eximiæ. Literas quidem tuas, quoniam ita convenerat, diu expectabam; verum acceptis neque dum ullis, si quid mihi credis, non idcirco veterem meam ergo te benevolentiam tantillum refrigescere sum passus; immo vero qua tarditatis excusatione usus literarum initio es, ipsam illam te allaturum esse jam animo præsenseram, idque recte, nostræque necessitudini convenienter. Non enim in epistolarum ac [illegible]lutationum momentis veram verti amicitiam volo, quæ omnia ficta esse possunt; sed altis animi radicibus niti utrinque et sustinere se; cœptamque sinceris, et sanctis rationibus, etiamsi mutua cessarent officia, per omnem tamen vitam suspicione et culpa vacare: ad quam fovendam non tam scripto sit opus, quam viva invicem virtutum recordatione. Nec continuò, ut tu non scripseris, non erit quo illud suppleri officium possit, scribit vicem tuam apud me tua probitas, veraque literas intimis sensibus meis exarat, scribit morum simplicitas, et recti amor; scribit ingenium etiam tuum, haudquaquam quotidianum, et majorem in modum te mihi commendat. Quare noli mihi, arcem illam medicinæ tyrannicam nactus, terrores istos ostentare, ac si salutes tuas sexcentas velles, subducta minutim ratiuncula, ad unum omnes a me reposcere, si forte ego, quod ne siverit unquam Deus, amicitiæ desertor fierem; atque amove terribile illud ἐπιτειχισμα quod cervicibus nostris videris imposuisse, ut sine tua bona venia ne liceat ægrotare. Ego enim ne nimis minitere, tui similes impossibile est quin amem, nam de cætero quidem quid de me statuerit Deus nescio, illud certe; δεινόν μοι ἔρωτα, εἰπέρ τω αλλω, τοῦ καλοῦ ἐνέσταξε. Nec tanto Ceres labore, ut in fabulis est, Liberam fertur quæsivisse filiam, quanto ego hanc τοῦ καλοῦ ἰδέαν, veluti pulcherrimam quandam imaginem, per omnes rerum formas et facies: (πολλαι γὰρ μορφαὶ των Δαιμονίων :) dies noctesque indagare soleo, et quasi certis quibusdam vestigiis ducentem sector. Unde fit, ut qui, spretis quæ vulgus prava rerum æstimatione opinatur, id sentire et loqui et esse audet; quod summa per omne ævum sapientia optimum esse docuit, illi me protinus, sicubi reperiam, necessitate quadam adjungam. Quod si ego sive natura, sive meo fato ita sum comparatus, ut nulla contentione, et laboribus meis ad tale decus et fastigium laudis ipse valeam emergere; tamen quo minus qui eam gloriam assecuti sunt, aut eo feliciter aspirant, illos semper colam, et suspiciam, nec dii puto, nec homines prohibuerint. Cæterum jam curiositati tuæ vis esse satisfactum scio. Multa solicite quæris, etiam quid cogitem. Audi, Theodote, verum in aurem ut ne rubeam, et sinito paulisper apud te grandia loquar; quid cogitem quæris? ita me bonus Deus, immortalitatem. Quid agam vero? πτεροφυῶ, et volare meditor: sed tenellis admodum adhuc pennis evehit se noster Pegasus, humile sapiamus. Dicam jam nunc serio quid cogitem, in hospitium juridicorum aliquod immigrare, sicubi amœna et umbrosa ambulatio est, quod et inter aliquot sodales, commodior illic habitatio, si domi manere, et ὁρμητήριον ευπρεπέστερον quocunque libitum erit excurrere; ubi nunc sum, ut nosti, obscure, et anguste sum; de studiis etiam nostris fies certior. Græcorum res continuata lectione deduximus usquequo illi Græci esse sunt desiti: Italorum in obscura re diu versati sumus sub Longobardis, et Francis, et Germanis, ad illud tempus quo illis ab Rodolpho Germaniæ rege concessa libertas est; exinde quid quæque civitas suo marte gesserit, separatim legere præstabit. Tu vero quid? quousque rebus domesticis filius familias imminebis urbanarum sodalitatum oblitus? quod, nisi bellum hoc novercale, vel Dacico, vel Sarmatico infestius sit, debebis profecto maturare, ut ad nos saltem in hyberna concedas. Interim, quod sine tua molestia fiat, Justinianum mihi Venetorum historicum rogo mittas; ego mea fide aut in adventum tuum probe asservatum curabo; aut, si mavis, haud ita multo post ad te remissum. Vale.

Londino, Septemb. 23. 1637.

8. QUOD novas patriæ linguæ institutiones adornas (Benedicte Bonmatthæe) jam operi fastigium impositurus, et commune tu quidem cum summis quibusdam ingeniis iter ad laudem ingrederis, et eam spem, quod video, eamque de te opinionem apud cives tuos concitasti, ut qui ab aliis quæ tradita jam sunt, iis aut lucem, aut copiam, aut certe limam, atque ordinem tuo marte facile sis allaturus. Quo nomine profecto populares tuos quam non vulgarem in modum tibi devinxeris, ingrati nempe sint ipsi, si non perspexerint. Nam qui in civitate mores hominum sapienter norit formare, domique et belli præclaris institutis regere, illum ego præ cæteris omni honore apprime dignum esse existimem. Proximum huic tamen, qui loquendi scribendique rationem et normam probo gentis sæculo receptam, præceptis regulisque sancire adnititur, et veluti quodam vallo circummunire; quod quidem ne quis transire ausit, tantum non Romulea lege sit cautum. Utriusque enim horum utilitatem conferre si libet, justum utrique et sanctum civium convictum alter ille solus efficere potest; hic vero solus liberalum, et splendidum, et luculentum, quod proxime in votis est. Ille in hostem fines invadentem, ardorem credo excelsum, et intrepida consilia suppeditat; hic barbariem animos hominum late incursantem, fœdam et intestinam ingeniorum perduellem, docta aurium censura, authorumque bonorum expedita manu, explodendam sibi, et debellandam suscipit. Neque enim qui sermo, purusne an corruptus, quæve loquendi proprietas quotidiana populo sit, parvi interesse arbitrandum est, quæ res Athenis non semel saluti fuit: immo vero, quod Platonis sententia est, immutato vestiendi more habituque graves in republica motus, mutationesque portendi, equidem potius collabente in vitium atque errorem loquendi usu, occasum ejus urbis, remque humilem et obscuram subsequi crediderim: verba enim partim inscita et pudita, partim mendosa, perperam prolata; quid nisi ignavos et oscitantes, et ad servile quidvis jam olim paratos incolarum animos haud levi indicio declarant? Contra, nullum unquam audivimus imperium, nullam civitatem non mediocriter saltem floruisse, quamdiu linguæ sua gratia, suusque cultus constitit. Tu itaque, Benedicte, hanc operam reipublicæ tuæ navare modo, ut pergas, quam pulchram, quamque solidam à civibus tuis necessario gratiam initurus sis, vel hinc liquido specta. Quæ à me eo dicta sunt, non quod ego te quidquam horum ignorare censeam, sed quod mihi persuadeam, in hoc te magis multo intentum esse, quid tute patriæ tuæ possis persolvere, quam quid illa tibi jure optimo sit debitura. De exteris jam nunc dicam, quorum demerendi, si tibi id cordi est, persane ampla in præsens oblata est occasio; ut enim est apud eos ingenio quis forte floridior, aut moribus amœnis et elegantibus, linguam Hetruscam in deliciis habet præcipuis, quin et in solida etiam parte eruditionis esse sibi ponendam ducit, præsertim si Græca aut Latina, vel nullo, vel modico tinctu imbiberit. Ego certe istis utrisque linguis non extremis tantummodo labris madidus; sed siquis alius, quantum per annos licuit, poculis majoribus prolutus, possum tamen nonnunquam ad illum Dantem, et Petrarcham, aliosque vestros complusculos, libenter et cupide commessatum ire: nec me tam ipsæ Athenæ Atticæ cum illo suo pellucido Ilisso, nec illa vetus Roma sua Tiberis ripa retinere valuerunt; quin sæpe Arnum vestrum, et Fæsulanos illos colles invisere amem. Jam vide, obsecro, numquid satis causæ fuerit, quæ me vobis ultimum ab oceano hospitem per hosce aliquot dies dederit, vestræque nationis ita amantem, ut non ullius, opinor, magis. Quo magis merito potes meminisse, quid ego tanto opere abs te contendere soleam; uti jam inchoatis, majori etiam ex parte absolutis, velles, quanta maxima facilitate res ipsa tulerit, in nostram exterorum gratiam, de recta linguæ pronuntiatione adhuc paululum quiddam adjicere. Cæteris enim sermonis vestri consultis in hanc usque diem id animi videtur fuisse, suis tantum ut satisfacerent, de nobis nihil soliciti. Quanquam ille meo quidem judicio, et [illegible] suæ, et Italici sermonis gloriæ, haud paulo certius consuluissent, si præcepta ita tradidissent, ac si omnium mortalium referret ejus linguæ scientiam appetere: verum per illos non stetit quo minus nobis videremini vos Itali, intra Alpium duntaxat pomœria sapere voluisse. Hæc igitur laus prælibata nemini, tota erit tua, tibi intactam et integram hucusque se servat; nec illa minus, si in tanta scriptorum turba commonstrare separatim non gravabere, quis post illos decantatos Florentinæ linguæ auctores poterit secundas haud injuria sibi asserere: quis tragœdia insignis, quis in comœdia festivus et lepidus; quis scriptis epistolis aut dialogis, argutus aut gravis; quis in historia nobilis: ita et studioso potiorem quemque eligere volenti non erit difficile, et erit, quoties vagari latius libebit, ubi pedem intrepide possit figere. Qua quidem in re, inter antiquos Ciceronem et Fabium habebis, quos imiteris; vestrorum autem hominum haud scio an ullum. Atque hæc ego tametsi videor mihi abs te (nisi me animus fallit) jam primo impetrasse, quoties in istius rei mentionem incidimus, quæ tua comitas est, et benignum ingenium; nolo tamen id tibi fraudi sit, quo minus exquisite, ut ita dicam, atque elaborate exorandum te mihi esse putem. Nam quod tua virtus, tuusque candor, minimum rebus tuis pretium, minimamque æstimationem addicit; iis ego, justam volo, et exactam, cum rei dignitas, tum adeo mea observantia imponat; et certe hoc æquum est ubique, quanto quis petenti faciliorem se præbet, tanto minus concedentis honori deesse oportebit. De cætero, si forte cur in hoc argumento, Latina potius quam vestra lingua utar, miraris; id factum ea gratia est ut intelligas quam ego linguam abs te mihi præceptis exornandam cupio, ejus me plane meam imperitiam, et inopiam Latine confiteri; et hac ipsa ratione plus me valiturum apud te speravi simul et illud, si canam; et venerandam è Latio matrem, in filiæ causa suæ mecum adjutricem adduxissem, credidi fore ejus authoritati, et reverentiæ, augustæque per tot sæcula majestati, nihil ut denegares. Vale.

LUCÆ HOLSTENIO Romæ in Vaticano.

9. TAMETSI multâ in hoc meo Italiæ transcursu multorum in me humaniter et peramice facta, et possum, et sæpe soleo recordari; tamen pro tam brevi notitia, haud scio an jure dicam ullius majora extitisse in me benevolentiæ indicia quam ea quæ mihi abs te profecta sunt. Cum enim tui conveniendi causa in Vaticanum ascenderem, ignotum prorsus, nisi si quid forte ab Alexandro Cherubino dictum de me prius fuerat, summa cum humanitate recepisti; mox in musæum comiter admisso, et conquisitissimam librorum supellectilem, et permultos insuper manuscriptos authores Græcos, tuis lucubrationibus exornatos, adspicere licuit: quorum partim nostro sæculo nondum visi, quasi in procinctu, velut illæ apud Maronem, expeditas modo typographi manus, et μαιευτικὴν poscere videbantur; partim tua opera etiamnum editi, passim ab eruditis avide accipiuntur; quorum et unius etiam duplici dono abs te auctus dimittor. Tum nec aliter crediderim, quam quæ tu de me verba feceris ad præstantissimum Cardin. Franc. Barberinum, iis factum esse, ut cum ille paucis post diebus ἀκρόαμα illud musicum magnificentia vere Romana publice exhiberet, ipse me tanta in turba quæsitum ad fores expectans, et pene manu prehensum persane honorifice intro admiserit. Qua ego gratia cum illum postridie salutatum accessissem, tute idem rursus is eras, qui et aditum mihi fecisti, et colloquendi copiam; quæ quidem cum tanto viro, quo etiam in summo dignitatis fastigio nihil benignius, nihil humanius, pro loci et temporis ratione largiuscula profecto potius erat, quam nimis parca. Atque ego (doctissime Holsteni) utrum ipse sim solus tam me amicum, et hospitem expertus, an omnes Anglos, id spectans scilicet quod triennium Oxoniæ literis operam dederis, istiusmodi officiis etiam quoscunque prosequi studium sit, certe nescio. Si hoc est, pulchre tu quidem Angliæ nostræ, ex parte etiam tuæ, διδασκάλια persolvis; privatoque nostrum cujusque nomine, et patriæ publico, parem utrobique gratiam promereris. Sin est illud, eximium me tibi præ cæteris habitum, dignumque adeo visum quicum velis ξενίαν ποιεῖσθαι, et mihi gratulor de tuo judicio, et tuum simul candorem præ meo merito pono. Jam illud vero quod mihi negotium dedisse videbare, de inspiciendo codice Mediceo, sedulo ad amicos retuli, qui quidem ejus rei efficiendæ spem perexiguam in presens ostendunt. In illa bibliotheca, nisi impetrata prius venia, nihil posse exscribi, ne stylum quidem scriptorium admovisse tabulis permissum; esse tamen aiunt Romæ Joannem Baptistam Donium, is ad legendas publice Græcas literas Florentiam vocatus indies expectatur, per eum ut consequi possis quæ velis facile esse; quamquam id sane mihi pergratum accidisset, si res tam præsertim optanda quæ sit, mea potius opella saltem aliquando plus promovisset, cum sit indignum tam tibi honesta et preclara suscipienti, non omnes undecunque homines, et rationes, et res favere. De cætero, novo beneficio devinxeris, si eminentissimum cardinalem quanta potest observantia meo nomine salutes, cujus magnæ virtutes, rectique studium, ad provehendas item omnes artes liberales egregie comparatum, semper mihi ob oculos versantur; tum illa mitis, et, ut ita dicam, summissa animi celsitudo, quæ sola se deprimendo attollere didicit; de qua vere dici potest, quod de Cerere apud Callimachum est, diversa tamen sententia, ἴθματα μεν χέρσω κεφαλὰ δὲ οἱ ἄπτετ' ὀλύμπω. Quod cæteris fere principibus documento esse potest, triste illud supercilium, et aulici fastus, quam longe à vera magnanimitate discrepantes et alieni sint. Nec puto fore, dum ille vivit, Estenses, Farnesios, aut Mediceos, olim doctorum hominum fautores, ut quis amplius desideret. Vale, doctissime Holsteni, et si quis tui, tuorumque studiorum amantior est, illi me quoque, si id esse tanti existimas, ubicunque sim gentium futurus, velim annumeres.

CAROLO DATO Patricio Florentino.

10. PERLATIS inopinatò literis ad me tuis, mi Carole, quanta, et quam nova sim voluptate perfusus, quandoquidem non est ut pro re satis queam dicere, volo ex dolore saltem, sine quo vix ulla magna hominibus delectatio concessa est, id aliquantum intelligas. Dum enim illa tua prima percurro, in quibus elegantia cum amicitia pulchre sane contendit, merum illud quidem gaudium esse dixerim, præsertim cum uti vincat amicitia, operam te dare videam. Statim vero cum incido in illud quod scribis, ternas te jam olim ad me dedisse, quas ego periisse scio, tum primum sincera illa infici, tristique desiderio conturbari, cœpta est lætitia; mox etiam gravius quiddam subit, in quo vicem meam dolere persæpe soleo, quos forte viciniæ, aut aliqua nullius usus necessitudo mecum, sive casu, sive lege conglutinavit, illos nulla re alia commendabiles assidere quotidie, obtundere, etiam enecare mehercule quoties collibitum erit; quos, mores, ingenium, studia, tam belle conciliaverant, illos jam pane omnes, aut morte, aut iniquissima locorum distantia invideri mihi, et ita confestim è conspectu plerumque abripi, ut in perpetua fere solitudine versari mihi necesse sit. Te, quod ais, ex quo Florentia discessi, mea de salute solicitum, semperque mei memorem fuisse, gratulor mihi sane, par illud utrique et mutuum accidisse, quod ego me solum sensisse meo fortasse merito arbitrabar. Gravis admodum, ne te celem, discessus ille et mihi quoque fuit, eosque meo animo aculeos infixit, qui etiam nunc altius inhærent, quoties mecum cogito tot simul sodales atque amicos tam bonos, tamque commodos una in urbe, longinqua illa quidem, sed tamen charissima, invitum me, et plane divulsum reliquisse. Testor illum mihi semper sacrum et solenne futurum Damonis tumulum; in cujus funere ornando cum luctu et mœrore oppressus, ad ea quæ potui solatia confugere, et respirare paulisper cupiebam, non aliud mihi quicquam jucundius occurrit, quam vestrum omnium gratissimam mihi memoriam, tuique nominatim in mentem revocasse. Id quod ipse jamdiu legisse debes, siquidem ad vos carmen illud pervenit, quod ex te nunc primum audio. Mittendum ego sane sedulo curaveram, ut esset ingenii quantulumcumque, amoris autem adversum vos mei, vel illis paucis versiculis, emblematis ad morem inclusis, testimonium haudquaquam obscurum. Existimabam etiam fore hoc modo, ut vel te vel alium ad scribendum allicerem; mihi enim si prior scriberem, necesse erat, ut vel ad omnes, vel si quem aliis prætulissem, verebar ne in cæterorum, qui id rescissent, offensionem incurrerem; cum permultos adhuc superesse istic sperem, qui hoc à me officium vendicare certe potuerint. Nunc tu omnium primus, et hac amicissima literarum provocatione, et scribendi officio ter jam repetito dubitas tibi à me jampridem respondendi vices reliquorum expostulatione liberasti. Quanquam fateor accessisse ad illam silentii causam, turbulentissimus iste, ex quo domum reversus sum, Britanniæ nostræ status, qui animum meum paulo post ab studiis excolendis, ad vitam et fortunas quoquo modo tuendas necessario convertit. Ecquem tu inter tot civium commissa prælia, cædes, fugas, bonorum direptiones, recessum otio literario tutum dari putes posse? Nos tamen etiam inter hæc mala, quoniam de studiis meis certior fieri postulas, sermone patrio haud pauca in lucem dedimus; quæ nisi essent Anglice scripta, libens ad vos mitterem, quorum judiciis plurimum tribuo. Poematum quidem quæ pars Latina est, quoniam expetis, brevi mittam; atque id sponte jamdudum fecissem, nisi quod, propter ea quæ in pontificem Romanum aliquot paginis asperius dicta sunt, suspicabar vestris auribus fore minus grata. Nunc abs te peto, ut quam veniam, non dico Aligerio, et Petrarchæ vestro eadem in causa, sed meæ, ut scis, olim apud vos loquendi libertati, singulari cum humanitate, dare consuevistis, eandem impetres (nam de te mihi persuasum est) ab cæteris amicis, quoties de vestris ritibus nostro more loquendum erit. Exequias Ludovici regis à te descriptas libenter lego, in quibus Mercurium tuum, non compitalem illum et mercimoniis addictum, quem te nuper colere jocaris, sed facundum illum, Musis acceptum, et Mercurialium virorum præsidem, agnosco. Restat ut de ratione aliqua et modo inter nos constet, quo literæ deinceps nostræ certo itinere utrinque commeare possint. Quod non admodum difficile videtur, cum tot nostri mercatores negotia apud vos, et multa, et ampla habeant, quorum tabellarii singulis hebdomadis ultro citroque cursitant; quorum et navigia haud multo rarius hinc illinc solvunt. Hanc ego curam Jacobo Bibliopolæ, vel ejus hero mihi familiarissimo, recte, ut spero, committam. Tu interim, mi Carole, valebis, et Cultellino, Francino, Frescobaldo, Malatestæ, Clementillo minori, et si quem alium nostri amantiorem novisti; toti denique Gaddianæ academiæ, salutem meo nomine plurimam dices. Interim vale.

Londino, Aprilis 21. 1647.

HERMANNO MILLIO, Comitis Oldenburgici Oratori.

11. AD literas tuas, nobilissime Hermanne, 17 Decemb. ad me datas, antequam respondeam; ne me silentii tam diutini reum fortassis apud te peragas, primum omnium oportet exponam, cur non responderem prius. Primum igitur ne nescias, moram attulit, quæ perpetua jam fere adversatrix mihi est, adversa valetudo; deinde valetudinis causa, necessaria quædam et subita in ædes alias migratio, quam eo die forte inceperam, quo tuæ ad me literæ perferebantur; postremo certe pudor, non habuisse me quicquam de tuo negotio quod gratum fore tibi judicabam. Nam cum postridie in dominum Frostium casu incidissem, exque eo diligenter quærerem, ecquod tibi responsum etiamnum decerneretur? (ipse enim à concilio valetudinarius sæpe aberam) respondit, et commotior quidem, nihil dum decerni, seque in expedienda re ista nihil proficere. Satius itaque duxi ad tempus silere, quam id quod molestum tibi sciebam fore, extemplo scribere, donec, quod ipse vellem, tuque tantopere expetebas, libentissime possem scribere; quod et hodie, uti spero, perfeci; nam cum in concilio præsidem de tuo negotio semel atque iterum commonefecissem, statim ille retulit, adeoque in crastinum diem de responso quamprimum tibi dando constituta deliberatio est. Hac de re si primus ipse, quod conabar, certiorem te facerem, et tibi jucundissimum, et mei in te studii indicium aliquod fore existimabam.

Westmonasterio.

12. BENEVOLENTIAM erga me tuam, ornatissime Leonarde Philara, nec non etiam præclarum de nostra pro P. A. Defensione* judicium, ex literis tuis ad dominum Augerium, virum apud nos, in obeundis ab hac republica legationibus, fide eximia illustrem, partim ea de re scriptis cognovi: missam deinde salutem cum effigie, atque elogio tuis sane virtutibus dignissimo: literas denique abs te humanissimas per eundem accepi. Atque ego quidem cum nec Germanorum ingenia, ne Cymbrorum quidem, aut Suecorum aspernari soleo, tum certe tuum, qui et Athenis Atticis natus, et, literarum studiis apud Italos fœliciter peractis, magno rerum usu honores amplissimos es consecutus, judicium de me non possum quin plurimi faciam. Cum enim Alexander ille magnus in terris ultimis bellum gerens, tantos se militiæ labores pertulisse testatus sit, της παρ' Αθηναίων ἐνδοξίας ἕνεκα; quidni ego mihi gratuler, meque ornari quam maxime putem, ejus viri laudibus, in quo jam uno priscorum Atheniensium artes, atque virtutes illæ celebratissimæ, renasci tam longo intervallo, et reflorescere videntur. Qua ex urbe cum tot viri disertissimi prodierint, eorum potissimùm scriptis ab adolescentia pervolvendis, didicisse me libens fateor quicquid ego in literis profeci. Quod si mihi tanta vis dicendi accepta ab illis et quasi transfusa inesset, ut exercitus nostros et classes ad liberandam ab Ottomannico tyranno Greciam, eloquentiæ patriam, excitare possem, ad quod facinus egregium nostras opes pene implorare videris, facerem profecto id quo nihil mihi antiquius aut in votis prius esset. Quid enim vel fortissimi olim viri, vel eloquentissimi gloriosius aut se dignius esse duxerunt, quam vel suadendo vel fortiter faciendo ἐλευθέρους καὶ ἀυτονόμους ποιεῖσθαι τοὺς Ἕλληνας? Verùm et aliud quiddam præterea tentandum est, mea quidem sententia longe maximum, ut quis antiquam in animis Græcorum virtutem, industriam, laborum tolerantiam, antiqua illa studia dicendo, suscitare atque accendere possit. Hoc si quis effecerit, quod à nemine potius quam abs te, pro tua illa insigni erga patriam pietate, cum summa prudentia, reique militaris peritia, summo denique recuperandæ libertatis pristinæ studio conjuncta, expectare debemus; neque ipsos sibi Græcos neque ullam gentem Græcis defuturam esse confido. Vale.

* Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio.

Londino, Jun. 1652.

Richardo Hetho.

13. Si quam ego operam, amice spectatissime, vel in studiis tuis promovendis, vel in eorum subsidio comparando, unquam potui conferre, quæ sane aut nulla plane, aut perexigua fuit; tamen eam in bona indole, quamvis serius cognita, tam bene tamque fœliciter collocatam, haud uno profecto nomine gaudeo; eam etiam adeo frugiferam fuisse, ut et ecclesiæ pastorem probum, patriæ bonum civem, mihi denique amicum gratissimum pepererit. Quod equidem, cum ex cætera vita tua atque ex eo, quod de religione et simul de republica præclare sentis, tum præcipue ex singulari animi tui gratitudine, quæ nulla absentia, nullo ætatis decursu, extingui aut minui potest, facile intelligo. Neque enim potest fieri, nisi in virtute ac pietate, rerumque optimarum studiis, progressus plusquam mediocres fecisses, ut in eos, qui tibi ad ea acquirenda vel minimum adjumentum attulere, tam grato animo esses. Quapropter, mi alumne, hoc enim nomine in te utor libenter, si sinis; sic velim existimes, te cum primis à me diligi, nec mihi quicquam optatius fore, quam, si tua commoda rationesque ferrent, quod et tibi etiam in votis esse video, ut possis prope me alicubi degere, quo frequentior inter nos atque jucundior, et vitæ usus et studiorum esset. Verum de eo, prout numini visum erit, tibique expediverit. Quod scripseris deinceps, poteris, si placet, nostro sermone scribere (quanquam tu quidem Latinis haud parum profecisti) nequando scriptionis labor alterutrum nostrum segniorem forte ad scribendum reddiderit, utque sensus animi noster inter nos, nullis exteri sermonis vinculis constrictus, eo liberius exprimere se possit. Literas autem tuas cuivis, credo, ex ejus famulitio, cujus mentionem fecisti, rectissime committes. Vale.

Westmonasterio, Decemb. 13, 1652.

Henrico Oldenburgo Bremensium ad Sen. A. Oratori.

14. Priores literæ tuæ, vir ornatissime, tum mihi sunt datæ, cum tabellarius vester diceretur jamjam rediturus: quo factum est, ut rescribendi eo tempore facultas nulla esset: id vero quamprimum facere cogitantem inopinatæ quædam occupationes excepere; quæ nisi accidissent, librum profecto, defensionis licet titulo munitum, non ita nudum ad te sine excusatione misissem; cum ecce tuæ ad me alteræ, in quibus pro muneris tenuitate satis superque gratiarum sunt actæ. Et erat quidem haud semel in animo, Latinis tuis nostra reponere; ut qui sermonem nostrum exteris omnibus, quos ego quidem novi accuratius ac fœlicius addidiceris, ne quam occasionem eundem quoque scribendi, quod æque te arbitror accurate posse, amitteres. Verum id prout dehinc impetus tulerit, tua perinde optio sit. De argumento quod scribis, plane mecum sentis, clamorem istiusmodi ad cœlum sensus omnes humanos fugere: quo impudentior sit is, necesse est, qui audisse se eum tam audacter affirmaverit. Is autem quis sit, scrupulum injecisti: atqui dudum, cum aliquoties hac de re essemus inter nos locuti, tuque recens ex Hollandia huc venisses, nulla tibi de authore dubitatio subesse videbatur; quin is Morus fuisset: eam nimirum iis in locis famam obtinuisse, neminem præterea nominari. Si quid igitur hac de re certius nunc demum habes, me rogo certiorem facias. De argumenti tractatione vellem equidem (quid enim dissimulem) abs te non dissentire; id pene ut audeam quid est quod persuadere facilius possit, quam virorum, qualis tu es, cordatorum sincerum judicium, omnisque expers adulationis laudatio? Ad alia ut me parem, nescio sane an nobiliora aut utiliora (quid enim in rebus humanis asserenda libertate nobilius aut utilius esse possit?) siquidem per valetudinem et hanc luminum orbitatem, omni senectute graviorem, si denique per hujusmodi rabularum clamores licuerit, facile induci potero: neque enim iners otium unquam mihi placuit, et hoc cum libertatis adversariis inopinatum certamen, diversis longe, et amœnioribus omnino me studiis intentum, ad se rapuit invitum; ita tamen ut rei gestæ, quando id necesse erat, nequaquam pœniteat: nam in vanis operam consumpsisse me, quod innuere videris, longe abest, ut putem. Verum de his alias; tu tandem, vir doctissime, ne te prolixius detineam, vale; meque in tuis numera.

Westmonasterio, Julii 6, 1654.

Leonardo Philaræ Atheniensi.

15. Cum sim à pueritia totius Græci nominis, tuarumque in primis Athenarum cultor, si quis alius, tum una hoc semper mihi persuasissimum habebam, fore ut illa urbs præclaram aliquando redditura vicem esset benevolentiæ erga se meæ. Neque defuit sane tuæ patriæ nobilissimæ antiquus ille genius augurio meo; deditque te nobis et germanum Atticum et nostri amantissimum: qui me, scriptis duntaxat notum, et locis ipse disjunctus, humanissime per literas compellaveris, et Londinum postea inopinatus adveniens, visensque non videntem, etiam in ea calamitate, propter quam conspectior nemini, despectior multis fortasse sim, eadem benevolentia prosequaris. Cum itaque author mihi sis, ut visus recuperandi spem omnem ne abjiciam, habere te amicum ac necessarium tuum Parisiis Tevenotum medicum, in curandis præsertim oculis præstantissimum, quem sis de meis luminibus consulturus, si modo acceperis à me unde is causas morbi et symptomata possit intelligere; faciam equidem quod hortaris, ne oblatam undecunque divinitus fortassis opem repudiare videar. Decennium, opinor, plus minus est, ex quo debilitari atque hebescere visum sensi, eodemque tempore lienem, visceraque omnia gravari, flatibusque vexari: et mane quidem, siquid pro more legere cœpissem, oculi statem penitus dolere, lectionemque refugere, post mediocrem deinde corporis exercitationem recreari; quam aspexissem lucernam, iris quædam visa est redimere: haud ita multò post sinistra in parte oculi sinistri (is enim oculus aliquot annis prius altera nubilavit) caligo oborta, quæ ad latus illud sita erant, omnia eripiebat. Anteriora quoque, si dexterum forte oculum clausissem, minora visa sunt. Deficiente per hoc fere triennium sensim atque paulatim altero quoque lumine, aliquot ante mensibus quam visus omnis aboleretur, quæ immotus ipse cernerem, visa sunt omnia nunc dextrorsum, nunc sinistrorsum natare; frontem totam atque tempora inveterati quidem vapores videntur insedisse; qui somnolenta quadam gravitate oculos, à cibo præsertim usque ad vesperam, plerunque urgent atque deprimunt; ut mihi haud raro veniat in mentem Salmydessii vatis Phinei in Argonauticis, > ————κάρος δέ μιν ἀμφεκάλυψεν

> πορφύρεος· γαίαν δε πέριξ ἐδόκησε φερισθαι > νειόθεν, ἀβληχρῷ δ' ἐπι κώματι κέκλιτ' ἄναυδος.

Sed neque illud omiserim, dum adhuc visus aliquantum supererat, ut primum in lecto decubuissem, meque in alterutrum latus reclinassem, consuevisse copiosum lumen clausis oculis emicare; deinde, imminuto indies visu, colores perinde obscuriores cum impetu et fragore quodam intimo exilire; nunc autem, quasi extincto lucido, merus nigror, aut cineraceo distinctus, et quasi intextus solet se affundere: caligo tamen quæ perpetuo obversatur, tam noctu, quam interdiu, albenti semper quam nigricanti propior videtur; et volvente se oculo aliquantillum lucis quasi per rimulam admittit. Ex quo tametsi medico tantundem quoque spei possit elucere, tamen ut in re plane insanabili, ita me paro atque compono; illudque sæpe cogito, cum destinati cuique dies tenebrarum, quod monet sapiens multi sint, meas adhuc tenebras, singulari Numinis benignitate, inter otium et studia, vocesque amicorum, et salutationes, illis lethalibus multo esse mitiores. Quod si, ut scriptum est, non solo pane vivet homo, sed omni verbo prodeunte per os Dei, quid est, cur quis in hoc itidem non acquiescat, non solis se oculis, sed Dei ductu an providentia satis oculatum esse. Sane dummodo ipse mihi prospicit, ipse mihi providet, quod facit, meque per omnem vitam quasi manu ducit atque deducit, ne ego meos oculos, quandoquidem ipsi sic visum est, libens feriari jussero. Teque, mi Philara, quocunque res ceciderit, non minus forti et confirmato animo, quam si Lynceus essem, valere jubeo.

16. PERGRATUM est eandem adhuc memoriam retinere te mei, quam antea benevolentiam, dum apud nos eras, me semel atque iterum invisendo, perhumaniter significasti. Ad librum quod attinet de divortiis, quem dedisse te cuidam Hollandice vertendum scribis, mallem equidem Latine vertendum dedisses: nam vulgus opiniones fondum vulgares, quemadmodum excipere soleat, in iis libris expertus jam sum. Tres enim ea de re tractatus olim scripsi: primum duobus libris, quibus doctrina et disciplina divortii, is enim libro titulus est, diffuse continetur: alterum qui Tetrachordon inscribitur, et in quo quatuor præcipua loca scripturæ supra ea doctrina quæ sunt, explicantur: tertium, Colasterion, in quo cuidam sciolo respondetur. Quem horum tractatum vertendum dederis, quamve editionem, nescio; nam eorum primus bis editus est, et posteriori editione multo auctius. Qua de re nisi certior jam factus sis, aut si quid à me aliud velle te intellexero, ut vel editionem correctiorem, vel reliquos tractatus tibi mittam, faciam sedulo et libenter. Nam mutatum in iis quicquam aut additum non est in præsentia quod velim. Itaque si in tua sententia præstiteris, fidum ego mihi interpretem, tibi fausta omnia exopto.

Westmonasterio, Feb. 5, 1654.

17. NESCIO quo casu acciderit, ut literæ tuæ post paulo minus tres menses mihi sint redditæ, quam abs te datæ: meis profecto expeditiore prorsus ad te commeatu plane est opus; quas dum de die in diem scribere constituebam, occupationibus quibusdam continuis impeditus, in alterum fere trimestre spatium procrastinasse me sentio. Tu vero ex hac mea tarditate rescribendi velim intelligas, benevolentiæ erga me tuæ non refrixisse gratiam, sed eo altius insedisse memoriam, quo sæpius atque diutius de officio meo vicissim tibi reddendo indies cogitabam. Habet hoc saltem officii tarda solutio quo se excuset, dum clarius confitetur deberi, quod tanto post tempore, quam quod statim persolvitur. Illa te imprimis literarum initio non fefellit de me opinio; non mirari si à peregrino homine salutor: neque enim rectius de me senseris, quam si sic existimes, neminem me verum bonum in peregrini aut ignoti numero habere. Talem te esse facile mihi persuadetur, cum quòd patris doctissimi atque sanctissimi es filius, tum quod à viris bonis bonus existimaris, tum denique quod odisti malos. Cum quibus, quandoquidem mihi quoque bellum esse contigit, fecit pro humanitate sua Calandrinus, deque mea sententia, ut significaret tibi, pergratum mihi fore, si contra communem adversarium tua subsidia mecum communicasses. Id quod his ipsis literis perhumaniter fecisti, quarum partem, tacito authoris nomine, tuo erga me studio confisus, in defensionem meam pro testimonio inserere non dubitavi. Quem ego librum, ut primum in lucem prodierit, si quis erit cui recte possim committere, mittendum ad te curabo. Tu interim quas ad me literas destinaveris, Turrettino Genevensi Londini commoranti, cujus illic fratrem nosti, haud frustra, puto, inscripseris: per quem ut ad vos hæ nostræ, ita ad nos vestræ, commodissime pervenerint. De cætero scias velim, et te plurimi tuo merito a me fieri, meque uti porro abs te diligar, imprimis velle.

HENRICO OLDENBURGO Bremensium ad Sen. A. Oratori.

18. OCCUPATIOREM repererunt me tuæ literæ quas adolescens Ranaleius attulit, unde cogor esse brevior quam vellem: tu vero quas abiens promiseras, eas ita probe reddidisti, ut æs alienum nemo sanctius ad calendas, credo, persolvisset. Secessum istum, tibi, quamvis mihi fraudi sit, tamen quoniam tibi esse voluptati, gratulor; tum illam quoque fœlicitatem animi tui, quem ab urbano vel ambitione vel otio ad sublimium rerum contemplationem tam facile potes attollere. Quid autem secessus ille conferat, præter librorum copiam, nescio: et quos illic nactus es studiorum socios, eos suopte ingenio potius quam disciplina loci tales esse existimem; nisi forte ob desiderium tui iniquior sum isti loco quia te detinet. Ipse interim recte animadvertis, nimis illic multos esse qui suis inanissimis argutiis tam divina quam humana contaminent, ne plane nihil agere videantur dignum tot stipendiis, quibus pessimo publico aluntur. Sed tu ista melius per te sapis. Tam vetusti à diluvio usque Sinensium fasti, quos ab jesuita Martinio promissos esse scribis, propter rerum novitatem avidissime proculdubio expectantur: verum auctoritatis, aut firmamenti, ad Mosaicos libros adjungere quid possint non video. Salutem tibi reddit Cyriacus noster, quem salutatum volebas. Vale.

Nobilissimo Adolescenti RICHARDO JONESIO.

19. PARANTEM me semel atque iterum ad proximas tuas literas rescribere, subita quædam negotia, cujusmodi mea sunt, ut nosti, præverterunt: postea excucurrisse te in vicina quædam loca audiveram; nunc discedens in Hyberniam mater tua præstantissima, cujus discessu uterque nostrum dolere haud mediocriter debemus, nam et mihi omnium necessitudinum loco fuit, has ad te literas ipsa perfert. Tu vero quod de meo erga te studio persuasus es, recte facis; tibique tanto plus indies persuadeas velim, quanto plus bonæ indolis, bonæque frugis in te esse, facis ut intelligam. Id quod Deo dante, non solum in te recipis, sed quasi ego te sponsione lacessissem, facturum te satisdas atque vadaris; et velut judicium pati et judicatum solvere ni facias, non recusas: delector sane hac tua de temetipso tam bona spe; cui nunc deesse non potes; quin simul non promissis modo tuis non stetisse, verum etiam vadimonium ipse tuum deseruisse videare. Quod scribis non displicere tibi Oxonium, ex eo profecisse te quicquam aut sapientiorem esse factum, non adducis ut credam: id mihi longe aliis rebus ostendere debebis. Victorias principum quas laudibus tollis, et res ejusmodi in quibus vis plurimum potest, nolim te philosophos jam audientem nimis admirari. Quid enim magnopere mirandum est, si vervecum in patria valida nascantur cornua, quæ urbes et oppida arietare valentissime possint? Tu magna exempla non ex vi et robore, sed ex justitia et temperantia ab ineunte ætate ponderare jam disce atque cognoscere: vale; meoque fac nomine, salutem ornatissimo viro Henrico Oldenburgo tuo contubernali plurimam dicas.

Westm. Sept. 21, 1656.

Ornatissimo Adolescenti PETRO HEIMBACHIO.

20. PROMISSA tua, mi Heimbachi, cæteraque omnia, quæ tua virtus præ se fert, cumulate implevisti, præterquam desiderium meum reditus tui quem intra duos ad summum menses fore pollicebaris; nunc, nisi me temporis ratio tui cupidum fallit, trimestris pene abes. De Atlante, quod abs te petebam, abunde præstitisti; non ut mihi comparares, sed tantummodo ut pretium libri minimum indagares: centum et triginta Florenos postulari scribis; montem illum opinor Mauritanum, non librum Atlantem, dicis tam immani pretio coemendum. Ea nunc etiam typographorum in excudendis libris luxuries est, ut bibliothecæ non minus quam villæ sumptuosa supellex jam facta videatur. Mihi certe cum pictæ tabulæ ob cæcitatem usui esse vix possint, dum orbem terræ frustra cæcis oculis perlustro, quanti illum librum emissem, vereor ne tanti videar lugere potius orbitatem meam. Tu hanc insuper impendas mihi operam, rogo, ut cum reversus eris, certiorem me facere queas, quot sint integri operis illius volumina, et duarum editionum, Blavianæ videlicet et Jansenianæ, utra sit auctior et accuratior: id quod ex teipso jam brevi redituro potius quam ex alteris literis, coram auditurum me esse spero. Interim vale, teque nobis quamprimum redde.

Westm. Novemb. 8, 1656.

Ornatissimo Viro EMERICO BIGOTIO.

21. QUOD in Angliam trajicienti tibi dignus sum visus, quem præter cæteros visendum duceres et salutandum, fuit sane mihi et meritò quidem gratum; quod per literas tanto etiam intervallo nunc denuo salutas, id aliquanto fuit gratius. Poteras enim primò aliorum fortassis opinione ductus ad me venisse, per literas nunc redire, nisi proprio judicio vel saltem benevolentia reductus, vix poteras. Unde est sane, ut posse videar jure mihi gratulari: multi enim scriptis editis floruere, quorum viva vox et consuetudo quotidiana nihil fere prætulit non demissum atque vulgare: ego si id assequi possum, ut si qua commode scripsi, iis par animo ac moribus esse videar; et pondus ipse scriptis addidero, et laudem vicissim, quantulacunque ea est, eo tamen majorem ab ipsis retulero: cum rectum et laudabile quod est, id non magis ab authoribus præstantissimis accepisse, quam ab intimo sensu mentis atque animi depromisisse purum atque sincerum videbor. De mea igitur animi tranquillitate in hoc tanto luminis detrimento, deque mea in excipiendis exteris hominibus comitate ac studio, persuasum tibi esse gaudeo. Orbitatem certe luminis quidni leniter feram, quod non tam amissum quam revocatum intus atque retractum, ad acuendam potius mentis aciem quam ad hebetandam, sperem. Quo fit, ut neque literis irascar, nec earum studio penitus intermittam, etiamsi me tam male multaverint: tam enim morosus ne sim, Mysorum regis Telephi saltem exemplum erudiit; qui eo telo, quo vulneratus est, sanari postea non recusavit. Quod ad illum librum de modo tenendi parlamenta quem apud te habes, ejus designata loca ex codice clarissimi viri Domini Bradsciavi, nec non ex codice Cottoniano, vel emendanda, vel dubia si erant, confirmanda curavi; ut ex reddita hic tibi tua chartula perspicies. Quod autem scire cupis, num etiam in arce Londinensi autographum hujus libri extet, misi qui id quæreret ex feciali, cui actorum custodia mandata est, et quo ipse utor familiariter: respondit is, nullum exemplar illius libri iis in monumentis extare. Tu vicissim quam mihi operam defers in re libraria procuranda, pergratum habeo; desunt mihi ex Bysantinis historiis, Theophanis Chronographia Græc. Lat. fol. Constant. Manassis Breviarium Historicum, et Codini Excerpta de Antiquit. C. P. Græc. Lat. fol. Anastasii Bibliothecarii Hist. et Vitæ Rom. Pontific. fol. quibus Michaelem Glycam, et Joannem Sinnamum, Annæ Comnenæ Continuatorem, ex eadem typographia, si modo prodierunt, rogo adjicias: quàm queas minimo non addo; cum quòd, id ut te moneam hominem frugalissimum, non est opus, tum quòd pretium eorum librorum certum esse aiunt, et omnibus notum: nummos D. Stuppius numeratò se tibi curaturum recepit, nec non etiam de vectura, quæ sit commodissima, provisurum. Ego vero quæ tu vis, quæque optas, cupio tibi omnia. Vale.

Westmonasterio, Martii 24. 1656.

Nobili Adolescenti Richardo Jonesio.

22. Tardius multo accepi literas tuas quam abs te datæ sunt, post quindecim puto dies quam sepositæ alicubi apud matrem delituissent. Ex quibus tandem studium erga me tuum gratique animi sensum libentissime cognovi: mea certe erga te benevolentia monitaque fidissima, neque optimæ matris tuæ de me opinioni atque fiduciæ, neque indoli tuæ unquam defuere. Est quidem, ut scribis, amœnitatis atque salubritatis eo in loco, quo nunc recessisti, est et librorum quod academiæ satis esse possit; si ad ingenium incolarum tantum conferret ista soli amœnitas quantum ad delicias confert, ad fœlicitatem illius loci nihil deesse videretur. Et bibliotheca etiam illic instructissima est; verum nisi studiosorum mentes disciplinis optimis instructiores inde reddantur, apothecam librorum illam quam bibliothecam rectius dixeris. Oportere itaque ad hæc omnia discendi animum atque industriam accedere percommode sane agnoscis. Tu ex ista sententia, nequando tecum agere necesse habeam, etiam atque etiam vide; id facillimo negotio evitabis, si ornatissimi viri Henrici Oldenburgi qui tibi præsto est, gravissimis atque amicissimis præceptis diligenter parueris. Vale mi Richarde dilectissime, et ad virtutem ac pietatem, matris præstantissimæ fœminæ exemplo, veluti Timotheum alterum, sinito te adhortei atque accendam.

Westmonasterio.

23. Video te, domine, id quod perpauci ex hodierna juventute faciunt, qui oras exteras perlustrant, non juvenilium studiorum sed amplioris undique comparandæ eruditionis causa, veterum exemplo philosophorum, recte et sapienter peregrinari. Quanquam ea quæ scribis quoties intueor, ad eruditionem non tam aliunde capiendam, quam aliis impertiendam, ad commutandas potius, quam ad coemendas bonas merces, accessisse ad exteros videris. Atque utinam mihi tam facile esset, ista tua præclara studia rebus omnibus adjuvare ac promovere, quam est jucundum sane et pergratum tuam egregiam indolem id à me petere. Quod scribis tamen statuisse te ut ad me scriberes, meaque responsa peteres ad eas difficultates enucleandas, circa quas à multis sæculis historiarum scriptores videntur caligasse, nihil equidem hujusmodi neque unquam mihi sumpsi, neque ausim sumere. De Sallustio quod scribis, dicam libere, quoniam ita vis plane ut dicam quod sentio, Sallustium cuivis Latino historico me quidem anteferre; quæ etiam constans fere antiquorum sententia fuit. Habet suas laudes tuus Tacitus; sed eas meo quidem judicio maximas, quod Sallustium nervis omnibus sit imitatus. Cum hæc tecum coram dissererem, perfecisse videor, quantum ex eo quod scribis conjicio, ut de illo cordatissimo scriptore ipse jam idem prope sentias: adeoque ex me quæris, cum is in exordio belli Catilinarii perdifficile esse dixerit historiam scribere, propterea quod facta dictis exæquanda sunt, qua potissimum ratione id assequi historiarum scriptorem posse existimem. Ego vero sic existimo; qui gestas res dignas digne scripserit, eum animo non minus magno rerumque usu præditum scribere oportere, quam is qui eas gesserit: ut vel maximas pari animo comprehendere atque metiri possit, et comprehensas sermone puro atque casto distincte graviterque narrare: nam ut ornate, non admodum laboro; historicum enim, non oratorem requiro. Crebras etiam sententias, et judicia de rebus gestis interjecta prolixe nollem, ne, interrupta rerum serie, quod politici scriptoris munus est historicus invadat; qui si in consiliis explicandis, factisque enarrandis, non suum ingenium aut conjecturam, sed veritatem potissimum sequitur, suarum profecto partium satagit. Addiderim et illud Sallustianum, qua in re ipse Catonem maxime laudavit, posse multa paucis absolvere; id quod sine acerrimo judicio, atque etiam temperantia quadam neminem posse arbitror. Sunt multi in quibus vel sermonis elegantiam, vel congestarum rerum copiam non desideres; qui brevitatem cum copia conjunxerit, id est, qui multa paucis absolverit, princeps meo judicio Latinorum est Sallustius. Has ego virtutes historico inesse putem oportere, qui facta dictis exæquaturum se speret. Verum quid ego tibi ista? ad quæ tu ipse, quo es ingenio, per te sufficis; quique eam ingressus es viam, in qua si pergis, neminem te ipso doctiorem poteris brevi consulere: et uti pergas, quanquam tibi hortatu non opus est cujusquam, ne omnino tamen nihil pro expectatione tua respondisse videar, quantum valere me auctoritate apud te sinis, hortor magnopere atque auctor sum. Vale, tuaque virtute et sapientiæ acquirendæ studio macte esto.

Westmonasterio, Idibus Quintil. 1657.

HENRICO OLDENBURGO.

24. QUOD Salmurium peregrinationis vestræ, ut puto, sedem incolumes pervenistis, gaudeo: hoc enim te non fefellit, id mihi imprimis gratissimum fore; utqui et te merito tuo diligam, et suscepti itineris causam tam esse honestam atque laudabilem sciam. Quod autem audisti accersitum ecclesiæ tam illustri erudiendæ Antistitem tam infamem, id mallem quivis alius in Charontis, quam tu in Charentonis cymba audisses: verendum enim est valde, ne toto cœlo devius frustretur, quisquis tam fœdo auspice perventurum se unquam ad superos putat. Væ illi ecclesiæ (Deus modo avertat omen) ubi tales ministri aurium causa potissimum placent, quos ecclesia, si reformata vere vult dici, ejiceret rectius quam cooptaret. Quod scripta nostra nemini nisi poscenti impertisti, recte tu quidem et eleganter, neque ex mea solum, sed etiam ex Horatiana sententia fecisti;

> Ne studio nostri pecces, odiumque libellis
> Sedulus importes opera vehemente.——

Commorabatur vir doctus quidam, familiaris meus, superiore æstate Salmurii; is ad me scripsit, librum illum iis in locis expeti: unum exemplar duntaxat misi; rescripsit, placitum esse aliquod doctis, quibuscum communicaverat, ut nihil supra. Nisi iis rem gratam facturum me fuisse existimassem, parsissem utique et tuo oneri et sumptui meo. Verum,

> Si te forte meæ gravis uret sarcina chartæ,
> Abjicito potius, quam, quo perferre juberis,
> Clitellas ferus impingas,——

Laurentio nostro, ut jussisti, salutem nomine tuo dixi: de cætero, nihil est quod abs te prius agi, priusve curare velim, quam ut tu atque alumnus tuus recte valeatis, votorumque compotes ad nos quamprimum redeatis.

Westmonasterio, Calend. Sextil. 1657.

Nobili Adolescenti RICHARDO JONESIO.

25. CONFECISSE te sine incommodo tam longum iter, et spretis Lutetiarum illecebris, tanta celeritate eò contendisse, ubi literato otio, doctorumq. consuetudine frui possis, et magnopere lætor, et te tuæ indolis laudo. Illic quoad te continebis in portu eris; Syrtes et Scopulos, et Sirenum cantus alias tibi cavendum. Quin et vindemiam, qua oblectare te cogitas, Salmuriensem nimium satire te nolim, nisi in animo quoque sit, mustum illud Liberi liberiore Musarum latice quinta plus parte diluere. Verum ad hæc, me etiam tacente, hortatorem habes eximium, quem si audis, tibimet profecto optime consulueris, et præstantissimam parentem tuam summo gaudio, et crescente indies amore tui affeceris. Quod uti facere possis, à Deo Opt. Max. petere quotidie debes. Vale, et ad nos quam optimus, bonisque artibus quam cultissimus, fac redeas: id mihi præter cæteros jucundissimum erit.

26. IMPEDITUS per hosce dies occupationibus quibusdam, illustrissime Domine, serius rescribo quam volebam. Volebam enim eo citius, quod literas tuas multa jam nunc eruditione plenas, non tam præcipiendi tibi quicquam (id quod à me honoris credo mei, non usus tui causa postulas) quam gratulandi duntaxat, reliquisse mihi locum videbam. Gratulor auemt et mihi imprimis fœlicitatem meam, qui Sallustii sententiam ita commode explicasse videar, et tibi tam assiduam illius auctoris sapientissimi tanto cum fructu lectionem. De quo idem tibi ausim confirmare quod de Cicerone Quintilianus, sciat se haud parum in re historica profecisse cui placeat Sallustius. Illud autem Aristotelis præceptum ex rhetoricorum tertio quod explicatum cupis, sententiis utendum est in narratione et in fide, moratum enim est; non video quid habeat magnopere explicandum, modo ut narratio et fides, quæ et probatio dici solet, ea hic intelligatur, qua rhetor, non qua historicus utitur: diversæ enim sunt partes rhetoris et historici, sive narrant, sive probant; quemadmodum et artes ipsæ inter se diversæ sunt. Quid autem conveniat historico, ex auctoribus antiquis Polybio, Halicarnassæo, Diodoro, Cicerone, Luciano, aliisque multis, qui ea de re præcepta quædam sparsim tradidere, rectius didiceris. Ego vero et studiis tuis et itineribus secunda omnia atque tuta exopto, dignosque successus eo animo ac diligentia, quam rebus quibusque optimis adhibere te video. Vale.

Ornatissimo Viro PETRO HEIMBACHIO.

27. LITERAS tuas Haga comitis dat. 18 Dec. accepi: ad quas, quoniam id tuis rationibus expedire video, eodem die, quo mihi sunt redditæ, rescribendum putavi. In iis post gratias actas ob beneficia nescio quæ mea, quæ vellem sane non essent nulla, ut qui tua causa quidvis cupiam, petis ut te per D. Laurentium oratori nostro in Hollandiam designato commendarem: quod quidem doleo in me situm non esse; cum propter paucissimas familiaritates meas cum gratiosis, qui domi fere, idque libenter me contineo; tum quod is credo, è portu jam solvit, jamque adventat, secumque habet in comitatu quem sibi ab epistolis vult esse, quod tu

JOANNI BADIÆO Pastori ARAUSIONENSI.

28. QUOD tardius ad te rescribo, vir clarissime et reverende, non recusabit, credo, noster Duræus, quo minus tardioris culpam rescriptionis à me in ipsum transferam. Postea enim quam schedulæ illius, quam mihi recitatam volebas, de iis quæ Evangelij causa egisses atque perpessus esses, copiam mihi fecit, non distuli parare has ad te literas ut ei darem tabellario, qui primus discessisset, sollicitus quam in partem silentium meum tam diuturnum interpretarere. Maximam interim habeo gratiam Molinæo vestro Nemausensi, qui suis de me sermonibus et amicissima prædicatione, tot per ea loca bonorum virorum me in gratiam immisit. Et sane quanquam non sum nescius, me vel eo quod cum adversario tanti nominis publice jussus certamen non detrectaverim, vel propter argumenti celebritatem, vel denique scribendi genus longe lateque satis innotuisse; sic tamen existimo, me tantundem duntaxat habere famæ, quantum habeo bonæ existimationis apud bonos. Atque in eadem te quoque esse sententia, plane video; qui veritatis Christianæ studio atque amore accensus, tot labores pertuleris, tot hostes sustinueris; eaque quotidie fortiter facias, quibus tantum abest, ut ullam ab improbis famam tibi quæras, ut eorum certissima odia et maledicta in te concitare non verearis. O te beatum! quem Deus unum ex tot millibus virorum, alioqui sapientum atque doctorum, ex ipsis inferorum portis ac faucibus ereptum, ad tam insignem atque intrepidam Evangelii sui professionem evocavit. Et habeo nunc quidem cur putem Dei voluntate singulari factum, ut ad te citius non rescriberim: cum enim intelligerem ex literis tuis, te ab infestis undique hostibus petitum atque obsessum, circumspicere, et meritò quidem, quo te posses in extremo discrimine, si ita res tulisset, recipere, et Angliam tibi in primis placuisse, gaudebam equidem non uno nomine, te id consilii cepisse; cum tui potiundi spe, tum te de mea patria tam præclare sentire: illud dolebam, non tum vidisse me unde tibi hic apud nos præsertim Anglice nescienti, pro eo ac deceret prospectum esset posset. Nunc vero peropportune accidit ut minister quidam Gallicus ætate confectus, ante paucos dies è vita migraverit. In ista ecclesia qui plurimum pòssunt, teque illis in locis non satis tutò versari intelligunt (non hoc incertis rumoribus collectum, sed ex ipsis auditum refero) cooptatum te illius ministri in locum summopere cupiunt, immo invitant; sumptusque itineris suppeditandos tibi decreverunt; atque ita tibi de re familiari provisum iri pollicentur, ut ministrorum apud nos Gallicorum nemini melius; nec tibi quicquam defore, quod ad munus evangelicum apud se libenter obeundum possit conducere. Quare advola quamprimum, si me audis, vir reverende, ad cupidissimos tui, messem hic messurus, etsi commodorum hujus mundi fortasse non ita uberem, tamen, quam tui similis potissimum exoptant, animarum, ut spero, numerosam: tibique persuadeas, te viris bonis omnibus expectatissimum esse venturum; et quanto citius, tanto gratiorem. Vale.

Westmonasterio, April. 21, 1659.

HENRICO OLDENBURGO.

29. SILENTII, quam petis veniam tui, dabis potius mei; cujus erant, si memini, respondendi vices. Me certe non imminuta erga te voluntas, hoc enim persuasissimum tibi esse velim, sed vel studia, vel curæ domesticæ impediverant, vel ipsa fortasse ad scribendum pigritia, intermissi officii reum facit. Quod scire cupis, valeo equidem, Deo juvante, ut soleo: ab historia nostrorum motuum concinnanda, quod hortari videris, longe absum; sunt enim silentio digniores quam præconio: nec nobis qui motuum historiam concinnare, sed qui motus ipsos componere feliciter possit, est opus: tecum enim vereor ne libertatis ac religionis hostibus nunc nuper sociatis, nimis opportuni inter has nostras civiles discordias vel potius insanias, videamur; verum non illi gravius, quam nosmetipsi jamdiu flagitiis nostris, religioni vulnus intulerint. Sed Deus, uti spero, propter se gloriamque suam, quæ nunc agitur, consilia impetusque hostium ex ipsorum sententia succedere non sinet, quicquid reges et cardinales turbarum meditentur aut struant. Synodo interea protestantium Laodunensi, propediem, ut scribis, convocandæ, precor id, quod nulli adhuc synodo contigit, fœlicem exitum, non Nazianzenicum; fœlicem autem huic nunc satis futurum, si nihil aliud decreverit, quam ejiciendum esse Morum. De adversario posthumo simul ac prodierit, fac me, rogo, primo quoque tempore certiorem. Vale.

Nobili Adolescenti RICHARDO JONESIO.

30. QUOD longo intervallo ad me scribis, modestissime tu quidem te excusas, qui possis ejusdem delicti me rectius accusare: ut haud sciam profecto utrum non deliquisse te, an sic excusasse, maluèrim. Illud tibi in mentem cave veniat; me gratitudinem tuam, si qua mihi abs te debetur, literarum assiduitate metiri: tum te gratissimum adversus me esse sensero, cum mea erga te quæ prædicas merita, non tam in literis crebris, quam in optimis perpetuo studiis tuis ac laudibus apparebunt. Viam virtutis quidem, in illo orbis terrarum gymnasio quod es ingressus, recte fecisti; sed viam scito illam virtutis ac vitii communem; illuc progrediendum, ubi via in bivium se scindit. Teque sic comparare jam nunc mature debes, ut relicta hac communi, amœna ac florida, illam arduam ac difficilem, qui solius virtutis clivus est, tua sponte libentius, etiam cum labore ac periculo, possis ascendere. Id tu præ aliis multo facilius, mihi crede, poteris, qui tam fidum ac peritum nactus es itineris ducem. Vale.

Ornatissimo Viro Petro Heimbachio, Electoris Brandenburgici Consiliario.

31. Si inter tot funera popularium meorum, anno tam gravi ac pestilenti, abreptum me quoque, ut scribis, ex rumore præsertim aliquo credidisti, mirum non est; atque ille rumor apud vestros, ut videtur, homines, si ex eo quod de salute mea soliciti essent, increbuit, non displicet; indicium enim suæ erga me benevolentiæ fuisse existimo. Sed Dei benignitate, qui tutum mihi receptum in agris paraverat, et vivo adhuc et valeo; utinam ne inutilis, quicquid muneris in hac vita restat mihi peragendum. Tibi vero tam longo intervallo venisse in mentem mei, pergratum est; quanquam, prout rem verbis exornas, præbere aliquem suspicionem videris, oblitum mei te potius esse, qui tot virtutum diversarum conjugium in me, ut scribis, admirere. Ego certe ex tot conjugiis numerosam nimis prolem expavescerem, nisi constaret in re arcta, rebusque duris, virtutes ali maxime et vigere: tametsi earum una non ita belle charitatem hospitii mihi reddidit: quam enim politicam tu vocas, ego pietatem in patriam dictam abs te mallem, ea me pulchro nomine delinitum prope, ut ita dicam, expatriavit. Reliquarum tamen chorus clare concinit. Patria est, ubicunque est bene. Finem faciam, si hoc prius abs te impetravero, ut, si quid mendose descriptum aut non interpunctum repereris, id puero, qui hæc excepit, Latine prorsus nescienti velis imputare; cui singulas plane literulas annumerare non sine miseria dictans cogebar. Tua interim viri merita, quem ego adolescentem spei eximiæ cognovi, ad tam honestum in principis gratia provexisse te locum, gaudeo, cæteraque fausta omnia et cupio tibi, et spero. Vale.

JOANNIS MILTONII

PROLUSIONES QUÆDAM ORATORIÆ.

IN COLLEGIO, &c.

[FIRST PUBLISHED 1674.]

Utrum Dies an Nox præstantior sit?

Scriptum post se reliquere passim nobilissimi quique rhetoricæ magistri, quod nec vos præteriit, Academici, in unoquoque dicendi genere, sive demonstrativo, sive deliberativo, sive judiciali, ab aucupanda auditorum gratia exordium duci oportere; alioqui nec permoveri posse auditorum animos, nec causam ex sententia succedere. Quod si res ita est, quam sane, ne vera dissimulem, eruditorum omnium consensu fixum ratumque novi, miserum me! ad quantas ego hodie redactus sum angustias! qui in ipso orationis limine vereor ne aliquid prolaturus sim minime oratorium, et ab officio oratoris primo et præcipuo necesse habeam abscedere. Etenim quî possim ego vestram sperare benevolentiam, cum in hoc tanto concursu, quot oculis intueor tot ferme aspiciam infesta in me capita; adeo ut orator venisse videar ad non exorabiles. Tantum potest ad simultates etiam in scholis æmulatio, vel diversa studia, vel in eisdem studiis diversa judicia sequentium; ego vero solicitus non sum,

Veruntamen ne penitus despondeam animum, sparsim video, ni fallor, qui mihi ipso aspectu tacito, quam bene velint, haud obscure significant; à quibus etiam quantumvis paucis, equidem probari malo quam ab innumeris imperitorum centuriis, in quibus nihil mentis, nihil rectæ rationis, nihil sani judicii inest, ebullienti quadam et plane ridenda verborum spuma sese venditantibus; à quibus si emendicatos ab novitiis authoribus centones dempseris, Deum immortalem! quanto nudiores Leberide conspexeris, et exhausta inani vocabulorum et sententiuncularum supellectile, μηδὲ γρὺ φθέγγεσθαι, perinde mutos ac ranuncula Seriphia. At ô quam ægre temperaret à risu vel ipse, si in vivis esset, Heraclitus, si forte hosce cerneret, si Diis placet, oratorculos, quos paulo ante audiverit cothurnato Euripidis Oreste, aut furibundo sub mortem Hercule grandiora eructantes, exhausto tandem vocularum quarundam tenuissimo penu, posito incedere supercilio, aut retractis introrsum cornibus, velut animalcula quædam abrepere. Sed recipio me paululum digressus. Si quis igitur est qui, spreta pacis conditione, ἄσπονδον πολέμον mihi indixerit, eum ego quidem in præsentia non dedignabor orare et rogare, ut semota paulisper simultate, æquabilis adsit certaminis hujus arbiter; neve oratoris culpa, si qua est, causam quam optimam et præclarissimam in invidiam vocet. Quod si mordaciora paulo hæc et aceto perfusa nimio putaveritis, id ipsum de industria fecisse me profiteor: volo enim ut initium orationis meæ primulum imitetur diluculum; ex quo subnubilo serenissima fere nascitur dies. Quæ an nocte præstantior sit, haud vulgaris utique agitatur controversia, quam quidem mearum nunc est partium, auditores, pensique hujus matutini, accurate et radicitus excutere; quamvis et hæc prolusioni poeticæ, quam decertationi oratoriæ, magis videatur idonea: at at noctemne dixi cum die struxisse lites? Quid hoc rei est? quænam hæc molitio? numnam antiquum Titanes redintegrant bellum, Phlegræi prælii instaurantes reliquias? an terra novam in superos deos enixa est portentosæ magnitudinis prolem? an vero Typhœus injectam Ætnæ montis electatus est molem? an denique, decepto Cerbero, catenis adamantinis subduxit se Briareus? quid est aliquando tandem, quod deos manes ad cœlestis imperii spem jam tertiò erexerit? adeone contemnendum Jovis fulmen? adeon' pro nihilo putanda Palladis invicta virtus, qua tantam olim inter terrigenas fratres edidit stragem? excidit ne animo insignis ille per cœli templa Liberi patris ex profligatis gigantibus triumphus? neutiquam sanè: meminit illa probe, nec sine lachrymis, consternatos plerosque à Jove fratres superstitesque cæteros usque ad penitissimos inferorum recessus in fugam actos; et certe jam nihil minus quam bellum adornat trepida, querelam potius et lites instruit, atque pro more mulierum post rem unguibus et pugnis fortiter gestam ad colloquium seu versus ad rixam venit, periclitura, opinor, linguane plus an armis valeat. At vero quam inconsultò, quam arroganter, quamque debili causæ titulo præ die summam rerum ambiat, expedire festino. Video siquidem et ipsam diem galli cantu expergefactam, cursu solito citatiori adproperasse ad suas laudes exaudiendas. Et quoniam unusquisque hoc imprimis ad honores et decus conferre arbitratur, si ab generosis natalibus et prisco regum vel deorum sanguine oriundum se comperit. Videndum primo utra genere sit clarior, mox quænam antiquitate honoratior; dein hæc an illa humanis usibus accommodatius inserviat. Apud vetustissimos itaque mythologiæ scriptores memoriæ datum reperio, Demogorgonem deorum omnium atavum (quem eundem et Chaos ab antiquis nuncupatum hariolor) inter alios liberos, quos sustulerat plurimos, Terram genuisse; hac, incerto patre, noctem fuisse prognatam; quamvis paulo aliter Hesiodus eam chaogenitam velit hoc monasticho, Ἐξ χάεος δ' Ἔρεβός τε μέλαινά τε νὺξ ἐγένοντο.

Hanc, quocunque natam, cum adoleverat ad ætatem nuptiis maturam, poscit sibi uxorem Phanes pastor; annuente matre, refragatur illa, negatque se ignoti viri et nusquam visi, moribusque insuper tam longe diversis, concubitum inituram. Repulsam Phanes ægre ferens, verso in odium amore, nigellam hanc Telluris filiam per omnes orbis terrarum tractus ad necem sequitur indignabundus. Illa vero quem amantem sprevit, eum hostem non minus tremit; propterea ne apud ultimas quidem nationes, et disjuncta quam maxime loca, immo ne in ipso sinu parentis satis se tutam rata, ad incestos Erebi fratris amplexus furtim et clanculum se corripit; timore simul gravi soluta, maritumque nacta proculdubio sui similem. Hoc itaque tam venusto conjugum pari Æther et Dies perhibentur editi, ut author est idem, cujus supra mentionem fecimus, Hesiodus.

Οὓς τε κεκυσσα μένη Ἐρέβει φιλότητι μιγεῖσα.

At enim vetant humaniores musæ, ipsa etiam prohibet philosophia diis proxima, ne minus poetis deorum figulis, præsertim Græcanicis, omni ex parte habeamus fidem; nec quisquam iis hoc probro datum putet, quod in re tanti momenti authores videantur vix satis locupletes. Si quis enim eorum aliquantillum deflexerit à vero, id non tam ingeniis eorum assignandum, quibus nihil divinius, quam pravæ et cæcutienti ejus ætatis ignorantiæ, quæ tunc tempestatis pervadebat omnia. Abunde sane laudis hinc sibi adepti sunt, affatim gloriæ, quod homines in sylvis atque montibus dispalatos belluarum ad instar, in unum compulerint locum, et civitates constituerint, quodque omnes disciplinas quotquot hodie traduntur, lepidis fabellarum involucris obvestitas pleni Deo primi docuerint; eritque hoc solum iisdem ad assequendam nominis immortalitatem non ignobile sane subsidium, quod artium scientiam feliciter incboatam posteris absolvendam reliquerint.

Noli igitur, quisquis es, arrogantiæ me temere damnare, quasi ego jam veterum omnium poetarum decreta, nulla nixus authoritate, perfregerim aut immutaverim; neque enim id mihi sumo, sed ea tantummodo ad normam rationis revocare conor, exploraturus hoc pacto num rigidæ possint veritatis examen pati. Quocirca primò noctem Tellure ortam erudite quidem et eleganter fabulata est antiquitas; quid enim aliud mundo noctem obducit quam densa et impervia terra, solis lumini nostroque horizonti interposita? quòd eam deinde nunc patrimam, fuisse negant mythologi, nunc matrimam, id quoque festiviter fictum; inde siquidem recte colligitur spuriam fuisse aut subdititiam, aut demum parentes prolem tam famosam et illiberalem præ pudore non agnovisse. At vero cur existimarent Phanetem illum mirifica supra modum humanum facie, noctem Æthiopissam et monogrammam etiam in matrimonium adamasse, arduum impense negotium videtur è vestigio divinare, nisi quod fœminarum insignis admodum id temporis paucitas delectum suppeditaret nullum. Atqui presse agamus et cominus. Phanetem interpretantur veteres solem sive diem; quem dum commemorant noctis conjugium primo petiisse, deinde in ultionem spreti connubii insecutum, nihil aliud quam dierum et noctium vices ostendere volunt. Ad hoc autem quid opus erat introduxisse Phanetem noctis nuptias ambientem, cum perpetua illa eorum successio et mutuus quasi impulsus innato et æterno odio melius adsignificetur; quippe constat sudum et tenebras ab ipso rerum principio acerrimis inter se dissedisse inimicitiis. Atque ego sane noctem credo, εὐφρόνης cognomen hinc solum accepisse, quod Phanetis connubio permiscere se caute recusarit, nec non cogitate; etenim si illum semel in suos admisisset thalamos, extra dubium radiis ejus et impatibili fulgore absumpta vel in nihilum interiisset, vel penitus conflagrasset, sicuti olim invito Jove Amasio arsisse ferunt Semelem. Quapropter huic, non improvida salutis suæ, Erebum prætulit. Unde scitum illud Martialis et perurbanum.

Uxor pessima, pessimus maritus,
Non miror bene convenire vobis.

Nec tacendum existimo, quam formosa et se digna virum auxerit prole, nimirum ærumna, invidia, timore, dolo, fraude, pertinacia, paupertate, miseria, fame, querela, morbo, senectute, pallore, caligine, somno, morte, Charonte, qui ultimo natus est partu; adeo ut hic apprime quadret quod in proverbii consuetudinem venit, κακοῦ κόρακος κακὸν ᾠόν. Cæterum nec desunt qui etiam ætherem et diem itidem Erebo suo Noctem peperisse tradunt. At enim quotusquisque est, non impos mentis, qui sic philosophantem non explodat ac rejiciat tanquam democritica commenta aut nutricularum fabulas proferentem? Ecquam enim veri speciem præ se fert, posse obscuram et fuscam noctem tam venustulum, tam amabilem, tam omnibus gratum acceptumque reddere partum? Qui etiam ut primum conceptus esset, præmaturo impetu erumpens utro matrem enecasset, ipsumque Erebum patrem abegisset protinus, vetulumque coegisset Charontem, ut sub imo Styge nocturnos abderet oculos, et si qua sub inferis lati-bula sunt, ut eo se remigio et velis reciperet. Nec solum apud Orcum non est natus dies, sed ne unquam quidem ibi comparuit; neque potest illuc nisi fatorum ingratiis vel per minimam intromitti rimulam; quid! quod etiam diem nocte antiquiorem audeo dicere, eamque mundum recens emersum è Chao diffuso lumine collustrasse, priusquam nox suas egisset vices; nisi crassam illam et immundam caliginem noctem vel ipsi Demogorgoni equævam velimus perperam nominare. Ideoque diem Urani filiam natu maximam arbitror, vel filii potius dixeris, quem ille in solatium humanæ gentis et terrorem infernalium deorum procreasse dicitur; ne scilicet, occupante tyrannidem nocte, nulloque inter terras et Tartara discrimine posito, manes et furiæ atque omne illud infame monstrorum genus ad terras usque, deserta Barathri sede, se proreperent, misellique homines densis obvoluti umbris, et quaquaversum occlusi, defunctarum animarum pœnas etiam vivi experirentur. Hactenus, academici, obscuram noctis propaginem atris et profundissimis eruimus tenebris; habebitis ilicet ut se dignam præbuerit natalibus suis, sed si prius diei laudibus impensam dederim opellam meam, quamvis et illa sane omnium laudatorum eloquentiam anteeat. Et certe primo quam omnium animantium stirpi grata sit et desiderabilis, quid opere est vobis exponere; cum vel ipsæ volucres nequeant suum celare gaudium, quin egressæ nidulis, ubi primum diluculavit, aut in verticibus arborum concentu suavissimo deliniant omnia, aut sursum librantes se, et quam possunt prope Solem volitent, redeunti gratulaturæ luci. At primus omnium adventantem Solem triumphat insomnis gallus, et quasi præco quivis, monere videtur homines, ut excusso somno prodeant, atque obviam effundant se novam salutatum Auroram: tripudiant in agris capellæ, totumque genus quadrupedum gestit et exultat lætitia. Quinetiam et mœsta Clysie totam fere noctem, converso in Orientem vultu, Phœbum præstolata suum, jam arridet et adblanditur appropinquanti amatori. Caltha quoque et Rosa, ne nihil addant communi gaudio, aperientes sinum, odores suos Soli tantum servatos profusè spirant, quibus noctem dedignantur impertiri, claudentes se folliculis suis simulatque vesper appetat; cæterique flores inclinata paulum, et rore languidula erigentes capita quasi præbent se Soli, et tacite rogant ut suis osculis abstergat lacrymulas, quas ejus absentiæ dederant. Ipsa quoque Tellus in adventum Solis cultiori se induit vestitu, nubesque juxta variis chlamydatæ coloribus, pompa solenni, longoque ordine videntur ancillari surgenti deo. Ad summam, nequid deesset ad ejus dilatandas laudes, huic Persæ, huic Libyes, divinos honores decrevere; Rhodienses pariter celeberrimum illum stupendæ magnitudinis colossum, Charetis Lyndii miro extructum artificio, huic sacrarunt; huic itidem hodie Occidentalis Indiæ populi thure cæteroque apparatu sacrificare accepimus. Vos testor, academici, quam jucundum, quam optatum diuque expectatum vobis illucescat mane, utpote quod vos ad mansuetiores musas revocet, à quibus insaturabiles et sitibundos dimiserat ingrata Nox. Testor ultimo Saturnum cœlo deturbatum in Tartara, quam lubens vellet, si modo per Jovem liceret, ab exosis tenebris ad auras reverti; quod demum lux vel ipsi Plutoni sua caligine longe sit potior, id quidem in confesso est, quando cœleste regnum toties affectavit, unde scite et verissime Orpheus in hymno ad Auroram:

> Ἣ χαίρει θνητῶν μερόπων γένος οὐδέ τις ἐστὶν,
> Ὃς φεύγει τὴν σὴν ὄψιν καθυπέρτερον, οὖσαν
> Ἡνίκα, τον γλύκυν ὕπνον ἀπό βλεφάρων ἀποσείσῃς.
> Πᾶς δὲ βροτός γήθει, πᾶν ἑρπετόν, ἀλλάτε φῦλα
> Τετραπόδων, πτηνῶντε, καὶ ἐνναλίων πολυεθνῶν.

Nec mirum utique cum Dies non minus utilitatis adferat quam delectationis, et sola negotiis obeundis accommodata sit; quis enim mortalium lata et immensa maris trajiçere sustineret, si desperaret affuturum diem; immo non aliter oceanum navigarent quam Lethen et Acherontem manes, horrendis nimirum undiquaque tenebris obsiti. Unusquisque etiam in suo se contineret gurgustio, haud unquam ausus foras prorepere; adeo ut necesse esset dissui statim humanam societatem. Frustra Venerem exeuntem è mari inchoasset Apelles; frustra Zeuxis Halenam pinxisset, si Nox cæca et obnubila res tam visendas oculis nostris adimeret; tum quoque frustra tellus serpentes multiplici et erratico lapsu vites, frustra decentissimæ proceritatis arbores profunderet, incassum denique gemmis et floribus tanquam stellulis interpoliret se, cœlum exprimere conata; tum demum nobilissimus ille videndi sensus nullis animalibus usui foret; ita prorsus, extincto mundi oculo, deflorescerent omnia et penitus emorerentur; nec sane huic cladi diu superessent ipsi homines, qui tenebricosam incolerent terram, cum nihil suppeteret unde victitarent, nihil denique obstaret, quominus in antiquum chaos ruerent omnia. Hisce quidem possit quispiam inexhausto stylo plura adjicere; verum non permitteret ipsa verecunda Dies ut singula persequatur, et proclivi cursu ad occasum præcipitans, nullo modo pateretur immodice laudantem. Jam igitur declinat in vesperam dies, et nocti statim cedet, ne adulta hieme solstitialem contigisse diem facete dicatis. Tantum pace vestra liceat adjungere pauca quæ non possum commode præterire. Meritò igitur poetæ Noctem inferis exsurgere scriptitarunt; cum impossibile plane sit aliunde tot tantaque mala nisi ex eo loco mortalibus invehi. Oborta enim nocte sordescunt et obfuscantur omnia, nec quicquam tunc profecto interest inter Helenam et Canidiam, nihil inter pretiosissimos et viles lapillos, nisi quod gemmarum nonnullæ etiam noctis obscuritatem vincant: huc accedit, quod amœnissima quæque loca tunc quidem horrorem incutiant, qui etiam alto et tristi quodam augetur silentio; siquidem quicquid uspiam est in agris, aut hominum aut ferarum, vel domum, vel ad antra raptim se conferunt; ubi stratis immersi ad aspectus noctis terribiles claudunt oculos. Nullum foris conspicies præterquam fures et laverniones lucifugos, qui cædem anhelantes et rapinas, insidiantur bonis civium, et noctu solum vagantur, ne detegantur interdiu; quippe dies nullum non indagare solet nefas, haud passura lucem suam istiusmodi flagitiis inquinari; nullum habebis obvium nisi lemures et larvas, et empusas quas secum Nox comites è locis asportat subterraneis, quæque tota nocte terras in sua ditione esse, sibique cum hominibus communes vendicant. Ideoque opinor noctem auditum nostrum reddidisse solertiorem, ut umbrarum gemitus, bubonum et stygum ululatus, ac rugitus leonum, quos fames evocat; eò citius perstringerent aures, animosque; graviori metu percellerent. Hinc liquidò constat, quam sit ille falsus animi qui noctu homines à timore otiosos esse, Noctemque curas sopire omnes autumat; namque hanc vanam esse et nugatoriam opinionem infœlici norunt experientia, quicunque sceleris cujuspiam conscii sibi fuere; quos tunc sphinges et harpyiæ, quos tunc gorgones et chimæræ intentatis facibus insequuntur; norunt miseri, qui cum nullus adsit qui subveniat iis et opituletur, nullus qui dulcibus alloquiis dolores leniat, ad bruta saxa irritas jaciunt querelas, subinde exoptantes oriturum diluculum. Idcirco Ovidius poetarum elegantissimus Noctem jure optimo curarum maximam nutricem appellavit. Quod autem eo potissimum tempore fracta et defatigata laboribus diurnis corpora recreemus somno et refocillemus, id numinis beneficium est non noctis munus; sed esto, non est tanti somnus ut ejus ergo noctem in honore habeamus, enimvero cum proficiscimur dormitum, revera tacite fatemur nos imbelles et miseros homines, qui minuta hæc corpuscula ne ad exiguum tempus sine requie sustentare valeamus. Et certe quid aliud est somnus quam mortis imago et simulachrum? hinc Homero mors et somnus gemelli sunt, uno generati conceptu, uno partu editi. Postremò, quod luna cæteraque sidera nocti suas præferant faces, id quoque soli debetur; neque enim habent illa quod transfundant lumen nisi quod ab illo accipiant mutuum. Quis igitur, si non tenebrio, si non effractor, si non aleator, si non inter scortorum greges noctem pernoctare perpetem integrosque dies ronchos efflare solitus, quis inquam nisi talis tam inhonestam, tamque invidiosam causam in se susceperit defendendam? Atque demiror ego ut aspicere audeat solem hunc, et etiam cum communi luce impune frui, quam ingratus vituperat, dignus profecto quem adversis radiorum ictibus veluti Pythonem novum interimat sol; dignus qui Cimmeriis occlusus tenebris longam et perosam vitam transigat; dignus denique cujus oratio somnum moveat auditoribus, ita ut quicquid dixerit non majorem somnio quovis fidem faciat; quique ipse etiam somnolentus, nutantes atque stertentes auditores annuere sibi et plaudere peroranti deceptus putet. Sed nigra video noctis supercilia, et sentio atras insurgere tenebras; recedendum est, ne me nox improvisum opprimat. Vos igitur, auditores, posteaquam nox nihil aliud sit quam obitus, et quasi mors diei, nolite committere ut mors vitæ præponatur; sed causam dignemini meam vestris ornare suffragiis, ita studia vestra fortunent musæ; exaudiatque Aurora musis amica, exaudiat et Phœbus qui cuncta videt auditque, quos habeat in hoc cœtu laudis ejus fautores. Dixi.

De Sphærarum Concentu.

Si quis meæ tenuitati locus Academici, post tot hodie, tantosque exauditos oratores, conabor etiam ego jam pro meo modulo exprimere, quam bene velim solenni hujus lucis celebritati, et tanquam procul sequar hodiernum hunc eloquentiæ triumphum. Dum itaque trita illa, et pervulgata dicendi argumenta refugio penitus, et reformido, ad novam aliquam materiem ardue tentandam accendit animum, et statim erigit hujus diei cogitatio, horumque simul quos digna die loquuturos haud injuria suspicabar; quæ duo vel tardo cuivis, et obtuso cæteroquin ingenio stimulos, aut acumen addidisse poterant. Hinc idcirco subiit pauca saltem super illo cœlesti concentu, dilatata (quod aiunt) manu, et ubertate oratoria præfari, de quo mox quasi contracto pugno disceptandum est; habita tamen ratione temporis, quod me jam urget et coarctat. Hæc tamen perinde accipiatis velim auditores, quasi per lusum dicta. Quis enim sanus existimaverit Pythagoram deum illum philosophorum, cujus ad nomen omnes ejus sæculi mortales non sine persancta veneratione assurgebant, quis, inquam, eum existimaverit tam lubricè fundatam opinionem unquam protulisse in medium. Sanè si quam ille sphærarum docuit harmoniam, et circumactos ad modulaminis dulcedinem cœlos, per id sapienter innuere voluit, amicissimos orbium complexus, æquabilesque in eternum ad fixam fati legem conversiones; in hoc certe vel poetas, vel quod idem pene est, divina imitatus oracula, à quibus nihil sacri reconditique mysterii exhibetur in vulgus, nisi aliquo involutum tegumento et vestitu. Hunc secutus est ille Naturæ Matris optimus interpres Plato, dum singulis cœlis orbibus Sirenas quasdam insidere tradidit, quæ mellitissimo cantu deos hominesque mirabundos capiant. Atque hanc deinque conspirationem rerum universam, et consensum amabilem, quem Pythagoras per harmoniam poetico ritu subinduxit, Homerus etiam per auream illam Jovis catenam de cœlo suspensam insigniter appositeque adumbravit. Hinc autem Aristoteles, Pythagoræ, et Platonis æmulus et perpetuus calumniator, ex labefactatis tantorum virorum sententiis viam sternere ad gloriam cupiens, inauditam hanc cœlorum symphoniam, sphærarumque modulos affinxit Pythagoræ. Quod si sic tulisset sive fatum, sive sors, ut tua in me, Pythagora pater, transvolasset anima, haud utique deesset qui te facile assereret, quantumvis gravi jamdiu laborantem infamia. At vero quidni corpora cœlestia, inter perennes illos circuitus, musicos efficiant sonos? Annon æquum tibi videtur Aristoteles? næ ego vix credam intelligentias tuas sedentarium illum rotandi cœli laborem potuisse tot sæculis perpeti, nisi ineffabile illud astrorum melos detinuisset abituras, et modulationes delinimento suasisset moram. Quam si tu cœlo adimas sane mentes illas pulchellas, et ministros deos plane in pistrinum dedis, et ad molas trusatiles damnas. Quinetiam ipse Atlas ruituro statim cœlo jampridem subduxisset humeros, nisi dulcis illa concentus anhelantem, et tanto sub onere sudabundum lætissima voluptate permulsisset. Ad hæc, pertæsus astra Delphinus jamdiu cœlo sua præoptasset maria, nisi probe calluisset, vocales cœli orbes lyram Arioniam suavitate longe superare. Quid! quod credibile est ipsam alaudam prima luce recta in nubes evolare, et Lusciniam totam noctis solitudinem cantu transigere, ut ad harmonicam cœli rationem, quam attente auscultant, suos corrigant modulos. Hinc quoque musarum circa Jovis altaria dies noctesque saltantium ab ultima rerum origine increbuit fabula; hinc Phœbo lyræ peritia ab longinqua vetustate attributa est. Hinc Harmoniam Jovis et Electræ fuisse filiam reverenda credidit antiquitas, quæ cum Cadmo nuptui data esset, totus cœli chorus concinuisse dicitur. Quid si nullus unquam in terris audiverit hanc astrorum symphoniam? Ergone omnia supra lunæ sphæram muta prorsus erunt, torpidoque silentio consopita? Quinimo aures nostras incusemus debiles, quæ cantus et tam dulces sonos excipere aut non possunt, aut non dignæ sunt. Sed nec plane inaudita est hæc cœli melodia; quis enim tuas Aristoteles in media æris plaga tripudiantes capras putaverit, nisi quod præcinentes cœlos ob vicinitatem clare cum audiant, non possint sibi temperare quo minus agant choreas. At solus inter mortales concentum hunc audisse fertur Pythagoras; nisi et ille bonus quispiam genius, et cœli indigena fuerit, qui forte superum jussu delapsus est ad animos hominum sacra eruditione imbuendos, et ad bonam frugem revocandos: ad minimum certe vir erat, qui omnes virtutum numeros in se continebat, quique dignus erat cum diis ipsis sui similibus sermones miscere, et cœlestium perfrui consortio: ideoque nihil miror, si dii ejus amantissimi abditissimis eum naturæ secretis interesse permiserint. Quod autem nos hanc minime audiamus harmoniam sane in causa videtur esse furacis Promethei audacia, quæ tot mala hominibus invexit, et simul hanc fœlicitatem nobis abstulit qua nec unquam frui licebit, dum sceleribus cooperti belluinis cupiditatibus obrutescimus; quî enim possumus cœlestis illius soni capaces fieri, quorum animæ (quod ait Persius) in terras curvæ sunt, et cœlestium prorsus inanes. At si pura, si casta, si nivea gestaremus pectora, ut olim Pythagoras, tum quidem suavissima illa stellarum circumeuntium musica personarent aures nostræ, et opplerentur; atque dein cuncta illico tanquam in aureum illud sæculum redirent; nosque tum demum miseriarum immunes, beatum et vel diis invidendum degeremus otium. Hic autem me veluti medio in itinere tempus intersecat, idque persane opportune vereor enim ne incondito minimeque numeroso stylo, huic quam prædico harmoniæ, toto hoc tempore obstrepuerim; fuerimque ipse impedimento, quo minus illam audiveritis: Itaque Dixi.

IN SCHOLIS PUBLICIS.

Contra Philosophiam Scholasticam.

Quærebam nuper obnixe, academici, nec in postremis hoc mihi curæ erat quo potissimum verborum apparatu vos auditores meos exciperem, cum subito mihi in mentem venit id quod Marcus Tullius (à quo, non sine fausto omine exorditur oratio mea) toties commisit literis; in hoc scilicet partes rhetoris sitas esse, ac positas, ut doceat, delectet, et denique permoveat. Proinde istuc mihi tantummodo proposui negotium, ut ab hoc triplici oratoris munere quam minime discedam. At quoniam docere vos consummatos undique homines non est quod ego mihi sumam, nec quod vos sustineatis, liceat saltem (quod proximum est) monere aliquid fortasse non omnino abs re futurum; delectare interim, quod sane perquam vereor, ut sit exilitatis meæ, erit tamen desiderii summa, quam si attigero, certe parum erit, quin et permoveam. Permovebo autem in præsens abunde, ex animi sententia, si vos auditores inducere potero, ut immania illa, et prope monstrosa subtilium, quod aiunt, doctorum volumina rariori manu evolvatis, utque verrucosis sophistarum controversiis paulo remissius indulgeatis. At vero ut palam fiat omnibus quam sit æquum atque honestum quod suadeo, strictim ostendam, et pro mea semihorula hisce studiis nec oblectari animum, nec erudiri, nec denique commune bonum quicquam promoveri. Et certe in primis ad vos provoco, academici, si qua fieri potest ex mea vestri ingenii conjectura, quid, quæso, voluptatis inesse potest in festivis hisce tetricorum senum altercationibus, quæ si non in Trophonii antro, certe in Monachorum specubus natæ olent, atque spirant scriptorum suorum torvam severitatem, et paternas rugas præ se ferunt, quæque inter succinctam brevitatem plus nimio prolixæ tædium creant, et nauseam; at si quando productiores leguntur, tum quidem aversationem pene naturalem, et si quid ultra est innati odii pariunt lectoribus. Sæpius ego, auditores, cum mihi forte aliquoties imponeretur necessitas investigandi paulisper has argutiolas post retusam diutina lectione et animi et oculorum aciem, sæpius inquam ad interspirandum restiti, et subinde pensum oculis emensus quæsivi miserum tædii solatium; cum vero plus semper viderem superesse, quàm quod legendo absolveram, equidem inculcatis hisce ineptis quoties præoptavi mihi repurgandum Augeæ bubile, fœlicemque prædicavi Herculem, cui facilis Juno hujusmodi ærumnam nunquam imperaverat exantlandam. Nec materiam hanc enervem, languidam, et humi serpentem erigit, aut attollit floridior stylus, sed jejunus et exsuccus rei tenuitatem adeo conjunctissime comitatur, ut ego utique facile crediderim sub tristi Saturno scriptam fuisse, nisi quod innocua tunc temporis simplicitas ignoraret prorsus offucias istas, et diverticula, quorum hi libri scatent ubique. Mihi credite, juvenes ornatissimi, dum ego inanes hasce quæstiunculas nonnunquam invitus percurro, videor mihi per confragosa tesqua, et salebras, perque vastas solitudines, et præruptas montium angustias iter conficere; propterea nec verisimile est venustulas, et elegantes musas pannosis hisce et squalidis præesse studiis, aut deliros horum sectatores in suum vendicare patrocinium; immo existimo nullum unquam fuisse iis in Parnasso locum, nisi aliquem forte in imo colle angulum incultum, inamœnum, dumis et spinis asperum, atque horridum, carduis, et densa urtica coopertum, à choro et frequentia dearum remotissimum, qui nec emittat lauros nec fundat flores, quò denique Phœbeæ citharæ nunquam pervenerit sonus. Divina certe poesis ea, qua cœlitus impertita est, virtute obrutam terrena fæce animam in sublime exuscitans, inter cœli templa locat, et quasi nectareo halitu afflans, totamque perfundens ambrosia, cœlestem quodammodo instillat beatitudinem, et quoddam immortale gaudium insusurrat. Rhetorica sic animos capit hominum, adeoque suaviter in vincula pellectos post se trahit, ut nunc ad misericordiam permovere valeat, nunc in odium rapere, nunc ad virtutem bellicam accendere, nunc ad contemptum mortis evehere. Historia pulchre concinnata nunc inquietos animi tumultus sedat et componit, nunc delibutum gaudio reddit, mox evocat lachrymas, sed mites eas et pacatas, et quæ mœstæ nescio quid voluptatis secum afferant. At vero futiles hæ, nec non strigosæ controversiæ, verborumque velitationes, in commovendis animi affectibus, certè nullum habent imperium; stuporem duntaxat et torpedinem accersunt ingenio; proinde neminem oblectant, nisi qui agrestis, et hirsuti plane pectoris est, quique ex arcano quodam impetu ad lites et dissidia proclivis, et insuper impendio loquax à recta et sana sapientia abhorret semper atque avertitur. Amandetur itaque cum suis captiunculis sane, vel in montem Caucasum, aut sicubi terrarum cæca dominatur barbaries, ibique subtilitatum suarum et præstigiarium ponat officinam, et pro libitu de rebus nihili torqueat et augat se, usque dum nimia solicitudo, veluti Prometheus ille vultur cor exederit, penitusque absumpserit. Sed nec minus infrugifera sunt, quam injucunda hæc studia, et quæ ad rerum cognitionem nihil prorsus adjutant. Ponamus enim ob oculos omnes illos turmatim cucullatos vetulos, harum præcipue captionum figulos, quotusquisque est qui ullo beneficio locupletaverit rem literariam? Citra dubium profecto cultam et nitidam, et mansuetiorem philosophiam asperitate impexa deformem pene reddidit, et veluti malus genius, humana pectora spinis et sentibus implevit, et perpetuam in scholas intulit discordiam, quæ quidem fœlices discentium progressus mirum in modum remorata est. Quid enim? ultrò citroque argutantur versipelles philosophastri? hic suam undique sententiam graviter firmat, ille contra magna mole labefactare adnititur, et quod inexpugnabili argumento munitum existimas, id statim adversarius haud multo negotio amolitur. Hæret interea lector, tanquam in bivio, quò divertat, quò inclinet anceps, et incertus consilii, dum tot utrinque confertim vibrantur tela, ut ipsam lucem adimant, rebusque profundam afferant caliginem, adeo ut jam lectori tandem opus sit, ut diuturnos Cereris imitatus labores, per universum terrarum orbem accensa face quærat veritatem, et nusquam inveniat: eo usque demum insaniæ redactus est, ut se misere cæcutire putet, ubi nihil est, quod videat. Ad hæc non rarenter usu venit, ut, qui harum disputationum fuligini addicunt se totos et devovent, si forte aliud quidvis aggrediantur à suis deliramentis alienum, mire prodant inscitiam suam, et deridiculam infantiam. Novissime, summus hic tam serio navatæ operæ fructus erit, ut stultus evadas accuratior, et nugarum artifex, utque tibi accedat quasi peritior ignorantia, nec mirum; quandoquidem hæc omnia, de quibus adeo afflictim et anxie laboratum est, in natura rerum nullibi existunt, sed leves quædam imagines, et simulachra tenuia turbidas oberrant mentes, et rectioris sapientiæ vacuas. Cæterùm ad integritatem vitæ, et mores excolendos (quod multo maximum est) quam minime conducant hæ nugæ, etiamsi ego taceam, abunde vobis perspicuum est. Atque vel hinc liquido evincitur quod mihi postremo dicendum proposui, scilicet importunam hanc λογομαχίαν nec in publicum cedere commodum, nec ullo modo patriæ vel honori esse, vel utilitati, quod tamen in scientiis omnes antiquissimum esse ducunt. Siquidem his maxime duobus auctam atque exornatam præcipue patriam animadverti; vel præclare dicendo, vel fortiter agendo; atque litigiosa hæc discrepantium opinionum digladiatio, nec ad eloquentiam instruere, nec ad prudentiam instituere, nec ad fortia facinora incitare posse videtur. Abeant igitur cum suis formalitatibus argutatores versuti; quibus post obitum hanc par erit irrogari pœnam, ut cum Ocno illo apud inferos torqueant funiculos. At quanto satius esset, academici, quantoque dignius vestro nomine nunc descriptas chartula terras universas quasi oculis perambulare, et calcata vetustis heroibus inspectare loca, bellis, triumphis, et etiam illustrium poetarum fabulis nobilitatas regiones percurrere, nunc æstuantem transmittere Adriam, nunc ad Ætnam flammigerantem impune accedere, dein mores hominum speculari, et ordinatas pulchre gentium respublicas; hinc omnium animantium naturas persequi, et explorare, ab his in arcanas lapidum et herbarum vires animum demittere. Nec dubitetis, auditores, etiam in cœlos evolare, ibique illa multiformia nubium spectra, nivisque coacervatam vim, et unde illæ matutinæ lachrymæ contemplemini, grandinisque exinde loculos introspicite, et armamenta fulminum perscrutemini; nec vos clam sit quid sibi velit aut Jupiter aut Natura, cum dirus atque ingens cometa cœlo sæpe minitatur incendium, nec vos vel minutissimæ lateant stellulæ, quotquot inter polos utrosque sparsæ sunt, et dispalatæ; immo solem peregrinantem sequamini comites, et ipsum tempus ad calculos vocate, æternique ejus itineris exigite rationem. Sed nec iisdem, quibus orbis, limitibus contineri et circumscribi se patiatur vestra mens, sed etiam extra mundi pomœria divagetur; perdiscatque ultimò (quod adhuc altissimum est) seipsam cognoscere, simulque sanctas illas mentes, et intelligentias quibuscum post hæc sempiternum initura est sodalitium. Quid multa nimis? vobis ad hæc omnia disciplinæ sit ille, qui tantopere in deliciis est, Aristoteles, qui quidem hæc prope cuncta scienter et conquisite scripta nobis reliquit addiscenda. Cujus ego ad nomen jam subito permoveri sentio vos, academici, atque in hanc sententiam duci pedetentim, et quasi eo invitante proclivius ferri. Quod si ita sit, sane ejus rei laudem, cujusquemodi est, illi debebitis et gratiam: quod interim ad me attinet, ego certe satis habeo, si veniam prolixitatis meæ pro vestra humanitate impetravero. Dixi.

IN COLLEGIO, &c.

THESIS.

In rei cujuslibet interitu non datur resolutio ad materiam primam.

Error an è Pandoræ pixide, an ex penitissimo eruperit Styge, an denique unus ex Terræ filiis in cœlites conjuraverit, non est hujus loci accuratius disquirere. Hoc autem vel non scrutanti facile innotescat, eum ex infimis incrementis, veluti olim Typhon, aut Neptuno genitus Ephialtes in tam portentosam crevisse magnitudinem, ut ipsi quidem veritati ab illo metuam. Video enim cum ipsa diva ἀλήθεια haud raro æquo marte pugnantem, video post damna factum ditiorem, post vulnera virescentem, victumque victoribus exultantem. Quod de Antæo Lybico fabulata est antiquitas. Adeo ut hinc sane non levi de causa carmen istud Ovidianum possit quispiam in dubium vocare, an scilicet ultima cœlestum terras reliquerit Astræa; vereor etenim ne pax et veritas multis post eam sæculis invisos etiam mortales deseruerint. Nam certe si illa adhuc in terris diversaretur, quis inducatur ut credat, luscum et cæcutientem errorem veritatem solis æmulam posse intueri, quin plane vincatur oculorum acies, quin et ipse rursus abigatur ad inferos, unde primum emersus est? At vero citra dubium aufugit in cœlum, patriam suam misellis hominibus nunquam reditura; et jam totis in scholis dominatur immundus error, et quasi rerum potitus est, non in strenuos utique et non paucos nactus assertores. Quarum accessione virium, ultra quam ferri potest inflatus, quænam est ulla physiologiæ particula vel minutula, in quam non impetiverit, quam non profanis violaverit unguibus, quemadmodum harpias Phinei regis Arcadum mensas conspurcasse accepimus? unde sane eò res deducta est, ut lautissima philosophiæ cupedia, ipsis quibus superi vescuntur dapibus non minus opipara, nunc suis conviviis nauseam faciant. Contingit enim sæpenumero ingentia philosophorum volumina evolventi, et diurnis nocturnisque manibus obterenti, ut dimittatur incertior quam fuerit pridem. Quicquid enim affirmat hic, et satis valido se putat statuminare argumento, refellit alter nullo negotio aut saltem refellere videtur, atque ita pene in infinitum semper habet hic quod opponat, semper ille quod respondeat; dum miser interim lector hinc atque inde tanquam inter duas belluas diu divulsus ac discerptus, tedioque prope enectus, tandem veluti in bivio relinquitur, huc an illuc inclinet plane anceps animi: ab utro autem stet veritas, fortasse (ne vera dissimulem) non est operæ pretium ea, qua expedit, industria explorare: quippe sæpius de re perquam minimi momenti maxima inter centurias philosophantium agitatur controversia. Cæterùm videor mihi inaudire submussitantes quosdam, quo nunc se proripit ille? dum in errorem invehitur, ipse toto errat cœlo: equidem agnosco erratum; neque hoc fecissem, nisi de vestro candore magna mihi pollicitus. Jam igitur tandem accingamur ad institutum opus: et his tantis difficultatibus dea Lua (quod ait Lipsius) me fœliciter expediat. Quæstio quæ nobis hodie proponitur enucleanda hæc est, an interitu cujuslibet rei detur resolutio usque ad materiam primam? Quod aliis verbis sic proferre solent, an ulla accidentia quæ fuere in corrupto maneant etiam in genito? hoc est, an intereunte forma omnia intereant accidentia quæ in composito præextiterant? Magna quidem est inter multos haudquaquam obscuri nominis philosophos hac de re sententiarum discrepantia; hi dari ejusmodi resolutionem contendunt acerrimè, illi neutiquam dare posse mordicus defendunt; hos ut sequar inclinat animus, ab illis ut longe lateque dissentiam tum ratione adductus, uti opinor, tum etiam tantorum virorum authoritate: hoc autem quo pacto probari queat, reliquum est ut paulisper experiamur; idque succincte quoad poterimus, atque primo hunc in modum. Si fiat resolutio ad materiam primam subinfertur inde essentiale istud effatum, nempe eam nunquam reperiri nudam, materiæ primæ perperam attribui; occurrent adversarii, hoc dicitur respectu formæ, verum sic habento scioli isti formas substantiales nullibi gentium reperiri citra formas accidentarias: sed hoc leve, nec causæ admodum jugulum petit; firmiora his adhibenda sunt. Atque imprimis videamus ecquos habeamus veterum philosophorum nostrarum partium fautores; inquirentibus ecce ultro se nobis offert Aristoteles, cumque lectissima manu suorum interpretum se nobis agglomerat; quippe velim intelligatis auditores, ipso duce et hortatore Aristotele initum hoc prælium, et bonis avibus, uti spero, auspicatum. Qui quidem id ipsum quod nos arbitramur, innuere videtur, Metaph. 7, Text. 8, ubi ait quantitatem primò inesse materiæ; huic perinde sententiæ quicunque refragabitur, possum illi dicam hæreseως ex lege omnium sapientium audacter scribere. Quinimo alibi plane vult quantitatem materiæ primæ proprietatem, quod idem asserunt plerique ejus sectatores; proprium autem à suo subjecto avellentem quis ferat ipsa vel editiții judicis sententia: verum age, cominus agamus, et quod suadeat ratio perpendamus. Assertio itaque probatur primo hinc, quod materia habet propriam entitatem actualem ex sua propria existentia, ergo potest sustentare quantitatem, eam saltem quæ dicitur interminata. Quid? quod nonnulli confidenter affirment formam non nisi mediante quantitate in materiam recipi, secundo, si accidens corrumpitur, necesse habet ut his tantum modis corrumpatur, vel per introductionem contrarii, vel per disitionem termini, vel per absentiam alterius causæ conservantis, vel denique ex defectu proprii subjecti cui inhæreat: priori modo nequit corrumpi quantitas, posteaquam contrariam non habeat; et quantumvis habeat qualitas hic tamen introduci non est supponendum: secundus modus huc non spectat, utpote qui sit relatorum proprius; nec per absentiam causæ conservantis, ea enim, quam assignant adversarii, est forma; accidentia autem à forma pendere concipiuntur bifariam, vel in genere causæ formalis, aut efficientis; prior dependentia non est immediata, forma enim substantialis non informat accidentia, neque intelligi potest quod aliud munus exerceat circa ea in hoc genere causa, ideoque tantummodo mediata est, nimirum in quantum materia dependet à forma, et hæc deinceps à materia; modus dependentiæ posterior est in genere causæ efficientis, à forma tamen an accidentia pendeant in hoc genere necne, in ambiguo res est: sed ut donemus ita esse, non sequitur tamen, depereunte forma juxta etiam perire accidentia, propterea quod causæ illi recedenti, succedit è vestigio alia similis omnino sufficiens ad conservandum eundem numero effectum absque interruptione: postremo, quod non ex defectu proprii subjecti in nihilum recidit quantitas aliaque id genus accidentia, probatur quia subjectum quantitatis est aut compositum, aut forma, aut materia; quod compositum non sit, ex eo liquet, quod accidens quod est in composito attingit simul sua unione et materiam et formam per modum unius, at vero quantitas non potest ullo modo attingere animam rationalem, dum hæc spiritualis sit, et effectus formalis quantitatis, hoc est extensionis quantitativæ minime capax; porro quod forma non sit subjectum ejus, ex supradictis satis est perspicuum: restat igitur ut materia sola sit subjectum quantitatis, atque ita præciditur omnis interitus illatio in quantitate. Quod pertinet ab id quod vulgo affertur de cicatrice, argumentum efficacissimum esse censeo: quis enim mihi fidem adeo extorqueat, ut credam eam in cadavere plane diversam esse ab ea quæ fuit nuperrime in vivo, cum nulla subsit ratio, nulla necessitas corrigendi sensus nostri, qui raro quidem hallucinatur circa proprium objectum; citiusque ego et facilius audirem de larvis, deque empusis miri commemorantem, quam cerebrosos hosce philosophrastos de accidentibus suis de novo procreatis stulte et insubide obgannientes. Etenim calorem, cæterasque animalis qualitates intensibiles et remissibiles easdem prorsus pernovimus in ipso mortis articulo, et post mortem itidem; quorsum enim destruerentur hæ, cum aliæ similes sunt producendæ? huc accedit, quod si de novo procrearentur, ad tempus non adeo exiguum durarent, neque etiam repente ad summum pervenirent intensionis gradum, sed paulatim et quasi pedetentim. Adde quod vetustissimum sit axioma, quantitatem sequi materiam, et qualitatem formam. Potui quidem, immo ac debui huic rei diutius immorari, ac profecto nescio an vobis, mihimet certe ipse maximopere sum tædio. Superest ut jam ad adversariorum argumenta descendamus, quæ faxint musæ, ut ego in materiam primam si fieri potest, vel potius in nihilum redigam. Quod ad primum attinet, Aristotelis testimonium, quod dixerit in generatione non manere subjectum sensibile, occurrimus illud intelligi debere de subjecto completo et integro (i. e.) de substantiali composito, quod testatur Philoponus antiquus et eruditus scriptor. 2. Quod inquit Arist. materia est nec quid, nec quantum, nec quale; hoc non dicitur quod nulla quantitate aut qualitate efficiatur, sed quia ex se, et in entitate sua nullam aut quantitatem aut qualitatem includat. Tertio, ait Arist. destructis primis substantiis destrui omnia accidentia, quod sane futurum non inficiamur si ipsi corruptæ subinde succederet alia. Postremo, formam inquit recipi in materiam nudam; hoc est, nuditate formæ substantialis. Adhuc incrudescit pugna, et nutat victoria, sic enim instaurato prælio incursant, materia quandóquidem sit pura potentia, nullam habet esse præterquam illud quod emendicata forma, unde non satis ex se valet ad sustentanda accidentia, nisi prius ad minimum natura conjungatur formæ à qua τὸ εἶναι acceptum ferat; huic errori sic mederi solent, materiam primam suum habere proprium esse, quod licet in genere substantiæ sit incompletum, cum accidente tamen si conferatur esse simpliciter haud incommode dici potest. Quinetiam objiciunt materiam respicere formam substantialem ut actum primum, at accidentia ut actus secundarios. Respondeo, materiam respicere formam prius ordine intentionis, non generationis aut executionis. Gliscit jam atque effervescit contentio, et tanquam ad internecionem dimicaturi urgent nos acrius hunc ad modum: omnis proprietas manat active ab essentia ejus cujus est proprietas; quantitas autem hoc nequit, quia hæc dimanatio est aliqua efficientia, materia autem secundum se nullam habet efficientiam, cum sit mere passiva; ergo, &c. Respondeo, duobus modis posse intelligi naturalem conjunctionem materiæ cum quantitate, ratione solum potentiæ passivæ intrinsecus natura sua postulantis talem affectionem; neque enim ulla impellit necessitas, ut omnis innata proprietas sit debita subjecto ratione principii activi; namque interdum sufficit passivum, quo modo multi opinantur motum esse naturalem cœlo. Secundo potest et intelligi per intrinsecam dimanationem activam, cum in se habeat veram et actualem essentiam. Sed nec adhuc omnis amissa spes victoriæ; iterum enim facto impetu adoriuntur, inferentes deo formam media quantitate in materiam recipi, quoniam inest materiæ prius: nos è contra aperte reclamamus huic sequelæ, et nihilominus quo omnia possimus salva reddere, hac utimur distinctione, recipi formam in materiam media quantitate ut dispositione, seu conditione necessaria, verum nullo modo tanquam potentia proxime receptiva formæ. Ultimò, sic arguunt, si quantitas insit materiæ soli sequitur esse ingenerabilem et incorruptibilem; quod videtur repugnare, quia motus per se fit ad quantitatem. At nos utique largimur consequentiam, quippe revera quantitas est incorruptibilis quoad suam entitatem, licet quoad varios terminos possit incipere et desinere esse per conjunctionem et divisionem quantitatis, neque enim est per se motus ad quantitatis productionem, sed ad accretionem; et nec eo fit quasi nova quantitas incipiat esse in rerum natura, sed eo quod una quantitas adjungatur alteri, et quæ erat aliena fit propria. Possem equidem plura argumenta ultra citroque proferre, quæ tamen tædii levandi gratia prætermitto; hic igitur satius erit receptui canere.

IN SCHOLIS PUBLICIS.

Non dantur formæ partiales in animali præter totalem.

Romani rerum olim domini altissimum imperii fastigium adepti sunt, quale nec Assyria magnitudo, nec virtus Macedonica, unquam potuit attingere, quò nec futura regum majestas efferre se olim valebit: sive ipse Jupiter annis jam gravior, cœloque contentus suo in otium se tradere voluerit, commissis populo Romano tanquam diis terrestribus rerum humanarum habenis; sive hoc Saturno patri in Italiam detruso ad amissi cœli solatium concesserit, ut Quirites, ejus nepotes, quicquid uspiam est, terræ, marisque potirentur. Utcunque certe non ultro largitus est hoc illis beneficium, sed per assidua bella, perque longos labores ægre dedit, exploraturus opinor, an Romani soli digni viderentur, qui summi vices Jovis inter mortales gererent; itaque parce duriterque vitam degere coacti sunt, quippe inchoatas pacis blanditias abrupit semper belli clamor, et circumcirca strepitus armorum. Ad hæc, devictis quibusque urbibus et provinciis præsidia imponere et sæpius renovare necesse habuere, omnemque pene juventutem nunc in longinquam militiam, nunc in colonias mittere. Cæterùm non incruentam semper victoriam domum reportarunt, immo sæpe funestis cladibus affecti sunt. Siquidem Brennus Gallorum dux virescentem modo Romanam gloriam pene delevit; et parum abfuit, quo minus divinitus creditum orbis moderamen abripuerit Romæ Carthago urbs nobilissima. Denique Gothi et Vandalici sub Arico rege, Hunnique et Panonii Attyla et Bleda ducibus totam inundantes Italiam, florentissimas imperii opes, ex tot bellorum spoliis aggestas, miserè diripuere, Romanos paulo ante reges hominum turpi fuga stravere, ipsamque urbem, ipsam inquam Romam, solo nominis terrore ceperunt; quo facto nihil dici aut fingi potuit gloriosius, plane quasi ipsam victoriam aut amore captant, aut vi et armis exterrefactum in suas traxissent partes. Satis admirati estis auditores, quorsum hæc omnia protulerim, jam accipite. Hæc ego quoties apud me recolo animoque colligo, toties cogito quantis viribus de tuenda veritate certatum sit, quantis omnium studiis, quantis vigiliis contenditur labantem ubique, et profligatam veritatem ab injuriis hostium asserere. Nec tamen prohiberi potest, quin fœdissima colluvies errorum invadat indies omnes disciplinas, quæ quidem tanta vi aut veneno pollet, ut vel niveæ veritati suam imaginem inducere valeat, aut sideream veritatis speciem nescio quo fuco sibi adsciscere, qua, ut videtur, arte et magnis philosophis frequenter imposuit, et honores, venerationemque uni veritati debitam sibi arrogavit. Quod in hodierna quæstione videre poteritis, quæ quidem non instrenuos nacta est pugiles, eosque clari nominis, si relictis hisce partibus veritatem demereri mallent: itaque nostræ nunc erit operæ, ut nudatum, plumisque emendicatis exutum errorem deformitati nativæ reddamus; quod ut expeditius fiat gravissimorum vestigiis authorum insistendum esse mihi existimo, neque enim expectandum est, ut ego quicquam de meo adjiciam, quod utique tot viros ingenio præstabiles fugit et præteriit; idcirco quod sufficit ad rem dilucidandam expromam brevi, argumentoque uno atque altero tanquam aggere vallabo; tum si quid reclamat, atque obstat nostræ sententiæ diluam, ut potero; quæ tamen omnia paucis perstringam, et quasi extremis alis radam. Contra unitatem formæ, quam in una eademque materia statuere semper emunctiores philosophi solent, varias opiniones subortas esse legimus; quidam enim plures in animali formas totales dari pertinaciter contendunt, idque pro suo quisque captu varie defendunt; alii totalem unicam, partiales vero multiplices ejusdem materiæ hospitio excipi importunius asseverant. Cum illis ad tempus more bellico paciscemur inducias, dum in hos omnem prælii vim atque impetum transferimus. Ponatur prima in acie Aristoteles, qui noster plane est, quique sub finem primi libri de anima, non occulte favet nostræ assertioni. Huic authoritati aliquot attexere argumenta non est longæ disquisitionis opus: præbet se mihi imprimis Chrysostomus Javellus, cujus è stercorario, nimirum horridulo et incompto stylo, aurum et margaritas effodere possimus, quæ si quis delicatus aspernetur, in illum sane aliquatenus belle quadrabit ille Æsopici Galli apologus. In hunc ferme modum argumentatur; distinctio illa et organizatio partium dissimilarium præcedere debet introductionem animæ, utpote quæ sit actus corporis non cujuslibet, sed physici organici; quapropter immediate ante productionem totalis formæ necesse est corrumpi partiales illas nisi corruat penitus receptissimum illud axioma, generatio unus est alterius corruptio; quarum productionem non sequitur similium præsentanea productio; id enim frustra foret, et ad naturæ matris sapientiam parum conveniens. Deinde posteaquam omnis forma, sive perfecta sit, sive imperfecta, tribuat esse specificum, necesse est, ut quamdiu manet ista forma, tamdiu res illa maneat eadem, non variata secundum substantiam suam, proindeque superveniet forma totalis tanquam accidens, non per generationem sed per alterationem. Sequitur porro animam totalem sive divisibilem, sive indivisibilem, non sufficere ad omnes partes animantis plene perfecteque informandas, quod ut largiamur nulla suadet ratio. Sequitur itidem unam formam substantialem esse quasi dispositionem proximam et permanentem ad aliam, quod veritatis absonum est, quandoquidem unaquæque forma constituit essentiam completam in genere substantiæ. Postremo, si in omnibus partibus puta hominis plurificientur formæ partiales, ex illis certe consurget una integra distincta ab anima rationali, unde illa erit, aut forma inanimati seu corporeitatis, aut mistionis (quam præter animam in homine dari sane ultra quam credibile est) vel erit anima sensitiva, aut vegetativa, hoc autem affirmantem nullo modo audiat eruditior chorus philosophantium; cujus rei ampliori probatione supersedeo, quoniam in confesso est, nec admodum accedit ad apicem causæ. Verum, quod caput est controversiæ, objiciunt adversarii, partem ab animali amputatam remanere actu post separationem, non per formam totius cum sit extra totum, nec per formam recens acquisitam, cum nullum adsit agens, nulla perceptibilis actio, nulla prævia alteratio; ergo, actu existit per formam propriam quam prius habebat, dum erat una in toto. Atque hoc argumento arietare se putant causam nostram et funditus evertere: cæterum non minus vere quam vulgariter solet responderi, formam de novo genitam, cum vilissima sit utpote cadaveris, et quasi via ad resolutionem, certe nec multum temporis, nec dispositiones multas, nec ordinatam alterationem efflagitare. Quid si etiam causa aliqua universalis concurrat cum proximo temperamento ad inducendam qualemcunque formam ne materia reperiatur vacua? Quod autem multiplices visantur in animali operationes, id non à formis distinctis partialibus petendum est, sed ab animæ totalis eminentia, quæ quidem æquipollet formis specie distinctis. Cæteras quæ occurrunt, levioris momenti objectiones ex composito prætcrire libet, neque enim jugulant; faciliusque amoveri, et luculentius redargui poterunt, si forte inter disputandum prolatæ fuerint in medium. Quocunque res redeat tametsi ego causa cadam, causa non cadet; satis enim superque suo marte valet ad se defendendam invicta semper veritas; nec ad id alienis indiget adminiculis; et licet nobis aliquando superari, et pessum premi videatur, inviolatam tamen perpetuò servat se, et intactam ab erroris unguibus; in hoc soli non absimilis, qui sæpe involutum se, et quasi inquinatum nubibus ostendit humanis oculis, cum tamen collectis in se radiis, totoque ad se revocato splendore purissimus ab omni labe colluceat.

IN FERIIS ÆSTIVIS COLLEGII, SED CONCURRENTE, UT SOLET, TOTA FERE ACADEMIÆ JUVENTUTE.

Cum ex ea urbe quæ caput urbium est, huc nuper me reciperem, academici, deliciarum omnium, quibus is locus supra modum affluit, usque ad saginam, prope dixerim, satur, sperabam mihi iterum aliquando otium illud literarium, quo ego vitæ genere etiam cœlestes animas gaudere opinor; eratque penitus in animo jam tandem abdere me in literas, et jucundissimæ philosophiæ perdius et pernox assidere; ita semper assolet laboris et voluptatis vicissitudo amovere satietatis tædium, et efficere, ut intermissa repetantur alacrius. Cum his me incalentem studiis repente avocavit, atque abstraxit pervetusti moris fere annua celebritas, jussusque ego sum eam operam quam acquirendæ sapientiæ primò destinaram, ad nugas transferre, et novas ineptias excogitandas: quasi jam nunc non essent omnia stultorum plena, quasi egregia illa, et non minus Argo decantata navis stultifera fecisset naufragium, plane denique ac si ipsi Democrito materia jam ridendi deesset. Verum date quæso veniam, auditores; hic enim hodiernus mos, utut ego liberius paulo sum locutus, sane quidem non est ineptus, sed impense potius laudabilis, quod quidem ego jam mihi proposui statim luculentius patefacere. Quod si Junius Brutus secundus ille rei Romanæ conditor, magnus ille ultor regiæ libidinis, animum prope diis immortalibus parem, et mirificam indolem simulatione vecordiæ supprimere sustinuit; certe nihil est, cur me pudeat aliquantisper μωροσοφῶς nugari, ejus præsertim jussu, cujus interest, tanquam ædilis hos quasi solennes ludos curare. Tum nec mediocriter me pellexit, et invitavit ad has partes subeundas vestra, vos qui ejusdem estis mecum collegii, in me nuperrime comperta facilitas, cum enim ante præteritos menses aliquam multos oratorio apud vos munere perfuncturus essem, putaremque lucubrationes meas qualescunque etiam ingratas propemodum futuras, et mitiores habituras judices Æacum et Minoa, quam è vobis fere quemlibet, sane præter opinionem meam, præter meam si quid erat speculæ, non vulgari secuti ego accepi, imo ipse sensi, omnium plausu exceptæ sunt, immo eorum, qui in me alias propter studiorum dissidia essent prorsus infenso et inimico animo: generosum utique simultatis exercendæ genus, et regio pectore non indignum; siquidem cum ipsa amicitia plerumque multa inculpate facta detorquere soleat, tunc profecto acris et infesta inimicitia errata forsitan multa, et haud pauca sine dubio indiserte dicta, leniter et clementius quam meum erat meritum interpretari non gravabatur. Jam semel unico hoc exemplo vel ipsa demens ira mentis compos fuisse videbatur, et hoc facto furoris infamiam abluisse. At vero summopere oblector, et mirum in modum voluptate perfundor, cum videam tanta doctissimorum hominum frequentia circumfusum me, et undique stipatum: et rursus tamen cum in me descendo, et quasi flexis introrsum oculis meam tenuitatem secretus intueor, equidem sæpius mihimet soli conscius erubesco et repentina quædam ingruens mœstitia subsilientem deprimit et jugulat lætitiam. Sed nolite, academici, sic me jacentem et consternatum, et acie oculorum vestrorum tanquam de cœlo tactum, nolite quæso sic deserere; erigat me semianimum, quod potest, et refocillet vestri favoris aura, ita fiet, ut, vobis authoribus, non admodum grave sit hoc malum; at remedium mali vobis exhibentibus, eo jucundius et acceptius; adeo ut mihi fuerit perquam gratum sic sæpius examinari, modo liceat à vobis recreari me toties et refici. At ô interim singularem in vobis vim, atque eximiam virtutem, quæ tanquam hasta illa Achillea, Vulcani munus, vulnerat et medicatur! Cæterum nec miretur quispiam, si ego tot eruditione insignes viros, totumque pene academiæ florem huc confluxisse, tanquam inter astra positus triumphem; vix etenim opinor plures olim Athenas adventasse ad audiendum duos oratores summos Demosthenem et Æschinem de principatu eloquentiæ certantes, nec eam unquam fœlicitatem contigisse peroranti Hortensio, nec tot tam egregie literatos viros condecorasse orantem Ciceronem; adeo ut quamvis ego hoc opus minus fœliciter absolvero, erit tamen mihi honori non aspernando in tanto concursu conventuque præstantissimorum hominum vel verba fecisse. Atque hercle non possum ego nunc, quin mihi blandiuscule plaudam, qui vel Orpheo, vel Amphione multo sim meo judicio fortunatior: hi enim chordulis suavi concentu adsonantibus digitos tantum docte et perite admovebant; eratque in ipsis fidibus, et in apto dextroque manuum motu æqualis utrinque pars dulcedinis: atqui ego si quid hodie laudis hinc reportavero, ea sane et tota erit et vere mea, tantoque nobilior, quanto ingenii opus vincit ac præstat manuum artificium. Deinde hi saxa, et feras, sylvasque ad se trahebant, et si quos homines, rudes illos et agrestes: at ego doctissimas mihi deditas aures, et ab ore meo pendentes video. Novissime agrestes illi, et feræ jam satis notam et complures exauditam sequebantur nervorum harmoniam; vos vero huc rapuit, et jam detinet sola expectatio. Sed tamen academici, hic vos imprimis commonefactos volo, me non hæc gloriosus crepuisse; utinam enim mihi vel in præsentia concederetur melleum illud, seu verius nectareum eloquentiæ flumen quicquid unquam Attica vel Romana ingenia imbuebat olim, et quasi cœlitus irrorabat, utinam mihi liceret omnem penitus Suadæ medullam exugere, et ipsius etiam Mercurii scrinia fuffurari, omnesque elegantiarum loculos funditus exinanire, quo possim aliquid tanta expectatione, tam præclaro cœtu, tam denique tersis et delicatis auribus dignum adferre. Ecce, auditores, quo me raptat et impellit vehementissimus ardor et prolubium placendi vobis, quippe de improviso me provectum sentio in ambitionem quandam, sed eam sane piam, et honestum, si hoc fieri potest, sacrilegium. Et certe existimo haudquaquam mihi opus esse Musarum auxilium implorare et exposcere, iis enim me circumseptum puto, qui Musas omnes spirant et Gratias, totumque reor Helicona, et quæcunque sunt alia Musarum delubra ad hunc diem celebrandum omnes suos effudisse alumnos; adeo ut credibile sit jam nunc propter eorum absentiam lugere et deflorescere Parnassi lauros; unde profecto frustra erit Musas, et Charites, et Libentias usquam terrarum quæritare, quam in hoc loco; quod si ita sit, necesse est protinus ipsam barbariem, errorem, ignorantiam, et omne illud musis invisum genus quam celerrimè aufugere ad aspectum vestrum, et sub diverso longe cœlo abscondere sese; atque deinde quidem quid obstat, quo minus quicquid est barbaræ, incultæ, et obsoletæ locutionis abigatur exemplò ab oratione mea, atque ego afflatu vestro, et arcano distinctu disertus et politus subito evadam. Utcunque tamen vos, auditores, obtestor, ne quem vestrum pœniteat meis paulisper vacasse nugis; ipsi enim dii omnes, cœlestis politiæ cura ad tempus deposita, depugnantium homunculorum spectaculo sæpius interfuisse perhibentur; aliquoties etiam humiles non dedignati casus, et paupere hospitio excepti, fabas et olera narrantur esitasse. Obsecro itidem ego vos, atque oro, auditores optimi, ut hoc meum quale conviviolum ad subtile vestrum et sagax palatum faciat. Verum etiamsi ego permultos noverim sciolos quibus usitatissimum est, si quid ignorarunt, id superbe et inscite apud alios contemnere, tanquam indignum cui operam impendant suam: quemadmodum hic dialecticam insulse vellicat, quam nunquam assequi potuerit; ille philosophiam nihili facit, quia scilicet formosissima dearum natura nunquam illum tali dignata est honore, ut se nudam illi præbuerit intuendam: ego tamen festivitates et sales, in quibus quoque perexiguam agnosco facultatem meam, non gravabor, ut potero, laudare; si prius hoc unum addidero, quod sane arduum videtur, et minime proclive, me jocos hodie seriò laudaturum. Atque id non immeritò quidem, quid enim est quod citius conciliet, diutiusque retineat amicitias, quam amœnum et festivum ingenium? et profecto cui desunt sales, et lepores, et politulæ facetiæ, haud temere invenietis cui sit gratus et acceptus. Nobis autem, academici, si quotidiani moris esset indormire et quasi immori philosophiæ, et inter dumos et spinas logicæ consenescere citra ullam enim relaxationem, et nunquam concesso respirandi loco, quid, quæso, aliud esset philosophari, quam in Trophonii antro vaticinari, et Catonis plus nimio rigidi sectam sectari; immo dicerent vel ipsi rusticani, sinapi nos victitare. Adde quod, quemadmodum qui luctæ et campestri ludo assuescunt se, multo cæteris valentiores redduntur, et ad omne opus paratiores; ita pariter usu venit, ut per hanc ingenii palæstram corroboretur nervus animi, et quasi melior sanguis et succus comparetur, utque ipsa indoles limatior fiat acutiorque, et ad omnia sequax et versatilis. Quod si quis urbanus et lepidus haberi nolit, ne sis hoc illi stomacho si paganus et subrusticus appelletur; et probe novimus illiberale quoddam genus hominum, qui cum ipsi prorsus insulsi sint et infestivi, suam tacite secum æstimantes vilitatem et inscitiam, quicquid forte urbanius dictitatum audiunt, id statim in se dici putant; digni sane quibus id vere eveniat, quod injuria suspicantur, ut scilicet omnium dicteriis everberantur, pene usquedum suspendium cogitent. Sed non valent istæ hominum quisquiliæ urbanitatis elegantulæ licentiam inhibere. Vultis itaque me auditores, rationis fundamento fidem exemplorum superstruere? ea utique mihi abunde suppetunt, primus omnium occurrit Homerus ille oriens, et Lucifer cultioris literaturæ, cum quo omnis eruditio tanquam gemella nata est; ille enim interdum à deorum consiliis et rebus in cœlo gestis divinum revocans animum, et ad facetias divertens, murium et ranarum pugnam lepidissime descripsit. Quinetiam Socrates, teste Pythio, sapientissimus ille mortalium, jurgiosam uxoris morositatem sæpenumero quam urbane perstrinxisse fertur. Omnia deinde veterum philosophorum diverbia sale sparsa, et lepore venusto passim legimus referta: et certe hoc unum erat quod antiquos omnes comœdiarum et epigrammatum scriptores, et Græcanicos et Latinos, æternitate nominis donavit. Quinimo accepimus, Ciceronis jocos et facetias tres libros à Tyrone conscriptos implevisse. Et cuique jam in manibus est ingeniosissimum illud Moriæ encomium non infimi scriptoris opus, multæque aliæ clarissimorum hujus memoriæ oratorum de rebus ridiculis extant haud infacetæ prolusiones. Vultis summos imperatores, et reges, et fortes viros? Accipite Periclem, Epaminondam, Agesilaum, et Philippum Macedonem, quos (ut Gelliano more loquar) festivitatum et salse dictorum scatuisse memorant historici: ad hos Caium Lælium, Pub. Cor. Scipionem, Cneium Pompeium, C. Julium et Octavium Cæsares, quos in hoc genere omnibus præstitisse coætaneis author est M. Tullius. Vultis adhuc majora nomina? ipsum etiam Jovem reliquosque Cœlites inter epulas et pocula jucunditati se dantes inducunt poetæ sagacissimi veritates adumbratores. Vestra demum, academici, utar tutela et patrocinio, quod mihi erit omnium ad instar; quippe quam non displiceant vobis sales et joculi; indicat satis tantus hodie vestrum factus concursus, et hoc sane unumquodque caput mihi annuere videtur; nec mirum est mehercle festam hanc ut mundulam urbanitatem omnes probos, simulque claros viros sic oblectare, cum et ipsa inter splendidos virtutum Aristotelicarum ordines sublimis sedeat, et velut in Panthæo quodam diva cum divis sororibus colluceat. Sed forte non desunt quidêm barbati magistri tetrici oppido et difficiles, qui se magnos Catones, nedum Catunculos putantes, vultu ad severitatem stoicam composito, obstipo nutantes capite anxie querantur omnia nunc dierum commisceri, et in deterius perverti et loco priorum Aristotelis ab initiatis recens baccalaureis exponendorum, scommata et inanes nugas inverecunde et intempestive jactari; hodiernum quoque exercitium à majoribus nostris sine dubio recte et fideliter institutum ob insignem aliquem, sive in rhetorica, sive in philosophia fructum inde percipiendum, nunc nuper in insipidos sales perperam immutari. At vero his quod respondeatur ad manum mihi est, et in procinctu; sciant enim illi, si nesciant, literas, cum leges reipub. nostræ literariæ primum essent latæ, ab exteris regionibus vix has in oras fuisse advectas: idcirco cum Græcæ et Latinæ linguæ peritia impendio rara esset et insolens, expediebat eò acriori studio, et magis assiduis exercitationibus ad eas eniti et aspirare: nos autem quandoquidem superioribus nostris pejus sumus morati, melius eruditi, oportebit relictis quæ haud multam habent difficultatem ad ea studia accedere, ad quæ et illi contulissent se, si per otium licuisset; nec vos præteriit primos quosque legumlatores duriora paulo scita, et severiora quam ut ferri possint semper edere solere, ut deflectentes et paululum relapsi homines in ipsum rectum incidant. Denique mutata nunc omnino rerum facie, necesse est multas leges, multasque consuetudines si non antiquari et obsolescere coangustari saltem nec per omnia servari. Verum si leves istiusmodi nugæ palam defensitatæ fuerint et approbatæ, publicamque demeruerint laudem, (sic enim arduis superciliis solent dicere,) nemo non averso ab sana et solida eruditione animo eum ad ludicra statim et histrionalem prope levitatem adjunget, adeo ut ipsa philosophorum spatia pro doctis et cordatis nugatores emissura sint vel mimis et scurris proterviores. At vero ego existimo eum qui jocis insubidis sic solet capi, ut præ iis seria et magis utilia plane negligat, eum inquam, nec in hac parte, nec in illa posse admodum proficere: non quidem in seriis, quia si fuisset ad res serias tractandas natura comparatus, factusque, credo non tam facile pateretur se ab iis abduci; nec in nugatoriis, quia vix queat ullus belle et lepide jocari, nisi et serio agere prius addidicerit. Sed vereor, academici, ne longius æquo deduxerim orationis filum; nolo excusare quod potui, ne inter excusandum ingravescat culpa. Jam oratoriis soluti legibus prosiliemus in comicam licentiam. In qua si forte morem meum, si rigidas verecundiæ leges transversum, quod aiunt, digitum egressus fuero, sciatis academici, me in vestram gratiam exuisse antiquum meum, et parumper deposuisse: aut si quid solute, si quid luxurianter dictum erit, id quidem non mentem et indolem meam, sed temporis rationem et loci genium mihi suggessisse putetis. Itaque, quod simile solent exeuntes implorare comœdi, id ego inceptans flagito. Plaudite, et ridete.

Laboranti, ut videtur, et pene corruenti stultorum rei summæ, equidem nescio quo merito meo dictator sum creatus. At quorsum ego? cum dux ille, et antesignatus omnium sophistarum et sedulò ambiverit hoc munus, et fortissime potuerit administrare; ille enim induratus miles ad quinquaginta pridem sophistas sudibus breviculis armatos per agros Barwellianos strenue duxit, et obsessurus oppidum satis militariter aquæductum disjecit, ut per sitim posset oppidanos ad deditionem cogere; at vero abiisse nuper hominem valde doleo, siquidem ejus discessu nos omnes sophistas non solum ἀκεφάλως reliquit, sed et decollatos. Et jam fingite, auditores, quamvis non sint Aprilis calendæ, festa adesse hilaria, matri deum dicata, vel deo risui rem divinam fieri. Ridete itaque et petulanti plene sustollite cachinnum, exporrigite frontem, et uncis indulgete naribus, sed naso adunco ne suspendite; profusissimo risu circumsonent omnia, et solutior cachinnus hilares excutiat lachrymas, ut iis risu exhaustis ne guttulam quidem habeat dolor qua triumphum exornet suum. Ego profecto si quem nimis parce diducto rictu ridentem conspexero, dicam eum scabros et cariosos dentes rubigine obductos, aut indecoro ordine prominentes abscondere, aut inter prandendum hodie sic opplevisse abdomen, ut non audeat ilia ulterius distendere ad risum, ne præcinenti ori succinat, et ænigmata quædam nolens affutiat sua non sphinx sed sphincter anus, quæ medicis interpretanda non Oedipo relinquo; nolim enim hilari vocis sono obstrepat in hoc cœtu posticus gemitus: solvant ista medici qui alvum solvunt. Si quis strenuum et clarum non ediderit murmur, cum ego asseverabo tam gravem et mortiferum faucibus exhalare spiritum, ut vel Ætna, vel Avernus nihil spiret tetrius; aut certe allium aut porrum comedisse dudum, adeo ut non audeat aperire os, ne vicinos quosque fœtido halitu enecet. At vero absit porro ab hoc cœtu horrendus et tartareus ille sibili sonus, nam si hic audiatur hodie, credam ego Furias et Eumenides inter vos occulte latitare, et angues suos colubrosque pectoribus vestris immisisse, et proinde Athamanteos furores vobis inspiravisse. At enimvero, academici, vestram ego in me benevolentiam demiror atque exosculor, qui me audituri per flammas et ignes irrupistis in hunc locum. Hinc enim in ipso limine scintillans ille noster Cerberus astat, et fumido latratu horribilis, flammeoque coruscans baculo favillas pleno ore egerit; illinc ardens et voracissimus fornax noster luridos eructat ignes, et tortuosos fumi globos evolvit, adeo ut non sit difficilius iter ad inferos vel invito Plutone; et certe nec ipse Jason minori cum periculo boves illos Martis πυριπνέοντας aggressus est. Jamque auditores, credite vos in cœlum receptos, posteaquam evasistis Purgatorium, et nescio quo novo miraculo ex fornace calida salvi prodiistis, neque sane mihi in mentem venit ullius herois cujus fortitudinem commode possim vestræ æquiparare, neque enim Bellerophontes ille ignivomam chimœram animosius debellavit, nec validissimi illi regis Arthuri pugiles, igniti et flammigerantis castelli incantamenta vicerunt facilius et dissiparunt; atque hinc subit, ut puros mihi auditores et lectissimos pollicear, si quid enim fæcis huc advenerit post explorationem camini, ego statim dixero ignes nostros janitores esse fatuos. At fœlices nos et incolumes perpetuo futuros! Romæ enim ad diuturnitatem imperii sempiternos ignes sollicite et religiose servabant, nos vigilibus et vivis ignibus custodimur: quid dixi vivis et vigilibus? id sane improviso lapsu prætervolavit, quippe nunc melius commemini, eos primo crepusculo extinguere sese, et non nisi claro sudo sese resuscitare. Attamen spes est, tandem iterum domum nostram posse inclarescere, cum nemo inficias iverit duo maxima academiæ luminaria nostro collegio præsidere; quamvis illi nusquam majori forent in honore quam Romæ; ibi enim vel virgines Vestales inextinctos eos, et insomnes totas noctes servarent, vel forte ordini seraphico initiarentur flammei fratres. In hos denique optime quadrat hemistichon illud Virgilianum, igneus est ollis vigor: immo pene inductus sum ut credam Horatium horum nostrorum ignium mentionem fecisse, major enim horum, dum stat inter conjugem et liberos, micat inter omnes velut inter ignes luna minores. Non possum autem prætcrire fædum Ovidii errorem, qui sic cecinit, "Nataque de flamma corpora nulla vides." Videmus enim passim oberrantes igniculos hoc nostro igne genitos, hoc si negaverit Ovidius, necessum habebit uxoris pudicitiam vocare in dubium. Ad vos redeo, auditores; ne vos pœniteat tam molesti et formidolosi itineris, ecce convivium vobis apparatum! eccas mensas ad luxum Persicum extructas, et cibis conquisitissimis onustas, qui vel Apicianam gulam oblectent et deliniant! Ferunt enim Antonio et Cleopatræ octo integros apros in epulis appositos, vobis autem primo forculo hem quinquaginta saginatos apros cervisia conditanea per triennium maceratos, et tamen adhuc adeo callosos, ut vel caninos dentes delassare valeant. Dein totidem optimos boves insigniter caudatos famulari nostro igni præ foribus recens assos; sed vereor ne omnem succum in patinam exudaverint. Ab his tot etiam en vitulina capita, sane crassa et carnosa, sed adeo pertenui cerebro, ut non sufficiat ad condimentum. Tum quidem et hœdos plus minus centum, sed puto crebriori Veneris usu nimium macros: arietes aliquot expectavimus speciosis et patulis cornubus, sed eos coqui nostri nondum secum attulerunt ex oppido. Si quis aves mavult, habemus innumeras, turundis, et offis, et scobinato caseo diu altiles: inprimis, nescio quod genus avium tam ingenio quam pluma viride, unde eas e regione psittacorum suspicor asportatas; quæ quia gregatim semper volitant, et eodem fere loco nidulantur, eodem etiam disco apponentur; iis vero parce velim vescamini, quia præterquam quod admodum crudi sint, et nihil in se habeant solidi nutrimenti, scabiem etiam comedentibus protrudunt (modo vera tradit comestor.) Jam vero libere et genialiter epulamini; hic enim præsto est missus quem vobis præ omnibus commendo, prægrandis scilicet gallinago, pertriennalem saginam adeo unguinosæ pinguedinis, ut illi vix satis largum sit unum ferculum amplissimum, rostro eosque prælongo et eduro, ut impune possit cum elephante aut rhinocerote certamen ingredi; eam autem in hunc diem commode obtruncavimus, propterea quod prægrandium simiorum more incepit puellis insidiari, et vim inferre mulieribus. Hunc subsequuntur aves quædam Hibernicæ, nescio quo nomine; sed incessu et corporis filo gruibus persimiles, quamvis utplurimum soleant in postremam mensam asservari; hic quidem est novus et rarus magis quam salutaris cibus: his itaque abstineatis moneo, sunt enim efficacissimi (modo vera tradit comestor) ad generandos pediculos inguinales; has igitur arbitror ego agasonibus utiliores futuras; nam cum sint naturæ vividæ, vegetæ, et saltaturientes, si equis strigosis per podicem ingerantur, reddent eos protinus vivaciores et velociores quam si decem vivas anguillas in ventre haberent. Anseres etiam complures aspicite, et hujus anni et superiorum argutos valde, et ranis Aristophanicis vocaliores; quos quidem facile dignoscetis; mirum enim est ni se jam prodiderint sibilando, statim fortasse audietis. Ova insuper aliquot habemus, sed ea κακοῦ κόρακος; frugum vero nihil prætcrquam mala et mespila, eaque infœlicis arboris, nec satis matura, præstabit itaque iterum ad solem suspendi. Videtis apparatus nostros, quæso vos, quibus palato sunt, commessamini. Verum hariolor dicturos vos, epulas hasce, veluti nocturnæ illæ dapes quæ à dæmone veneficis apparantur, nullo condiri sale, vereorque ne discedatis jejuniores quam venistis. Verum ad ea pergo quæ ad me propius attinent. Romani sua habuere floralia, rustici sua patilia, pistores sua fornacalia, nos quoque potissimum hoc tempore rerum et negotiorum vacui, Socratico more ludere solemus. Itaque hospitia leguleiorum suos habent, quos vocant dominos, vel hinc indicantes quam sint honoris ambitiosi. Nos autem, academici, ad paternitatem quamproxime accedere cupientes id ficto nomine usurpare gestimus, quod vero non audemus saltem nonnisi in occulto; quemadmodum puellæ nuptias lusorias et puerperia solenniter fingunt, earum rerum quas anhelant et cupiunt, umbras captantes et amplectentes. Quorsum autem eo, qui proxime se circumegit, anno intermissa fuerit hæc solennitas, ego sane haud possum divinare; nisi quod ii qui patres futuri erant, adeo strenue se gesserint in oppido, ut is cui id negotii dabatur, tantorum misertus laborum ultro jusserit eos ab hac cura otiosos esse. At vero unde est quod ego tam subito factus sum pater? Dii vestram fidem! Quid hoc est prodigii Pliniana exuperantis portenta? numnam ego percusso angue Tyresiæ fatum expertus sum? ecqua me Thessala saga magico perfudit unguento? an denique ego à deo aliquo vitiatus, ut olim Cnœeus, virilitatem pactus sum, stupri pretium, ut sic repente ἐκ θηλείας εἰς ἄῤῥενά ἀλλα χθείην ἄν? A quibusdam, audivi nuper domina. At cur videor illis parum masculus? Ecquis Prisciani pudor? itane propria quæ maribus fœmineo generi tribuunt insulsi grammaticastri! scilicet quia scyphos capacissimos nunquam valui pancratice haurire; aut quia manus tenenda stiva non occaluit, aut quia nunquam ad meridianum solem supinus jacui septennis bubulcus; fortasse demum quod nunquam me virum præstiti, eo modo quo ille ganeones; verum utinam illi possint tam facile exuere asinos, quam ego quicquid est fœminæ; at videte quam insubide, quam incogitate mihi objecerint id, quod ego jure optimo mihi vertam gloriæ. Namque et ipse Demosthenes ab æmulis adversariisque parum vir dictus est. Q. itidem Hortensius, omnium oratorum post M. Tullium clarissimus, Dionysia Psaltria appellatus est à L. Torquato. Cui ille, Dionysia, inquit, malo equidem esse, quam quod tu Torquate, ἄμουσος, ἀγροδίαιτος, ἀπρόσιτος. Ego vero quicquid hoc domini aut dominæ est à me longe amolior atque rejicio, nisi in rostris atque subselliis vestris, academici, dominari non cupio. Quis jam prohibebit me quin lætar tam auspicato et fœlici omine, exultemque gaudio me tantis viris ejusdem opprobrii societate conjunctum! Interea ut bonos omnes et præstantes supra invidiam positos arbitror, ita hos lividos adeo omnium infimos puto, ut ne digni sint qui maledicant. Ad filios itaque pater me converto, quorum cerno speciosum numerum, et video etiam lepidulos nebulones occulto nutu me patrem fateri. De nominibus quæritis? Nolo sub nominibus ferculorum filios meos epulandos vobis tradere, id enim Tantali et Lycaonis feritati nimium esset affine; nec membrorum insignibo nominibus, ne putetis me pro integris hominibus tot frusta hominum genuisse; nec ad vinorum genera eos nuncupare volupe est, ne quicquid dixero, sit ἀπροσδίονυσον, et nihil ad Bacchum; volo ad prædicamentorum numerum nominatos, ut sic et ingenuos natales et liberalem vitæ rationem exprimam; et eadem opera curabo, uti omnes ad aliquem gradum ante meum obitum provecti sint. Quod ad sales meos nolo ego edentulos, sic enim tritos, et veteres dicatis, et aniculam aliquam tussientem eos expuisse: proinde credo neminem sales meos dentatos inculpaturum, nisi qui ipse nullos habet dentes, ideoque reprehensurum, quia non sunt ipsius similes. Et certe in præsens ego exoptarem obtigisse mihi Horatii sortem, nempe ut essem salsamentarii filius, tunc enim sales mihi essent ad unguem, vos etiam sale ita pulchre defricatos dimitterem, ut nostros milites, qui nuper ab insula Reana capessere fugam, non magis pœniteret salis petiti. Non libet mihi in consilio vobis exhibendo, mei gnati, gnaviter esse operoso, ne plus operæ vobis erudiendis quam gignendis insumpsisse videar, tantum caveat quisque ne ex filio fiat nepos: liberique mei ne colant liberum, si me velint patrem. Si qua ego alia præcepta dedero, ea lingua vernacula proferenda sentio: conaborque pro viribus ut omnia intelligatis. Cæterum exorandi sunt mihi Neptunus, Apollo, Vulcanus, ut omnes dii fabri, uti latera mea vel tabulatis corroborare, vel ferreis laminis circumligare velint. Quinetiam et supplicanda mihi est dea Ceres, ut quæ humerum eburneum Pelopi dederit, mihi pariter latera pene absumpta reparare dignetur. Neque enim est cur miretur quibuslibet, si post tantum clamorem et tot filiorum genituram paulo infirmiora sint. In his itaque sensu Neroniano ultra quam satis est moratus sum: nunc leges academicas veluti Romuli muros transiliens à Latinis ad Anglicana transcurro. Vos quibus istæc arrident, aures atque animos nunc mihi attentos date.

IN SACRARIO HABITA PRO ARTE.

ORATIO.

Beatiores reddit Homines Ars quam Ignorantia.

Tametsi mihi, auditores, nihil magis jucundum sit atque optabile aspectu vestro assiduaque togatorum hominum frequentia, hoc etiam honorifico dicendi munere, quo ego vice una atque altera apud vos non ingrata opera perfunctus sum; tamen, si quod res est fateri liceat, semper ita fit, ut, cum neque meum ingenium, nec studiorum ratio ab hoc oratorio genere multum abhorreat, ego vix unquam mea voluntate, aut sponte ad dicendam accedam; mihi si fuisset integrum, vel huic vespertino labori haud illibenter equidem parsissem: nam quoniam ex libris et sententiis doctissimorum hominum sic accepi, nihil vulgare, aut mediocre in oratore, ut nec in poeta posse concedi, eumque oportere, qui orator esse meritò et haberi velit, omnium artium, omnesque scientiæ circulari quodam subsidio instructum et consummatum esse; id quando mea ætas non fert, malui jam prius ea mihi subsidia comparando, longo et acri studio illam laudem veram contendere, quam properato et præcoci stylo falsam præripere. Qua animi cogitatione et consilio dum æstuo totus indies, et accendor, nullam unquam sensi gravius impedimentum et moram, hoc frequenti interpellationis damno; nihil vero magis aluisse ingenium, et, contra quam in corpore fit, bonam ei valetudinem conservasse erudito et liberali otio. Hunc ego divinum Hesiodi somnum, hos nocturnos Endymionis cum Luna congressus esse crediderim; hunc illum duce Mercurio Promethei secessum in altissimas montis Caucasi solitudines, ubi sapientissimus deûm atque hominum evasit, utpote quem ipse Jupiter de nuptiis Thetidis consultum isse dicatur. Testor ipse lucos, et flumina, et dilectas villarum ulmos, sub quibus æstate proxime præterita (si dearum arcana eloqui liceat) summam cum musis gratiam habuisse me jucunda memoria recolo; ubi et ego inter rura et semotos saltus velut occulto ævo crescere mihi potuisse visus sum. Hic quoque eandem mihi delitescendi copiam utique sperassem, nisi intempestive prorsus interposuisset se im-portuna hæc dicendi molestia, quæ sic ingrate arcebat sacros somnos, sic torsit animum in aliis defixum, et inter præruptas artium difficultates sic impedivit et oneri fuit, ut ego amissa omni spe persequendæ quietis mœstus cogitare cœperim, quam procul abessem ab ea tranquillitate quam mihi primò literæ pollicebantur, acerbam fore inter hos æstus et jactationes vitam, satius esse vel omnes artes didicisse. Itaque vix compos mei, temerarium cœpi consilium laudandæ ignorantiæ, quæ nihil prorsus haberat harum turbarum; proposuique in certamen utra suos cultores beatiores redderet Ars an Ignorantia? Nescio quid est, noluit me meum sive fatum, sive genius ab incepto Musarum amore discedere; imo et ipsa cæca sors tanquam derepente prudens providensque facta hoc idem noluisse visa est; citius opinione mea Ignorantia suum nacta est patronum, mihi Ars relinquitur defendenda. Gaudeo sane sic illusum me, nec me pudet vel cæcam Fortunam mihi restituisse oculos; hoc illi nomine gratias habeo. Jam saltem illam laudere licet, cujus ab amplexu divulsus eram, et quasi absentis desiderium sermone consolari: jam hæc non plane interruptio est, quis enim interpellari se dicat, id laudando et tuendo quod amat, quod approbat, quod magnopere assequi velit. Verum, auditores, sic ego existimo in re mediocriter laudabili maxime elucere vim eloquentiæ; quæ summum laudem habent, vix ullo modo, ullis limitibus orationis contineri posse, in his ipsa sibi officit copia, et rerum multitudine comprimit et coangustat expandentem se elocutionis pompam; hac ego argumenti fœcunditate nimia laboro, ipsæ me vires imbecillum, arma inermem reddunt; delectus itaque faciendus, aut certe enumeranda verius quam tractanda quæ tot nostram causam validis præsidiis firmam ac munitam statuunt; nunc illud mihi unice elaborandum video, ut ostendam quid in utraque re, et quantum habeat momentum ad illam in quam omnes ferimur, beatitudinem; in qua contentione facili certe negotio versabitur oratio nostra, nec admodum esse puto metuendum quid possit scientiæ inscitia, arti ignorantia objicere; quamvis hoc ipsum quod objiciat, quod verba faciat, quod in hac celebritate literatissimæ concionis vel hiscere audeat, id totum ab arte precariò vel potius emendicato habet. Notum hoc esse reor, auditores, et receptum omnibus, magnum mundi opificem, cætera omnia cum fluxu et caduca posuisset, homini præter id quod mortale esset, divinam quandam auram, et quasi partem sui immiscuisse, immortalem, indelebilem, lethi et interitus immunem; quæ postquam in terris aliquandiu tanquam cœlestis hospes, caste, sancteque peregrinata esset, ad nativum cœlum sursum evibraret se, debitamque ad sedem et patriam reverteretur: proinde nihil merito recenseri posse in causis nostræ beatitudinis, nisi id et illam sempiternam, et hanc civilem vitam aliqua ratione respiciat. Ea propemodum suffragiis omnium sola est contemplatio, qua sine administro corpore seducta et quasi conglobata in se mens nostra incredibili voluptate immortalium deorum ævum imitatur, quæ tamen sine arte tota infrugifera est et injucunda, imo nulla. Quis enim rerum humanarum divinarumque ἰδέας intueri digne possit aut considerare, quarum ferme nihil nosse queat, nisi animum per artem et disciplinam imbutum et excultum habuerit; ita prorsus ei cui artes desunt, interclusus esse videtur omnis aditus ad vitam beatam: ipsam hanc animam altæ sapientiæ capacem et prope inexplebilem, aut frustra nobis Deus, aut in pœnam dedisse videtur, nisi maxime voluisset nos ad excelsam earum rerum cognitionem sublimes eniti, quarum tantum ardorem natura humanæ menti injecerat. Circumspicite quaqua potestis universam hanc rerum faciem, illam sibi in gloriam tanti operis summus artifex ædificavit; quanto altius ejus rationem insignem, ingentem fabricam, varietatem admirabilem investigamus, quod sine arte non possumus, tanto plus authorem ejus admiratione nostra celebramus, et veluti quodam plausu persequimur, quod illi pergratum esse, certum ac persuasissimum habeamus. Ecquid, auditores, putabimus tanta immensi ætheris spatia æternis accensa atque distincta ignibus, tot sustinere concitatissimos motus, tanta obire conversionum itinera ob hoc unum ut lucernam præbeant ignavis et pronis hominibus? et quasi facem præferant nobis infra torpentibus et desidiosis? nihil inesse tam multiplici fructuum herbarumque proventui, præterquam fragilem viriditatis ornatum? Profecto si tam injusti rerum æstimatores erimus, ut nihil ultra crassum sensus intuitum persequamur, non modo serviliter et abjecte, sed inique et malitiose cum benigno numine egisse videbimur; cui per inertiam nostram, et quasi per invidiam titulorum magna pars, et tantæ potentiæ veneratio penitus intercidet. Si igitur dux et inchoatrix nobis ad beatitudinem sit eruditio, si potentissimo numini jussa et complacita, et ejus cum laude maxime conjuncta, certe non potest sui cultores non efficere vel summe beatos. Neque enim nescius sum, auditores, contemplationem hanc qua tendimus ad id quod summe expetendum est, nullum habere posse veræ beatitudinis gustum sine integritate vitæ, et morum innocentia; multos autem vel insigniter eruditos homines nefarios extitisse, præterea iræ, odio, et pravis cupiditatibus obedientes; multos è contra literarum rudes viros probos atque optimos se præstitisse; quid ergo? Num beatior ignorantia? minime vero. Sic itaque est, auditores, paucos fortasse doctrina præstabiles suæ civitatis corruptissimi mores et illiteratorum hominum colluvies in nequitiam pertraxere, unius perdocti et prudentis viri industria multos mortales ab arte impolitos in officio continuit: nimirum una domus, vir unus arte et sapientia præditus, velut magnum dei munus toti reipub. satis esse possit ad bonam frugem. Cæterum ubi nullæ vigent artes, ubi omnis exterminatur eruditio, ne ullum quidem ibi viri boni vestigium est, grassatur immanitas atque horrida barbaries; hujus rei testem appello non civitatem unam, aut provinciam, non gentem, sed quartam orbis terrarum partem Europam, qua tota superioribus aliquot sæculis omnes bonæ artes interierant, omnes tunc temporis academias præsides diu Musæ reliquerant; pervaserat omnia, et occuparat cæca inertia, nihil audiebatur in scholis præter insulsa stupidissimorum monachorum dogmata, togam scilicet nacta, per vacua rostra et pulpita, per squalentes cathedras jactitavit se prophanum et informe monstrum, Ignorantia. Tum primum lugere pietas, et extingui religio et pessum ire, adeo ut ex gravi vulnere, sero atque ægre vix in hunc usque diem convaluerit. At vero, auditores, hoc in philosophia ratum, et antiquum esse satis constat, omnis artis, omnisque scientiæ perceptionem solius intellectus esse, virtutum ac probitatis domum atque delubrum esse voluntatem. Cum autem omnium judicio intellectus humanus cæteris animi facultatibus princeps et moderator præluceat, tum et ipsam voluntatem cæcam alioqui et obscuram suo splendore temperat et collustrat, illa veluti luna, luce lucet aliena. Quare demus hoc sane, et largiamur ultro, potiorem esse ad beatam vitam virtutem sine arte, quam artem sine virtute; at ubi semel fœlici nexu invicem consociatæ fuerint, ut maxime debent, et sæpissime contingit, tum vero statim vultu erecto atque arduo superior longe apparet, atque emicat scientia, cum rege et imperatore intellectu in excelso locat se, inde quasi humile et sub pedibus spectat inferius quicquid agitur apud voluntatem; et deinceps in æternum excellentiam et claritudinem, majestatemque divinæ proximam facile sibi asserit. Age descendamus ad civilem vitam, quid in privata, quid in publica proficiat utraque videamus; taceo de arte quod sit pulcherrimum juventutis honestamentum, ætatis virilis firmum præsidium, senectutis ornamentum atque solatium. Prætereo et illud multos apud suos nobiles, etiam P. R. principes post egregia facinora, et rerum gestarum gloriam ex contentione et strepitu ambitionis ad literarum studium tanquam in portum ac dulce perfugium se recepisse; intellexere nimirum senes præstantissimi jam reliquam vitæ partem optimam optime oportere collocari; erant summi inter homines, volebant his artibus non postremi esse inter deos; petierant honores, nunc immortalitatem; in debellandis imperii hostibus longe alia militia usi sunt, cum morte maximo generis humani malo conflictaturi, ecce quæ tela sumpserint, quas legiones conscripserint, quo commeatu instructi fuerint. Atqui maxima pars civilis beatitudinis in humana societate et contrahendis amicitiis fere constituta est; doctiores plerosque difficiles, inurbanos, moribus incompositis, nulla fandi gratia ad conciliandos hominum animos multi queruntur: fateor equidem, qui in studiis fere seclusus atque abditus est, multo promptius esse Deos alloqui quam homines, sive quod perpetuo fere domi est apud superos infrequens rerum humanarum et vere peregrinus, sive quod assidua rerum divinarum cogitatione mens quasi grandior facta in tantis corporis angustiis difficulter agitans se minus habilis sit ad exquisitiores salutationum gesticulationes; at si dignæ atque idoneæ contigerint amicitiæ nemo sanctius colit; quid enim jucundius, quid cogitari potest beatius illis doctorum et gravissimorum hominum colloquiis, qualia sub illa platano plurima sæpe fertur habuisse divinus Plato, digna certe quæ totius confluentis generis humani arrecto excipiantur silentio; at stolide confabulari, alios aliis ad luxum et libidines morem gerere ea demum ignorantiæ est amicitia, aut certe amicitiæ ignorantia. Quinetiam si hæc civilis beatitudo in honesta liberaque oblectatione animi consistit, ea profecto doctrinæ et arti reposita est voluptas, quæ cæteras omnes facile superet; quid omnem cœli siderumque morem tenuisse? omnis aeris motus et vicissitudines, sive augusto fulminum sonitu, aut crinitis ardoribus inertes animos perterrefaciat, sive in nivem et grandinem obrigescat, sive denique in pluvia et rore mollis et placidus descendat; tum alternantes ventos perdidicisse, omnesque halitus aut vapores quos terra aut mare eructat; stirpium deinde vires occultas, metallorumque caluisse, singulorum etiam animantium naturam, et si fieri potest, sensus intellexisse; hinc accuratissimam corporis humani fabricam et medicinam; postremo divinam animi vim et vigorem, et si qua de illis qui lares, et genii, et dæmonia vocantur ad nos pervenit cognitio? Infinita ad hæc alia, quorum bonam partem didicisse licuerit, antequam ego cuncta enumeraverim. Sic tandem, auditores, cum omnimoda semel eruditio suos orbes confecerit, non contentus iste spiritus tenebricoso hoc ergastulo eousque late aget se, donec et ipsum mundum, et ultra longe divina quadam magnitudine expatiata compleverit. Tum demum plerique casus atque eventus rerum ita subito emergent, ut ei, qui hanc arcem sapientiæ adeptus est, nihil pene incautum, nihil fortuitum in vita possit accidere; videbitur sane is esse, cujus imperio et dominationi astra obtemperent, terra et mare obsecundent, venti tempestatesque morigeræ sint; cui denique ipsa parens natura in deditionem se tradiderit, plane ac si quis deus abdicato mundi imperio, huic jus ejus, et leges, administrationemque tanquam præfectori cuidam commisisset. Huc quanta accedit animi voluptas, per omnes gentium historias et loca pervolare regnorum, nationum, urbium, populorum status mutationesque ad prudentiam, et mores animadvertere: hoc est, auditores, omni ætati quasi vivus interesse, et velut ipsius temporis nasci contemporaneus; profecto cum nominis nostri gloriæ in futurum prospeximus, hoc erit ab utero vitam retro extendere et porrigere, et nolenti fato anteactam quandam immortalitatem extorquere. Mitto illud cui quid potest æquiparari? Multarum gentium oraculum esse, domum quasi templum habere, esse quos reges et respublicæ ad se invitent, cujus visendi gratia finitimique exterique concurrant; quem alii vel semel vidisse quasi quoddam bene meritum, glorientur; hæc studiorum præmia, hos fructus eruditio suis cultoribus in privata vita præstare, et potest, et sæpe solet. At quid in publica? Sane ad majestatis fastigium paucos evexit laus doctrinæ, nec probitatis multò plures. Nimirum, illi apud se regno fruuntur, omni terrarum ditione longe gloriosiori: et quis sine ambitionis infamia geminum affectat regnum? addam hoc tamen amplius, duos tantum adhuc fuisse qui quasi cœlitus datum universum terrarum orbem habuere, et supra omnes reges et dynastas æquale diis ipsis partiti sunt imperium, Alexandrum nempe Magnum et Octavium Cæsarem, eosque ambos philosophiæ alumnos. Perinde ac si quoddam electionis exemplar divinitus exhibitum esset hominibus, quali potissimum viro clavum et habenas rerum credi oporteret. At multæ resp. sine literis, rebus gestis et opulentia claruere. Spartanorum quidem, qui ad literarum studium contulerint se, pauci memorantur; Romani intra urbis mœnia philosophiam sero receperunt; at illi legislatore usi sunt Lycurgo, qui et philosophus fuit et poetarum adeo studiosus, ut Homeri scripta per Ioniam sparsa summa cura primus collegerit. Hi post varios in urbe motus et perturbationes ægre se sustentare valentes, ab Athenis ea tempestate artium studio florentissimis, leges decemvirales, quæ et duodecim tabulæ dictæ sunt, missis legatis emendicarunt. Quid si hodiernos Turcas per opimà Asiæ regna rerum late potitos omnis literaturæ ignaros nobis objiciant? Equidem in ea repub. (si tamen crudelissimorum hominum per vim et cædem arrepta potentia, quos unum in locum sceleris consensus convocavit, continuo respub. dicenda sit) quod in ea ad exemplum insigne sit nil audivi, parere vitæ commoda, tueri parta, id naturæ debemus, non arti; aliena libidinose invadere, sibi mutuo ad rapinam auxilio esse, in scelus conjurare, id naturæ pravitati. Jus quoddam apud eos exercetur; nec mirum: cæteræ virtutes facile fugantur, justitia vere regia, ad sui cultum impellit, sine qua vel injustissimæ societates cito dissolverentur. Nec omiserim tamen, Saracenos Turcarum propemodum conditores non armis magis quam bonarum literarum studiis imperium suum propagasse. Sed si antiquitatem repetamus, inveniemus non institutas modo ab arte, sed fundatas olim fuisse respublicas. Antiquissimi quique gentium indigenæ in sylvis et montibus errasse dicuntur, ferarum ritu pabuli commoditatem sequuti, vultu erecti, cætera proni, putasses præter formæ dignitatem nihil non commune cum bestiis habuisse; eadem antra, iidem specus cœlum et frigora defendebant; nulla tunc urbs, non ædes marmoreæ, non aræ deorum, aut fana collucebant, non illic fas sanctum, nondum jura in foro dicebantur, nulla in nuptiis tæda, non chorus, nullum in mensa geniali carmen, nullum solenne funeris, non luctus, vix tumulus defunctos honestabat; nulla convivia, nulli ludi, inauditus citharæ sonus, ipsa tunc omnia aberant, quibus jam inertia ad luxum abutitur. Cum repente artes et scientiæ agrestia hominum pectora cœlitus afflabant, et imbutos notitia sui in una mœnia pellexere. Quamobrem certe quibus authoribus urbes ipsæ primum conditæ sunt, dein stabilitæ legibus, post consiliis munitæ, poterunt iisdem etiam gubernatoribus quam diutissime fœlicissimeque consistere. Quid autem ignorantia? sentio, auditores, caligat, stupet, procul est, effugia circumspicit, vitam brevem queritur, artem longam; immo vero tollamus duo magna studiorum nostrorum impedimenta, alterum artis male traditæ, alterum nostræ ignaviæ, pace Galeni, seu quis alius ille fuit; totum contra erit, vita longa ars brevis; nihil arte præstabilius, adeoque laboriosius, nihil nobis segnius, nihil remissius; ob operariis et agricolis nocturna et antelucana industria vinci nos patimur; illi in re sordida ad vilem victum magis impigri sunt, quam nos in nobilissima ad vitam beatam; nos cum ad altissimum atque optimum in humanis rebus aspiremus, nec studium ferre possumus, nec inertiæ dedecus; immo pudet esse id, quod non haberi nos indignamur. At valetudini cavemus à vigiliis et acri studio: turpe dictu, animum incultum negligimus, dum corpori metuimus, cujus vires quis non imminuat, quo majores acquirantur animo? quanquam certe qui hæc causantur perditissimi plerique, abjecta omni temporis, ingenii, valetudinis cura, comessando, belluæ marinæ ad morem potando, inter scorta et aleam pernoctando, nihilo se infirmiores factos queruntur. Cum itaque sic se afficiant atque assuescant, ut ad omnem turpitudinem strenui atque alacres; ad omnes virtutis actiones et ingenii hebetes et languidi sint, culpam in naturam aut vitæ brevitatem falso et inique transferunt. Quod si modeste ac temperanter vitam degendo, primos ferocientis ætatis impetus ratione et pertinaci studiorum assiduitate mallemus edomare, cœlestem animi vigorem ab omni contagione et inquinamento purum et intactum servantes; incredibile esset, auditores, nobis post annos aliquot respicientibus quantum spatium confecisse, quam ingens æquor eruditionis cursu placido navigasse videremur. Cui et hoc egregium afferet compendium, si quis norit et artes utiles, et utilia in artibus recte seligere. Quot sunt imprimis grammaticorum et rhetorum nugæ aspernabiles? audias in tradenda arte sua illos barbare loquentes, hos infantissimos. Quid logica? Regina quidem illa artium si pro dignitate tractetur: at heu quanta est in ratione insania! non hic homines, sed plane acanthides carduis et spinis vescuntur. O dura messorum ilia! quid repetam illam, quam metaphysicam vocant peripatetici, non artem, locupletissimam quippe me ducit magnorum virorum authoritas, non artem inquam plerumque, sed infames scopulos, sed Lernam quandam sophismatum ad naufragium et pestem excogitatam: hæc illa quæ supra memini togatæ ignorantiæ vulnera sunt; hæc eadem cucullorum scabies etiam ad naturalem philosophiam late permanavit: vexat mathematicos demonstrationum inanis gloriola; his omnibus quæ nihil profutura sunt meritò contemptis et amputatis, admirationi erit quot annos integros lucrabimur. Quid! quod jurisprudentiam præsertim nostram turbata methodus obscurat, et quod pejus est, sermo nescio quis, Americanus credo, aut ne humanus quidem, quo cum sæpe leguleios nostros clamitantes audiverim, dubitare, subiit quibus non esset humanum os et loquela, an et his ulli affectus humani adessent; vereor certe ut possit nos sancta justitia respicere, vereor ut querelas ullo tempore nostras aut injurias intelligat, quorum lingua loqui nesciat. Quapropter, auditores, si nullum à pueritia diem sine præceptis et diligenti studio vacuum ire sinamus, si in arte, aliena supervacanea otiosa sapienter omittamus, certe intra ætatem Alexandri Magni majus quiddam et gloriosius illo terrarum orbe subegerimus: tantumque aberit quo minus brevitatem vitæ, aut artis tædium incusemus, ut flere et lachrymari promptius nobis futurum credam, ut illi olim, non plures superesse mundos de quibus triumphemus. Expirat ignorantia, jam ultimos videte conatus et morientem luctam; mortales præcipue gloria tangi, antiquos illos illustres longa annorum series atque decursus eum celebrârit, nos decrepito mundi senio, nos properante rerum omnium occasu premi, si quid prædicandum æterna laude reliquerimus, nostrum nomen in angusto versari, cujus ad memoriam vix ulla posteritas succedat, frustra jam tot libros et preclara ingenii monumenta edi quæ vicinus mundi rogus cremarit. Non inficior illud esse posse verisimile; at vero non morari gloriam cum bene feceris, id supra omnem gloriam est. Quam nihil beavit istos inanis hominum sermo cujus ad absentes et mortuos nulla voluptas, nullus sensus pervenire potuit? nos sempiternum ævum expectemus quod nostrorum in terris saltem benefactorum memoriam nunquam delebit; in quo, si quid hic pulchre meruimus, præsentes ipsi audiemus, in quo qui prius in hac vita continentissime acta omne tempus bonis artibus dederint, iisque homines adjuverint, eos singulari et summa supra omnes scientia auctos esse futuros multi graviter philosophati sunt. Jam cavillari desinant ignavi quæcunque adhuc nobis in scientiis incerta atque perplexa sint, quæ tamen, non tam scientiæ, quam homini attribuenda sunt; hoc est, auditores, quod et illud nescire Socraticum et timidam scepticorum hæsitationem aut refellit, aut consolatur, aut compensat. Jam vero tandem aliquando quænam ignorantiæ beatitudo? sua sibi habere, à nemine lædi, omni cura et molestia supersedere, vitam secure et quiete, quoad potest, traducere; verum hæc feræ aut volucris cujuspiam vita est, quæ in altis et penitissimis sylvis in tuto nidulum cœlo quamproximum habet, pullos educit, sine aucupii metu in pastum volat, diluculo, vesperique suavès modulos emodulatur. Quid ad hæc desideratur æthereus ille animi vigor? Exuat ergo hominem, dabitur sane Circæum poculum, ad bestias prona emigret: ad bestias vero? at illæ tam turpem hospitem excipere nolunt, si quidem illæ sive inferioris cujusdam rationis participes, quod plurimi disputarunt, sive pollenti quodam instinctu sagaces, aut artes, aut artium simile quoddam apud se exercent. Namque et canes in persequenda fera dialecticæ non ignaros esse narratur apud Plutarchum, et si ad trivia forte ventum sit, plane disjuncto uti syllogismo. Lusciniam veluti præcepta quædam musices pullis suis tradere solere refert Aristoteles; unaquæque fere bestia sibi medica est, multæ etiam insignia medicinæ documenta hominibus dedere. Ibis Ægyptia alvi purgandæ utilitatem, hippopotamus detrahendi sanguinis ostendit. Quis dicat astronomiæ expertes à quibus tot ventorum, imbrium, inundationem, serenitatis præsagia petantur? Quam prudenti et severa ethica supervolantes montem Taurum anseres obturato lapillis ore periculosæ loquacitati moderantur; multa formicis res domestica, civitas apibus debet; excubias habendi, triquetram aciem ordinandi rationem ars militaris gruum esse agnoscit. Sapiunt altius bestiæ, quam ut suo cœtu et consortio ignorantiam dignentur; inferius detrudunt. Quid ergo? ad truncos et saxa. At ipsi trunci, ipsa arbusta, totumque nemus ad doctissima Orphei carmina solutis quondam radicibus festinavere. Sæpe etiam mysteriorum capaces, ut quercus olim Dodoneæ, divina oracula reddidere. Saxa etiam sacræ poetarum voci docilitate quadam respondent: an et hæc aspernantur à se ignorantiam? Num igitur infra omne brutorum genus, infra stipites et saxa, infra omnem naturæ ordinem licebit in illo Epicureorum non esse requiescere? Ne id quidem: quandoquidem necesse est, quod pejus, quod vilius, quod magis miserum, quod infimum est, esse ignorantiam? Ad vos venio, auditores intelligentissimi, nam et ipse si nihil dixissem, vos mihi tot non tam argumenta, quam tela video, quæ ego in ignorantiam usque ad perniciem contorquebo. Ego jam classicum cecini, vos ruite in prælium; summovete à vobis hostem hanc, prohibete vestris porticibus et ambulacris; hanc si aliquid esse patiamini, vos ipsi illud eritis, quod nostis omnium esse miserrimum. Vestra itaque hæc omnium causa est. Quare si ego jam multo fortasse prolixior fuerim, quam pro consuetudine hujus loci liceret, præterquam quod ipsa rei dignitas hoc postulabat, dabitis et vos mihi veniam, opinor, judices, quandoquidem, tanto magis intelligitis in vos quo sim animo, quam vestri studiosus, quos labores, quas vigilias vestra causa non recusarim. Dixi.

PRÆFATIO.

Quanquam philosophorum multi, suopte ingenio freti, contempsisse artem logicam dicuntur, eorum tamen qui vel sibi, vel aliis propter ingenium aut judicium natura minus acre ac perspicax utilissimam esse sibique diligenter excolendam judicarunt, optime est de ea meritus, ut ego quidem cum Sidneio nostro sentio, Petrus Ramus. Cæteri fere physica, ethica, theologica logicis, effrœnata quadam licentia, confundunt. Sed noster dum brevitatem sectatus est nimis religiose, non plane luci, sed ubertati tamen lucis, quæ in tradenda arte, non parca, sed plena et copiosa esse debet, videtur defuisse: id quod tot in eum scripta commentaria testantur. Satius itaque sum arbitratus, quæ ad præcepta artis plenius intelligenda, ex ipsius Rami scholiis dialecticis aliorumque commentariis necessario petenda sunt, ea in ipsum corpus artis, nisi sicubi dissentio, transferre atque intexere. Quid enim brevitate consequimur, si lux aliunde est petenda? Præstat una opera, uno simul in loco artem longiusculam cum luce conjungere, quam minore cum luce brevissimam aliunde illustrare; cum hoc non minore negotio multoque minus commode hactenus fiat, quam si ars ipsa ut nunc suapte copia se fuse explicaverit. Quam artis tradendæ rationem uberiorem ipse etiam Ramus in arithmetica et geometria aliquanto post à se editis, edoctus jam longiore usu, secutus est; suasque ipse regulas interjecto commentariolo explanavit, non aliis explanandas reliquit. Quorum cum plerique nescio an nimio commentandi studio elati, certe omnis methodi quod in iis mirum sit, obliti, omnia permisceant, postrema primis, axiomata syllogysmos eorumque regulas primis quibusque simplicium argumentorum capitibus ingerere soleant, unde caliginem potius discentibus offundi quam lucem ullam præferri necesse est, id mihi cavendum imprimis duxi, ut nequid præriperem, nequid præpostere quasi traditum jam et intellectum, nequid nisi suo loco attingerem; nihil veritus ne cui forte strictior in explicandis præceptis existimer, dum perpendenda magis quam percurrenda proponere studebam. Nec tamen iis facile assenserim, qui paucitatem regularum objiciunt Ramo, quarum permultæ etiam ex Aristotele ab aliis collectæ, nedum quæ ab ipsis cumulo sunt adjectæ, vel incertæ vel futiles, discentem impediunt atque onerant potius quam adjuvant: ac siquid habent utilitatis aut salis, id ejusmodi est, ut suopte ingenio quivis facilius percipiat, quam tot canonibus memoriæ mandatis, addiscat. Multoque minus constitui, canones quidvis potius quam logicos, à theologis infercire; quos illi, quasi subornatos in suum usum, tanquam è media logica petitos, depromant de Deo, divinisque hypostasibus et sacramentis; quorum ratione, quo modo est ab ipsis informata, nihil est à logica, adeoque ab ipsa ratione, alienius.

Prius autem quam opus ipsum aggredior, quoniam ars logica omnium prima est suisque finibus latissime patet, præmittam quædam de arte generalia, deque artium distributione; artem deinde ipsam persequar: ad extremum, analytica quædam exempla, sive usum artis, exercitationis causa, iis quibus opus est, et in eo genere exercere se libet, exhibebo: quibus opus est inquam; quibus enim ingenium per se viget atque pollet, iis ut in hoc genere analytico cum labore nimio ac miseria se torqueant, non sum author. Ad id enim ars adhibetur, ut naturam juvet, non ut impediat: adhibita nimis anxie nimisque subtiliter, et præsertim ubi opus non est, ingenium per se jam satis acutum, obtundit potius quam acuit; ita plane ut in medicina remediorum usus vel nimius vel non necessarius, valetudinem debilitat potius quam roborat. Quod autem Aristotelis aliorumque veterum auctoritatem ad singulas fere logicæ regulas adjungimus, id quidem in tradenda arte supervacuum fuisset, nisi

Artium omnium quasi corpus et comprehensio ἐγκυκλοπαιδεία Græce, i. e. eruditionis circuitus quidam in se redeuntis, adeoque in se absolutæ atque perfectæ, vel philosophia dicitur. Hæc cum sapientiæ studium proprie significat, tum vulgo artium omnium vel doctrinam, vel scientiam: doctrinam, cum præcepta artium tradit; scientiam, cum ars, quæ habitus est quidam mentis, præceptis illis percipitur, quasique possidetur. Eodem modo et artis significatio distinguitur: cum doctrinam significat, de qua nobis potissimum hic est agendum, est ordinata præceptorum exemplorumque comprehensio sive methodus, qua quidvis utile docetur.

Artis materia præcepta sunt: quæ qualia esse debeant, artis logicæ, quam nunc tradimus, proprium est suo loco præscribere.

Forma sive ipsa ratio artis, non tam est præceptorum illorum methodica dispositio, quam utilis alicujus rei præceptio: per id enim quod docet potius, quam per ordinem docendi, ars est id quod est: quod ex cujusque artis definitione perspicitur, ut infra ostendetur.

Præceptorum artis tria genera sunt: duo præcipua "definitiones et distributiones;" quarum doctrinam generalem logica etiam loco idoneo sibi vendicat; tertium, minus principale, "consectarium" nominatur; estque proprietatis alicujus explicatio, ex definitione fere deducta.

Exempla sunt quibus præceptionum veritas demonstratur, ususque ostenditur: suntque, ut scite Plato, quasi obsides sermonum: quod enim præcepto in genere docetur, id exemplo in specie confirmatur.

Efficiens artis primarius neminem reor dubitare quin sit Deus, author omnis sapientiæ: id olim philosophos etiam non fugit.

Causæ ministræ fuerunt homines divinitus edocti, ingenioque præstantes; qui olim singulas artes invenerunt. Inveniendi autem ratio eadem prope fuit quæ pingendi; ut enim in picturà duo sunt, exemplum sive archetypus, et ars pingendi, sic in arte invenienda, archetypo respondet natura sive usus, et exemplum hominum peritorum, arti pictoris respondet logica; saltem naturalis, quæ facultas ipsa rationis in mente hominis est; juxta illud vulgo dictum, ars imitatur naturam.

Ratio autem sive logica, primum illa naturalis, deinde artificiosa, quatuor adhibuit sibi quasi adjutores, teste Aristot. Metaphys. 1, c. 1, sensum, observationem, inductionem, et experientiam. Cum enim præcepta artium generalià sint, ea nisi ex singularibus, singularia nisi sensu percipi non possunt: sensus sine observatione, quæ exempla singula memoriæ committat, observatio sine inductione, quæ singularia quam plurima inducendo generalem aliquam regulam constituat, inductio sine experientia, quæ singulorum omnium convenientiam in commune et quasi consensum judicet, nihil juvat. Hinc recte Polus apud Platonem in Gorgia, "experientia artem peperit, imperitia fortunam," i. e. præcepta fortuita, adeoque incerta. Et Aristot. Prior. 1, c. 30, "cujusque rei principia tradere, experientiæ est: sic astrologica experientia illius scientiæ principia suppeditavit." Et Manilius;

> "Per varios usus artem experientia fecit, > Exemplo monstrante viam ———"

Et Cicero; "omnia quæ sunt conclusa nunc artibus, dispersa quondam et dissipata fuerunt, donec adhibita hæc ars est, quæ res dissolutas divulsasque conglutinaret et ratione quadam constringeret." Ea ars logica est, vel hæc saltem naturalis, quam ingenitam habemus, vel illa artificiosa, quam mox tradimus: hæc enim præcepta artis invenit ac docet. Hactenus de efficientibus causis artium.

Forma artis, ut supra dixi, non tam præceptorum dispositio est, quam præceptio ipsa rei alicujus utilis, eademque est finis. Quemadmodum, enim, non tam præceptorum logicorum methodica dispositio quam ipsum bene disserere, et forma logicæ et finis est, ut infra docebitur, ita in genere non solum præceptorum dispositio, sed ipsa rei utilis præceptio, forma artis et simul finis est; quod autem præcipitur, id esse utile in hominum vita debere, quod Græci βιωφελὲς vocant, omnes consentiunt; indignamque esse artis nomine, quæ non bonum aliquod sive utile ad vitam hominum, quod idem quoque honestum sit, sibi proponat, ad quod omnia præcepta artis referantur; adeoque formam artis esse rei alicujus utilis præceptionem, per quam scilicet ars est id quod est, necessario sequitur. Verum ad hunc finem perveniri non potest, nisi doctrinam natura commode percipiat, exercitatio confirmet, utræque simul doctrina et exercitatio artem quasi alteram naturam reddant. Sed ingenium sine arte, quam ars sine ingenio plus proficere censetur: proficere autem non admodum utrumque nisi accesserit exercitatio: unde illud Ovidii:

> Solus, et artificem qui facit, usus erit.

Exercitatio duplex est; analysis et genesis. Illa est, cum exempla artis in sua principia quasi resolvuntur: dum singulis partibus ad normam, i. e. ad præcepta artis examinantur: hæc, cum ex artis præscripto efficimus aliquid aut componimus.

Hactenus causæ artium: sequuntur species. Artes sunt generales vel speciales: generales, quarum materia subjecta est generalis. Materia autem illa vel artificis est, vel artis. Artificis materia generalis generalibus cunctis artibus est communis; artis autem, singularum est propria: estque artificis quidem generalis materia, omne id, quod revera est, aut esse fingitur; artis, quod in eo omni efficiunt singulæ. Id omne vel ratio complectitur, vel oratio: generalium itaque artium materia generalis, vel ratio est, vel oratio: versantur enim in excolenda vel ratione ad bene ratiocinandum, ut logica; vel oratione, eaque vel ad bene loquendum, ut grammatica, vel ad dicendum bene, ut rhetorica. Omnium autem prima ac generalissima, logica est; dein grammatica, tum demum rhetorica; quatenus rationis usus sine oratione etiam magnus, hujus sine illa potest esse nullus. Grammaticæ autem secundum tribuimus locum; eo quod oratio pura esse etiam inornata; ornata esse nisi pura sit prius, facile non queat.

Artes speciales sunt, quæ materiam habent specialem; nempe naturam fere vel mores: earum enim accuratior distributio non est hujus loci.

ARTIS LOGICÆ PLENIOR INSTITUTIO, &c.

LIBER PRIMUS.

CAPUT I.

Quid sit Logica?

Logica est ars bene ratiocinandi. Eodemque sensu dialectica sæpe dicta est.

Logica autem, i. e. ars rationalis, à λόγω dicitur: quæ vox Græcè rationem significat; quam excolendam logica sibi sumit.

Ratiocinari autem est rationis uti facultate. Additur bene, i. e. rectè, scienter, expeditè; ad perfectionem artis ab imperfectione facultatis naturalis distinguendam.

Logicam potius, quàm cum P. Ramo dialecticam, dicendam duxi, quòd eo nomine tota ars rationis aptissimè significetur; cùm dialectica à verbo Græco διαλέγεσθαι, artem potius interrogandi et respondendi, i. e. disputandi significet; ut ex Platonis Cratylo, ex doctrina peripateticorum et stoicorum, Fabio, Suida, aliisque docetur. Et tamen Plato in Alcibiade primo idem vult esse τό διαλέγεσθαι, quod ratione uti. Prior significatio ad rationis usum nimis augusta est; posterior, si inter authores de ea con convenit, nimis incerta.

Ratiocinandi autem potius dico quàm disserendi, propterea quòd ratiocinari, non minus late quàm ipsa ratio, idem valet propriè quod ratione uti; cùm disserere, præterquam quod vox non planè propria, sed translata sit, non latius plerumque pateat, quam disputare.

Addunt nonnulli in definitione subjectum dialecticæ, i. e. de re qualibet: sed hoc cum grammatica et rhetorica commune dialecticæ fuit, ut in proœmio vidimus; non ergo hic repetendum.

CAP. II.

De partibus Logicæ, deque Argumenti Generibus.

Ratiocinatio autem fit omnis, rationibus vel solis et per se consideratis, vel inter se dispositis; quæ argumenta etiam sæpius dicta sunt.

Logicæ itaque partes duæ sunt; rationum sive argumentorum inventio, eorumque dispositio.

Secutus veteres Ramus, Aristotelem, Ciceronem, Fabium, dialecticam partitur in inventionem et judicium. Verùm non inventio, quæ nimis lata est quocunque modo sumatur, sed argumentorum inventio, pars prima logicæ dicenda est; dispositio autem eorum, cur sit secunda, non judicium, secundi libri initio respondebimus. Sed neque hæc partitio suis auctoribus vel iisdem vel aliis caret: Plato, in Phædo, dispositionem inventioni addidit; Aristoteles τάξιν; Top. 8. 1. quod idem est. Et Cicero, de Orat., fatetur, inventionem et dispositionem, non orationis esse, sed rationis.

Inventionem autem et dispositionem quarum tandem rerum nisi argumentorum.

Argumentorum itaque inventio topica Græcè nominatur, quia τόπους continet, i. e. locos unde argumenta sumuntur, viamque docet et rationem argumenta bene inveniendi, suo nimirum ordine collocata; unde vel ad genesin expromantur, vel in analysi explorentur, inventorumque simul vim atque usum exponit.

"Argumentum est quod ad aliquid arguendum affectum est." Id est, quod habet affectionem ad arguendum; vel ut Cic. in Top. quod affectum est ad id de quo quæritur: id interpretatur Boethius refertur, vel aliqua relatione respicit id de quo quæritur.

Ista affectione sublata, argumentum non est; mutata, non est idem; sed ipsum quoque mutatur.

Ad arguendum autem, i. e. ostendendum, explicandum, probandum aliquid. Sic juxta illud tritum, "degeneres animos timor arguit," Æneid 4: et illud Ovidii; "Apparet virtus, arguiturque malis." Explicare autem et probare etiam simplicis argumenti propria atque primaria vis est, unde aliud ex alio sequi, vel non sequi, i. e. uno posito, alterum poni vel non poni primitus judicatur: quod de inductione quidem recte monuit Baconus noster, de Augment. Scient. l. 5, c. 4, "uno eodemque mentis opere, illud quod quæritur, et inveniri et judicari;" sed hoc de singulis argumentis simplicibus non minus verum est.

communem et ex utraque oriundum; ex syllogismo in re præsertim dubia clarius quidem at secundario tamen contra ac plerique docent.

Aliquid autem, est id quodcunque arguitur: quicquid enim est, aut esse fingitur, subjectum est logicæ, ut supra demonstravimus. Argumentum autem proprié neque vox est neque res; sed affectio quædam rei ad arguendum; quæ ratio dici potest ut supra.

Tractat igitur logica neque voces, neque res. Voces quidem, quamquam et sine vocibus potest ratiocinari, tamen, quoties opus est, distinctas et tantùm non ambiguas, non improprias, ab ipso usu loquendi videtur jure sanè postulare: res ipsas artib. quasque suis relinquit; arguendi duntaxat inter se quam habeant affectionem sive rationem considerat.

Ratio autem dicitur, voce à mathematicis petita, qua terminorum proportionalium inter se certa habitudo significatur.

"Argumentum est artificiale aut inartificiale. Sic Aristot. Rhet. 1, 12," quem Fabius sequitur, l. 5, c. 1. Cicero in "insitum" et "assumptum" dividit. Artificiale autem dicitur, non quo inveniatur arte magis quam inartificiale, sed quòd ex sese arguit, i. e. vi insita ac propria.

"Artificiale est primum, vel à primo ortum. Primum, quod est suæ originis." Id est, affectionem arguendi non modò in se habet, sed etiam à se; quod infrà clàrius patebit, cùm quid sit à "primo ortum" docebitur.

"Primum est simplex aut comparatum.

"Simplex, quod simpliciter et absolutè consideratur." Id est, simplicem habet affectionem arguendi id quod arguitur, sine quantitatis aut qualitatis cum eo comparatione.

"Simplex est consentaneum aut dissentaneum."

Nam quæ sine comparatione considerantur, necesse est vel consentiant inter se, vel dissentiant.

"Consentaneum est quod consentit cum re quam arguit." Id est, ponit, sive affirmat esse rem quam arguit.

"Estque consentaneum absolutè aut modo quodam." Absolutè, i. e. perfectè; absolvere enim est perficere. Aristotelis quoque hæc distributio est. Quæ autem absolutè consentiunt, eorum alterum alterius vi existere intelligitur; et sic consentiunt causa et effectus. Atque hæ sunt argumentorum distributiones generales ex affectionum differentiis desumptæ; suoque nunc ordine singulatim tractandæ: argumentorum autem omnium primum causa est; id quòd per se quivis intelligere potest.

CAP. III.

De Efficiente, procreante, et conservante.

"Causa est, cujus vi res est." Vel, si ex capite superiore, quod intelligi memoriaque teneri potest, repetito est opus, causa est argumentum artificiale, primum, simplex, absolutè consentaneum, cujus vi, vel facultate, res, i. e. effectum, arguitur esse vel existere. Nec male definiatur causa "quæ dat esse rei."

Cujus autem vi vel facultate, i. e. à quo, ex quo, per quod, vel propter quod res est, id causa esse dicitur. "Res" etiam, idem quod "aliquid" in definitione argumenti, vox generalis adhibetur, quæ significaret causam, sicut et reliqua argumenta, esse rerum omnium quæ vel sunt, vel finguntur: nam quæ revera sunt, veras; quæ finguntur, fictas causas habent.

Hinc intelligitur "causam sine qua non," quæ vulgò dicitur, impropriè causam, et quasi fortuito, dici: ut cum amissio rei alicujus dicitur causa recuperationis; quamvis amissio recuperationem necessariò præcedat. Neque enim causa sic intelligi debet, id quod et Cicero docuit, l. de Fato, ut quod cuique antecedat, id ei causa sit, sed quod cuique efficienter antecedat; i. e. ita ut res vi ejus existat. Hinc causa propriè dicta, "principium" quoque nominatur à Cic. 1 de Nat. Deor., sed frequentiùs apud Græcos.

Causa autem est cujus vi res non solùm est, verùm etiam fuit, vel erit. Ut enim præcepta logica de omni re, sic omnium præcepta artium de omni tempore intelligenda sunt; unde et æterna esse, veritatesque æternæ dicuntur.

Ex definitione autem causæ tertium illud artis præceptum, de quo in præfatione diximus, consectarium hoc oritur: "primus hic locus inventionis, fons est omnis scientiæ; scirique demum creditur cujus causa teneatur."

Neque aliud est Aristotelis decantata illa demonstratio, quàm qua effectum arguitur, probatur, cognoscitur, ponitur, ex causa posita; quodcunque illud demum causæ genus sit: ut cùm risibile probatur ex rationali, quippe, omnis homo est risibilis, quia rationalis: eoque erit clarior demonstratio, quo causa certior, propior, præstantior.

"Causa est efficiens et materia, aut forma et finis." Cur sic causa dividatur quasi in duo genera anonyma, infrà in doctrina distributionis facilius intelligetur.

Quot autem modis alicujus vi res est, tot esse species causæ statuendum est. Modis autem quatuor alicujus vi res est; ut rectè Aristot. Phys. 2, 7, et nos suprà diximus; vel enim à quo, vel ex quo, vel per quod, vel propter quod res unaquæque est, ejus vi esse rectè dicitur. His modis nec plures inveniuntur, nec pauciores esse possunt: rectè igitur causa distribuitur in causam à qua, ex qua, per quam, et propter quam, i. e. efficientem et materiam, aut formam, et finem.

"Efficiens est causa, à qua res est, vel efficitur." Ab efficiente enim principium movendi est; ipsa tamen effecto non inest.

Ciceroni omnis causa "efficiens" nominatur: sic enim in Topicis; "primus est locus rerum efficientium, quæ causæ appellantur:" et de Fato; "causa est quæ id efficit, cujus est causa." Hinc fit ut "causatum," à causis licet omnibus ortum habens, "effectum" tantummodo vocitetur: unde hoc solum intelligitur, efficientem esse causam præcipuam atque primariam; omnem autem causam aliquo modo efficere.

" Efficientis etsi, vera genera nulla sive species nobis apparent, ubertas tamen permagna modis quibusdam distinguitur."

" Primò, quòd procreet, aut tueatur."

Sic pater et mater procreant; nutrix tuetur. Huc quoque omnium rerum inventores, auctores, conditores, conservatores referendi sunt. Procreare igitur et tueri duo sunt modi quibus idem sæpe efficiens efficere solet: procreando quidem id quod nondum est, ut sit; conservando autem id quod jam est, ut porro sit.

CAP. IV

De Efficiente sola, et cum aliis.

"SECUNDÒ, causa efficiens sola efficit, aut cum aliis. Earumque omnium sæpe alia principalis, alia minus principalis, sive adjuvans et ministra." Quam Cicero, in Partit. "causam conficientem" vocat: et cujus, inquit, generis vis varia est, et sæpe aut major aut minor; ut et illa quæ maximam vim habet, sola sæpe causa dicatur. Hinc, Æneid. 2, Nysus ab Euryalo socio transfert in se factæ cædis et culpam et pœnam: quasi solus auctor fuerit, quia fuit præcipuus. Et solitaria causa cum plerisque et principalibus et sociis, pro "Marcello," variè adhibetur. Sed hæc duo exempla vide post finem in praxi analytica.

Causa minus principalis (ut quidam volunt) vel est impulsiva, quæ principalem quoquo modo impellit ac movet, vel est instrumentalis.

Impulsiva duplex est Græcisque vocibus receptis, "proegumena" dicitur, vel "procatarctica." Illa intus, hæc extrinsecus movet principalem: et vera si est, "occasio;" si ficta, "prætextus" dicitur.

Sic causa proeg. quæ intus movebat infideles ad persequendum Christianos (exemplis enim receptis hic utemur) erat eorum ignorantia aut impietas, causa procat. erant nocturni conventus, vel potius quævis conventicula Christianorum. Olim interficiendi Christi causa proeg. erat Judæorum zelus ignarus: procat. objecta sabbathi violatio concionesque seditiosæ. Notandum autem est ubi causa proegumena, sive interna, non est, ibi causæ procatarcticæ, sive externæ, vim nullam esse.

Ad causam autem procatarcticam, ea sæpe referenda videtur, si omnino est in causis numeranda, quæ suprà dicta est "causa sine qua non;" siquidem quovis modo causam extrinsecus movere principalem dici potest.

" Instrumenta etiam in causis adjuvantibus connumerantur." Quo argumento Epicureus, apud Cic. 1, de Nat. Deor. disputat mundum nunquam esse factum: hoc etiam exemplum ad praxin retulimus. Instrumenta autem propriè non agunt, sed aguntur aut adjuvant. Et qui causam adjuvantem nullam nisi instrumenta habent, potest rectè " solitaria causa " dici: quanquam lata admodum instrumenti significatio admittitur; ut apud Aristot. Polit. 1, 3, " instrumenta sunt animata, vel inanimata." Quo sensu omnes ferè causæ adjuvantes et ministræ possunt " instrumentales" nominari.

Ad hunc locum referendus commodissimè videtur causarum ordo, quo alia dicitur " prima;" idque vel absolutè, ut Deus, vel in suo genere, ut sol, et ejusmodi quippiam; alia " secunda;" et sic deinceps, quæ à prima vel à prioribus pendet, et quasi effectum est. Alia deinde " remota" dicitur, alia " proxima:" quò spectat illud vulgo dictum, " quicquid est causa causæ, est etiam causa causati." Quæ regula in causis duntaxat necessariò inter se ordinatis valet. Sed hæ causarum divisiones in logica non magnopere sectandæ sunt; quandoquidem tota vis arguendi in causa proxima continetur; deque ea sola generalis definitio causæ intelligitur.

CAP. V.

De Efficiente per se, et per Accidens.

"TERTIÒ, causa efficiens per se efficit, aut per accidens." Tertium hoc par modorum efficiendi est, ab Aristotele etiam et veteribus notatum.

" Per se efficit causa, quæ sua facultate efficit." Id est, quæ ab interno principio effectum producit.

" Ut quæ natura vel consilio faciunt." Naturalis efficientia est elementorum, fossilium, plantarum, animalium. Consilii exemplum est illa Ciceronis de se ad Cæsarem confessio: " nulla vi coactus, judicio meo ac voluntate, ad ea arma profectus sum, quæ erant sumpta contra te."

Naturæ, appetitum; consilio, artem nonnulli adjungunt. Sed appetitus aut ad naturam, aut ad naturæ vitium; ars ad consilium sine incommodo referetur: ars n. et consilium quatenus aliud efficiunt, non illa ab intellectu, hoc à voluntate; sed ut utrumque ab utroque proficisci videtur: etenim ars ferè non invita, non proximæ saltem invita; et consilium prudens sciensque agit. Hi quatuor modi efficiendi per se, ad eundem nonnunquam effectum concurrunt: ut cùm quis loquitur, naturâ; hoc vel illud, consilio simul et appetitu; eleganter, arte.

Videtur itaque huc propriè referenda etiam causa impulsiva, sive ea proegumena, sive procatarctica sit, de quibus capite superiore diximus; quæ non tam causæ sunt principali sociæ aut ministræ quam modi efficientis, quibus vel affectu aliquo impulsus, vel ex occasione aliqua oblata, consilio abductus hoc vel illud agit, ut ex allatis ibi exemplis intelligi potest.

Quæ autem natura necessariò, quæ consilio, libere agunt; necessariò agit quæ aliter agere non potest, sed ad unum quidpiam agendum determinatur, idque solum sua propensione agit quæ necessitas naturæ dicitur; ex hypothesi nimirum. Nisi Deus aliud voluerit, aut externa vis aliorsum impulerit, ut lapidem sursum. Libere agit efficiens non hoc duntaxat ut naturale agens, sed hoc vel illud pro arbitrio, idque absolute vel ex hypothesi. Absolute solus Deus libere agit omnia; id est quicquid vult; et agere potest vel non agere; testantur hoc passim sacræ literæ: libere ex hypothesi, illæ duntaxat causæ quæ ratione et consilio faciunt, ut angeli et homines; ex hypothesi nimirum divinæ voluntatis, quæ iis libere agendi potestatem in principio fecit. Libertas enim potestas est agendi vel non agendi hoc vel illud. Nempe nisi Deus aliud voluerit, aut vis aliunde ingruat.

"Per accidens efficit causa, quæ externa facultate efficit." Id est, non sua; cùm principium effecti est extra efficientem, externumque principium interno oppositum: sic n. efficiens non efficit per se, sed per aliud. Hinc vere dicitur, "omne effectum causæ per accidens potest reduci ad causam per se."

"Ut in his quæ fiunt coactione vel fortuna." Duo n. hæc sunt externa principia internis, naturæ nempe et voluntati sive consilio, opposita. Sic Aristot. Rhet. 2, 20, cùm dixisset, homines facere quædam non per se, quædam per se; subjungit, "eorum quæ non per se, alia per fortunam, alia ex necessitate." Sed "necessitas" vox nimis lata est, ut ex supra dictis de efficiente naturali patebit.

Coactione fit aliquid, cum efficiens vi cogitur ad effectum. Ut cum lapis sursum vel recta projicitur qui suapte natura deorsum fertur. Hæc necessitas coactionis dicitur et causis etiam liberis nonnunquam accidere potest. Sic necesse est mercatori in tempestate merces ejicere, siquidem salvus esse vult. Hæc itaque necessitas mixtas quasdam actiones produxit, quas facit quis volens nolente animo, quod aiunt.

"Fortuna sive fortuitò fit aliquid, cùm præter scopum efficientis accidit." Non enim fortuna, sed efficiens, quæ per fortunam sive fortuitò agit, est propriè causa per accidens rerum fortuitarum: eò quòd earum principium, occulta nimirum illa causa quam "fortunam" dicimus, extra illum efficientem est: fortuna autem est eventuum eorum principium, etsi occultum, non per accidens tamen, sed per se. Fortuna itaque apud veteres aut nomen sine re esse existimabatur, quo usi sunt homines, teste alicubi Hippocrate, cùm secundarias contingentium causas ignorarent, aut est ipsa latens causa: ut Cicero in Top. "cùm enim nihil sine causa fiat, hoc ipsum est fortuna, eventus obscura causa, quæ latenter efficit." Inter fortunam et casum hæc volunt interesse Aristot. Phys. 2, 6, et Plutarch. de Placit. et de Fato, ut casus quàm fortuna latius pateat: fortuna in iis duntaxat qui ratione utuntur; casus in omnibus tam animantibus quàm inanimatis dominetur: sed loquendi ferè usus fortunæ sub nomine casum etiam complectitur, quotiescunque præter scopum sive finem efficientis aliquid accidit. "Sic casu fortuito," ait Tullius, 3, De Nat. Deor. "Pheræo Jasoni profuit hostis, qui gladio vomicam ejus aperuit, quam medici sanare non poterant."

"In hoc genere causarum imprudentia connumerari solet." Sic etiam Aristot. Ethic. 3, 1, "videntur non voluntaria esse, quæ per vim aut ignorantiam fiunt." Et Ovid. 2 Trist.

> Cur aliquid vidi? cur noxia lumina feci?
> Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi est?
> Inscius Actæon vidit sine veste Dianam:
> Præda suis canibus nec minus ille fuit.
> Scilicet in superis etiam fortuna luenda est:
> Nec veniam, læso numine, casus habet.

Durum id esse queritur poeta: nam cæteroqui hinc sumitur plerumque deprecatio; et excusationi etiam nonnunquam locus hic est." Deprecationis exemplum est apud Cic. pro Ligario: "ignosce pater: erravit; lapsus est: non putavit: et" paulò pòst; "erravi: temerè feci: pœnitet; ad clementiam tuam confugio."

Fortunæ autem nomen, ut suprà dictum est, ignoratio causarum confixit: cùm enim aliquid præter consilium spemque contigerit, fortuna vulgò dicitur. Unde Cicero, apud Lactantium, Instit. 3, 29, "ignoratio rerum atque causarum fortunæ nomen induxit." Nec inscite Juvenalis:

> Nullum numen abest, si sit prudentia: sed te > Nos facimus, fortuna, deam: cœloque locamus.

Certè enim et cœlo locanda est; sed, mutato nomine, "divina providentia" dicenda. Unde Arist. Phys. 2, 4, "sunt nonnulli quibus fortuna quidem videtur esse causa, sed ignota humanæ intelligentiæ, tanquam divinum quiddam." Et Cic. Acad. 1, "providentiam Dei quæ ad homines pertinet, nonnunquam quidem fortunam appellant, quod efficiat multa improvisa nec opinata, nobis propter obscuritatem ignorationemque causarum." Sed providentia rerum omnium prima causa est, sive notæ sive ignotæ sint earum causæ secundariæ: et providentiæ si necessitatem adjungas, "fatum" dici solet. Verum de providentia melius theologia quàm logica disceptabit. Hoc tantùm obiter; fatum sive decretum Dei cogere neminem malefacere; et ex hypothesi divinæ præscientiæ certa quidem esse omnia, non necessaria. Non excusandus itaque Cicero pro Ligario, cùm ait, "fatalis quædam calamitas incidisse videtur, et improvidas hominum mentes occupavisse; ut nemo mirari debeat humana consilia divina necessitate esse superata." Multo rectius alibi, "datur quidem venia necessitati;" sed necessitati, quæ instituto efficientis repugnat, et voluntati.

CAP. VI.

De Materia.

"Materia est causa ex qua res est." Efficientem ordine naturæ sequitur materia; et efficientis effectum quoddam est; præparat enim efficiens materiam, ut sit apta ad recipiendam formam. Ut autem efficiens est id quod primum movet, ita id materia quod primum movetur, hinc efficiens, agendi; materia, patiendi principium appellatur. Hæc autem definitio materiæ apud omnes eadem ferè occurrit. "Est causa:" materiæ enim vi effectum est. Illa autem vis particula "ex qua" significatur: quanquam hæc vulgò non materiæ solùm nota est, sed nunc efficientis, ut, "ex ictu vulnus:" nunc partium, ut, "homo constat ex anima et corpore;" nunc mutationis cujusvis, ut, "ex candido fit niger. Res:" nempe quam arguit: effectum scilicet materiatum; ut intelligamus materiam etiam esse omnium entium et non-entium communem; non rerum sensibilium et corporearum propriam. Quales autem res ipsæ sunt, talis materia earum esse debet; sensibilium sensibilis, æternarum æternæ; et ita in reliquis. Sic artium materia sunt præcepta. "Est," i. e. efficitur et constat: unde Cic. 1, Acad. "materia ea causa est, quæ se efficienti præbet, ut ex sese non modò effectum fiat, sed etiam postquam effectum est, constet." Hoc argumento ficto, apud Ovid. 2 Metam. solis domus auro, pyropo, ebore, argento componitur. "Regia solis erat," &c. Sic Cæsar. 1 Bel. Civil. navium materiam describit: "carinæ primum ac statumina ex levi materia fiebant," &c.

Dividitur vulgo materia in primam et secundam; secunda in proximam et remotam. Verùm hæc distributio physica potius est. Id enim solum logicus in materia spectat, ut res ex ea sit; et potissimum quidem ut proximè ex ea sit; proxima enim potissimum arguit.

CAP. VII.

De Forma.

"CAUSÆ primum genus ejusmodi est in efficiente et materia: secundum sequitur in forma et fine." Quia scilicet ordine temporis est posterius. Efficiens enim et materia sub genere priore continentur, quòd in effecto producendo præcedunt; forma et finis sub posteriore, quòd efficientem et materiam sequuntur effectumque ipsum comitantur: positis enim efficiente, et materia, non continuò sequuntur forma et finis: efficiens enim etsi materia suppetit, forma tamen et fine suo nonnunquam frustratur; forma et finis si adsit, necesse est efficientem et materiam fuisse. Qui autem in usu observatur ordo causarum, idem debet in doctrina quoque observari. Nec tamen ordo iste ad constituenda causarum genera satis valet, sed aliud quiddam quod nomine caret. Unde meritò non satis accurata videtur illa causarum distributio, quæ affertur Aristotelis, in causas vel effectum præcedentes, ut efficientem et materiam; vel cum effecto simul existentes, ut formam et finem: tametsi enim hæc distributio ordinem causarum servat, naturam tamen earum non distinguit; immo causæ neque convenit, neque propria est: non convenit, quia causa quælibet, ut causa, non præcedit, sed cum effecto simul est. Præcedunt autem utcunque efficiens et materia effectum vel naturæ ordine, vel temporis: si naturæ, id et cum reliquis causis et cum subjectis omnibus commune habent; si temporis, hoc efficiente et materiæ neque omni commune est (quædam enim cum effecto non nisi simul sunt) neque solis iis proprium; nam et subjecta pleraque adjunctis suis tempore priora sunt. Nec fœliciùs ab eodem Aristotele dividuntur causæ in externas, efficientem et finem; et internas, materiam et formam: hæc enim distributio etsi usus ejus aliquis esse potest, ad leges tamen artis minus accommodata est: esse enim externum vel internum, non est causis proprium, sed effecto etiam et adjuncto commune. Deinde materia et forma cùm intra effectum sunt, non tam causæ quàm partes effecti sunt: quid? quòd finis, quæ perfectio rei est aptitudoque ad usum, interna potius causa diceretur. Postremò, hæc distributio turbat ordinem causarum, methodi proinde legem: efficiens enim est principium motus et causarum prima; finis, ultima est: si igitur internum externo præmittitur, materia et forma, quæ efficientis quodammodo effecta sunt, efficienti præponentur; si externum interno, finis efficienti, i. e. ultima primæ, adjungetur; mediis, materiæ nempe et forma, præmittetur. Cautius itaque Ramus atque arti convenientius, causarum genera anonyma reliquit: quod ut ostenderemus, longiuscule cum venia digressi, nunc ad alterum genus causarum, formam et finem, redeamus. Formæ autem est prior locus concedendus, cum finis nihil aliud sit quàm fructus quidam formæ.

"Forma est causa per quam res est id quod est." Hæc definitio Platonicam et Aristotelicam conjunxit: ille enim definit formam esse causam per quam, hic, quod quid est esse. Ut autem materia, si etiam forma effectum quoddam efficientis quidem est. Formam enim efficiens et producit nondum existentem, et inducit in materiam: forma autem effecti et causa est, et præcipua quidem, solaque effectum arguit, quòd vi formæ potissimum existit. Efficiens enim frustrari forma, forma effecto non potest. Per quam itaque particula eam causam significat eamque vim, quæ rem sive effectum informat atque constituit. Res enim nulla est quæ suam non habeat formam, nobis licet incognitam.

Res etiam singulæ, sive individua, quæ vulgò vocant, singulas sibique proprias formas habent; differunt quippe numero inter se, quod nemo non fatetur. Quid autem est aliud numero inter se, nisi singulis formis differre? Numerus enim, ut rectè Scaliger, est affectio essentiam consequens. Quæ igitur numero, essentia quoque differunt; et nequaquam numero, nisi essentia, differrent. Evigilent hic theologi. Quòd si quæcunque numero, essentia quoque differunt, nec tamen materia, necesse est formis inter se differant; non autem communibus, ergo propriis. Sic anima rationalis, forma hominis in genere est; anima Socratis, forma Socratis propria. "Per quam res est id quod est," i. e. quæ dat proprium esse rei. Cùm enim cujusque ferè rei essentia partim sit communis, partim propria; communem materia constituit, forma propriam. Et per alias quidem causas esse res potest dici; per solam formam "esse id quod est."

"Ideoque hinc à cæteris rebus omnib. res distinguitur." Id est, distinctione, quam vocant essentiali: ex sola enim forma est differentia essentialis. Immo quæcunque inter se quovis modo, eadem etiam formis differunt; fonsque omnis differentiæ forma est; nec aliis argumentis inter se res, nisi formis primariò discreparent. Et hoc quidem consectarium ex definitione est primum, sequitur alterum.

"Forma simul cum re ipsa ingeneratur." Hinc illud verissimum: "posita forma, res ipsa ponitur; sublata, tollitur." Ad exempla nunc veniamus. Anima rationalis est forma hominis, quia per eam homo est homo, et distinguitur à cæteris omnibus naturis: geometricarum figurarum in triangulis, quadrangulis sua forma est: physicarum, cœli, terræ, arborum, piscium sua.

"Unde præcipua rerum ut natura est, sic erit explicatio, si possit inveniri." Tertium hoc consectarium est ex definitione formæ. Unde illud quod de causa in communi supradictum est, nempe fontem esse omnis scientiæ, formæ potissimum convenire intelligitur. Quæ enim causa essentiam præcipuè constituit, eadem si nota sit, scientiam quoque potissimum facit. Sed formam internam cujusque rei nosse, à sensibus, ut ferè fit, remotissimam, difficile admodum est. In artificiosis autem rebus forma, utpote externa, sensibusque exposita, facilius occurrit; ut apud Cæsarem de Bell. Gall. l. 7, "muri autem omnes Gallici hæc ferè forma sunt," &c. Sic forma Virgiliani portus explicatur, Æneid. 1, "est in secessu longo locus," &c.

Distributio autem formæ nulla vera est. Nam quod nonnulli internam vel externam esse volunt, ea distributio neque ad res omnes, sed tantum ad corporeas pertinebit; et externa non minus essentialis cuique rei est artificiosæ, quàm interna naturali.

CAP. VIII.

De Fine.

"Finis est causa cujus gratia res est." Sic etiam "Aristoteles, Phil. 1, 3, quarta causa est cujus et bonum: hoc enim generationis omnis finis est." Cum enim efficiens assecutus est finem, in eo acquiescit, actionique suæ finem imponit. Finis itaque est causarum ultima. Verùm ut rectè "Aristot. Phys. 2, 2, non omne ultimum finalis causa est, sed quod est optimum:" Finis enim vel terminum rei significat, vel bonum rei; sicut et terminus est vel durationis, vel magnitudinis aut figuræ. Finalis autem causa non est nisi bonum quid; eodemque sensu finis et bonum dicitur; verumne an apparens, ad vim causæ nihil interest. Sic etiam Aristot. Phys. 2, 3, idemque in Eth. passim: mali etiam evitatio habet rationem boni. Nonnulli tamen inter finem et finalem causam ita distinguunt, ut finis sit usus rei, finalis autem causa de usu cogitatio. Atqui non cogitatio, sed res, i. e finis ipse effecti causa finalis vera est: nam de materia quoque et de forma prius cogitatur, sine hac tamen distinctione: cogitatur etiam de causa impulsiva, eaque movet efficientem, nec tamen finalis causa dici potest; cùm eam efficiens non appetat, sed sæpius aversetur, quoties affectus aut habitus aliquis pravus ad bonum aliquod apparens consequendum impellit. Idemque finis in animo efficientis primus, in opere atque effecto est postremus. Dum autem in animo tantum efficientis est, et nondum obtinetur, nondum sanè existit; cùm nondum existit, causa esse qui potest? Cum itaque vulgò dicitur, finis quatenus efficientem quasi suadendo movet ut materiam paret, eique formam inducat, non modò effecti, verùm etiam causarum causa earumque optima est, id impropriè et per anticipationem quandam dicitur. In opere autem et usu licet sæpe sit ultimus, aptitudine tamen ad usum nisi simul cum forma et tempore et natura esse intelligatur, erit posterior effecto per formam jam constituto, et adjunctum potius effecti quàm causa. Sic non habitatio, sed ad habitandum aptitudo, quæ cum inducta forma simul et tempore et natura est, proprius finis domus est statuendus, reique perfectio et formæ quasi fructus est. Hinc Græci non modò τελέω perficio, à τέλος, i. e. finis deducunt, sed etiam perfectum τέλειον, à fine, vocant, teste Aristotele, Phil. 8, 24.

Vis autem propria qua finalis causa aliis ab causis distinguitur, his verbis, "cujus gratia," exprimitur; ut et aliis etiam particulis, nempe "cujus causa, ad, ob, pro, propter, quo, quorsum," et similibus. Ne autem est nota illius finis, qui in mali alicujus vitatione versatur. Finis autem dicitur non eorum solùm qui finem sibi proponunt, i. e. efficientium rationalium, sed eorum quæcunque ad finem referuntur, i. e. quorumvis effectorum. Sic physicis rebus finis homo propositus est, homini Deus. Quod nec ignoravit Aristoteles, Phys. 2, 2, "rebus," inquit, "utimur, quasi nostra causa essent omnia: nam et nos quodammodo finis sumus." Deum esse omnium finem docet sapiens Hebræus, Proverb. 16, 4, "Deus propter se fecit omnia." Omnium artium est aliquod summum bonum et finis extremus; quæ et earum forma est: ut grammaticæ, bene loqui; rhetoricæ, bene dicere; logicæ, bene ratiocinari.

Quod autem forma finis quoque esse potest, testatur haud semel Aristoteles, Phil. 8, 24, et Phys. 2, 7, 8. Et Plato in Philebo, essentiam sive formam rei, generationis finem statuit: unde Arist. de Part. 1, 1, idem.

Ut formæ, ita et finis distributio vera nulla est; quæ vulgò efferuntur, non sunt logici finis distributiones, sed specialium finium pro varietate effectorum distinctiones. Distinguitur ab Aristotele, de Anima, l. 2, 4, "finis cujus, et finis cui:" finis cujus, est finis operæ, sive operandi; finis cui, est finis ipsius operis, e. g. in domo ædificanda; finis cujus, sive operæ, est domus; finis cui, sive ipsius operis, i. e. domus ædificatæ, est aptitudo ad habitationem.

Afferuntur et aliæ distributionis fines, quæ ad finem cui pertinent, ut ex Aristot. Mag. Mor. 1, 2, "finis alius est perfectus, alius imperfectus;" vel, quod idem est, ex aliis, "finis est summus, aut subordinatus." Summus autem est, qui propter se expetitur: estque vel universalis, omnib. scilicet rebus communis, vel specialis, cuique speciei peculiaris et proprius. Subordinatius autem non tam finis est, quàm destinatum quiddam ad finem: et esse summum vel subordinatum, esse universale vel speciale, ad alia æque argumenta pertinet, atque ad finem. Postremò, lex distributionis jubet partes distributionis esse oppositas: at inter summum et subordinatum oppositio nulla est. Ad omnes igitur omnium rerum fines intelligendos, unica finis definitio satis est; ut id sit cujus gratia res est: utrum autem sit summus an subordinatus, universalis an specialis, id logica non spectat, sed inferioribus quibusvis disciplinis relinquit.

CAP. IX.

De Effecto.

"EFFECTUM est, quod è causis existit." Effectum cùm sit vi omnium causarum, à causa tamen principe, scilicet efficiente, effectum denominatur. Sed quoniam, si propriè loquimur, effectum ab efficiente solo efficitur, omnium autem causarum vi est, idcirco non definitur ex denominatione quòd à causis efficitur, sed ex re potius, i. e. ex communi causarum vi, quod è causis est vel existit. Jam illud hîc monendum est, ex cap. 2, quod in causa explicanda monuimus, effectum esse argumentum absolute cum causa sive causæ consentaneum, i. e. causam absolutè arguere; ita ut quemadmodum posita causa, ponitur effectum; sic posito effecto, ponatur causa: ut enim causæ dant esse effecto, ita effectum esse suum habet à causis, i. e. ab efficiente, ex materia, per formam, propter finem existit. Effectum igitur causas arguit, et ab iis vicissim arguitur; sed non pari ratione: effectum enim arguit causam esse aut fuisse, Græcis ὅτι; causa autem, quare sit effectum demonstrat, Græcis διότι. Causæ sunt priores et notiores, effectum, ut posterius, ita minus arguit. Sic argentum materia poculi, magis arguit et manifestum reddit naturam poculi, quàm poculum argenti. Interdum autem effecta, non per se quidem, sed nobis notiora, clarius causas arguunt, quàm arguuntur à causis. Sic etiam Aristoteles, Post. 1, 10, "nihil prohibet eorum quæ se reciprocè arguunt," ut causa et effectum, "id notius nonnunquam esse quod non est causa."

"Sive igitur gignatur, sive corrumpatur, sive modo quolibet moveatur quidlibet, hic motus et res motu facta effectum dicitur." Ut causarum modi quidem fuere, ita nunc effectorum quidam his verbis ostenduntur. Modi effectorum generales sunt, vel speciales. Generales sunt vel motus quilibet, quæ "operatio et actio" dicitur; vel res motu factæ, quæ sunt opera. Modi speciales, sive exempla specialia, sunt "generatio, corruptio, et similia," à physicis petita. Causa enim corrumpens est causa procreans corruptionis. Notandum autem est hic rem quamlibet, non motam, sed "motu factam, effectum" dici; nulla enim res corrupta corrumpenti contraria est.

Hujus loci sunt laudes et vituperationes, quarum pleni sunt libri sacri et prophani. A factis enim quisque potissimum laudatur et vituperatur.

Huc etiam dicta scriptaque referenda sunt; consilia item et deliberationes, etiamsi ad exitum perductæ non fuerint. Neque enim facta solùm, sed etiam consulta et cogitata pro effectis habenda sunt.

"Sunt etiam effecta virtutum et vitiorum." Horatius hoc modò ebrietatis effecta describit:

"Quid non ebrietas designat? operta recludit," &c.

Volunt hic plerique Rami interpretes motus doctrinam, utpote rei generalis, ad logicam pertinere; sed non rectè. Quid enim potest logica docere de motu, quod naturale et physicum non sit? "Scientias," inquiunt, ex Aristot. Phys. 8, 3, "et opiniones, motu uti omnes." Utuntur quidem, sed ex natura, quam physica docet, petito. Sic logica ratione utitur, nec tamen rationis naturam, sed ratiocinandi artem docet. Omnis quidem causa movet, effectum movetur; nec tamen quid moveat aut moveatur, sed quid arguat aut arguatur logicus considerat. Ipsum etiam "arguere et argui" non quatenus motus est, aut res motu facta, sed quatenus relatione quadam arguendi vel facultatem ratiocinandi juvat vel artem tradit, ad logicam pertinet.

Duos hic canones causæ et effecti communes, quamvis in physica potiùs quàm in logica tractandos, ut multa alia quæ Aristotelici congerere huc solent, tamen quia sæpe occurrunt et fallaces sunt, appendiculæ in modum libet cum suis cautionibus hic attingere. Primus est, "qualis causa, tale causatum:" ex Aristot. 2 Top. c. 9. Quod verum non est primò in causis per accidens: ut, "hic sutor est vir bonus;" at non ergo "bonos consuit calceos;" potest enim esse sutor non bonus. Secundò, non in causis universalibus: ut, "sol omnia calefacit;" at non "idcirco ipse est calidus." Tertiò, non in causis voluntariis, nisi velint. Quartò, si res in qua effectum est producendum, id per naturam suam recipere non potest.

Canon secundus est, "propter quod unumquodque est tale, illud est magis tale;" Arist. 1 Post. c. 2. Scilicet primò rursus in causis per se: ut, "hic est ebrius;" non ergo "vinum magis ebrium." Secundò, si id à quo tales denominantur utrique insit: ut, "cera sit mollis à sole;" non "ergo sol est mollior." Tertiò, si causa illa recipiat magis et minus: non "ergo si filius est homo propter patrem, pater propterea magis homo." Sed canon hic valet præcipuè in causis finalibus: ut, "hic studiis dat operam propter quæstum; quæstui igitur studet magis."

CAP. X.

De Subjecto.

"ARGUMENTUM modo quodam consentaneum succedit, ut subjectum et adjunctum." Absoluta enim consensio causæ et effecti hanc modo quodam consensionem subjecti et adjuncti meritò præcessit. Modo quodam consentire cum re quam arguunt dicuntur, quæ leviter et extrinsecus tantum consentiunt, i. e. citra rationem essentiæ; cùm non ut causa effecto, ita subjectum det esse adjuncto; neque hoc ab illo essentiam accipiat. De subjecto prius est agendum: etenim subjectum omne suis adjunctis natura prius est, et quodammodo se habet ad adjunctum, ut causa ad effectum.

"Subjectum est, cui aliquid adjungitur." Hoc argumentum Cicero "rem subjectam" appellat, quia nimirum alicui subjicitur; subjici autem id dicitur, cui, cùm ex causis constitutum jam est, aliquid tanquam additamentum quoddam præter causas adjungitur: adjungitur itaque aliquid, quod alteri, nempe subjecto, perfecto jam suisque causis constituto, extrinsecus sive præter essentiam accedit. Subjectum ergo est quod ad aliquid arguendum est affectum, quod sibi præter illam essentiam, quam è causis habet, insuper accedit.

Ut causa, ita et subjectum suos quosdam habet modos: subjici enim aliquid dicitur vel recipiendo adjuncta vel occupando. Undè subjectum distingui potest in recipiens, quod Græce δεκτικὸν appellant, et occupans, quod objectum dici solet, quia in eo adjuncta occupantur. Recipiens vel in se recipit adjuncta, vel ad se: recipiens in se adjuncta, vel sustinet ea et quasi sustentat, quæ idcirco insita et inhærentia appellantur, vel continet, ut locus locatum.

Primus ergo modus est cum subjectum recipit adjuncta insita sive inhærentia. Sic anima est subjectum scientiæ, ignorantiæ, virtutis, vitii; quia hæc animæ adjunguntur, i. e. præter essentiam accedunt: corpus sanitatis, morbi, roboris, infirmitatis, pulchritudinis, deformitatis; quia corpori quidem insunt, sed præter essentiam.

Secundus modus est subjecta adjuncta in se continentis, i. e. loci. Sic locus est subjectum rei locatæ, sive in quo res locata continetur. Sic philosophi divinis entibus, licet parte et magnitudine carentibus, attribuunt locum. Sic geometræ locum locique differentias in rebus geometricis. Physici multo etiam diligentius in rebus physicis considerant, in mundo, in elementis simplicibus, in rebus compositis. Hinc nonnulli dialectici suæ artis amplificandæ studio, ut motus, ita loci doctrinam in logica tractandam esse contendunt. Verùm cùm locus externa sit affectio cujusvis naturæ sive corporeæ sive incorporeæ, miror quid illis, Rami præsertim discipulis, in mentem venerit, ut cùm argumenta, i. e. non res, sed rationes subjectum esse logicæ doceant; res tamen aut rerum naturalium affectiones, motum, locum, tempus in logica tractandas esse statuerent. Locus inquiunt omnium omninò rerum communis est: ergo, inquam, ad artem aliquam non corporum duntaxat, sed rerum naturalium omnium sive physicam, universalem, non ad logicam pertinet: quæ non quid sit locus, spatiumne an superficies corporis ambientis, sed quomodo arguat rem locatam, id solùm considerat; nempe ut subjectum arguit adjunctum.

Tertius modus est subjecti ad vel circa se recipientis adjuncta; quæ idcirco "adjacentia et circumstantiæ" appellantur. Sic homo est subjectum divitiarum, paupertatis, honoris, infamiæ, vestitus, comitatus, et eorum ferè quæ dicuntur "antecedentia, concomitantia, consequentia," si quam omninò affectionem inter se habent non necessariam; quæ causarum et effectorum quæque ab his orta sunt argumentorum affectio duntaxat esse solet. Hactenus de subjecto recipiente.

Quartus modus est subjecti occupantis, in quo nimirum adjunctum occupatur et exercetur: atque hoc propriè objectum dicitur. Sic sensilia sensuum, et res virtutibus ac vitiis propositæ, subjecta vitiorum et virtutum hoc modo nominantur. Color est subjectum visus, sonus subjectum auditus; quia hi sensus in his sensilibus occupantur et exercentur. Virtutes et vitia declarantur in ethicis hoc argumento: temperantia et intemperantia, voluptate; fortitudo et ignavia, periculis; liberalitas et avaritia, divitiis. Sic res numerabilis arithmeticæ; mensurabilis, ut ita dicam, geometriæ subjicitur. Ejusmodi subjecto Cicero 2 Agrar. disputat, inter Campanos nullam contentionem esse, quia nullus sit honor: "Non gloriæ cupiditate," ait, "efferebantur, propterea quòd ubi honos publicè non est, ibi cupiditas gloriæ esse non potest," &c.

CAP. XI.

De Adjuncto.

"Adjunctum est cui aliquid subjicitur," vel quod affectum est ad arguendum subjectum. Doctrina adjuncti doctrinæ subjecti per omnia respondet. Cicero hoc argumentum "adjunctum" et "conjunctum" vocat. Ab Aristotele, accidens vocatur, nec male. Quicquid enim ulli subjecto extrinsecus accidit, sive fortuito sive non, adjunctum ejus est. Animi, corporisque, et totius hominis bona et mala, quæ dicuntur, adjuncta sunt animi, corporis, hominis.

Cùm igitur adjunctum subjecto præter essentiam accedat, non mutatur ejus accessione vel decessione essentia subjecti, neque aliud inde fit subjectum, sed alio duntaxat modo se habet. Unde et modi, qui dicuntur, in adjunctis numerandi sunt. Sic in causis "procreare" et "tueri," modi, ut suprà dictum est, sive adjuncta quædam vel efficientis vel efficiendi sunt.

"Hoc argumentum etsi subjecto est levius, attamen est copiosius et frequentius." Subjecto suo levius est, quia subjectum prius est, et adjuncti sui quodammodo causa. Id quod de adjunctis non quibusvis verum esse docebitur. Hinc Aristot. Phil. S. 1, "adjunctum subjecto est posteriùs ratione, tempore, cognitione et natura:" quod etiam de omni adjuncto ita duntaxat verum est, si de tempore excipias, existentiam enim adjuncti non spectat logica, sed mutuam quam cum subjecto habet affectionem quæ utrobique simul est; ita ut subjectum adjuncto non magis sit tempore prius quam adjunctum subjecto; sublato igitur subjecto, tollitur adjunctum, ut "mortuus non est; ergo nec miser est." Hinc strepitur in scholis, "ab est secundi adjecti, ad est tertii adjecti, valet consequentia negando." Et posito adjuncto, ponitur necessario subjectum; ut, "si mortuus est miser, certè necessario mortuus est." Quod et scholæ sic balbutiunt; "ab est tertii adjecti, ad est secundi, valet consequentia affirmando." Est autem adjunctum subjecto copiosius et frequentius, quia unius ejusdemque subjecti plurima adjuncta esse possunt. Itaque quod de ejusmodi signis ait Ovid. 2, de Remed.

Forsitan hæc aliquis (nam sunt quoque) parva vocabit;
Sed quæ non prosunt singula, multa juvant.

Huc itaque referuntur signa, quæ ad effecta potius referenda sunt; vimque arguendi perinde habent ut eorum causæ certæ sunt et cognitæ. Sic tumor uteri signum est gravidæ; incertum tamen, quia causæ tumoris illius aliæ esse possunt; lac mammarum multo certius, quia causa certior et notior. Ejusdem generis sunt signa physiognomonica, prognostica astrologorum et medicorum. Itaque ut causæ et effecta scientiam, sic subjecta et adjuncta conjecturam ferè pariunt. Hoc genere argumenti Fannium Chæream Cicero pro Roscio comœdo cavillatur: et ab adjuncta corporis habitudine, signa malitiæ colligit: "nonne ipsum caput et supercilia illa penitus abrasa olere malitiam, et clamitare calliditatem videntur? nonne ab imis unguibus usque ad verticem summum (si quam conjecturam affert homini tacita corporis figura) ex fraude, fallaciis, mendaciis constare totus videtur?" Sic Martial. l. 2, Zoilum ludit:

"Crine ruber, niger ore, brevis pede, lumine luscus, Rem magnam præstas, Zoile, si bonus es."

Subjectorum porro modis, adjunctorum respondent modi. Quemadmodum igitur subjectum erat recipiens vel occupans, ita adjunctum est receptum vel occupatum. Receptum vel in subjectum recipitur, vel ad subjectum: quod in subjectum recipitur, vel sustinetur ab eo, vel in eo continetur aut collocatur: quod sustinetur, est adjunctum insitum, sive inhærens.

Primus ergo modus est adjunctorum inhærentium sive insitorum. Omninòque qualitates (qualitas autem est qua res qualis dicitur) subjectis præter causas, i. e. formas externas (quæ etiam qualitatibus numerantur) adjunctæ; sive propriæ sint, quæ omni solique subjecto semper conveniunt, ut homini risus, equo hinnitus, cani latratus; sive communes, quæcunque non sunt eo modo propriæ. Propria autem quatuor modis vulgò dicuntur: soli, sed non omni; ut homini proprium est mathematicum esse, sed non omni: omni, sed non soli; ut bipedem esse homini: omni et soli, sed non semper; ut homini canescere in senectute: omni, soli, et semper; ut risibilem esse homini: hoc demum verè proprium est et reciprocum; ita ut omnis homo sit risibilis, et omne risibile, propriè dictum, sit homo. Adjunctum itaque proprium etsi natura est posterius subjecto, adeoque levius, tempore tamen simul est, nobisque ferè notius; positoque adjuncto proprio, ponitur subjectum, et contrà: subjectum enim adjuncto proprie est modo quodam essentiale, adjunctumque à forma subjecti fluit: habet igitur à forma subjecti, non ab natura sua, quòd subjectum ponit et tollit.

Communis etiam qualitas est separabilis vel inseparabilis: ut aquæ frigus, qualitas est separabilis; humiditas verò inseparabilis; utraque autem communis. Atque istæ qualitatum distinctiones, communium et propriarum, separabilium et inseparabilium, ad judicium faciendum valde sunt utiles, ut secundo libro facile perspiciemus. Ad hunc modum refertur etiam quantitas, qua res magnæ vel parvæ, multæ vel paucæ dicuntur; et passio, qua res aliquid pati dicitur; adeo que motus, ad rem motam si referatur, hujus loci est. Hactenus de adjuncto quod in subjecto sustinetur.

Secundus modus est adjunctorum quæ continetur in subjecto, ut locatum in loco: atque huc etiam situs locorum refertur; nisi si cui ad primum potius modum referendus videatur: cùm situs passio sit quædam rei locatæ, et ad priorem modum sic pertineat. Atque hæc de adjunctis quæ in subjectum recipiuntur.

Tertius modus est adjunctorum quæ recipiuntur ad subjectum; quæ vulgò circumstantiæ nuncupantur, quia extra subjectum sunt. Huc "tempus" refertur, duratio nempe rerum præterita, præsens, futura. Sic etiam Deus dicitur qui est, qui erat, et qui futurus est, Apocal. 1, 8, et 4, 8. Deo tamen ævum sive æternitas, non tempus attribui solet: quid autem est ævum proprie, nisi duratio perpetua, Græcè ἀιων, quasi ἀεὶ ὢν semper existens. Sed quod superioribus capitibus de motu et loco, idem nunc de tempore monendum est; non pertinere ad logicam quid sit tempus philosophari, sed quo in genere argumenti ponendum sit, hic nempe in adjunctis. Huc etiam referuntur divitiæ, paupertas, honor, infamia, vestitus, comitatus, et ejusmodi quicquid adesse, adjacere, circumstare, aut citra vim causæ antecedere, concomitari, sequi, ut suprà in subjecto diximus, dici potest; vel, ut Cic. in Top. Quicquid ante rem, cum re, post rem, dummodo non necessariò, evenit.

Quo circumstantiæ genere, "Dido venetum proficiscens, magnifice 4 Æneid. depingitur:

"Oceanum interea surgens Aurora reliquit.
It portis, jubare exorto, delecta juventus:
Retia rara, plagæ, lato venabula ferro," &c.

In hoc exemplo Dido est subjectum: cujus adjuncta adjacentia sive circumstantiæ variæ hic enumerantur: 1. "Tempus, oceanum interea," &c. 2. "Comitatus," nimirum "delecta juventus, equites," principes "Pœnorum." 3. Instrumenta (quæ quatenus ad habentem referuntur) adjuncta; et hujus quidem modi sunt, "retia, plagæ, venabula, canes, sonipes." 4. Habitus sive vestitus, "Sidonia chlamys, purpurea vestis," &c. Atque hæc de adjuncto recepto.

Quartus modus est adjuncti occupati. "Et" enim "adjunctorum ad subjecta, quibus occupantur, usus item magnus."

Hoc argumento "Plato miseras civitates auguratur, quæ medicorum et judicium multitudine indigeant, quia multam quoque et intemperantiam et injustitiam in ea civitate versari necesse sit." Quia nempe in effectis intemperantiæ sanandis, medici; in effectis injustitiæ vindicandis, judices tanquam adjuncti occupati in subjecto suo occupante versantur.

"Sed categoria" sive locus argumentorum "consentaneorum sic est, unde quidvis alteri consentaneum, vel idem vel unum dici possit: omnesque modi unitatis et (ut ita dicam) identitatis huc sunt tanquam ad primas et simplices fontes referendi."

Ad explicandum consentaneorum in comparationibus usum hæc clausula adjecta est. Namque ut consensionis omnis duorum in uno tertio, ita et unitatis modo hinc sunt petendi. Quot autem modis plura dicuntur inter se consentire, tot etiam modis dicuntur unum et idem: absolute scilicet aut modo quodam: absolute unum vel idem causa et effecto; modo quodam unum et idem subjecto et adjuncto. Causa vel efficiente vel materia vel forma vel fine. Sic plures statuæ efficiente sunt eædem, si ejusdem artificis; materia, si ex eadem, auro scilicet aut ebore; forma, si effigies ejusdem, Alexandri puta vel Cæsaris; fine, si ad eundem ornandum. Sic subjecto idem sunt adjuncta duo vel plura in eodem subjecto; adjuncto idem sunt plura subjecta quibus idem adjungitur: ut duæ vel plures res albæ vel nigræ, albedine vel nigredine idem sunt.

CAP. XII.

De Diversis.

"Argumentum consentaneum expositum est" in causa et effecto, subjecto et adjuncto.

Altera species argumenti artificialis, primi, simplicis, dissentaneum, sequitur. Et sequi debet: ut enim affirmatio negatione, sic consensio prior est dissensione; prior autem non natura solum, verùm etiam usu et dignitate. Ab affirmatione enim et consensione, ut scientia omnis, ita ars omnis atque doctrina deducitur.

"Dissentaneum est quod dissentit à re" quam arguit. Ab altero nempe sui generis ac nominis dissentaneo. Nam in hoc genere argumentorum, argumenta inter se affecta eodem nomine, ideoque plurali numero enunciantur, eademque definitione et doctrina explicantur.

"Sunt autem dissentanea inter se æquè manifesta: alterumque ab altero æqualiter arguitur; tametsi sua dissensione clarius elucescant."

Hæ duæ sunt proprietates dissentaneorum communes. Primum n. in consentaneis causæ effectis, subjecta adjunctis, priora, notiora, firmiora, præstantiora fuerunt: in dissentaneis alterum altero neque prius neque notius; sed natura simul, in illa nempe dissensione, et æquè nota, æquè firma inter se sunt: id quod necesse est cùm eodem nomine ac definitione tractentur.

Secunda quoque proprietas, quam Aristoteles contrariis alligat, dissentaneorum est omnium communis; nempe "sua dissensione clarius elucescere." Quod nisi fieret, argumentum dissentaneorum nullius usus esset. Debet enim omne argumentum affectum esse ad aliquid arguendum et illustrandum. Quorum autem hæc est proprietas ut æquè nota et ignota sint, eorum alterum ab altero argui aut illustrari non potest. Priori igitur proprietati secunda hæc subvenit: quamvis enim dissentanea sint inter se æquè manifesta, ita ut unum ab altero tanquam notiori argui non queat, ex dissensione tamen sua, sive, ut alii loquuntur, juxta se posita, clarius elucescunt. Sic bonæ valetudinis commoda adversæ valetudinis incommodis manifestiora fiunt; virtutum laudes contrariorum vituperatione vitiorum illustrantur.

Utiles itaque sunt hi loci dissentaneorum, teste etiam Aristotele, Top. 3, 4, non solùm ad arguendum et illustrandum, verum etiam ad impellendum ac refutandum: ut enim consentaneorum loci valent maximè ad arguendum, probandum, et confirmandum, sic loci dissentaneorum ad redarguendum, impellendum, et refutandum: ut qui consentaneo argumento doceri non vult, dissentanei absurda consecutione eò redigatur, ut nolens etiam non possit veritati non assentiri. Hinc Aristot. Rhet. 3, 17, "refutantia demonstrativis" anteponit.

"Diversa sunt dissentanea, quæ sola ratione dissentiunt." Nomen hoc videtur aptissimum ad hanc levissimam dissensionem significandam: hac enim voce ea significantur, quæ cùm consensionem quandam inter se habere videantur, possintque per se suaque natura eidem subjecto simul convenire, tamen nec idem sunt, nec ei subjecto competunt cujus ratione dissentire dicuntur: quæ autem dissentiunt in eodem tertio, dissentiunt etiam inter se.

Sola igitur ratione dissentiunt, quia non per se suaque natura dissentiunt, sed solummodo ratione attributionis, i. e. ratione ac respectu alicujus subjecti, cui simul non attribuuntur. Distributio itaque dissentaneorum pro ratione dissensionis rectè instituta est: nam ut consensio alia arctior est et absoluta, alia remissior et imperfecta (unde consentanea divisa sunt in ea quæ absolutè vel modo quodam consentiunt) ita dissensio omnis vel remissior est, ut in distinctione sive discretione diversorum, vel acrior, ut in disjunctione oppositorum: ergo dissentanea aut ratione et modo quodam dissentiunt, ut diversa, aut re et absolute, ut opposita. Verùm quod de consentaneis etiam objici potuit, speciebus æque communicandum est genus (has enim voces etiam communi usu citra artem vulgò intellectus, pace methodi nonnunquam anticipare fas sit) respondetur, quemadmodum consentanea absolute et modo quodam erant æque consentanea, sed non æque consentiebant; sic diversa et opposita æque dissentanea sunt, sed non æque dissentiunt; in diversis tam est dissensio quam in oppositis, sed non tanta: ut in re simili Cic. de Fin. 4, "æquè contingit omnib. fidibus, ut incontentæ sint; illud non continuò, ut æquè incontentæ." Diversa autem idcirco priore loco tractantur, quòd propter levissimam dissensionem videntur affinitatem quandam cum consentaneis præ se ferre. Quanquam autem diversorum doctrina ab omnibus præter Ramum logicis omissa est, constat tamen locum in argumentorum doctrina diversis etiam assignandum, cùm ex arguendi varia affectione argumenta distinguenda sint, affectio autem dissensionis in diversis, ut diximus, levior sit, in oppositis acrior. Cur diversa logici hactenus omiserint, videtur hoc esse; quod ad unum syllogismum omnia referunt, in quo diversa locum non habent, ut l. 2, ostendetur.

Diversorum autem notæ sunt frequentissimè "non hoc, sed illud, quanquam, tamen:" ut pro Pompeio; "non victoriam, sed insignia victoriæ reportarunt."

Victoria et victoriæ insignia res admodum affines sunt; possuntque ac debent eidem duci competere: ad Syllam autem et Muræenam si spectas, qui non reportata victoria triumpharunt, dissentanea sunt, et distinguuntur, alteroque affirmato alterum negatur. Sic Ovid. 2, de Arte:

> "Non formosus erat, sed erat facundus Ulysses."

Et Virg. Æneid. 2.

> "Hic Priamus quanquam in media jam morte tenetur, > Non tamen abstinuit."

Ut victoria et victoriæ insignia respectu Syllæ et Murænæ, sic formosum et facundum respectu Ulyssis, in media morte teneri et non abstinere à convitiis ratione Priami, diversa adeoque dissentanea sunt. Paulò sècus in Eunucho:

> "Nam si ego digna hac contumelia > Sum maxime: at tu indignus qui faceres tamen."

Sed idem est ac si dictum esset, quanquam ego digna; tamen tu indignus qui mihi hanc contumeliam faceres. Dignam se quidem esse contumelia Thais affirmat; à Chærea tamen negat. Cic. 5 Tusc. "Quanquam sensu corporis judicantur, ad animum tamen referuntur." Hoc affirmato, negatum intelligitur non ad corpus.

Item illa aliusmodi. Pro Ligario: "scelus tu illud vocas, Tubero? cur? isto n. nomine illa adhuc causa caruit: alii enim errorem appellant, alii timorem; qui durius, spem, cupiditatem, odium, pertinaciam; qui gravissimè, temeritatem: scelus præter te adhuc nemo." In hoc genere exemplorum aliquid conceditur, ut aliud vicinum possit negari: cujusmodi et illud est; veritas premi potest, opprimi non potest; et similia.

Atque hi modi quidam diversorum sunt: in quibus plerunque accidit, ut quæ sua natura sunt opposita, ratione tamen certi alicujus subjecti sint tantùm diversa; ut in exemplo superiore error, timor, spes, cupiditas, pertinacia, scelus. Sic aurum, argentum, æs opposita sunt, ut infrà liquebit: ratione tamen attributionis huic vel illi subjecto, qui unum vel aliqua horum habet, alterum vel reliqua non habet, cùm habere simul possit, diversa sunt.

CAP. XIII.

De Disparatis.

"Opposita" sunt "dissentanea, quæ ratione et re dissentiunt." Opposita respondent nomine quidem iis, quæ ab Aristotele ἀντικείμενα dicuntur; sed re et significatione latius patent; nam ἀντικείμενα Aristoteli (qui disparata non attigit) nihil aliud quàm "contraria" sunt. Possunt etiam "repugnantia" dici; siquidem repugnare ea dicuntur, quæ ejusmodi sunt, ut cohærere nunquam possint; quod Cic. ait in Top. ejusmodi enim sunt opposita. "Re" autem "et ratione," est non solùm ratione certi alicujus subjecti, cui cùm tribuuntur, simul non conveniunt, verùm etiam reipsa, i. e. per se et inter se, sua ipsorum natura dissentire, etiam subjecto cuivis non attributa; cui si tribuuntur, non solùm non conveniunt, sed, servata, quæ sequitur, oppositorum lege, convenire non possunt. Ea lex quæ ex ipsa definitione oritur, et est oppositorum omnium communis, non, ut docuit Aristoteles, contrariorum propria, hæc est, "Opposita eidem attribui, secundum idem, ad idem, et eodem tempore non possunt." "Eidem," i. e. eidem numero, rei, sive subjecto. "Secundum idem," i. e. eadem parte. "Ad idem," i. e. eodem respectu; ut, "sol et major est terra et minor;" sed non eodem respectu; in se quidem major; ut nobis videtur, minor. Extra has tres conditiones possunt eidem subjecto attribui opposita. "Sic Socrates, albus et ater non potest secundum idem," i. e. eadem parte esse; pater et filius ejusdem," sive ad eundem relatus; "sanus et æger eodem tempore: at albus esse potest alia parte, ater alia; pater hujus, filius illius; sanus hodie, cras æger."

"Itaque ex altero affirmato alterum negatur."

"Ex quo facile apparet quid intersit inter diversa et opposita: in illis enim "altero affirmato;" in his, "ex altero affirmato" alterum negatur: i. e. ex affirmatione unius, necessario sequitur negatio alterius. Ut, sumpto ex diversis exemplo, "non victoriam, sed insignia victoriæ reportarunt:" hic insignia victoriæ affirmantur, victoria negatur; non ex his affirmatis negatur illa: at in oppositis, dicta lege servata, Socrates est homo, ergo non est equus: juxta illud; "opposita se invicem tollunt.

"Opposita autem sunt disparata aut contraria.

"Disparata sunt opposita quorum unum multis pariter opponitur."

Disparatorum ergo remissior videtur esse oppositio, contrariorum acrior. Disparata etiam à Boethio nominantur, "quæ tantum à se diversa sunt, nulla contrarietate pugnantia," ut vestis, ignis. Apud Ciceronem tamen, Invent. 1, et Fabium, l. 5, c. 10, contradicentia significant. Nos verborum inopia coacti, Boethium sequimur. Multis, nempe sine ulla certa oppositionis lege aut numero: nam et infinitæ ferè res hoc modo opponi inter se possunt: et sic intelligendum est verbum opponitur, juxta illud; "Vocabula in artibus facultatem significant:" ut vestis et ignis etsi res duæ, inter se tamen disparata sunt, eò quòd multis pariter opponi possunt. Pariter: i. e. æquè pari ratione, eodem dissensionis modo: ut enim disparata sint, non multis tantum, sed pariter opponi debent. Albedo opponitur nigredini, flavedini, rubedini, ut unum pluribus; non autem singulis ut disparatum, quia non pariter: nigredini enim opponitur ut contrarium, cæteris rebus omnibus ut disparatum. Viride, cineraceum, rubrum, media sunt inter album et nigrum, quæ singula extremis, et inter se disparata sunt. Sic liberalitas et avaritia inter se disparantur. Sic homo, arbor, lapis, et ejusmodi res infinitæ disparantur; nec eadem res potest esse homo, arbor, lapis. Virgil. 1 Æneid. hoc argumento disputat:

> "O quam te memorem, virgo! namque haud tibi vultus > Mortalis; nec vox hominem sonat: o dea certè."

CAP. XIV.

De Relatis.

"CONTRARIA sunt opposita, quorum unum uni tantum opponitur."

Intelligitur autem unum uni in eodem genere opponi contrariorum, ut relatorum unum uni tantum, et sic in reliquis: nam in diversis speciebus contrariorum, plura possunt ut contraria, uni eidemque rei opponi; ut "videnti, non videns, et cæcus; motui, motus contrarius, et quies; servo, dominus, et liber."

Quæ Aristoteles ἀντιθέμενα et ἀντικείμενα, ea Cicero in Topicis (quem Ramus sequitur) contraria appellat: quas etiam in species quatuor Aristoteles ἀντικείμενα, in easdem Cicero contraria distribuit.

Priùs autem quàm ad contrariorum distributionem in species accedimus, inserenda est distinctio quædam non inutilis, et ad ea quæ diximus capite superiore clariùs intelligenda, et ad eas, quæ secundo libro dicentur, disjunctiones necessarias à contigentibus dijudicandas. Dictum est superiore capite, viride, cineraceum, rubrum, media esse inter album et nigrum, quæ singula extremis et inter se disparata sunt. Sciendum itaque est contraria, quasi extrema quædam, habere alia medium, alia medio carere: medium vel est negationis vel participationis; ex Aristotele, Top. 4, 3, et Phil. V, 7. Medium negationis est quicquid inter duo contraria dici potest, quod sit neutrum eorum: ut inter præceptorem et discipulum, is qui neque est præceptor neque discipulus. Medium participationis est, quod utriusque extremi naturam participat; ut viride inter album et nigrum, tepidum inter calidum et frigidum. Contrariorum igitur quæ medium habent, non est necesse alterutrum affirmari; potest enim affirmari medium: quæ autem medio carent, eorum alterum necesse est affirmari. Quœnam autem contraria medium habeant aut non habeant, ex eo dignoscitur quod et Gellius tradit, l. 16, Noct. Att. c. 8. Contraria quorum contradicentia, cùm attribuuntur ei subjecto cui propriè possunt attribui, sunt etiam inter se contraria, ea medium non habent. Sanum et ægrum contraria sunt: eorum contradicentia, non sanum non ægrum, si animali attribuas cui soli possunt attribui, contraria etiam reperies: non sanum enim, est ægrum: non ægrum, sanum; sanum ergo et ægrum medio carent: sic nox et dies, non nox et non dies, æquè sunt inter se contraria; non nox enim, est dies; non dies, nox; medio igitur carent: sic visu prœditum, et cæcum esse, si homini tribuis. Quorum verò contradicentia non sunt contraria, ea medium habent: ut præceptor et discipulus; non præceptor enim, non est discipulus; neque non discipulus, est præceptor; etenim potest alteruter aliquid esse tertium sive medium. Sic album et nigrum: namque non album et non nigrum de quovis colore medio dici possunt. Nunc ad distributionem contrariorum veniamus.

"Affirmantia, quorum utrumque affirmat." Scilicet rem, sive veram sive fictam; vel quorum vox utraque rem certam ponit atque significat; quorumque unum alteri ut res rei opponitur; ut pater filio, calor frigori. Contraria itaque affirmantia, quod hic notandum est distinguendum, sunt quorum utrumque affirmat rem, non affirmatur de re sive subjecto eodem, id enim supradictæ oppositorum regulæ, qua ex altero affirmato alterum negatur, planè repugnaret. Quæ igitur affirmat rem aut negat, topica affirmatio aut negatio dicitur; quæ res de alio affirmatur aut negatur axiomatica, de qua lib. 2.

Atque ita quidem ut ex eorum illa mutua affectione, contrarietas ipsa nascatur, ut infra demonstrabitur. Quid ergo; num idcirco relata nunc consentanea nunc dissentanea sunt? Nequaquam, ut relata quidem: sed ea tamen quæ relata sunt, aliis atque aliis argumentorum generibus possunt subjici; ipsa interim argumentorum genera inconfusa et distincta manent. Sic causa et effectum, quæ arguendo inter se relata sunt, adeoque dissentanea et æque manifesta, suam tamen vim propriam arguendi retinent, qua et consentanea sunt, et causa prior notiorque effecto. Relata esse contraria ex definitione et consectariis contrariorum liquet; sunt enim opposita, quorum unum uni tantum opponitur, ut pater et filius. At, inquis, unus multis, pater filiis, frater fratribus, præceptor discipulis, herus famulis, opponi potest. Respondetur, opponi patrem filio ut relatum; neque aliud quicquam patri quàm filium, neque filio quàm patrem; et sic de cæteris: sed hunc patrem et hunc filium, hunc præceptorem et hunc discipulum, &c. non esse relata, sed disparata: neque enim horum alter ex mutua alterius affectione constat; neque natura simul sunt, et alter sine altero existere potest. Itaque primæ substantiæ, sive individua et singularia, ut ait Aristoteles, Categor. 5, non sunt relata. Et Categor. 6, ait multa genera "relata esse, singularia verò nulla:" sed non video cur relata, quemadmodum et alia argumenta, etiam in singularibus considerari non possunt; singularia enim exempla sunt ferè omnia. Nec magis video cur in uno relato singulari non possit ad correlata multa esse multiplex relatio; dummodo relatio una numero inter bina tantummodo sit, totiesque consideretur quot sint correlata; patris nimirum toties quot sunt filii; filii quot sunt parentes, pater nempe et mater; fratris, quot sunt fratres et sorores: nam nisi quicquid de relatis in genere dici solet, de singulis quoque relatis verè dicatur. Id ne toto quidem de genere verè dici posset. Si reponas ex Aristot. Philos. 5, Relata non significare existentiam, ne cætera quidem argumenta id significant sed mutuam tantummodo affectionem. Sunt affirmantia, i. e. ut duæ voces sunt, ita etiam duæ sunt res inter se oppositæ; ut pater, filius. Constare autem alterum ex mutua alterius affectione, est nullam aliam habere essentiam, quatenus relata sunt, præter mutuam illam unius affectionem ad alterum et alterius ad illud. "Atque inde nominata sunt relata," quòd ad se invicem referuntur, totaque illorum natura in relatione consistit. Sic patrem esse, est habere filium; filium esse, est habere patrem. Hinc illud, Omnia relata convertuntur: ut pater est filii pater; filius est patris filius.* Hujus mutua affectionis ratione relata sunt mutuæ sibi causæ et mutui effectus, nam quòd quis pater est, id habet à filio; quòd filius, à patre: et tamen hujus mutuæ affectionis vi ita sibi invicem opponuntur, ut neque unum de altero nec ambo de tertio dici possint; ut Æneas est pater Ascanii, ergo non est Ascanii filius; Ascanius est filius Æneæ, ergo non est Æneæ pater. Sed quoniam relatorum unum constat ex mutua alterius affectione, mutuæque sibi, ut diximus, causæ atque effecta sunt, consectarium hoc inde est quod sequitur.

Relata autem simul esse natura docuerunt et veteres logici, Aristoteles, Damascenus, et alii; relataque se mutuò inferre mutuoque tollere; ut posito patre, ponatur filius; sublato, itidem tollatur: etiamsi enim ille manet qui filius fuit, non tamen filius manet. Neque solùm unum existere nequit sine altero, sed ne intelligi quidem. Necesse est igitur, quod et meminit Aristot. Top. 3, "Ut alterum in alterius definitione comprehendatur;" utque alterum perfecte, i. e. definite, qui norit, norit continuò alterius definitionem; quæ sicuti et essentia eorum, reciproca est. Supra itaque Ramus definivit subjectum, "cui aliud adjungitur;" non, "quod alteri subjicitur," ut alii malebant; etiamsi his verbis non modò essentia subjecti, sed etiam notatio contineri videatur: deinde adjunctum definivit, "cui aliquid subjicitur," non quod alteri adjungitur, quia subjectum et adjunctum relata sunt; et subjectum adjuncti, adjunctum subjecti, ex qua alterum alterius mutua affectione constat, ea erat definiendum, quæ ipsorum essentia est. Ad exempla nunc veniamus.

Pro Marcello: "Ex quo profectò intelligis quanta in dato beneficio sit laus, cùm in accepto tanta sit gloria." Hic dare et accipere relata sunt, quorum unius consequens ex consequente alterius intelligi ait Cicero. Martialis in Sosibianum, l. 1.

> "Tum servum scis de genitum, blandeque fateris;
> Cùm dicis dominum, Sosibiane, patrem."

Arguebat se servum esse genitum Sosibianus, dum negare videbatur, quia dominum vocabat patrem. Sic apud Quintilianum, l. 5, c. 10. "Si portorium Rhodiis locare honestum est, et Hermacreonti conducere." Quomodo et in Oratore Perfecto Tullius: "Num igitur est periculum, ait, nequis putet in magna arte et gloriosa turpe esse docere alios id quod ipsi fuerit honestum discere?" Apud Ovidium in ætatis ferreæ descriptione, Metam. 1, varia relatorum exempla afferuntur:

> "—— Non hospes ab hospite tutus,
> Non socer à genero: fratrum quoque gratia rara est.
> Imminet exitio vir conjugis, illa mariti:
> Lurida terribiles miscent aconita novercæ:
> Filius ante diem patrios inquirit in annos."

"Atqui argumentum talis relationis contrarium nihil habet, immo arguit mutuas causas:" ut sum tuus pater; tu es igitur meus filius. At quum dico, sum tuus pater; non igitur sum tuus filius, tum contraria verè sunt; atque ex ipsa quidem hac mutua relatione.

CAP. XV.

De Adversis.

"Adversa sunt contraria affirmantia, quæ inter se velut è regione absolutè adversantur."

Sic etiam à Cicerone appellantur in Topicis. Sunt contraria, quia eorum unum uni tantum opponitur; ut honestum turpi: duo n. duntaxat possunt sibi invicem è regione adversari. Sunt affirmantia; quia unum uni opponitur, ut res rei; quod supra demonstratum est, et infra clarius patebit. His autem verbis "è regione absolutè adversantur," nihil aliud quàm directa oppositio, adeoque maxima, intelligitur; qualis est inter duo puncta diametri in eodem circulo. His etiam verbis distinguuntur adversa à suis mediis, quæ inter se et cum extremis disparantur. Absolutè; i. e. omninò, perfectè; ut in consentaneis, quæ absolutè consentiebant. Ramus perpetuò dixerat: sed assentior aliis, qui absolutè malunt; nam perpetuò opponi, omnib. oppositis etiam relatis, commune est, quatenus opposita sunt, i. e. ratione et re dissentiunt. Absolutè autem additur, ut hac particula distingui adversa possint à relatis, in quibus consensio quædam est, quatenus alterum ex mutua constat alterius affectione, cujusmodi hic omninò nulla est. Sic albor et nigror, calor et frigus opponuntur.

Aristoteles, contraria (sic enim adversa vocat Categ. 6) definit, "quæ plurimum inter se distant in eodem genere:" et rursus Categ. 8, "Contraria sunt vel in eadem specie, vel in eodem genere." Quem Cic. est secutus in Top. et Galen de Opt. secta. Verum adversa, ut docet idem Arist. cap. de Contrariis, non in eodem solùm genere plurimum differunt, ut album et nigrum, verum etiam in contrariis, ut justitia et injustitia; vel ipsa genera, ut bonum et malum, virtus et vitium. Quid quod in eodem genere differre, commune videtur adversis cum relatis: pro eodem igitur genere, rectius in definitione ponitur è regione, prout Cicero interpretatur. Æneid. 11.

Libertas et servitus apud Tibullum, 1, 2.

> "Sic mihi servitium video, dominamque paratam;"
> Tu mihi libertas illa paterna vale."

Sic consilium et casus; pro Marcello: "nunquam enim temeritas cum sapientia commiscetur, nec ad consilium casus admittitur." Et Parad. 1, contra Epicureos: "illud tamen arctè tenent accurateque defendunt, voluptatem esse summum bonum: quæ quidem mihi vox pecudum videtur, non hominum," &c. Pecudem et hominem adversa Cicero opposuit: voluptas pecudis bonum est, non igitur hominis. Usus enim hujus argu-menti non in qualitatibus duntaxat, ut vulgò putant, verùm in substantiis etiam et quantitatibus, immo omnibus in rebus versatur: id quod Aristot. non diffitetur, cùm ait Phil. x. 3, "Contraria etiam ad primas entis differentias referri:" et rursus; "in omni genere contrarietatem esse." Contrarietas deinde argumentum esse logicum ab omnibus agnoscitur: nihil ergo obstat quominus ad quævis rerum genera pertineat. Quædam denique formæ vel maximè substantiæ sunt: formas autem specificas omnes sibi invicem adversas esse, apud omnes receptissimum est: immo verò major videtur esse formarum contrarietas quàm qualitatum; qualitates enim commisceri facile possunt, formæ vix unquam. Quod ergo idem Aristot. alibi docet, substantiæ et quantitati nihil esse contrarium, id non ratione tantùm, sed ipsius etiam testimonio suprà citato refellitur; non substantiarum autem pugna etsi non physica, logica tamen est, dum ex altera substantia singulari affirmata, negatur altera.

CAP. XVI.

De Contradicentibus.

"CONTRARIA negantia sunt, quorum alterum ait, alterum negat idem." Ab altero negante sic nominantur: in puris enim negantibus, ut loquuntur, nullus est rationis usus. Atque hinc demum nunc clarius patet, quænam essent contraria affirmantia: de quibus cùm dictum est, de negantibus quoque est dictum quod satis sit.

"Ea sunt contradicentia aut privantia.

"Contradicentia sunt contraria negantia, quorum alterum negat ubique:" ut justus, non justus; animal, non animal; est, non est.

"Contradicentia sunt contraria," quia una negatio uni affirmationi opponitur, et contrà; immo sine medio. Sic etiam Aristot. Post. 1, 2, "Contradictio est oppositio cujus nullum est medium per se." Quorum alterum negat ubique; i. e. in re qualibet: negare enim ubique est de re qualibet dici, de qua affirmatum non dicitur; ut de quo videt non dicitur, de eo non videt dicitur. Unde illud vulgò dictum, "contradicentia sunt omnia:" et illud Aristot. 1, Post. 1, 2, "quodvis verè est vel affirmare vel negare: verè affirmare et negare simul, impossibile est," et Top. 6, 3, de qualibet re vel affirmatio vel negatio verè dicitur." Alterum autem negare ubique dicitur, vel expressè vel implicitè. Expressè ut suprà, cum negandi particula: implicitè, cùm reipsa non minus contradicit et repugnat alteri, quàm si verbo negaret; ut corpus infinitum, proprietas communis. Vulgò vocatur contradictio in adjecto; quia id subjecto adjungit quod subjectum planè tollit; atque ita contradictionem implicat. Atque hinc etiam est quòd contradicentia medio carent non solùm participationis, verum etiam negationis, quia necesse est affirmare vel negare unum quodvis de altero. Sic etiam Boethius in Topicis: "inter affirmationem et negationem nulla est medietas." Contradicentium porrò exempla hæc sunt. In defensione Murænæ contradicitur sententiis Catonis et Ciceronis; illius Stoici, hujus Academici. Dialogus est his verbis: "nihil ignoveris: immo aliquid, non omnia. Nihil gratiæ causa feceris: immo ne resistito gratiæ, cum officium et fides postulabit. Misericordia commotus ne sis; etiam in dissolvenda severitate: sed tamen est aliqua laus humanitatis. In sententia permaneto: enimverò nisi sententia alia vicerit melior." In hoc exemplo quadruplex contradictio est; nihil ignoveris; nonnihil ignoveris: nihil gratiæ causa feceris; nonnihil gratiæ causa feceris, &c. Martial. l. 1.

> "Bella es; novimus: et puella; verum est:
> Et dives; quis enim potest negare?
> Sed dum te nimium, Fabulla, laudas,
> Nec dives, neque bella, nec puella es."

Cicero in Tusc. cogit hoc argumento Atticum Epicureum fateri mortuos miseros non esse, si omnino non sint, ut Epicurei credebant. "Quem esse negas; eundem esse dicis: cùm enim miserum esse dicis, tum eum qui non sit, esse dicis." Sic Terentianus Phædria Dori eunuchi dictum elevat, quòd affirmasset prius, quæ pòst inficiaretur: modò ait, modò negat.

Sunt qui contradictionem nullam esse statuunt, nisi axiomaticam; de qua lib. 2. Verùm si affirmatio et negatio topica datur, ut suprà demonstravimus, necesse est dari quoque topicam contradictionem: qualis est illa Rom. 9, "Vocabo non populum meum, populum meum; et non dilectam, dilectam." In distinctionibus etiam frequentissimus est hujus contradictionis usus; præsertim ubi alterum distinctionis membrum apta voce exprimi non potest: ut dialecticæ materia est ens, et non ens; lex est scripta, vel non scripta. Sic ad Critonem Socrates; "videris opportunè quidem non excitasse me." In his exemplis axiomatica contradictio nulla est; uti neque in illo quod suprà in hoc capite ex Martiale allatum est: "bella es; novimus: et puella," &c. Non enim verbum est sive copulatio negatur, sed partes. Fabulla est bella, et puella, et dives; Fabulla est et non bella, et non puella, et non dives. Axiomatica enim contradictio hujusmodi fuisset: Fabulla non est et bella et puella et dives: quod lib. 2 clarius intelligetur.

CAP. XVII.

De Privantibus.

"PRIVANTIA sunt contraria negantia, quorum alterum negat in eo tantum subjecto, in quo affirmatum suapte natura inest." Atque hic affirmatum dicitur habitus, quo quis quid habet, negatum autem privatio, qua quis ea re privatur aut caret: ut visus et cæcitas, motus et quies in iis rebus quæ motu conservantur. Sunt contraria, quòd unum uni opponitur, habitus privationi; qua ex parte negantia quoque dicuntur: nam et hic rei alicujus affirmationi ejusdem negatio, i. e. enti non ens opponitur: privatio enim, ut inquit Aristot. Phys. 2, 8, "per se est non ens:" et Plut. de primo frigido; privatio est essentiæ negatio;" habituique opponitur, non ut natura quædam aut essentia per se existens, sed ut ejus corruptio et ademtio. Quorum alterum negat in eo tantum subjecto, in quo, &c. His verbis forma privantium qua distinguuntur à contradicentibus, exprimitur. In contradicentibus enim negatio infinita est, affirmatum suum ubique, i. e. qualibet in re negans; ut quicquid non est justum, est non justum, in privantibus verò finita est negatio, atque in eo tantum subjecto affirmatum sive habitum negans, in quo affirmatum suapte natura inest: aut inesse potest; ut etiam Aristot. in Categor. Sic cæcitas est negatio visus, non ubique et in re qualibet, sed in qua solùm visus inesse natura debuit: nam privari aliquid tum demum dicitur, cùm eo caret quod natum est habere: non ergo quicquid non videt, propriè cæcum dicitur. Deinde in contradicentibus negatum contradicendo negat, et est pura negatio; ut videns, non videns; in privantibus negat privando; nec solum negatio est, sed privans negatio et extinctio habitus alicujus qui inesse natura subjecto debuit aut potuit; ut videns, cæcus. Hinc illæ privationis proprietates ex Plut. de primo frigido, non inutiles: "privatio iners et agendi impos est: non suscipit magis aut minus;" neque enim quis dixerit hunc illo cæciorem; aut tacentem, magis minusve tacere; aut defunctum, magis minusve esse mortuum: habitus enim gradus esse possunt, non entis non item: illa autem Aristot. "à privatione ad habitum non datur regressus," incertior est: cùm enim habitus quo quis habere quid dicitur duo modi sint, potentia et actus, à privatione potentiæ vel facultatis, idque natura duntaxat, regressus negatur. Contradicentia denique medio carent non solùm participationis, verùm etiam negationis: privantia verò carent quidem medio participationis, nulla enim est habitus cum privatione permixtio; non carent autem medio negationis; multa enim sunt, quæ neque vident, neque cæca sunt; ut lapis, arbor, &c., nisi cùm ei subjecto attribuuntur, cui natura inesse debuerunt: tum enim negationis etiam medio carent; quippe omnis homo aut videns est aut cæcus, gnarus aut ignarus. Exempla porrò privantium sunt dives et pauper: Martial. l. 5.

> "Semper eris pauper, si pauper es, Æmiliane.
> Dantur opes nullis nunc, nisi divitibus."

Vita et mors, ut in Miloniana: "hujus mortis sedetis ultores, cujus vitam, si putetis per vos restitui posse, nolitis." Item loqui et tacere: 1 Catil. "quid expectas auctoritatem loquentium, quorum voluntatem tacitorum perspicis." Cætera exempla quæ Ramus attulit, minus quadrant: ut ebrius et sobrius, mortalis et immortalis, quæ potius adversa sunt. Neque enim "in" præpositio in compositis privationem semper, sed adversum habitum sæpe significat; unde nec peccatum privationem esse dixerim; siquidem hoc vel illud peccatum sive vitium, privatio non est. Atque hæ quidem species contrariorum sunt. Sed quæri hic solet, quænam earum sint maximè inter se contrariæ. Aristoteles maximam contrarietatem nunc adversis tribuit, nunc contradicentibus. Sed videtur maximam esse dissensionem inter privantia: deinde inter adversa; minorem adhuc inter contradicentia; minimam inter relata: nam relata propter illam mutuam affectionem, partim consentanea sunt: contradicentia purè quidem contraria negantia sunt, sed tamen propter infinitam illam negationem, pro mediis et disparatis crebro accipiuntur, ut non calidum non tam opponitur calido quàm frigidum; quoniam non calidum potest tepidum esse; sic non bonum, medium quiddam esse potest et adiaphorum: non album de rubro dici aut intelligi potest: adversa è regione quidem adversantur; non ita tamen, quin commisceri queant: privantia verò mixtionem non admittunt; et privatio ferè est habitus extinctio atque ereptio aut saltem deficientia; habitusque est ens, privatio non ens; enti autem nihil, æquè ac non ens, contrarium est.

"Sed dissentaneorum categoria sic est, unde quidvis ab altero differre quolibet modo possit."

Quanquam enim causa omnis essentialis differentiæ, formæ primitus est reliquarum, argumenta reliqua consentanea, ut quot modis consentire totidem dissentire res dicantur, causa nempe vel effecto, subjecto vel adjuncto, modi tamen omnes, quib. res inter se differunt vel ratione scilicet vel re, non tractantur nisi in dissentaneis, vel si comparantur, in comparatis. Unde illud genere vel specie differre, nihil aliud est quàm communi vel propria forma, quarum illa symbola sunt, ut infra dicetur.

CAP. XVIII.

De Paribus.

"Argumenta simplicia ita fuerunt in consentaneis et dissentaneis.

"Comparata sunt argumenta prima, quæ inter se comparantur."

Simplex rerum affectio comparatione prius tractanda fuit; hanc enim si removes, comparata omnia aut consentanea erunt aut dissentanea. Platonis doctrina et Xenophontis ante adjuncta utrique erat, quàm comparata. Sunt argumenta prima non orta, eo quòd orta, ut patebit infra, eandem habent affectionem cum primis unde orta sunt; comparata etsi simplicia prius fuere, simplicium tamen affectionem non habent. Inter se comparantur; nimirum quæ sunt ejusdem generis: genera autem distributio mox docebit. Nunc proprietates comparatorum sunt dicendæ.

"Comparata etsi ipsa comparationis natura æquè nota sunt; attamen alterum altero alicui notius et illustrius esse debet."

Ubi hoc advertendum, non sua sed comparationis natura dici æquè nota esse comparata. Ita sunt, inquis, et relata vi relationis; immo argumenta omnia quæ etiam relata sunt. At, inquam, relatio et comparatio non sunt idem; et reliqua argumenta, et si quatenus relata sunt notione logica, æquè nota sunt, sua tamen natura, prout quæque est, vel æquè vel non æquè sunt manifesta; dissentanea quidem æquè, consentanea non æquè, ut jam supra est dictum. Debet autem ei quicum disputamus comparatorum id quod arguit sua natura et priusquam comparatio instituitur, notius esse atque illustrius eo quod arguitur; æquè enim obscurum nihil argueret. Unde in signis comparatorum usus elucet; quo fit ut inæqualis rerum notitia comparationis vi æqualis reddatur. Sic consentanea ad probandum, dissentanea ad refellendum, comparata ad illustrandum aptissima sunt.

"Comparata autem sæpe notis brevius indicantur; aliquando partibus distinguuntur, quæ propositio redditioque nominantur."

Duplex ergo est comparationis forma: altera contracta, altera explicata. Contracta est quæ uno verbo concluditur, ut infra cap. 21. Explicata, quæ partibus distinguitur; partesque istæ propositio et redditio nominantur. Propositio præcedit sæpe, et argumentum est: redditio sæpe sequitur, estque id quod arguitur: si secus occurrit, inversio est. Omnis autem forma comparationis contracta, suis partibus explicari potest.

"Atque omnino comparata etiam ficta arguunt fidemque faciunt."

Arguunt scilicet rem veram; in quo cæteris argumentis præcellunt; quæ ficta si sunt, rem fictam duntaxat arguunt; ut materia ficta, fictam solis domum. At comparata etiam ficta, non sua quidem natura, sed comparationis vi, res veras arguunt fidemque faciunt.

"Comparatio est in quantitate vel qualitate.

"Quantitas est qua res comparatæ quantæ dicuntur.

"Estque parium vel imparium." Non hic loquimur de quantitate solùm mathematica, quæ magnitudinis est aut numeri, sed de quantitate logica, quæ ratio quælibet sive affectio est, qua res quæcunque inter se comparatæ quantæ, i. e. æquales vel inæquales, pares vel impares dici possint.

"Paria sunt, quorum est una quantitas."

Sic enim definit Aristoteles, Phil. 8, 15. Quod idem valet acsi diceretur, quorum par ratio est. "Una," i. e. eadem, æqualis: unde in plurali numero eodem nomine ac definitione explicantur.

"Argumentum igitur paris est, cum par illustratur à pari."

Ad exempla veniamus; atque ad ea primùm quæ in forma, ut diximus, contracta notis brevius indicantur. Hæ autem notæ præcipuæ sunt "par, æquale, æquare;" ut in his:

"———Par levibus ventis." Æneid. 2.

Ubi levitas Creusæ umbræ comparatur levitati ventorum.

"Et nunc æquali tecum pubesceret ævo." Æneid. 3.

"En hujus nate auspiciis, illa inclyta Roma Imperium terris, animos æquabit Olympo." Æneid. 6.

His notis aliæ sunt affines, "pariter, æquè, æqualitas, æqualiter, perinde, acsi," et id genus alia.

Sequitur forma explicata: in qua propositio et redditio distinguuntur, quæ in contracta forma erant implicitæ. In hac autem forma explicata par quantitas vel notis apertè indicatur, vel sine notis mente et ratione concipitur: notæ istæ sunt vel propriæ parium: vel negationes imparium: parium propriæ, "idem quod; tam, quàm; tanto, quanto; tot, quot." In quibus singulis notarum paribus prior quæque redditioni inservit, posterior verò propositioni. Catil. 4, "Cujus res gestæ atque virtutes iisdem, quibus solis cursus, regionibus ac terminis continentur."

"Tam ficti pravique tenax quàm nuntia veri." Æneid 4.

"Tantò pessimus omnium poëta, Quantò tu optimus omnium patronus."
Catullus 4.

"Littora quot conchas, quot amœna rosarea flores,
Quotque soporiferum grana papaver habet, &c.
Tot premor adversis——" Ovid. 4. Trist.

Negationes imparium sunt; vel majoris et minoris seorsim vel utriusque simul "non magis, non minus." Philippic. 9, "Neque enim ille magis jurisconsultus quàm justitiæ fuit," &c. "Neque constituere litium actiones malebat, quàm controversias tollere." Ovid. 2, de Arte.

"Non minor est virtus, quàm quærere, parta tueri."

"Utriusque simul" pro Muræna: "paria cognosco esse ista in L. Muræna, atque ita paria, ut neque ipse dignitate vinci potuerit, neque te dignitate superarit." Observandum est autem negationem majoris vel minoris seorsim non semper esse notam parium: neque enim si "servus non est major domino, ergo est æqualis;" nec si "dominus non est minor servo, ergo par."

Hactenus cum notis; nunc sine notis hæc quæ sequuntur. Atque in hoc potissimum genere exemplorum sine notis, apparet vis eadem arguendi in utramque partem; adeo ut si unum, alterum quoque sit; si non sit unum, neque alterum. Itaque ex uno eorum affirmato, alterum affirmatur; ex negato, negatur: 2 Philip. "Quorum facinus commune, cur non eorum præda communis?" Ter. in Adel.

"Quando ego non curo tuum, ne cura meum."

"Hujus loci," parium nempe sine notis, "sunt consectaria illa è contrariis quidem orta, sed parium collatione tractata." Ut ex adversis ista; Cicero pro Sylla "neque verò quid mihi irascare intelligere possum; si, quòd eum defendo quem tu accusas, cur tibi quoque ipse non succenseo, qui accuses eum quem ego defendo? Inimicum, inquis, accuso meum: et amicum, inquam, ego defendo meum." Sic 5 Tusc. "quod cùm fateantur, satis magnam vim esse in vitiis ad miseram vitam; nonne fatendum est eandem vim in virtute esse ad beatam vitam?" Contraria enim contrariorum sunt consequentia."

Quæ tamen regula non est perpetuo vera: primò nisi collatio sit verè parium: non ergo sequitur, "mala opera damnant; ergo bona justificant." Mala n. opera omninò mala, bona imperfectè bona sunt; illa nostra, hæc non plane nostra. Secundo, sed in iis duntaxat paribus, contrariorum ex loco petitis, quorum parium propositio reciprocatur. Quod in relatis quidem fit frequentissimè: ut apud Martialem:

> "Tum servum scis de genitum, blandeque fateris,
> Cùm dicis dominum, Sosibiane, patrem."

Pater est filii dominus, et filii dominus est pater: pariter ergo filius est patris servus. Sic ex adversis: "bonum est appetendum; pariter ergo malum est fugiendum." Nempe quia propriè adeoque reciprocè, omne appetendum est bonum. Et ex privantibus: Ovid. 1 Fast.

> "In pretio pretium nunc est, dat census honores, > Census amicitias: pauper ubique jacet."

Dives est in pretio, et quisquis est in pretio, est dives; ergo omnis pauper jacet.

"Quoties autem collationis propositio non reciprocatur, vel quoties uni parium id quasi proprium tribuitur quod utrisque commune est, eorum consequentia contraria non sunt, sed sæpe eadem." Fallit ergo hoc ex relatis: "pater est dives; ergo filius est pauper:" quia propositio non est reciproca; omnis enim dives non est pater. Et hoc etiam ex adversis: "homo est sensu præditus; bestia igitur sensu caret. Homo mortalis; bestia igitur immortalis:" quippe nec sensu præditum, nec mortale est homini proprium; sed utrique contrario commune, et homini et bestiæ. Hoc etiam ex contradicentibus: "homo est animal; ergo non homo est non animal." Hoc denique ex privantibus: "videns vivit; ergo cæcus est mortuus:" vivere enim et videnti et cæco commune est. "Non enim idem non dici de contrariis, sed contraria de eodem dici non possunt; immo quod suscipit unum contrariorum, suscipit alterum; et quod unum non suscipit, neque alterum;" ut, "in quo est amor, in eo potest esse odium. Quibus nullum est jus, iis nulla fit injuria."

Est et alius parium sine notis modus, "quo interdum lacessiti, par pari reponimus." Qualis est Virgil. Ecl. 3, in illa pastorum alterna contentione repetitum illud; "Dic quib. in terris," &c. Cujusmodi est et illud Mat. 21, 23, &c. "Qua authoritate facis ista? &c. Interrogabo vos ego etiam quiddam: Baptisma Joannis unde erat?" Affine est illud Cic. Off. 2, "Cato, cùm ab eo quæreretur, quid esset fœnerari? respondit, quid hominem occidere."

Paria verò ficta quorum esse proprium suprà diximus rem veram arguere, sunt illa apud Ciceronem, Invent. 1, ex Æschine Socratico; ubi Aspasia cum Xenophontis uxore et Xenophonte ipso sic inducitur locuta: "dic mihi, quæso, Xenophontis uxor, si vicina tua melius habeat aurum quàm tu habes, utrum illius an tuum malis? Illius, inquit. Et si vestem? Illius verò respondit. Age verò, si virum illa meliorem, an illius malis." Hic mulier erubuit. Comparatio sic se habet: si aurum, si vestem vicinæ meliorem habere malles quàm tuam, malle etiam meliorem vicinæ virum argueris. Non dicit vicinam habere aurum aut vestem meliorem, sed fingit aut ponit, eamque si mallet Xenophontis uxor, arguitur malle virum quoque vicinæ si melior sit.

CAP. XIX.

De Majoribus.

"Imparia sunt, quorum quantitas non est una."

"Non una," i. e. non eadem; quorum par ratio non est: contrariorum enim contraria ratio est.

> "Impar est majus vel minus.
> "Majus est cujus quantitas excedit."

Major autem vel minor quantitas æstimanda est ex rerum quæ comparantur, elatione vel summissione, ut inquit Cic. in Top. i. e. excessu vel defectu; quæ vel notis indicantur, vel, si desunt notæ, aliis vocibus, quæ excessum vel defectum significant, intelliguntur. Ex eo autem quod suprà de logica quantitate diximus, intelligendum est id logicè majus quoque esse, cujus non solum magnitudo, mensura, aut numerus, sed etiam auctoritas, potentia, præstantia, probabilitas, difficultas, aut quid hujusmodi majus est; vel brevius, quod quavis ratione excessum habet, id majus est; idque non solùm rei ipsius natura, sed vel opinione disserentis. Majus igitur est cujus quantitas excedit id quod minus est: majus enim hic adhibetur ad arguendum minus.

Quemadmodum autem parium, ita argumenti à majore, forma alia contracta est, quæ notis brevius indicatur; alia explicata, quæ partibus plenius distinguitur.

Contractioris formæ notæ sunt vel nomina comparativa et superlativa suos casus regentia, vel verba quædam; et ea quidem utraque non solùm quæ excessum significant, ut "major, melior, pejor; præstare, superare, vincere, excedere, præferri," cum referuntur ad id quod arguit, verùm etiam ea cùm nomina tum verba quæ defectum significant, ut "minor, inferior, posthabeo, cedo, vincor, superor," si referuntur ad id quod arguitur.

Explicata autem forma nunc est cum notis, nunc sine notis. Notæ sunt "non solùm, sed etiam;" non, tam, quam, et comparationes, verbaque, ut suprà, non modò elationem significantia cum particula "quàm," si ea particula tribuatur ei semper quod arguitur, sed etiam ea quæ summissionem significant, si modò particula "quàm" referatur ad id quod arguit: ut, "minus est amicum pulsare, quàm patrem." Sed hoc exemplum arguit potius à minori quàm grave scelus sit pulsare patrem, quàm a majori non admodum grave esse pulsare amicum. Idem de cæteris hujusmodi est dicendum.

Exemplum primæ notæ: Cic. pro Muræna: "Tollitur è medio non solùm ista verbosa simulatio prudentiæ, sed etiam illa domina rerum sapientia. Spernitur orator non solùm odiosus in dicendo aut loquax, verùm etiam bonus." In hujusmodi exemplis "sed etiam" est propositio, et, ut majus, arguit redditionem "non solum," ut minus.

Huic nota affinis est "immo," vel "immo verò." Cujusmodi est illud apud Terent. "Thr. Magnas verò agere gratias Thais mihi? Gn. Ingentes. Thr. Ain tu? læta est. Gn. Non tam ipso quidem dono, quàm abs te datum esse: id verò seriò triumphat." Hic facile intelligitur "immo ingentes" et "immo id seriò triumphat." Ingentes gratiæ arguunt magnas; et triumphare, lætam esse. Sic Catil. 1: "Hic tamen vivit, vivit? immo verò in senatum venit." Et illud Ver. 3: "Non furem, sed raptorem; non adulterum, sed expugnatorem pudicitiæ," &c.

Exemplum secundæ notæ, comparativorum scilicet et verborum cum particula "quàm," est ex Cic. pro Marcello: "Plus admirationis habitura, quam gloriæ." Sed ambiguum: aut enim plus admirationis arguit minus gloriæ, et sic argumentum est à majori, aut minor gloria si magna sit, arguit maximam admirationem.

Verborum elationem significantium cum particula "quàm" exemplum hoc erit; "mendicare præstat, quàm furari." Hic mendicare, quanquam inhonestum, ut magis tamen et potius faciendum, arguit multo minus esse furandum.

"Sic malo illud," scilicet quod arguit, "quàm hoc," scilicet quod arguitur: ut Juvenal Satyra 8, adversus gloriosum nobilem:

> "Malo pater tibi sit Thersites, dummodo tu sis > Æacidæ similis, Vulcaniaque arma capessas, > Quam te Thersitæ similem producat Achilles."

Quod malit ignobilem fortem, quod tamen non est ita optandum, ex eo arguit atque ostendit à majori sive à potiori quàm minime velit nobilem ignavum. Cæsar: "Malo modestiam in milite, quam virtutem." Modestia, judicio Cæsaris, præstantior et major, arguit virtutem sive fortitudinem in milite minus esse quàm modestia requirendam: vel potius à minori exaggerat modestiæ laudem in milite præ virtutis laude.

"Sequitur majorum tractatio sine notis."

Atque in hoc solùm genere id majus est cujus probabilitas aut difficultas est major. Hic etiam logici regulas consequentiæ tradere solent non solùm negando, ut vult Aristot. Rhet. 2, 23, verùm etiam affirmando, pro quantitatis diversa vi et consideratione, in exemplis diversis: ejusdem enim exempli una tantum ratio est. Si majus est probabilius, duntaxat negando, in hunc modum: "quod non valet in majore, non valebit in minore." Si majus est difficilius aut incredibilius, duntaxat affirmando: "quod in re majore valet, valet in minore," ut inquit Cic. in Top. Hujus exemplum est Æneid. 1:

> "O socii (neque enim ignari sumus ante malorum)
> O passi graviora! dabit deus his quoque finem."

Si gravioribus malis dedit deus finem, dabit his certè. Sic Cic. pro Muræna: "Noli tam esse injustus, ut cùm tui fontes vel inimicis tuis pateant, nostros rivulos etiam amicis putes clausos esse oportere."

"Ficta etiam majora idem valent in suis consequentiis vel refutandis vel probandis."

Refutandi exemplùm est Terent. Heaut.

> "———— Satrapas si fiet
> Amator, nunquam sufferre ejus sumtus queat:
> Nedum tu possis:"—quasi diceret, finge satrapam esse.

Et Æneid. 5:

> "Magnanime Ænea, non si mihi Jupiter auctor
> Spondeat, hoc sperem Italiam contingere cœlo:
> Mutati transversa fremunt, &c.
> Nec nos obniti contrà, nec tendere tantùm
> Sufficimus:"—i. e. multo nunc minus Jove non spondente.

CAP. XX.

De Minoribus.

Majus et minus inter se affecta et relata sunt: adeoque unius definitionem qui norit, norit alterius.

Ut igitur majus est cujus quantitas excedit, "ita minus est cujus quantitas exceditur." Quantitas autem ut majoris erat in qualibet rerum elatione sive excessu, ita nunc minoris est in qualibet rerum summissione sive defectu. Sententiarum enim minor probabilitas aut difficultas locum non habet, nisi in minorum forma explicata; quod ex majorum quoque explicata forma intelligi potest. Minus igitur est cujus quantitas exceditur à majore: argumentum itaque à minore est, cùm id quod minus est, adhibetur ad arguendum id quod est majus.

Minora etiam vel brevius indicantur notis, vel plenius distinguuntur partibus. Hujus utriusque formæ vel propriæ sunt minorum notæ, vel negationes parium.

Propriæ notæ contractioris formæ sunt primùm, voces comparativæ grammaticæ, cùm nomina tum verba, elationem utraque significantia, si modò attribuantur ei quod arguitur. Ovid. 2 de Trist. "Sævior es tristi Busiride." Hic minor sævitia Busiridis arguit majorem illius in quem poeta invehitur. "Præstat sapientia divitiis." "Sævior" et "præstat" elationem significant, et notæ sunt majoris; sed quia tribuuntur ei quod arguitur, argumentum utrobique est à minori. Atque hoc sedulò advertendum est, ut argumentum majoris à minori dijudicare possis: majora enim et minora, contractæ præsertim formæ, easdem plerumque notas præ se ferunt; idemque exemplum utramvis in partem vel à majori vel à minori arguere potest: ut, "sævior es tristi Busiride." Hoc si ad sævitiam cujusvis exaggerandam dicatur, ut hoc loco, à minori est: si ad Busiridis extenuandam, à majori. Si igitur illa quæ elationem significant, referantur ad id quod arguitur, sunt illa quidem notæ majoris, argumentum autem est à minori; quoniam majus, cujus illa notæ sunt, est id quod arguitur: sin illa quæ summissionem significant, referuntur ad id quod arguitur, sunt illa quidem notæ minoris, sed argumentum est à majori; quoniam id quod arguitur, minus est.

Secundò, comparationes grammaticæ verbaque summissionem significantia, ut minor, inferior, &c. Posthabeo, postpono, cedo, vincor, superor, &c. Si modò ad id quod arguit, referatur: ut "cedant arma togæ." Hic togæ dignitas arguitur à minori armorum dignitate, quæ cedit.

Atque hæ sunt notæ affirmantes contractæ formæ:

quibus annumerandæ sunt etiam istæ formulæ, quæ fiunt negatione parium. Philip. 9, "Omnes ex omni ætate, qui in hac civitate intelligentiam juris habuerunt, si unum in locum conferantur, cum S. Sulpitio non sunt conferendi," i. e. non æquandi, quæ nota parium fuit. Hactenus contracta forma.

Explicata forma vel cùm notis est, vel sine notis. Propriæ notæ sunt primò, "non modò non, sed ne." Cic. 2, Catil. "Nemo non modò Romæ, sed ne ullo in angulo totius Italiæ oppressus ære alieno fuit, quem non ad hoc incredibile sceleris fœdus asciverit." Hic posterior nota "sed ne," est propositionis, et nota minoris; arguitque "non modo non," quæ redditionis est, et nota majoris, quod arguitur. Ne ullo in angulo Italiæ non fecit, quod minus utile sibi erat, non modò non igitur vel multo magis Romæ fecit, quod majus erat, vel sibi magis utile. Pro Fonteio: "Non modo nullum facinus hujus protulerunt, sed ne dictum quidem aliquod reprehenderent." Ne minus quidem fecerunt ut dictum aliquod reprehenderunt, quæ propositio est et arguit non modo non majus, i. e. ergo non majus, ut facinus aliquod proferrent, quæ redditio est, et arguitur.

Verùm in hujus notæ exemplis propositionis nota "sed ne," aliquando omittitur. Ad Lent. "Nullum meum minimum dictum, non modò factum pro Cæsare intercessit," i. e. nullum non modò factum, sed ne dictum quidem. Huic notæ affinis est illa formula, "tantum abest ab hoc, ut ne illud quidem." Pro Marcello: "Tantum abes à perfectione maximorum operum, ut fundamenta, quæ cogitas, nondum jeceris." Ne hoc quidem fecisti quod minus est, abes ergo longe ab illo quod est majus.

Secundæ notæ sunt comparationes grammaticæ et verba quædam cum particula "quàm," quæ vel elationem significant, ut "potius hoc quàm illud, malo hoc quàm illud," vel summissionem, ut "minor, inferior," ita ut "quàm" utrobique referatur ad id quod arguitur. Catil. 1, "Ut exul potius tentare, quàm consul vexare remp. possis." Quod potius erat Ciceroni ut exul tentaret remp. quàm consul vexaret, illud ut minus malum arguit hoc esse majus. Hic comparatio grammatica "potius," ad id quod arguit, refertur, nempe ad minus malum; particula "quàm" ad id refertur quod arguitur, nempe ad majus malum; "Sic maluit Metellus de repub. quàm de sententia sua dimoveri." Hic "maluit," verbum elationis, refertur ad id quod arguit, nempe ad minus malum, judicio Metelli, de rep. dimoveri; particula "quàm" ad id refertur quod majus malum arguitur, dimoveri de sententia. Sic in iis notis quæ summissionem significant, particula "quàm" refertur semper ad majus quod arguitur, non secus atque in iis quæ significant elationem: ut, "minus est accipere, quàm dare; inferior est Cæsar quàm Scipio."

Tertia nota est "cùm tum:" 1 Agr. "quæ cùm omnib. est difficilis et magna ratio, tum vero mihi præter cæteros."

Sequuntur negationes parium in hac forma explicata. "Non tam, quàm." Catil. 2, "Quanquam illi qui Catilinam Massiliam ire dictitant, non tam hæc queruntur, quàm verentur." Sic "non tot, quot:" pro Muræna; "Quod enim fretum, quem Euripum tot motus, tantas, tam varias habere putatis agitationes fluctuum; quantas perturbationes et quantos æstus habet ratio comitiorum?" In hoc exemplo interrogatio fortius negat paria.

Nunc ad exempla formæ sine notis explicatæ veniamus. Cic. Off. 1, "Ergo histrio hoc videbit in scena, non videbit sapiens in vita." Atque hinc etiam consequentiæ ducuntur non solùm affirmando et probando, ut vult Arist. Rhet. 2, 23, et Cic. in Top. sed etiam negando et refutando: si quidem hoc de exemplo non eodem intelligitur: sin de eodem, tum quidem vel solùm affirmando, vel solùm negando rectè proceditur. Affirmandi exemplum est Ovid. 1 de Remed.

> "Ut corpus redimas ferrum patieris et ignes, &c.
> Ut valeas animo quicquam tolerare negabis?"

Si corporis causa, multo magis animi quidvis tolerabis; animus enim dignior. Item pro Archia: "Bestiæ sæpe immanes cantu flectuntur: nos non poetarum voce moveamur?" Sic illud Mat. 6, 26, "Passeres curat Deus; multo magis ergo homines." At negando, nulla ex his consequentia deducitur: non ergo sequitur, "si corporis causa quicquam non tolerabis, ergo nunc animi;" et sic de cæteris. Rectè igitur, si hoc modo intelligitur Aristoteles, à minore ad majus affirmando solùm proceditur. Verùm exempla non desunt, in quib. à minore arguitur etiam solùm negando: cujusmodi est illud supra citatum, pro Marcello; "fundamenta nondum jecisti, certè ergo non perfecisti." Nec tamen idem affirmando; "fundamenta jecisti, ergo perfecisti." Hic modò cavendum est, ne ponatur negatio quæ affirmationi æquipolleat: ut, "Deus non negligit passeres," idem est quod "curat." Sic enim utriusque consequentiæ idem exemplum prout sententia eadem vel affirmando vel negando variatur, dari posset: ut, "si fures plectendi, multo magis sacrilegi. Si furib. non parcendum, multo minus sacrilegis." Hic "plectere" et "non parcere" idem est; et minus sit nota majoris: non igitur notæ, sed rerum elatio vel summissio majus vel minus efficit. Atque hæc de consequentiis minorum sine notis.

Verùm eædem consequentiæ ducuntur ab explicata forma, quæ etiam cum notis est, ut ex iis exemplis quæ suprà ponuntur, intelligas licet. In hac forma explicata sine notis est ubi occurrit minorum quædam gradatio: ut Ver. 7, "Facinus est vincere civem Romanum; scelus verberare; propè parricidium necare: quid dicam in crucem tollere?"

Finguntur etiam minora: Virgil. Ecl. 1.

> "Ante leves ergo pascentur in æthere cervi, &c.
> Quàm nostro illius labatur pectore vultus."

Philip. 2, "Si inter cœnam in tuis immanibus illis poculis hoc tibi accidisset, quis non turpe duceret? In cœtu verò populi R. negotium publicum gerens, magister equitum," &c.

CAP. XXI.

De Similibus.

Hactenus comparatio in quantitate fuit. Sequitur "comparatio in qualitate, qua res comparatæ quales dicuntur."

Qualitas enim logica non solùm est habitus, aut dispositio, aut potentia, vel impotentia naturalis, aut denique figura aut forma exterior, quæ Aristot. species qualitatis sunt, et in aliis artibus tractandæ, sed est affectio quælibet sive ratio, qua res inter se comparatæ quales, nempe similes aut dissimiles dicuntur. Nulla autem res est, quæ si alteri qualitate conferatur, non sit ei similis vel dissimilis.

"Similia sunt quorum eadem est qualitas."

Sic enim definit Aristoteles, Phil. 8, 15, et Boethius, l. 2, in Cic. Top. "similitudo," inquit, "est unitas qualitatis." Argumentum igitur similitudinis est, quando simile explicatur à simili. Magna quidem est affinitas parium cum similibus; verùm ut ex definitionibus eorum perspicere licet, in hoc maximè differunt, quòd paria non admittunt elationem aut summissionem, similia admittunt: possunt enim etiam simillima majora esse vel minora; quod paria non possunt.

Similitudo proportio dicitur, Græcè ferè "analogia;" et similia proportionalia, Græcè "analoga." Proportio autem nihil aliud est quàm duarum rationum similitudo; ratio autem est duorum inter se terminorum sive rerum collatio. * Monendum autem est similia sive contractæ formæ sive explicatæ urgenda non esse ultra eam qualitatem quam in utrisque eandem esse propositum assimilanti erat ostendere: sic magistratus assimilatur cani, sola nimirum fidelitate custodiæ: unde illa in scholis, "nullum simile est idem, simile non currit quatuor pedibus, omne simile claudicat."

Similia nunc notis brevius indicantur, nunc partibus plenius distinguuntur; hoc enim comparatis omnibus commune est. Notæ similitudinis contractæ "quæ uno verbo concluditur," sunt vel similium propriæ vel dissimilium negationes. Propriæ similium sunt vel nomina, ut "similis, effigies, imago, more, ritu, instar, in modum;" vel adverbia, "tanquam, veluti, quasi, sicuti;" vel verba, "imitari, referre," &c. 1 Æneid. "Os humerosque deo similis." Philip. 9, "Quanquam nullum monumentum clarius Servius Sulpitius relinquere potuit, quàm effigiem morum suorum, virtutis, constantiæ, pietatis, ingenii, filium." 1 Trist.

> "Namque ea vel nemo, vel qui mihi vulnera fecit, > Solus Achilleo tollere more potest."

In Pis. "Unus ille dies mihi quidem instar immortalitatis fuit, quo in patriam redii." Verr. 1, "Sed repente è vestigio ex homine, tanquam aliquo poculo Circæo, factus est Verres." Pro lege Manil. "Itaque omnes quidem nunc in his locis En. Pompeium, sicut aliquem, non ex hac urbe missum, sed de cœlo delapsum intuentur." Negationes dissimilium sunt, "haud secus, non àliter, non absimilis," &c. Æneid. 3, "Haud secus ac jussi faciunt." Terent. in Phor. "Ego isti nihilo sum aliter, ac sui."

Ad contractam similitudinis formam pertinet etiam metaphora: metaphora enim, ut docent rhetores, est ad unum verbum contracta similitudo sine notis quidem, quæ tamen intelliguntur. Pro Sest. "Cujus ego patrem deum atque parentem statuo fortunæ nominisque mei," i. e. "tanquam deum."

"Similitudinis partes deinceps explicantur, et quidem disjuncte vel continuè.

"Similitudo disjuncta est, quando termini" sive res "quatuor reipsa distinguuntur," i. e. quando duo termini sive res distinctæ in propositione comparantur duobus terminis sive rebus distinctis in redditione. Occurrit autem hæc forma et cum notis et sine notis. Notæ sunt, "qualis, talis;" illa propositionis, hæc redditionis nota est. Ita "quemadmodum, ut, sicut," propositionis; quibus respondent, "sic, eodem modo, similiter," redditionis. Ecl. 5,

> "Tale tuum carmen nobis, divine poeta, > Quale sopor fessis in gramine."

Carmen ad auditorem, ut sopor ad fessum, termini quatuor distincta sunt. Ad Frat. 1, "Quemadmodum gubernatores optimi vim tempestatis, sic sapientissimi viri fortunæ impetum persæpe superare non possunt." Hic quatuor sunt item termini, ut gubernator ad tempestatem, sic sapiens ad fortunam. 1 Trist.

> "Scilicet ut fulvum spectatur in ignibus aurum, > Tempore sic duro est inspicienda fides."

Cicero 2 Phil. "Sed nimirum ut quidam morbo et sensus stupore suavitatem cibi non sentiunt; sic libidinosi, avari, facinorosi, veræ laudis gustum non habent." In vita Virgil.

> "Hos ergo versiculos, feci, tulit alter honores:
> Sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves:
> Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes:" &c.

In hoc exemplo redditio sine nota præcedit. Particula autem "sic," quæ nota solet esse redditionis, hîc propositioni attribuitur.

"Aliquando nulla prorsus est nota." Virg. Ecloga 2,

> "O formose puer, nimium ne crede colori.
> Alba ligustra cadunt, vaccinia nigra leguntur."

"Continua similitudo est, quando est ut primus terminus ad secundum, ita secundus ad tertium." Leg. 3. "Ut magistratibus leges, ita populo præsunt magistratus." Hîc termini sunt tres; lex, magistratus, populus. Sed medius bis adhibetur, et in omni proportione continua continuatur; estque posterior terminus propositionis, prior redditionis. In omni enim proportione termini esse debent ad minimum quatuor. Ordo hujus sic est: ut leges magistratibus, ita magistratus populo præsunt.

Quanquam autem similia magis ad illustrandum quàm ad probandum accommodata sunt, et Plato in Phædone, "Ego," inquit, "sermones qui ex similibus demonstrationes sumunt, probè novi ad ostentationem comparatos esse; et nisi quis caveat ab iis, facile im-ponunt," quod ad regulas tamen consequentiarum attinet, ex definitione similium perspicitur, similium similem esse rationem; valere igitur similia in utramque partem. Unde Aristot. Top. 24, "Quod in aliquo simili valet, in aliis quoque similibus valebit; et quod non in aliquo, nec in cæteris."

Quoniam autem similitudo non solùm est propositionis et redditionis, sed terminorum etiam inter se. Idcirco si quædam similia sunt, inversè quoque similia erunt, et alternè. Et inversè quidem duobus modis; inversione scilicet vel propositionis et redditionis quæ aliorum comparatorum communis est; vel terminorum, quæ videtur similium propria. Exempli gratia; ut gubernator ad tempestatem, sic sapiens ad fortunam: inversè ergo; ut sapiens ad fortunam, sic gubernator ad tempestatem. Hæc propositionis et redditionis inversio est. Rursus, ut tempestas ad gubernatorem, sic fortuna ad sapientem: hæc inversio est terminorum. Alternatio est quando antecedens propositionis antecedenti redditionis et consequens consequenti comparatur. Regula ergo hîc est; si quædam similia fuerint, alternè similia erunt. Ut gubernator ad tempestatem, sic sapiens ad fortunam: ergo, alternè; ut gubernator ad sapientem, sic tempestas ad fortunam. Inversionum hujusmodi et alternationum in mathematicis proportionibus usus maximus est: sed proportio non mathematica solùm, verùm etiam logica est, ut supradiximus, rerum omnium communis; ejus ergo regulæ non erant hîc omittendæ.

Ficta similitudo parem vim habet superioribus illis, sed præcipuè in hac explicata similitudine Æsopici apologi excellunt.

Horat. 1 Epist.

> "Quod si me populus Romanus fortè roget, cur
> Non ut porticibus, sic judiciis fruar iisdem?
> Nec sequar aut fugiam quæ deligit ipse vel odit?
> Olim quod vulpes ægroto cauta leoni
> Respondit, referam; quia me vestigia terrent
> Omnia te adversum spectantia, nulla retrorsum."

Huc etiam refertur parabola Socratica vulga dicta: quæ est inductio similium interrogationib. ferè constans. "Illa autem," inquit Fabius, "hanc habuit vim; ut cùm plura interrogasset Socrates, quæ fateri adversario necesse esset, novissime id, de quo quærebatur, inferret, cui simile adversarius concessisset." Vide pag. 882, ad *.

CAP. XXII.

De Similibus.

Contrariorum enim eadem scientia est. Et Cic. in Top. "ejusdem est," inquit, "dissimile et simile invenire." In hoc differunt dissimilia à diversis, quod dissimilitudo sit differentia comparata, et non idem, eodem saltem tempore, sed diversis plerumque subjectis attribuatur. Itaque diversorum uno negato, alterum affirmatur; dissimilia, sive diversa sive opposita, simul affirmari aut negari possunt. Diversa autem qualitas est non eadem; sive diversa sit sive opposita: quasi dicas dissimilium dissimilis est ratio. Argumentum igitur dissimilitudinis est quando dissimile arguitur à dissimili.

Contractæ dissimilitudinis notæ sunt "dissimile, dispar, differens, aliud, secus:" Pro Planc. "Dissimilis est debitio pecuniæ et gratiæ." Ennius: "O domus antiqua, heu quàm dispari dominare domino." Dispar autem est non impar, sed dissimilis. Cæsar 1 Bell. Gal. "Hi omnes lingua, institutis, legibus inter se differunt." 2 Agrar. "Alio vultu, alio vocis sono, alio incessu esse meditabatur." Cic. 2 Nat. "Quoniam cœpi secus agere, atque initio dixeram."

Dissimilitudinis notæ etiam sunt per negationem similium, "ut non similis, non talis, non idem, non tanquam," &c. 3 de Orat. "Non est philosophia similis artium reliquarum." 2 Eneid.

> "At non ille, satum quo te mentiris, Achilles, > Talis in hoste fuit Priamo."———

Horat. 1 Epist. "Non eadem est ætas, non mens." 1 ad Frat. "Sit annulus tuus, non tanquam vas aliquod, sed tanquam ipse tu." Hoc argumento pastor ille errorem suum confitetur. Eclog. 1,

> "Urbem (quam dicunt Romam) Melibœe, putavi, > Stultus ego huic nostræ similem."———

Et mox,

> "Sic canibus catulos similes, sic matribus hœdos > Noram, sic parvis componere magna solebam."

Ut nec canibus catuli, nec matribus hœdi, sic nec Mantua Romæ similis est. In hoc exemplo erroris confessio pro negatione similium est.

Explicata dissimilitudo itidem cum notis est vel sine notis. Notæ sunt hic etiam negationes similium. 3 Philip. "Certus dies non ut sacrificii sic consilii expectari solet."

"Nota plerumque nulla est, cum dissimilitudo plenius explicatur."

Quintil. l. 5, c. 11, "Brutus occidit liberos proditionem molientes. Manlius virtutem filii morte mulctavit."

Catullus.

> "Soles occidere et redire possunt:
> Nobis cùm semel occidit brevis lux,
> Nox est perpetua una dormienda."

Dissimilitudo est dici et vitæ nostræ. Redditio est vitam semel amissam non restitui. Illustratur à dissimili, quæ propositio est, soles occidere et redire possunt.

CAP. XXIII.

De Conjugatis.

HACTENUS prima argumenta sunt exposita: quorum tria genera fuere; consentanea, dissentanea, et comparata.

Sequuntur "orta de primis; quæ ad id quod arguunt perinde sunt ut prima unde oriuntur: ut conjugata et notatio, distributio et definitio."

In se itaque habent vim arguendi ut argumenta artificialia, et eandem quidem cum iis unde oriuntur: non autem à se, quia non prima, ut in capite secundo jam dictum est. Definitionem autem vix aliam requirunt præter ipsum nomen, quod naturam eorum satis per se explicat: unde illud consectarium, "Orta argumenta perinde esse ad id quod arguunt, ut sunt prima unde oriuntur."

Quatuor hæ species ortorum, in duo genera, anonyma licet, distinguuntur, cùm propter dichotomiæ studium, tum quia conjugata et notatio sub eodem genere continentur, propter illam quæ inter ea intercedit communionem. Cicero itaque in Top. locum ex conjugatis notationi finitimum esse dixit. Et in multis exemplis conjugata à notatione et nomine nihil aut parum differunt. Communio autem illa duplex est: primò quòd sunt argumenta nominalia sive à nomine petita. Sed in hoc differunt, ut etiam tradit Boet. l. 4, in Top. Cic., quod notatio expositione nominis, conjugatio similitudine vocabuli ac derivatione perficitur. Neque idcirco ad grammaticam pertinent: ex vi enim nominum argumenta petere, logici est, non grammatici. Secunda communio est, quòd sunt orta simplicia: neque enim ex pluribus primis simul conjunctis, sed ex uno aliquo argumento primo singula eorum exempla oriuntur, nisi in nominibus compositis: compositorum enim nominum composita interdum ex pluribus argumentis notatio est. Distributio autem et definitio sunt argumenta realia, i. e. in rerum explicatione versari solent, et composita, i. e. ex pluribus argumentis primis simul conjunctis originem suam trahunt. Si ergo ortorum genera, quæ anonyma esse diximus, nominibus distinguere lubet, orta erunt vel nominalia et simplicia, ut conjugata et notatio, vel realia et composita, ut distributio et definitio: nisi hoc fortè excipiamus, quod definitio ex uno primo, i. e. ex sola forma nonnunquam constare potest. Ex his autem duobus generibus prius tractandum est illud cui conjugata et notatio subjiciuntur, quia ferè simplicius est. Atque in hoc genere conjugata priorem sibi locum vendicant, quod ex solis consentaneis oriantur, cùm notatio ex quovis argumento primo petatur. Fabius l. 5, c. 10, conjugata nihili facit: Aristoteles autem et Cicero in Topicis suis aliter sentiunt; quorum ille l. 3, c. 4, et l. 7, c. 2, locos ex dissentaneis, conjugatis et casibus plurimum ait valere; et ad plurima esse utiles.

"Conjugata sunt nomina ab eodem principio variè deducta. Ut justitia, justus, justè." Aristoteles et Cicero conjugata, ille, nomina ejusdem conjugationis; hic, ejusdem generis esse definiunt: sed neque ille quasi jugum ipsum conjugatorum, neque hic genus, neque noster principium ipsum sive originem et thema conjugatorum numero excludit. Conjugata autem sunt omnia non solùm nomina tam substantiva quàm adjectiva, sed etiam verba, et, quæ Aristoteles casus vocat, adverbia, cùm paronyma, i. e. derivata, tum ipsa themata, servatis tamen istis conditionibus. 1. Si ut idem sonant, sic idem etiam significant. 2. Si in eadem significationis ratione sumantur. Nam si unum significat potentiam sive facultatem aut habitum, alterum verò actum, et ex potentia sive habitu arguatur actus, aut contra, captio est. 3. Si in iis symbolum sit consentaneorum argumentorum, i. e. si à consentaneis orta sunt: quorum vim et affectionem in arguendo aliis nominibus iisque conjugatis referant: quorum etiam ad inventionem nominalis hujusque conjugationis indicio ducamur: unde elucet non contemnendus hujus loci usus, præsertim in definitionibus.

Sequuntur exempla; ut justitia, justus, justè. Cujusmodi in exemplis observandum est, abstractum quod vocant, causam esse concreti, et concretum adverbii. Ut justitia est causa, cur aliquis sit justus: et quia justus est, idcirco justè agit. Quod tamen non est ubique verum: sanum enim, i. e. quod efficit aut conservat sanitatem, causa est sanitatis, concretum scilicet abstracti, ut notat Aristot. top. 2, 3, Propert. lib. 2,

> "Libertas quoniam nulli jam restat amanti, > Nullus liber erit, siquis amare velit."

Hîc libertas, quæ causa est cur sis liber, quia non restat, ergo nullus, &c. Cicero 3, de Nat. Deor. cùm de Dionysio tyranno loquitur: "Jam mensas argenteas de omnibus delubris jussit auferri, in quibus quòd more veteris Græciæ inscriptum esset bonorum deorum, uti eorum bonitate velle se dicebat: dii boni sunt: eorum igitur bonitate est utendum." Hîc ex effectis ad causas est disputatum; ut vult Ramus: ut mihi quidem videtur à causis ad effecta. Terent. "Homo sum, humani à me nihil alienum puto." Ex subjecto est ad adjunctum. In Pison. "Cum esset omnis illa causa consularis et senatoria, auxilio mihi opus fuerat et consulis et senatus." Ex adjunctis est ad subjectum. Phil. 2, "Non tractabo ut consulem, ne ille quidem me ut consularem." Ex effecto est ad causam: nam esse consulem causa est ut quis postea sit consularis: unde sic arguitur; non agnoscit is in me effectum, non agnoscam ergo in eo causam. Notandum est nonnulla sensu duntaxat, non sono esse conjugata: ut "somnus, dormiens; morbus, æger."

CAP. XXIV.

De Notatione.

"NOTATIO est nominis interpretatio," i. e. reddita ratio cur quidvis ita nominatum sit. Definitio autem hæc est "Boëthii, l. 1, in Cic. Top. Notatio inquit Cic. in Top. Græcis etymologia dicitur," i. e. verbum ex verbo veroloquium: "nos autem novitatem verbi non satis apti fugientes, genus hoc notationem appellamus, quia sunt verba rerum notæ." Hæc ille. Ex iis igitur quæ supradicta sunt, intelligi potest, notationem esse argumentum ortum adeòque symbolum alicujus primi; esse nominale, i. e. ut Cicero loquitur, argumentum ex vi nominis elicitum.

"Quippe nomina sunt notæ rerum et cujuslibet nominis vel derivati vel compositi, siquidem notatione vera nomen inditum fuit, ratio reddi potest ex aliquo argumento primo."

"Ut homo ab humo." Hæc à materia est notatio. Sed linguæ, cùm prima illa quam Adamus in Edene, tum illæ variæ atque à prima fortassis ortæ, quas conditores turris Babelicæ subito acceperunt, divinitus proculdubio datæ sunt; unde vocum primitivarum ratio si ignoretur, mirum non est: quæ autem voces derivatæ sunt aut compositæ, vel earum origines ex aliis linguis antiquis jamque obsoletis petendæ sunt, vel ipsæ vetustate aut infimæ plebis inquinata fere pronuntiatione ita immutatæ, mendose etiam scribendi consuetudine ita quasi obliteratæ, ut vera vocum notatio raro admodum teneatur. Unde argumentum à notatione, nisi ea fortè manifestissima sit, fallax admodum et sæpe ludicrum est.

Nunc reliqua exempla videamus. Ovid. 6 Fast.

"Stat vi terra sua; vi stando Vesta vocatur."

Terra dicitur Vesta ab effecto suo naturali, propterea quod vi sua stat.

"At locus à flammis et quod fovet omnia dictus."

Ex effectis est notatio. Item Verr. 4, "O verrea præclara! Quo enim accessisti, quo non attuleris tecum istum diem? Etenim quam tu domum, quam urbem adiisti, quod fanum denique, quod non eversum atque extersum reliqueris? Quare appellantur sanè ista Verrea, quæ non ex nomine, sed ex moribus naturaque tua constituta esse videantur." Ex effectis item est notatio. Ovid. 1 Fast.

"Prima dies tibi, Carna, datur, dea cardinis hæc est.
Numine clausa aperit, claudit aperta suo."

Notatio hæc è subjecto est, cardine scilicet, in quo versando dea illa exercebatur. Hinc illa cavillatio in Antonium generum: "Tuæ conjugis, bonæ fœminæ, locupletis quidem certè, Bambalio quidem pater, homo nullo numero, nihil illo contemptius; qui propter hæsitantiam linguæ stuporemque cordis, cognomen ex contumelia traxerit." Ex adjunctis est notatio hæc Bambalionis, quia balbus et stupidus. E dissentaneis autem sunt illa apud Quintil. l. 1, c. 6. "Lucus, quia umbra opacus parum luceat: et ludus, quia sit longissimè à lusu: et dis quia minimè dives." Est etiam è comparatis notatio pyropi, quòd ignis quondam speciem præbeat.

Atque hactenus de notatione: nunc aliquid de nomine adjiciendum est. "Est enim ut notationi ad suum nomen, sic nomini ad notationem sua affectio:" Hoc est, ut notatio arguit nomen, sic nomen vicissim arguit notationem. Ut animi plenus, ergo animosus; et contrà, animosus, ergo animi plenus. Nam et nomen quoque ortum argumentum est; ex quo autem fonte oriatur, notatio declarat. Hæc autem appendicule de nomine idcirco est adjecta, quia cum alia argumenta inter se affecta, quot quidem eodem nomine ac definitione non sunt comprehensa, sua seorsum capita sibi habuerint, et tantillum esset quod de nomine dicendum erat, non videbatur caput novum ob id esse instituendum. In hoc igitur capite duo loci inventionis continentur, notationis et nominis: inter quos si comparatio fiat, potior videtur nominis. Unde tota hæc categoria ab Aristotele "locus à nomine" dicitur. Sæpiusque et firmius à nomine quàm à notatione argumentum ducitur; ut homo est, ergo ex humo; focus est, ergo fovet. At non eadem vi argumentum à notatione deducitur; ex humo est, homo igitur; fovet omnia, ergo focus est.

CAP. XXV.

De Distributione.

Reliquum est ex ortis aliunde argumentis argumentum distributionis et definitionis.

"In qua utraque affectio reciprocationis est, illic partium omnium cum toto, hic definitionis cum definito."

Reciprocatio autem hoc loco est qua prorsus idem, eademque, ut ita dicam, essentia utrinque significatur: nam partes omnes simul sumptæ, i. e. rite compositæ, idem sunt quod totum, et definitio idem, quod definitum; quod de nullo præterea genere argumentorum dici potest. Unde nascitur hæc regula utrique huic argumento communis, ut in distributione ac definitione "nequid desit, nequid redundet:" nam ubi reciprocatio, ibi quoque æqualitas requiritur. Hinc eximia illa distributionis et definitionis laus effloruit; ex iis nempe artium institutiones maxima ex parte constare. Cùm n. omnia artium præcepta constare debeant ex argumentis reciprocis, reciprocatio autem nusquam alibi reperiatur nisi inter formam (quæ ipsa in definitionibus comprehendi solet) et formatum, inter subjectum et proprium adjunctum; hinc factum est ut præcepta omnia vel definitiones sint vel distributiones vel regulæ quædam sive consectaria, quæ proprietatum explicationes dicuntur.

"Distributio est, cum totum in partes distribuitur.
Totum est, quod continet partes.
Pars est, quæ continetur à toto."

Totum logicè et generaliter dicitur, quicquid quocunque modo distribuitur et partes continet: pars, quæ quocunque modo continetur à toto.

"Atque ut distinctio totius in partes, distributio; sic collectio partium ad constituendum totum, inductio dicitur."

Inter hanc autem inductionem et distributionem nullum aliud discrimen est, nisi quod distributio à toto ad partes, hæc verò à partibus ad totum progreditur. Quamobrem, ut supra nomen ad notationem, ita hic inductio ad distributionem referenda est; non ad syllogismos, ut plerique volunt; cùm non alio modo ab inductione argumentemur atque à distributione: siquidem eadem est via Thebis Athenas quæ Athenis Thebas. Inductionis autem auctorem Aristoteles agnoscit Socratem; ejusque necessitatem tantam esse testatur, ut, cùm scientia universalium sit, universalia cognoscere nequeamus nisi per inductionem. Inductionis ergo ope præcepta artium inventa sunt; ut in proœmio monuimus.

"Distributio sumitur ex argumentis toti quidem consentaneis, inter se autem dissentaneis."

Sed dissensio illa non est distributionis dissensio (nunquam n. dissentaneum in dissentaneum distribuitur) sed partium distributarum.

"Itaque tanto accuratior erit distributio, quanto partium et cum toto consensio et inter se dissensio major fuerit."

Hinc efficitur, eam distributionem accuratissimam esse, quæ in duas partes fit; eaque "dichotomia" dicitur: dissensio enim inter duo maxima est; contrariorum unum uni tantum opponitur. Platonis itaque regula est: "oportet in quàm proximum fieri potest numerum semper dividere." Quod si dichotomiam invenire non queamus, difficile n. est eam semper invenire, species bisbinas ponere interdum præstat, quasi sub duobus generibus, licet anonymis, quàm quatuor sub uno. Hæc n. distributionis forma, licet non sit optima, est tamen optimæ proxima. Hac ratione suprà cap. 3, Ramus divisit causas in duo genera anonyma, nempe "efficientem et materiàm, aut formam et finem." Eff. Ubi autem dichotomia nullo modo commodè adhiberi potest, "multis protinus differentiis res dividenda est," ut Aristoteles monet. Neque enim propter dichotomiæ studium distributio vel mutilanda vel implicanda aut confundenda est.

CAP. XXVI.

De Distributione ex Causis.

"Distributio prima est ex absolutè consentaneis, causis nempe et effectis. Distributio ex causis est, quando partes sunt causæ totius."

"Hîc distributio integri in sua membra præcipuè laudatur."

"Integrum est totum, cui partes sunt essentiales," i. e. quod partibus totam suam essentiam complectentibus constituitur; ideòque symbolum est effecti ex materia per formam existentis.

"Membrum est pars integri."

Nimirum integro suo essentialis. Sive ut Aristot. Phil. 8, 15, "Membra sunt ex quibus integrum componitur." Et membra quidem symbola sunt causarum essentialium, materiæ nimirum et formæ, in quibus tota integri essentia consistit: singula n. membra materiam continent; cuncta simul, ipsam quoque formam. "Sic grammatica in etymologiam et syntaxin; rhetorica in elocutionem et actionem; logica in inventionem et dispositionem argumentorum dividitur. Ab his n. partib. artes illæ constituuntur;" non tanquam ex causis, sed tanquam ex causarum symbolis. Cùm enim essentia dialecticæ partim communis sit materia scilicet, i. e. præcepta, et forma etiam nempe methodica illorum præceptorum dispositio; partim propria, quæ in bene disserendo posita est, tota hæc dialecticæ essentia in inventione et dispositione comprehenditur. Nec tamen partes istæ sunt ipsa materia, i. e. præcepta, nec ipsa forma communis, i. e. methodica præceptorum dispositio, nec propria, i. e. ipsa facultate disserendi; sed ex præceptis methodicè dispositis conflatæ sunt, et ipsa facultas disserendi inventionis et dispositionis finibus continetur.

Quæ sequuntur apud authorem nostrum exempla duo, alterum ex Virgilio, Georg. 1, alterum ex Cicerone pro Muræna, objectis utraque distinguuntur, non causis; ideòque ad cap. 28, ad distributionem nempe è subjectis, ad quam etiam præmissa illa annotatio de usu pertinet.

"Quinetiam aliter tractatur hoc argumenti genus, vel à partibus ad totum, vel à toto ad partes."

Hac de re Aristoteles Top. 6, 6, regulas quasdam tradit. Primo à partibus: "affirmatis partibus cunctis, affirmatur totum:" et contrà; "sublatis partibus cunctis, tolli totum." Item ab una parte: "una parte sublata, totum tolli." Secundo à toto ad partes: "toto affirmato, affirmantur partes." Verùm hæc omnia ex illa reciprocationis regula superioris capitis initio tradita satis intelliguntur. Nam quæ reciprocantur, eorum alterum ex altero vicissim et necessariò affirmatè et negatè concluditur. Hoc verò, ut Aristoteles etiam notavit, non sequitur; sublato integro, partes tolluntur.

Utriusque generis (nempe affirmationis et negationis à partibus ad totum) exemplum habemus apud Catullum.

"Quintia formosa est multis: mihi candida, longa,
Recta est: hæc ego sic singula confiteor:
Totum illud, formosa, nego. Nam nulla venustas,
Nulla in tam magno est corpore mica salis.
Lesbia formosa est: quæ cùm pulcherrima tota est,
Tum omnibus una omnes surripuit veneres."

Est et alia distributio ex causis et meritò quidem imperfectior dicta, cum non tam ipsius rei quàm ejus causarum distributio sit: ut ab efficiente, testimonium est divinum vel humanum. Sic statuæ veteres aliæ factæ erant à Phydia, aliæ à Polycleto, &c. Distributio hæc quædam est totius in partes; ubi tamen non tam partes ipsæ ponuntur quàm pro iis earum efficientis, quibus inter se distinguuntur. Sic statuæ aliæ erant aureæ, aliæ argenteæ, aliæ æneæ, aliæ eburneæ, &c. distributio est ex materia. Aliæ ad hominum, aliæ ad brutorum effigiem factæ; est distributio à forma externa. Aliæ factæ sunt ad usum religiosum, aliæ ad civilem; est distributio à fine.

CAP. XXVII.

De Distributione ex Effectis, ubi de Genere et Specie.

"Distributio ex effectis est, quando partes sunt effecta.

Distributio generis in species hic excellit."

Nonnulli ex Cicerone distributionem integri in membra "partitionem" vocant; generis in species "divisionem." Nec de nihilo sanè: membra enim copulari, species disjungi solent.

"Genus est totum partibus essentiale."

In quo contrarium est integro: illic enim toti partes, hic totum partibus est essentiale: unde constat, illam ex causis, hanc ex effectis distributionem rectè dici. Genus autem "est totum partibus essentiale," quia illam essentiam nempe materiam et formam, quæ speciebus omnibus æquè communis est, significatione sua complectitur: vel brevius, quia symbolum est communis essentiæ. Neque enim genus propriè essentiam speciebus communicat (cùm in se extra species revera nihil sit) sed earum duntaxat essentiam significet. Quod enim essentiale est et speciebus omnibus commune, ejus notio genus dicitur. Et idœa sæpe à Græcis, non separata quidem à rebus illa, ut volunt Platonica, quæ nugæ sunt, teste Aristot. Phil. 1, 7, et v. 5. Sed quod cogitatione et ratione unum et idem est specieb. multis commune in quibus re et natura est singulatim, ut Plato in Menone. Stoici etiam Idœas, ut refert Plut. de Placit. 1, 10, nostras notiones esse dixerunt.

"Species est pars generis."

Sic etiam Aristoteles, Phil. 8, 25. Et Cicero Invent. 1, "Pars quæ generi subest." Ex definitione autem generis intelligimus speciem ejusmodi partem esse cujus essentia communis in generis significatione contineatur. Propriam autem essentiam species, per quam est id quod est, à propria forma habet, quæ generis significatione minime continetur." Sic etiam Aristot. Phil. ζ, 12, "Genus non videtur particeps esse differentiarum: simul n. contrariorum idem particeps esset; differentiæ n. contrariæ sunt." Unde illud; plus est in specie quam in genere: et illud Porphyrii; "differentia est qua species superat genus." Tota igitur generis essentia singulis æqualiter inest speciebus; at tota essentia speciei non est in genere, nisi potentia, ut inquit Porphyrius. Hinc ut species est pars generis, ita genus pars esse speciei quodammodo videtur: quod et Plato in Politico notavit. Sic animal genus hominis et bestiæ dicimus. Animal enim est totum, cujus essentia, nempe corporea, animata, sentiens, ad hominem et bestiam communiter attinet. Sic dicimus hominem et bestiam species animalis; quia partes sunt animali subjectæ, quæ animalis essentiam communem habent.

"Genus est generalissimum aut subalternum.

Species subalterna aut specialissima.

Genus generalissimum, cujus nullum est genus."

Ut in logica inventione argumentum est genus generalissimum artificialium et inartificialium.

"Subalternum genus, ut subalterna item species, quod species hujus, illius autem genus est."

Id est, quod nunc genus est, nunc species: genus, si ad species sibi subjectas referatur; species, si ad suum genus.

Sic causa, genus est materiæ et formæ; species, argumenti absolutè consentanei. Sic homo est genus subalternum, sive species subalterna: species quidem, si ad animal referas; genus, si ad singulos homines.

"Species specialissima est, quà individua est in species alias."

Ut materia et forma quæque singularis. Sic homines singuli sunt species specialissimæ hominis, et singuli leones leonis.

Logicorum quidem pars maxima hominem speciem specialissimam, singulos homines individua vocant, non species. Verum ut animal est totum cujus essentia communis, nempe corporea, animata, sentiens, ad hominem et bestiam communiter attinet; sic homo est totum, cujus communis essentia rationalis communiter ad singulos attinet homines; atque ut homo et bestia species sunt animalis, quia partes sunt animali subjectæ, quæ animalis essentiam communem habent; ita singuli homines species sunt hominis, quia partes sunt homini subjectæ, quæ hominis essentiam communem habent: ergo homo non minus est singulorum hominum genus quàm animal hominis; homines singuli non minus sunt hominis species quàm homo animalis. Singuli enim homines propria forma differunt: quæ autem forma differunt propria, differunt et specie; teste Aristot. Phys. 1, 7. Deinde, quicquid differt, aut genere differt aut specie; teste eodem Aristot. Phil. 10, 3. Differre autem genere singulos homines nemo dixerit; differunt ergo specie. Nam quod aiunt hominem esse speciem singulorum hominum, id planè absurdum est: species enim pars est ejus cujus est species; ut ex ejus definitione constat: genus porrò et species cum relata sint, genus utique erit speciei genus; species, generis erit species. Si igitur homo, ut vulgò volunt, est species singulorum hominum; singuli homines erunt genus hominis; quod nimis absurdum est. At inquiunt singuli homines numero tantum differunt, non forma. Verum quæ numero differunt, forma quoque differre, jam supra capite de forma satis ostendimus; etsi formæ cujusque propriæ differentia nobis non nisi per externa quædam effecta, et accidentia, quæ vocant, dignosci potest. Deinde, singuli homines inter se disparantur, ergo opponuntur: quæ autem inter se opponuntur, eorum eadem forma esse non potest; forma ergo differunt non numero tantum. Itaque apud Laertium, in Zenone, stoici docent, Socratem esse speciem specialissimam. Immo Aristot. de Part. 1, 4, Socratem et Coriscum species infimas vocat. Sic jurisconsulti, hominem genus appellant; Stichum et Pamphilum species.

In animali n. est essentia corporea, quæ materia est ad species communiter attinens: tum facultas vitæ et sensus, quæ forma item communiter ad species spectat. Quare "genus continet causas, quæ communiter ad ipsius species attinent: contra itaque etiam species effecta generis sui continent."

"Hinc universale est insigne ac præstabile: quia causam declarat."

Idem ait Aristot. Poster. 1, 24.

"Distributio generis in species valdè quidem excellit, sed difficilis est et rara inventu."

Excellit quidem quia quicquid in artibus ex causis et effectis sumitur, id totum fere generis et speciei notionibus comprehenditur: difficilis est, cùm quia formæ, unde species oriuntur, difficiles itidem inventu sunt; tum etiam propter vocum penuriam, quibus genera et species apte nominentur.

Attamen illustrationis et exempli gratia afferemus quod poterimus. Ovidius 1 Metam. dividit animal in quinque species, stellas, aves, bestias, pisces, homines: stellis animam tribuens, ut etiam quidam philosophi tribuerunt.

> "Neu regio foret ulla suis animalibus orba, > Astra tenent cœleste solum formeque deorum," &c.

Sic Cic. Offic. 1, virtutem dividit in species quatuor, prudentiam, justitiam, fortitudinem, temperantiam; quæ tamen ipsæ non ponuntur in distributione, sed, quod idem est, earum formæ. "Sed omne quod honestum est, id quatuor partium oritur ex aliqua: aut enim in perspicentia veri solertiaque versatur, aut in societate hominum tuenda, tribuendoque suum unicuique, et rerum contractarum fide; aut in animi excelsi atque invicti magnitudine ac robore; aut in omnibus quæ fiunt, quæque dicuntur, ordine et modo, in quo inest modestia et temperantia."

Hæc quidem, ut dixi, est "distributio generis in specierum formas;" quæ perinde est ac si in ipsa species esset; "quia forma cum genere constituunt suas species."

"Genus et species non solum tractantur hac simplici divisionis formula, sed etiam separatim alterum ex altero."

Hoc est, quod de toto genere, id de omnibus etiam speciebus rectè affirmatur. Sic Cicero, pro Archia, poëticam cum eloquentia comparans, quæ sunt species artis, cognatas esse ait inter se, quia idem de artibus in genere, humanioribus præsertim, affirmatur. "Etenim omnes artes, quæ ad humanitatem pertinent, habent quoddam commune vinculum, et quasi cognatione quadam inter se continentur."

"Contra genus tractatur per species."

Hoc est, quod de omnibus speciebus, id de genere quoque rectè affirmatur. Sic Ovidius probat, virtutem in rebus adversis clariorem esse, per inductionem specierum: quoniam scilicet virtus militis, nautæ, medici, rebus adversis spectatur, 4 Trist.

> "Hectora quis nosset, felix si Troia fuisset?
> Publica virtutis per mala facta via est:
> Ars tua, Tiphy, jacet, si non sit in æquore fluctus:
> Si valeant homines, ars tua, Phœbe, jacet.
> Quæ latet, inque bonis cessat non cognita rebus,
> Apparet virtus arguiturque malis."

Cùm itaque genus tractetur etiam per species, ut superiore regula docemur, et exempla specialia species eorum sint, quorum exempla sunt; hinc sequitur, "exempla speciali suo generi accommodata, hujus esse loci;" sive unum solum, sive per inductionem plura adhibeantur: specialia inquam, exempla enim vel similia sunt, quæ similia arguunt; vel specialia, quæ arguunt suum genus; qualia fuerunt in singulis argumentorum capitibus ex poëtis et oratoribus desumpta. Exemplorum autem specialium, non solum in artib. cùm inveniendis tum tradendis usus planè est necessarius (nam inductione exemplorum præcepta colliguntur, et eorum usu illustrantur) verùm etiam in omni sermone, quoties res lucem desiderat. Cujusmodi est illud Cic. ad Atticum: "Urbem tu relinquas? Ergo idem si Galli venirent. Non est, inquit, in parietibus respub. at in aris et focis: fecit idem Themistocles: fluctum enim totius barbariæ ferre urbs una non poterat. At idem Pericles non fecit, annum ferè post quinquagesimum, quum præter mœnia nihil teneret: nostri olim, urbe reliqua capta, arcem tamen retinuerunt." Hic ab exemplo speciali in utramque partem disseritur. Themistocles deseruit Athenas; ergo urbem deserere licet. Pericles non deseruit Athenas; nec Romani Gallis venientibus Romam; ergo urbs non est deserenda. Quod si hoc modo argumentaretur, Themistocles urbem reliquit, ergo mihi licet; argumentum esset à simili: nam exempla, cùm ad alia specialia accommodantur, similia sunt vel dissimilia. Hujus autem loci ea demum sunt, quæ generi suo accommodantur.

Est et alia imperfectior distributio ex effectis, quando partes non sunt propriè effecta totius, sed ipsarum partium. Ut Cic. de Senect. "Nautarum alii malos scandunt, alii per foros cursitant, alii sentinam exhauriunt; gubernator autem clavum tenet in puppi." In hoc exemplo totum est nauta, quod est singulorum nautarum genus; partes, malum scandere, cursitare, &c. Quæ tamen nautæ ut totius sive generis partes sive species non sunt, sed specierum, i. e. singulorum nautarum effecta sive officia, quibus ipsæ species, i. e. singuli nautæ inter se distinguuntur. Verùm quanto hæc distributio imperfectior est, tanto est frequentior. Usus autem illius præcipuus est, ut perfectioris raritatem suppleat; cùm distributio generis in species, ut supradictum est, tam difficilis inventu sit.

CAP. XXVIII.

De Distributione è Subjectis.

"Reliqua distributio est modo quodam consentaneorum, ut subjectorum et adjunctorum. Distributio e subjectis est, cùm partes sunt subjecta." Id est quando veræ partes intellectæ subjectis distinguuntur vel adumbrantur.

Ut apud Catullum:

> "Virginitas non tota tua est: ex parte parentum est.
> Tertia pars matri data, pars data tertia patri:
> Tertia sola tua est: noli pugnare duobus,
> Qui genero sua jura simul cum dote dederunt."

Virginitas puellæ vel jus potius virginitatis in tres partes dividitur subjectis distinctas, matre, patre, et ipsa puella. Alterum exemplum ex cap. 26 huc transfertur, Virgil. 1 Georg. ubi poëta exorditur opus suum à divisione in quatuor partes, subjectis suis occupantibus distinctas, segetes, arbores, pecora, apes.

> "Quid faciat lætas segetes, quo sidere terram
> Vertere, Mæcenas, ulmisque adjungere vites
> Conveniat: quæ cura boum, qui cultus habendo

Sit pecori, atque apibus quanta experientia parcis,
Hinc canere incipiam."——

Tertium exemplum ex eodem etiam capite huc transfertur. Cic. pro Muræna: "Intelligo, judices, tres totius accusationis partes fuisse: et earum unam in reprehensione vitæ, alteram in contentione dignitatis, tertiam in criminibus ambitûs esse versatam." Hic tota accusatio in tria membra distribuitur, subjectis suis occupantibus distincta: atque in his tribus exemplis totum est integrum. Quartum exemplum est generis in species ex Cic. 5 Tuscul. "Sint sanè illa tria genera bonorum, dum corporis et externa jaceant humi, et tantummodo quia sumenda sunt, appellentur bona. Alia autem, divina illa, longè latèque se pandant, cœlumque contingant." Hic Cicero bona in tres species, quas ille genera vocat, dividit, subjectis suis distinctas; nempe animi, corporis, et fortunæ.

CAP. XXIX.

De Distributione ex Adjunctis.

"Distributio ex adjunctis est, quando partes sunt adjuncta."

Ut hominum alii sani, alii ægri: alii divites, alii pauperes.

Sic Virgil. 1 Georg. mundum dividit in quinque partes; mediam torridam, duas extremas frigidas, et reliquas duas temperatas:

"Quinque tenent cœlum zonæ, quarum una corusco Semper sole rubens, et torrida semper ab igni, &c."

Cæsar 1 Belli Gall. "Gallia est omnis divisa in tres partes· quarum unam incolunt Belgæ, aliam Aquitani, tertiam, qui, ipsorum lingua Celtæ, nostra Galli, appellantur.

In distributionibus hujusmodi imperfectis advertendum est id quod videtur distribui. Nam si id totius rationem habet, integri vel generis, distributio est; si non habet rationem totius, sed simplex aliquod argumentum est, ut causa, effectum, subjectum, adjunctum, non est distributio sed enumeratio potius, vel causarum plurium ejusdem effecti, vel effectorum plurium ejusdem causæ, vel subjectorum plurium ejusdem adjuncti, vel denique adjunctorum plurium ejusdem subjecti. Hoc genere distributionis imperfecto argumenta sæpe quorum veræ species nullæ apparent, modis quibusdam distinguuntur, modos autem supra in adjunctis posuimus. Sic in causis, "procreans et conservans, modi" efficientis, "non species," dicuntur: quia non differunt inter se ut species per differentias oppositas, sed ita ut uni et eidem efficienti convenire queant; quandoquidem quæ causa procreat, eadem ferè conservat; potestque efficere idem vel solus, vel cum aliis; nonnulla vel per se, vel per accidens.

CAP. XXX.

De Definitione.

Definitio in tradendis artibus est usu quidem prior distributione (prius enim definitur unaquæque res quàm distribuitur) natura tamen et inveniendi ordine est posterior: genus enim, quo non adhibito, si quod sit, nulla definitio constitui potest, à distributione, qui proprius generis est locus, mutuum accipit.

"Definitio est, cum explicatur quid res sit."

Definitio vocatur, eo quòd rei cujusque essentiam definit, eamque suis quasi finibus circumscribit.

"Atque ut definitio arguit sive explicat definitum, sic vicissim à definito argui potest." Quæ quanquam argumentorum omnium affectio communis est arguere inter se vicissim et argui, hic tamen eandem ob causam facta mentio est definiti, ob quam in capite notationis facta est nominis; ne argumentorum numero excludi videatur, cùm neque ejusdem sit nominis cum definitione quam arguit, neque caput sibi peculiare obtineat; sicut alia argumentorum paria, quæ nominis ejusdem non sunt. Ad reciprocationem autem quod attinet, quæ definitioni cum distributione communis est, ea definitionis et definiti manifestissima est: logica enim est ars bene ratiocinandi; et vicissim, ars bene ratiocinandi est logica. Atque ad hunc modum omnis definitio, ut nonnulli rectè monuerunt, conversione examinanda est: unde Boëthius, Top. 5, "omnis definitio rei, quam definit, adæquatur."

"Definitio est perfecta aut imperfecta: illa propriè definitio, hæc descriptio dicitur."

"Definitio perfecta est, quæ constat è solis causis essentiam constituentibus." Redundat ergo in definitione perfecta quicquid præterea ponitur.

"Causæ autem illæ genere et forma comprehenduntur."

Genus enim et forma (quæ sunt quasi corpus et anima definitionis) totam rei essentiam constituunt. Non ita tamen necessariò requiritur in definitione perfecta genus, ut perfecta non sit nisi genus habeat: primùm enim, summorum generum, ut argumenti in logica inventione, genus nullum est; sed tota eorum essentia sub ipsa forma continetur; quæ etiam materiam iis convenientem complectitur; deinde fieri potest ut ipsæ causæ facilius occurrant quam earum symbolum genus. Itaque si ex ipsis causis definitio constat, perfecta erit; si ex genere, succinctior tantum. Genus autem proximum, non remotum, in definitione semper est ponendum: qui enim proximum ponit, remotiora etiam posuit; nisi proximum fortè anonymum sit; tum enim et quotiescunque generis, sive anonymum sit sive non, paulo ante facta mentio est, abesse genus in definitione, et rectè subintelligi potest: ut in hac ipsa definitionis definitione, genus remotum, nempe ortum argumentum; tum etiam proximum, nempe reale et compositum, subintelligitur. Quam autem hic formam in definitione appellamus, plerique differentiam vocant. Sed differentia formæ fructus est: et nisi in rerum collatione, quæ in definitione nulla est, non apparet; et forma ipsa est unde præcipua rerum explicatio sumitur; præcipuum ergo in definitione locum habet.

Atque hoc modo definitur homo, animal rationale: nempe genere, "animal," intelligimus, ut dictum est, essentiam corpoream plenam vitæ et sensus, quæ materies hominis est, et pars formæ: cui si addas "rationale," totam formam hominis comprehendes, vitæ, sensus, rationis facultate.

Itaque "perfecta definitio nihil aliud est, quàm universale symbolum causarum essentiam rei et naturam constituentium."

Tales definitiones sunt artium. Grammatica est ars bene loquendi. Rhetorica bene dicendi. Logica bene ratiocinandi. Arithmetica bene numerandi. Geometria bene metiendi. Nam genere "ars" intelligimus præceptorum ordine dispositorum comprehensionem, quæ materies est cujusque artis et pars formæ, sive forma communis, cui si addas formam cujusque artis propriam (quæ finem quoque sub se comprehendit, ut dictum est cap. 8,) habes totam artis essentiam explicatam, quæ perfecta definitio est.

Ad regulas consequentiæ quod attinet, nempe à definitione ad definitum; et contrà, affirmatè vel negatè; hæc omnia reciprocatio, quæ distributionis quoque fuit, satis clarè suo loco exposuit.

CAP. XXXI.

De Descriptione.

Definitiones perfectæ propter causarum et præsertim formarum obscuritatem, difficiles inventu sunt: ad supplendam igitur earum raritatem, "descriptio" inventa est.

"Descriptio est definitio imperfecta, ex aliis etiam argumentis rem definiens." Id est, ex quibusvis aliis rem quoquo modo explicans.

Ubi itaque forma haberi non potest (nam genera ferè notiora sunt) proprietas loco formæ seu differentiæ accipienda est: ut, "angelus est substantia incorporea; equus est animal hinnibile," &c. Adjuncta sive accidentia, quæ vocantur (quia substantiæ solæ, ut inquit Aristot. l. 6, Metaph. c. 5, primariò definiuntur, accidentia secundariò tantum) propria quidem genere, subjecto, causaque proxima vel efficiente, vel finali, vel utraque definiuntur. Genere et subjecto solo; ut, "simitas est curvitas nasi:" subjecto et efficiente; ut, "tonitru est sonus fractæ nubis, ob ignem oppressum; quantitas continua est adjunctum corporis, ab extensione materiæ:" finali; ut, "sensus est facultas naturalis in animali, ad judicandum de singularibus:" vel utraque; ut, "respiratio est attractio et expulsio aëris reciproca à pulmonibus facta, ad cordis refrigerationem." Omittitur enim sæpe subjectum in definitione propriorum; quippe quòd ex genere vel ex causa intelligitur: ut, "memoria est sensus internus conservans imagines rerum cognitarum." Non dicitur "sensus internus animalis," addito nempe subjecto, quia id mentione "sensus" intelligitur. Potentiæ naturales actione sua et causa efficiente definiuntur: ut, "risibilitas est facultas ridendi, orta ab anima rationali." Habitus vel fine vel objecto quæ sæpe coincidunt definiuntur: fine; ut, "Logica est ars bene ratiocinandi:" objecto; ut, "Physica est scientia rerum naturalium." Qualitates patibiles definiuntur subjecto et efficiente: ut, "color est qualitas corporis mixti, orta ex contemperatione lucidi et opaci." Actiones ferè subjecto efficiente et fine definiuntur. Relationes relatis inter se et fundamento sive causa: ut, "paternitas est relatio patris ad filium, ex procreatione orta."

Adjuncta communia objecto, efficiente, finali, vel ex his quot sunt ex usu, definiuntur: ut, "albedo est color, ortus ex lucido opacum superante."

Illud modo generatim in descriptionibus cavendum, ne causa pro genere habeatur: ut cùm dubitatio describitur, æqualitas rationum; sanitas, symmetria humorum; dolor, solutio continui; eclipsis lunæ, interpositio terræ: aut subjectum; ut, ventus est aër motus; justitia est voluntas constans; vulnus est pars carnis dilacerata; peccatum originis est natura corrupta, et similia.

Cæterum in his certæ regulæ dari non possunt. Aliquando enim ex remoto solùm contrario fit descriptio: ut,

> "Virtus est vitium fugere, et sapientia prima > Stultitia caruisse."——Aliquando planè arbitraria est.

Hinc etsi unica rei definitio, plures tamen descriptiones esse possunt.

Ut autem definitio definito, quod suprà monuimus, ita etiam descriptio descripto vicissim argui potest. Verùm non affectio solùm hæc mutua inter descriptionem et rem descriptam intercedit, sed etiam reciprocatio; juxta communem illam distributionis ac definitionis regulam, suprà, cap. 25, traditam; qua descriptio quoque propria rei descriptæ et reciproca esse debet. Quamvis enim in descriptionibus multa sæpe congeruntur, quorum aliqua fortè latius patent, quàm id quod describitur, juncta tamen æquantur descripto descriptionemque propriam reddunt; sin minus, vitiosa atque inutilis descriptio censenda est. Ut, "homo est animal mortale, capax disciplinæ." Hic cum aliqua causa (materia scilicet et communi forma, quæ sub genere "animal" continetur) miscentur duæ circumstantiæ sive adjuncta, alterum commune, scilicet "mortale," alterum proprium, "capax disciplinæ." At quorsum, inquis, illud "mortale," cùm nullum animal non sit mortale? Quia nempe Aristot. cujus hæc descriptio est, Top. 5, 1, animalia quædam ait esse immortalia, Top. 4, 2, et in eodem capite, Deum ipsum ζῶον ἀθάνατον, i. e. "immortale animal," vocat.

"Sed hæc succincta brevitas non est in hac specie perpetua; quæ sæpe illustriorem et copiosiorem explicationem desiderat."

Succinctæ descriptiones, quæ perfectas æmulantur definitiones, usum habent præcipuè in artibus tradendis ac disputationibus. Prolixiores illæ, utpote ad aures vulgi magis accommodatæ, apud oratores ac poëtas frequentiùs occurrunt.

Sic gloria describitur in Miloniana: "Sed tamen ex omnibus præmiis virtutis, si esset habenda ratio præmiorum, amplissimum esse præmium gloriam: hanc unam, quæ brevitatem vitæ posteritatis memoria consolaretur; quæ efficeret, ut absentes, adessemus; mortui, viveremus: hanc denique esse, cujus gradibus etiam homines in cœlum videantur ascendere." Descriptio hæc gloriæ constat ex genere, "præmio" nempe "virtutis;" adjuncta amplitudine, eaque aucta à minore, quod sit omnium amplissima; quatuor deinde effecta ejus adjiciuntur.

Sic 4 Æneid. fama describitur:

"Extemplò Lybiæ magnas it fama per urbes,
Fama, malum quo non aliud velocius ullum;
Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo," &c.

Describitur fama, 1. à genere, "malum:" 2. ab adjuncta velocitate, quæ illustratur à majore negato, "quo non aliud velocius:" tum duplici effecto aliarum rerum dissimili, quòd

"Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo."

3. Ab adjuncta varietate, quæ ostenditur ex aliis adjunctis, quòd sit primò "parva," idque arguitur causa, scilicet "metu," et circumstantia temporis, "primò" nempe; tum subitò grandior facta incremento exigui temporis incredibili, idque ostenditur trib. effectis, quæ singula subjectis suis illustrantur, ——"Mox sese attollit in auras: Ingrediturque solo, et caput inter nubila condit."

4. A causa procreante, "illam terra parens,"——— mater scilicet gigantum; et efficiendi modo, consilio nempe sive impetu naturali, "ira irritata deorum," qui gigantes occiderant; causa autem procreans communis illustrata tempore adjuncto, et communi testimonio,

"Extremam, ut perhibent, Cœo Enceladoque sororem Progenuit." Rursus illustratam ab adjunctis, ——"Pedibus celerem et pernicibus alis, Monstrum horrendum, ingens"——

Deinde à partibus corporis et membris, iisque paribus.

——"Cui quot sunt corpore plumæ,
Tot vigiles oculi subter, mirabile dictu,
Tot linguæ, totidem ora sonant, tot subrigit aures."

Tum ab effectis nocturnis, iisque partim affirmatis quæ subjectis locis illustrantur,

"Nocte volat cœli medio, terræque per umbram Stridens;" partim negatis, "nec dulci declinat lumina somno."

Tum diurnis, eaque illustrantur et subjectis locis, et adjuncto situ sedendi,

"Luce sedet custos, aut summi culmine tecti, Turribus aut altis, et magnas territat urbes."

Ab adjunctis denique paribus;

"Tam ficti pravique tenax quam nuntia veri."

Tales sunt descriptiones plantarum, animalium in physicis; item fluminum, montium, urbium apud Geographos et Historicos; personarum denique apud poëtas et oratores.

CAP. XXXII.

De Testimonio divino.

"Exposito artificiali argumento, sequitur inartificiale.

"Argumentum inartificiale est quod non sua natura, sed assumpta artificialis alicujus argumenti vi arguit.

"Id uno nomine testimonium dicitur." Nempe, ut inquit Cic. in Top. "quòd ab aliqua externa re sumitur ad faciendam fidem."

Inartificiale autem dicitur, non quòd artis ope et auxilio non inveniatur (siquidem de eo inveniendo, ut inquit Cicero, Partit. in arte præcipitur) sed quod ex se suaque natura artis hujus et facultatis arguendi expers sit. Potest etiam assumptum dici, quod assumpta vi arguit, non sua. Argumentum enim inartificiale naturam rei non attingit, nedum arguit, ut artificiale solet, neque rei affectio, sicut artificiale, est; sed est nuda cujuspiam aliqua de re attestatio, sive attestantis affirmatio aut negatio. Res autem neque propter affirmationem sunt, neque propter negationem non sunt: testimonium igitur ex se suaque natura non arguit; "sed assumpta artificialis alicujus argumenti vi." Vis autem hæc est testantis auctoritas, à qua omnis testimonii fides pendet. Auctoritas autem variis in argumentis consistit, sed in effectis testantis et in adjunctis præcipuè cernitur.

"Itaque cum exquisita rerum veritas" sive natura "subtiliùs exquiritur, perexiguam probationis vim testimonium habet."

Hinc Cic. 1 de Nat. "Non tam auctores," inquit, "in disputando, quàm rationum momenta quærenda sunt."

"In civilibus autem et humanis rebus," ubi de facto queritur, "plerumque hoc argumentum præcipuam fidem è moribus arguentis efficit, si prudentia, probitas, et benevolentia affuerint."

Horum unum aliquod si deest, vel per imprudentiam testis, vel propter improbitatem, vel inimicitiarum denique aut nimiæ gratiæ causa, falsum sæpe pro testimonio dicitur.

Testimonium est divinum vel humanum.

Et rectè quidem in species efficientibus suis causis distinctas dividitur. Ab efficientibus enim maximè testimonium suas vires assumit. Effectum itaque est, si ad testem spectas; testimonium, si ad rem testatam. Perexiguam autem vim probationis in exquisita veritate et natura rerum pervestiganda communiter tribui testimonio quod tam ad divinum quàm ad humanum pertinere videatur, id cur quempiam offendat, non video: testimonium enim sive divinum sit sive humanum, peræque vim omnem ab authore, nullam in se habet. Et divinum quidem testimonium affirmat vel negat rem ita esse, facitque ut credam; non probat, non docet, non facit ut sciam aut intelligam cur ita sit, nisi rationes quoque adhibeat.

Testimonium divinum est quod Deum habet authorem.

In divinis testimoniis numerantur non solum deorum oracula, sed etiam responsa vatum et fatidicorum.

Vera hæc sint an ficta, veri numinis an falsi, logicus non laborat, sed quam modò vim arguendi unumquodque habeat. Itaque in civilib. etiam et humanis rebus testimonium divinum perinde vim probationis habet, ut ejus author verus est aut falsus deus.

Hujusmodi sunt ista Catilin. 3, "Nam ut illa omittam, visas nocturno tempore ab occidente faces, ardoremque cœli; ut fulminum jactus, ut terræ motus, cæteraque, quæ ita multa, nobis consulibus, facta sunt, ut hæc, quæ nunc fiunt, canere dii immortales viderentur."

CAP. XXXIII.

De Testimonio humano.

Testimonium humanum est, quod authorem habet hominem.

"Estque commune aut proprium."

Distributio hæc proponitur, non ut accurata aliqua divisio (neque enim testimonio propria est) sed ut distinctio qualiscunque subalternarum specierum, ad quas inferiores species testimonii et exempla possint revocari. Atque, ut superior illa distinctio in divinum et humanum, ab efficiente quoque sumitur, qui fit persona publica sive communis, aut propria sive privata.

"Testimonium commune est, ut lex et illustris sententia."

Hæc enim duo exempla sunt potius quàm species; quibus adjungi potest fama; quam Cic. in Top. quoddam multitudinis testimonium appellat; alii, consensum civitatis et publicum testimonium vocant.

"Legis autem et non scriptæ et scriptæ testimonium est pro Milone: Est enim, judices, non scripta, sed nata lex; quam non didicimus, accepimus, legimus; verùm ex natura ipsa arripuimus, hausimus, expressimus: ad quam non docti, sed facti; non instituti, sed imbuti sumus: ut, si vita nostra in aliquas insidias, si in vim, in tela, aut latronum aut inimicorum incidisset, omnis honesta ratio esset expediendæ salutis." Et ibidem, "Quod si duodecim tabulæ nocturnum furem quoquo modo, diurnum autem, si se telo defenderit, interfici impunè voluerunt, quis est, qui," &c.

Restat illustris sententia; cujus generis sunt proverbia. Ut pares cum paribus facillime congregantur. Spartam nactus es, hanc exorna. Tum dicta sapientum: ut, Nosce teipsum. Ne quid nimis. Sponde, præsto est detrimentum. Quanquam enim hæc dicta singula à singulis fortasse auctoribus orta sunt, tamen quia omnium in ore versantur, quasi omnium fiunt, et ad commune testimonium rectè referuntur.

Proprium testimonium est: ut Platonis illud, 1 ad Q. fratrem: "Atque ille quidem princeps ingenii et doctrinæ, Plato, tum denique fore beatas respub. putavit, si aut docti et sapientes homines eas regere cœpissent, aut qui regerent, omne suum studium in doctrina ac sapientia collocassent."

Talia sunt in poetis. Æneid. 6.

> "Discite justitiam, moniti; et non temnere divos."

Sic Homericis illis versibus:

> Αἴας δ' ἐκ Σαλαμῖνος ἄγεν δυοκαίδεκα νῆας.
> Στῆσε δ' ἄγων ἵν' Ἀθηναίων ἵσταντο φάλαγγες.
>
> Ajax autem ex Salamine duxit duodecim naves.
> Constituit verò ducens, ubi Atheniensium stabant phalanges.

Victi sunt in judicio Megarenses, quo contenderunt cum Atheniensibus de Salamine insula, utrique forte civitati æquè vicina.

Atque hæc veterum fuere et absentium testimonia, et ferè mortuorum; quæ de jure potissimum afferuntur.

Viventium et præsentium, quæ de facto plerunque testantur, non tantum sunt "cùm quæritur de fundo aut cæde et ejusmodi negotio aliquo, sed etiam obligationis, confessionis, jurisjurandi testimonia sunt."

Obligationis exemplum est Philipp. 5, "Promitto, recipio, spondeo, P. C. Cæsarem talem semper fore civem, qualis hodie sit, qualemque eum maximè velle et optare debemus."

Pignus etiam obligatio quædam est.

Ut apud Virgil. Ecl. 3.

> "Vis ergo inter nos quid possit uterque vicissim > Experiamur? Ego hanc vitulam (ne forte recuses, > Bis venit ad mulctram, binos alit ubere fœtus) > Depono: tu dic, mecum quo pignore certes."

"Confessio est vel libera, in qua cujusvis testimonium pro se levissimum contra se gravissimum censetur. Vel est expressa tormentis, quæ propriè quæstio dicitur."

Tale fuit argumentum contra Milonem, quòd à Cicerone deridetur: quia cruciatus non sæpius veritatem quàm mendacium exprimit atque extorquet. "Age verò, quæ erat aut qualis quæstio: heus, ubi Ruscio? ubi Casca? Clodius insidias fecit Miloni? Fecit; certa crux. Nullas fecit. Sperata libertas."

Huc etiam referri potest argumentum, quo utimur cùm affirmationis nostræ approbationem et experientiam adversario proponimus.

Verr. 4. "Ecquis Volcatio, si sua sponte venisset, unam libellam dedisset? veniat nunc, experiatur; tecto recipiet nemo."

Terent, Eunuch.

> ———"Fac periculum in literis,
> Fac in palæstra, in musicis; quæ liberum
> Scire æquum est adolescentem, solertem dabo."

Ovid. 3 Trist.

> "Quod magis ut liqueat, neve hoc ego fingere credar, > Ipse velim pœnas experiare meas."

Jusjurandum etiam testimonium est.

Quale est Æneid. 9.

"Per superos, et siqua fides tellure sub ima est, Invitus, regina, tuo de littore cessi."

Quamvis autem in juramentis divinum quodammodo testimonium invocetur, juramenti tamen fides authoritate et moribus jurantis nititur.

Reciprocatio hic obscurior est ad rem testatam, quod est hic alterum argumentum affectum; ut quia testatum verum sit, testis sit etiam verax.

ARTIS LOGICÆ PLENIOR INSTITUTIO, &c.

LIBER SECUNDUS.

DE ARGUMENTORUM DISPOSITIONE.

CAP. I.

Quid sit argumentorum dispositio?

Adhuc prima artis logicæ pars fuit in argumentorum inventione: pars altera sequitur in eorum dispositione.

Quemadmodum grammaticæ pars prima est de singulis vocibus, secunda de syntaxi earum; sic logicæ pars prima de argumentis inveniendis fuit, secunda est de disponendis, i. e. quæ doceat argumenta rectè disponere: ita dispositio quasi syntaxis quædam argumentorum est; non tamen ad bene judicandum duntaxat, ut vult Ramus, quod nimis angustum est, sed ad bene ratiocinandum, qui finis est logicæ generalis, ad quem unum finem omnia artis præcepta referenda sunt. Iis itaque non assentior, qui judicium secundam esse partem logicæ volunt: cùm ipsorum sententia judicium sit secundæ hujus partis nempe dispositionis finis et fructus: non potest autem res eadem esse finis et id cujus est finis, fructus quod affectum est et ejus fructus causa, quæ dispositio est. An inquiunt, judicium ut doctrina est pars logicæ; finis est ut habitus bene judicandi. Immo verò inquam, dispositionis doctrina suam operam confert non solùm ad bene judicandum, sed ad bene ratiocinandum; judicium autem et dispositionem pro eodem non dixerim cum Ramo: si enim certa, ut ipse Ramus ait, dispositionis regula unumquodque judicatur, dispositio utique ac judicium si idem erunt, idem erit et regula, et id cujus regula est: doctrina deinde judicii docet nihil aliud quàm bene judicare; doctrina dispositionis pro sua disponendi parte, etiam bene ratiocinari: sive id sit intelligere, sive judicare, sive disputare, sive meminisse. Certa enim dispositionis regula unumquodque munus ratiocinandi excolitur.

Cum itaque simplicem argumentorum inter se affectionem aliquid per se conferre ad judicium rectumque ratiocinium initio proposuerim, nunc eorum dispositionem aliquanto plus, adeoque clarius ad idem conducere propono.

Prius autem quàm ad partes dispositionis accedimus, generalis quædam dispositionis affectio, quæ crypsis dicitur, attingenda est; ut quæ ad omnes species dispositionis communiter pertineat. Crypsis autem, sive occultatio ista, est triplex; dispositarum scilicet partium vel defectus, vel redundantia, vel inversio. Quod itaque semel hic monendum est, siqua propter has crypses dubitatio contingit, explenda quæ desunt, amputanda quæ supersunt, et pars quæque in suum restituenda est locum.

CAP. II.

De Axiomatis affirmatione et negatione.

"Dispositio est axiomatica vel dianoetica.

"Axioma est dispositio argumenti cum argumento, qua esse aliquid aut non esse indicatur."

Axioma sæpe Aristoteli significat propositionem sive sententiam ita claram, ut quasi digna sit cui propter se fides habeatur. Aliàs axioma et propositionem sive sententiam quamlibet pro eodem is habet: et rectè quidem: ut enim sententia à sentio, i. e. existimo, vel arbitror, ita axioma à verbo Græco quod idem significat, derivatur. Atque hujus vocis generalem hanc significationem apud veteres dialecticos receptam fuisse, ex Cicerone, Plutarcho, Laertio, Gellio, Galeno lib. 16, c. 8, constat.

Latinè "enuntiatum, enuntiatio; pronuntiatum, pronuntiatio; effatum" Varroni profatum, et proloquium, apud Gellium lib. 16, id est sententia in qua nihil desideratur. Ex Græco etiam "oratio" et "propositio" dicitur.

Cur ergo, inquis, Græcanica, et hæc præ aliis, vox placita est? Quia, inquam, commodissima. Nam "oratio" et "sententia" voces latiores sunt; ideoque Græci qui λόγον sive "rationem" vocant, addunt ferè

"primam, brevissimam" aut "enuntiativam." Deinde "propositio" ambigua vox est; significat enim nunc priorem partem plenæ comparationis, nunc primam partem syllogismi. Latina autem illa, "enuntiatum, enuntiatio," &c., orationis exterioris videntur magis quàm rationis interioris esse: cùm dispositio hæc logica rationis omnino sit tam mente conceptæ quàm ore prolatæ; utque voces symbola sunt et notæ simplicium notionum, ita enuntiatum videtur esse symbolum axiomatis mente concepti. Sic tamen retineri possunt voces Latinæ "enuntiatum, enuntiatio," &c., si distinguimus cum Aristotele sermonem in exteriorem, qui ore profertur; et interiorem qui mente solùm concipitur.

Genus autem axiomatis rectè statuitur dispositio, non judicium, quod, ut supra retuli, dispositionis effectum est, et hic quidem specialiter quo aliquid esse aut non esse judicantur.

Argumentum autem cum argumento est id quod arguit cum eo quod arguitur.

Finis dispositionis est, ut per eam esse aliquid aut non esse indicetur, sive ut aliquid de aliquo dicatur aut non dicatur. Hinc illud Arist. Phil. 9. 10, "esse est componi, et unum esse; non esse autem est non componi, sed plura esse." Et simplicia quidem argumenta per se considerata significant aliquid; non autem esse, aut non esse aliquid, nisi disposita. Solo autem modo indicativo esse aliquid aut non esse indicatur: non reliquis, nisi ad indicativum reductis: ut "abi," i. e. jubeo te abire. "Fiat voluntas tua," i. e. precamur ut fiat. "Utinam dissolverer," i. e. cupio dissolvi. "Quid est dialectica," i. e. quæro quid sit.

Cùm autem in axiomate argumentum cum argumento disponatur, horumque unum necesse sit antecedere, alterum sequi; hinc partes axiomatis (Aristot. terminos vocat) duæ sunt, antecedens et consequens: illa vulgò minor terminus, sive subjectum, hæc terminus major seu prædicatum nominatur; quia id continet, quod de subjecto prædicatur sive dicitur. Verùm hæc nomina angustiora sunt, quàm illa, ut infra patebit.

Axiomatis affectio communis est crypsis illa triplex, de qua deque ejus triplici medela capite superiore diximus: defectus, cùm pars aliqua deest; ut, "excessit, erupit, evasit;" Catilina scilicet vel quis alius: "pluit, tonat;" deus nempe vel cœlum. Redundantia, quæ et amplificatio dicitur, est, cùm argumentum ejusque synonymum ponitur; aut ad id illustrandum quidvis aliud: prioris exemplum est, logica sive dialectica est "ars bene ratiocinandi:" posterioris est hoc,

Livor iners vitium mores non exit in altos.

Inversio est, cùm antecedentis loco ponitur consequens: ut "quæstus magnus est pietas cum animo sua sorte contento," i. e. pietas cum animo sua sorte contento est magnus quæstus.

Duæ sunt reliquæ axiomatis affectiones; quarum altera ex dispositione oritur, altera ad judicium pertinet. Nam intellectus cùm disponit argumenta, vel componit ea inter se, vel dividit: compositio autem illa et divisio nihil aliud sunt quàm affirmatio et negatio. Cùm verò de dispositione illa judicium fert, judicat eam vel veram esse vel falsam. Quemadmodum autem dispositio est prior judicio, sic esse et non esse prius quiddam est et simplicius quàm affirmare et negare, et utrumque hoc quàm verum aut falsum judicare.

Duplex est hic modus enuntiandi, non duæ sunt species enuntiati sive axiomatis: contradictione enim idem axioma affirmatur et negatur: sed affirmatio et negatio enuntiationis, i. e. enuntiandi species sunt, non enuntiati; nam et affirmatio et negatio dici potest enuntiatio, enuntiatum verò nequaquam; axiomatis igitur utraque est affectio, non axioma.

"Axioma affirmatum est quando vinculum ejus affirmatur: negatum, quando negatur." Vinculum n. axiomatis forma est; vinculi vi axiomatis materia disponitur et quasi animatur; vinculo affirmato et negato, axioma ipsum affirmatur aut negatur: affirmatio itaque et negatio sunt vinculi affectiones, adeoque axiomatis ejusque specierum. Vinculum autem est vel verbum vel grammatica conjunctio, ut postmodum patebit, cum axioma in species dividetur.

Affirmatio autem hæc et negatio nihil aliud est, ut suprà diximus, quàm compositio et divisio: affirmatur enim axioma, cum ejus consequens per affirmationem vinculi cum antecedente componitur; negatur, cùm, negato vinculo, consequens ab antecedente dividitur. Negatio igitur axiomatica non est, quemadmodum erat topica non ens, sed entis tantummodo ab ente divisio.

"Hinc nascitur axiomatum contradictio, quando idem axioma affirmatur et negatur."

CAP. III.

De vero et falso.

"Axioma deinde est verum aut falsum."

Hoc scilicet ex affirmatione et negatione fit judicium: cùm enim affirmantur quæ affirmanda sunt, et negantur quæ neganda, axiomata judicantur vera; et contrà. Unde Aristot. de Interpret. 1, "in compositione et divisione est verum aut falsum." Falsum autem non docetur hoc modo in arte, sed judicatur: nam enuntiatio falsa non minus axioma est, quàm vera, eadem enim utrobique dispositio est: non idem de syllogismo ac methodo dici poterit.

"Axioma verum est, quandò pronuntiat uti res est: falsum, contrà."

Sic enim Plato, in Cratylo. Ad judicium itaque faciendum, non modò artis documenta, sed etiam rerum ipsarum cognitio requiritur; quia res ipsa veritatis norma et mensura est.

"Axioma verum est contingens aut necessarium. Contingens, quando sic verum est, ut aliquando falsum esse possit. Ut, 'audentes fortuna juvat.'

"Itaque veritatis hujus contingentis judicium, opinio dicitur." Quæ præteritorum et presentium homini certa esse potest, futurorum per naturam non admodum potest. Deo autem etsi tempora omnia præsentia non sunt, ut vulgò receptum est, præsentia enim mutare potest, præterita non item; opinio tamen in Deum non cadit, quia per causas æque omnia cognoscit.

De contingentibus autem, præteritis etiam, et præsentibus humanum judicium certa quidem opinio dicitur, non tamen scientia: ea enim ex argumentis, quorum est immutabilis affectio, oritur; cujusmodi in contingenti axiomate non disponuntur. Neque idcirco non est opinio præteritorum et præsentium, quòd manifesta sunt, immo tum maximè opinari contingentia dicimur; nam dubia si sunt, sive contingentia sive necessaria, ne opinamur quidem, sed dubitamus: et necessaria tametsi sunt atque certissima, si causam nescimus, etiam ea duntaxat opinamur.

At, inquies, præterita et præsentia non sunt contingentia, sed necessaria, quia sunt immutabilia; nam neque factum infectum fieri potest; et quicquid est, quandiu est, necesse est esse. Respondendum, necesse quidem esse, ut quod fuit, fuerit, et quod jam est, sit; nec tamen sequi, ut quod fuit vel est, sit propriè necessarium. In axiomate enim contingenti, præterito, vel præsenti quæ videtur esse necessitas, absoluta non est, neque ex rerum dispositarum natura, sed ex conditione duntaxat et lege contradictionis pendet: dum enim aliquid est, non esse non potest; neque dum verum est, esse falsum: et tamen quod nunc verum est, fieri potest ut aliquando salsum fuerit, aut futurum sit. Idem de futuris dicendum; siquid futurum certò est, id necesse est fore quidem verum (omne n. axioma verum est aut falsum) non tamen necessarium. Id nisi teneatur, omne contingens futurum erit necessarium, quod implicat contradictionem. Hoc etiam monendum, futura quidem ipsa neque vera esse neque falsa, neque contingentia, neque necessaria, nondum n. sunt, sed affirmatio solùm de iis aut negatio in futurum, deque præteritis eodem modo sentiendum.

"Axioma est necessarium, quando semper verum est, nec falsum potest esse."

Nec supervacua posterior hæc clausula est: semper n. esse verum etiam contingens potest, necessarium autem non modò semper est verum, sed falsum esse non potest. Sic etiam Aristot. Post. 1, 26.

"Contrà, quod semper falsum est, nec verum potest esse, axioma impossibile dicitur." Sic etiam Aristot. Phil. δ. 12.

Hæc autem immutabilitas veritatis in necessario, et falsitatis in impossibili, ab argumentorum quæ in iis disponuntur vel summa consensione, vel infesta semper dissensione pendet. Pari ratione mutabilitas veri aut falsi in contingenti et possibili ex levi argumentorum in iis dispositorum consensione aut dissidio perspicitur.

Ex quo doctrina illa quatuor formularum modalium, "necesse est, impossibile est, possibile est, contingens est," quàm inutiliter ab Aristot. introducta sit, facile apparet: ut, "necesse est hominem esse animal; impossibile est hominem esse equum; possibile est Socratem esse divitem; contingens est Socratem esse doctum." Hæ quatuor modales dispositionem purarum enuntiationum quodammodo afficiunt: pura est, "omnis homo est animal"; modalis, "necesse est omnem hominem esse animal:" hic "omnem hominem esse animal," licet inverso ordine, subjectum est enuntiationis modalis, modus "necesse" est prædicatum. Verùm quid attinet quomodo partes axiomatis inter se affectæ sint, signis aut modis exprimere, cùm id ex argumentis ipsis in eo dispositis possit rectius judicari, et ad hos modos alii complures, "facile, difficile, honestum, turpe," &c. non inutiliùs possint adjungi?

Equidem secundarias, quas vocant modales, primariis hisce potiores existimem: quibus vulgò dividuntur enuntiationes in "exclusivas," quarum notæ sunt "solus, tantum, duntaxat," &c., ut, "sola fides justificat: exceptivas," quarum notæ sunt "præter, præterquam, nisi," &c., ut, "nemo præter te sapit: et restrictivas," quarum notæ sunt "qua, quatenus, quoad, secundum, quid," &c., ut, "homo qua animal, sentit." Et exclusiva quidem est vel subjecti vel prædicati: subjecti, quæ, nota exclusiva præposita, excludit omnia subjecta alia à prædicato. Sed frustra hanc regulam ratio dictarit, si logicis quibusdam modernis, et nominatim Keckermanno licebit, eam statim, conflato ad id ipsum canone, funditus evertere. "Exclusiva," inquit, "subjecti non excludit concomitantia: ut, solus pater est verus Deus. Hic," inquit, "non excluditur concomitans, filius, et spiritus sanctus." At quis non videt subornatum hunc canonem, ad locum illum luculentissimum Joan. 17, 3, ludificandum? Haud paulò utilior est canon ille restrictivæ enuntiationis, quem tradit l. 2, c. 4, (restrictiva autem est quæ ostendit quatenus subjectum prædicato convenit) "prædicatum," inquit, "contradictorium nulla limitatione subjecto conciliatur;" ex Aristot. 2 Top. c. ult. sect. 4. Quid evidentius dici potuit? et tamen reperti sunt qui interpositis quibusdam distinctiunculis, "accidens posse existere sine subjecto" (quod repugnat) "in cœna Domini" contendant: deinde, qui similib. confictis distinctiunculis, "humanam naturam Christi adeoque corpus infinitum esse" disputantes, parem contradictionem committant. Sed omissis theologorum paradoxis, ad præcepta logica redeamus.

"Axioma necessarium affirmatum appellatur κατὰ παντός, de omni."

Id est, cum consequens sive prædicatum, ut vocant, axiomatis, de omni et toto antecedente sive subjecto semper verum est. Sic etiam Aristot. 1, prior. 1, et post. 1, 4, et hoc etiam nonnunquam καθόλυ, i. e. de toto, vocat, Post. 2, 13.

"Axiomata artium sic κατὰ παντός esse debent."

Nempe de omni et de toto vera, non falsa; necessaria, non fortuita, alioqui non scientiam pariunt, sed opinionem; affirmata denique non negata: affirmatum enim est firmum, certum, brevissimum; negatum verò est vagum, incertum, infinitum, nihilque docet: ut si quis definiret logicam, non esse artem bene loquendi, non doceret quid logica sit, sed quid non sit; eaque definitio omnibus artibus præter grammaticam æque ac logicæ conveniret. Nonnulli addunt ex hac lege, axiomata artium debere etiam esse generalia. Verùm hæc regula non tantum de omni est, sed de toto: et multa in artibus præcepta specialibus de rebus occurrunt, ut in theologia, de Christo; in astronomia de sole et luna reliquisque planetis: in aliis artibus hujusmodì alia, in quibus, cùm sint specialia, etsi κατὰ παν-τὸς dici non possunt, καθόλε tamen possunt, quod satis est. Quòd si quis objicit, ne in generalibus quidem præcepta artium κατὰ παντὸς esse posse, propter exceptionum multitudinem, ut in grammatica videre est; respondendum est, anomalium analogiæ conjunctam, κατὰ παντὸς instar esse.

"Sed præcepta artium homogenea etiam et reciproca esse debent.

"Axioma homogeneum est, quando partes sunt essentiales inter se."

i. e. Vel absolute, ut forma formato, genus speciei, membra integro, definitio definito; vel modo quodam, ut subjectum proprio adjuncto.

"Id appellatur καθ' αὑτὸ, per se."

Idcirco etiam partes axiomatis essentiales inter se esse debent, ut præceptum artis esse scientificum possit: accidentis enim, ut testatur Aristoteles, nulla est scientia; nulla nisi per essentiam et causam: idem, τὰ καθ' αὑτὸ, et τὰ συμβεβηκότα, i. e. accidentia, opponit, Post. 1, 4. Itaque non satis est, partes esse inter se consentaneas, sed essentiales: quod cùm ex argumentorum inter se summa consensione oriatur, ex qua necessarium quoque axioma esse ortum supradiximus, non video quid per hanc regulam καθ' αὑτὸ ad superiorem illam κατὰ παντὸς quod magni sit momenti, accedat; cum nullum axioma necessarium esse queat, quin ejus partes inter se sint etiam essentiales. Neque verò putem hic præcipi, ne quid heterogeneum sive alienum in arte doceatur; neque enim huc pertinet dispositio præcepti cum præcepto, sed argumenti solùm cum argumento, quæ axiomatis doctrina est, et ex homogenei definitione ipsa ejusque exemplis perspicitur.

"Axioma reciprocum est, quando consequens semper verum est de antecedente, non solùm omni et per se, sed etiam reciprocè."

Ut homo est animal rationale: numerus est par vel impar. Lupus est natus ad ululandum. Id appellatur καθόλε πρῶτον, de toto primum. Nempe quia de nullo prius dicitur: ideoque proximum est et immediatum, proprium et æquale; unoque verbo, reciprocum: ut risibile de homine: omnis enim homo est risibilis; et reciprocè, omne risibile est homo. Hæc regula nisi observetur, vitari tautologia in artibus non potest. Tum enim non reciprocatur axioma, cum antecedens consequenti non est æquale, aut contra; sed vel speciale alicui generi, vel generale alicui speciei attribuitur: generale autem de specie non dicitur primò; prius enim dicitur de genere. Cum autem id quod generis est, speciei attribuitur, idem in reliquis speciebus necessario est repetendum, quod in genere semel dictum oportuit. Ad hanc itaque regulam pertinet præceptum artis illud nobile γενικὰ γενικῶς, "generalia generaliter" et semel docenda sunt. Hæc lex brevitati, brevitas autem intelligentiæ et memoriæ consulit.

Atque hæ tres sunt leges documentorum artium propriorum. Prima κατὰ παντὸς, lex veritatis; propterea quòd necessariam affirmati axiomatis veritatem ex consentanea partium affectione postulat. Secunda καθ' αὑτὸ, lex justitiæ; quia justitiam requirit in essentiali partium cognatione. Peccant ergo in hanc legem, qui rhetoricam in inventionem, dispositionem, memoriam, &c., distribuunt, cùm rhetoricæ partes attribuant, quæ dialecticæ propriæ sunt. Tertia καθόλου πρῶτον lex sapientiæ meritò dici possit; cùm quia ejus judicium verissima scientia est, ut postea dicetur, tum quia vitia sapientiæ contraria prohibet, inæqualitatem sive inconvenientiam antecedentis cùm consequente et tautologiam.

Dices, duas illas priores leges comprehendi sub hac tertia: et hoc fatendum quidem est: veruntamen ut trigonum tetragonus et tetragonum pentagonus comprehendit, neque idcirco tamen distinctæ figuræ non sunt; ita hæ leges etiamsi posterior quæque priorum comprehendit, erant tamen perspicuitatis causa distinguendæ.

"Atque hujusmodi axiomatum ita reciprocorum judicium verissima et prima scientia est." Prima, quia principiorum est, quæ per se indemonstrabilia, suaque luce manifestissima sunt, neque syllogismi aut ullius argumenti clarioris lucem ad scientiam faciendam desiderant: quæ inde verissima quoque sit necesse est.

CAP. IV.

De Axiomate simplici.

"Atque hæc de communibus axiomatis affectionibus; species sequuntur.

"Axioma est simplex aut compositum."

Sic etiam Aristot. de Interpret. 1, 5. Vulgò propositio dividitur in categoricam et hypotheticam, eodem sensu. Sed categorica affirmatam duntaxat propositionem simplicem comprehendit, quæ scilicet de subjecto κατηγορεῖται, i. e. prædicatur.

"Axioma simplex est, quod verbi vinculo continetur."

Cùm enim vinculum, ut supradiximus, axiomatis forma et quasi anima sit, hinc efficitur, quemadmodum duæ sunt species vinculorum, verbum et conjunctio, illud simplicis axiomatis, hoc compositi, ut axioma quoque ex ista distributione vinculi, in oppositas formas sive species dividatur. Vinculum autem simplicis axiomatis, non solum est verbum substantivum, quod dicitur, sed quodvis verbum actionem aut passionem significans, vinculi in se vim inclusam habet; et vel totum consequens vel pars consequentis est; ut, Socrates scribit. Nam quod nonnulli putant, verbum omne in substantivum et participium resolvi oportere, ut ea ratione verbum substantivum esse vinculum appareat, scilicet, Socrates est scribens; id sæpe ineptissimum esse reperietur. Ut siquis hoc, Socrates docetur, sic solvat, Socrates est doctus: hoc enim aliud longe est. Quidquod etiam verbum substantivum nonnunquam et vinculum et totum consequens includit; ut, Socrates est; mortui non sunt, i. e. non existunt. Quodsi in uno simplici axiomate plura verba occurrunt, ut, imparia sunt comparata, quorum quantitas non est una, sciendum est illud verbum axiomatis vinculum esse, quod grammatici vocant principale.

"Id si affirmatur, axioma simplex est affirmatum; si negatur, negatum."

Negatur autem, si negationis nota verbum illud præcedit: nam si sequitur, negatum non est, sed affirmatum: ut Socrates est leo, non necessario affirmatum est, quia negationis nota sequitur verbum; nec totum consequens negatur, sed modus.

Negationis autem notæ non solùm sunt adverbia negandi, sed etiam particulæ exclusivæ (cujusmodi sunt "unicus et solus") et verba dissensionem vel differentiam significantia; ut, "differre, opponi," &c.

Exempla nunc videamus. Ignis urit; ignis est calidus; ignis est non aqua. Hic "ignis" est antecedens, "urit" consequens.

"Atque hic est prima inventarum rerum dispositio, causæ cum affecto, ut in primo exemplo; subjecti cum adjuncto, ut in secundo; dissentanei, cum dissentaneo, ut in tertio.

"Quo modo argumenta quælibet inter se affecta enuntiari possunt, consentanea quidem affirmando, dissentanea negando." Exceptis plenis comparationibus, in quibus duo planè distincta axiomata sunt, propositio, et redditio. Nam distributiones, quas etiam excipit Ramus, ut, argumentum est artificiale aut inartificiale, axiomate simplici enuntiari possunt, ut infra docebitur: possunt et diversa, quæ excipiunt alii, si sic enuntias, aliquis facundus non est formosus: et contraria: ut, virtus non est vitium, &c.

"Axioma simplex est generale aut speciale."

Hæc distributio est simplicis axiomatis ex adjuncta quantitate, quæ modos, non species constituit. In axiomate autem composito, quantitatis nulla ratio habetur, sed tantum vinculi, ut infra dicemus.

"Axioma generale est, quando commune consequens attribuitur generaliter communi antecedenti."

Vulgò etiam vocatur "universale." Generaliter autem consequens antecedenti attribuitur, quando omni totique sive universo antecedenti attribuitur, omnibusque iis, quæ sub ejus significatione continentur. Ad axioma igitur generale, tria hæc requiruntur; consequens, et antecedens generale, et generalis attributio. Neque enim ex nota sive signo universali definiendum fuit axioma generale; cùm et sæpissime non adsit nota, et cùm adest, non causa sed signum tantummodo sit axioma esse generale. Indefinita igitur, quæ vulgò vocant, etsi notam non habent generalem, generalia tamen sunt; ut definitiones et reliqua artium præcepta, quæ nemo generalia esse inficiabitur; nec notam tamen generalem præfixam habent. Notæ axiomatis generalis tam affirmati quàm negati hæ sunt: "omnis, nullus; semper, nunquam: ubique, nusquam," &c.

"Atque hic contradictio non semper dividit verum et falsum; sed contingentium utraque pars falsa potest esse:" ut, > Omnis in urbe locus bajis prælucet amœnis.

> Nullus in urbe locus bajis prælucet amœnis.

"Itèm non contingentium."

Ut, omne animal est rationale; nullum animal est rationale. Hæc enim non contingentia sunt, sed potius absurda; quia consequens speciale antecedenti generali generaliter attribuitur. Falsa igitur pars utraque generalis contradictionis esse potest, vera esse non potest; falsitas quippe multiplex, veritas una est.

"Axioma speciale est, quando consequens non omni antecedenti attribuitur."

Speciale dicitur, quia de specie aliqua enuntiatur. Atque ut in generali axiomate consequens generaliter, sive omni et universo antecedenti; ita in speciali specialiter, sive non omni attribuitur.

"In hoc axiomate contradictio semper dividit verum à falso."

Id est specialis contradictionis pars una semper vera, pars altera semper est falsa.

"Axioma speciale est particulare aut proprium.

"Particulare, quando consequens commune antecedenti particulariter attribuitur."

Est axioma speciale quia de specie aliqua, licet ea quidem incerta et indefinita, enuntiatur; particulariter autem consequens attribuitur, quando non universo antecedenti, sed ejus alicui parti attribuitur. Attributionis autem particularis notæ sive signa sunt, "quidam, aliquis, aliquando, alicubi;" et negationes generalium, nonnulli, nonnunquam, non semper, non omnis, &c., quæ particulari æquipollent. Commune autem consequens debet esse; ex illa regula; Consequens nunquam minus est antecedente, sed semper vel majus eo vel saltem æquale. Unde Aristoteles, prior. 1, 28, negat "singulare de alio prædicari."

Sequitur nunc contradictio particularium.

"Huic autem axiomata generaliter contradicitur.

"Aliquid ignoscendum est; nihil ignoscendum est: aliqua clementia non est laudanda; omnis clementia est laudanda." Hic particulari affirmato, generale negatum; et particulari negato, generale affirmatum opponitur. Quodsi utraque pars particularis est, non modo nulla est axiomatum contradictio, sed ne oppositio quidem. Ut, Quidam homo est doctus, quidam homo non est doctus. Non enim eidem subjecto attribuuntur, quæ lex est oppositorum. Pars igitur utraque vera esse potest; sicuti etiam cùm utraque affirmata est vel negata: ut, Omnis homo est rationalis, quidam homo est rationalis: nullus homo est irrationalis, quidam homo non est irrationalis. In his non modo contradictio nulla, sed consensio summa est, generis nempe et speciei.

"Axioma proprium" (quod alii singulare vocant) "est, quando consequens antecedenti proprio attribuitur." Antecedens autem logicè proprium dicitur quando rem vel personam singularem designat; sive proprio nomine exprimatur, sive non: qualia sunt etiam demonstrativa; ut, "hic homo." Secundò, quæ per synecdochen generis dicuntur; ut poëta pro Homero aut Virgilio, philosophus pro Aristotele aut Platone, et similia. Ad consequens autem hujus axiomatis quod attinet, id vel commune esse potest vel proprium.

Proprii contradictio est quando utraque pars est propria: in quo discrepat à particulari, cujus pars altera duntaxat particularis esse debet; consentit cum generali, cujus pars utraque generalis; ut, "Fabulla est bella:" cujus negatio et contradictio est, "Fabulla non est bella." Atque hæc de axiomate simplici.

APPENDIX.

Ad has axiomatis simplicis affectiones addunt Aristotelici æquipollentiam et conversionem.

Æquipollentia definitur, "enuntiationum verbis discrepantium convenientia re atque sensu: sic aliquis homo est doctus, et, non omnis homo est doctus," idem valent, et similia, ut suprà in notis est dictum. Æquipollentia itaque cum in verbis duntaxat, non in rebus, posita sit, ad grammaticam vel ad rhetoricam et verborum copiam remittenda est.

Conversio est prædicati unius enuntiationis in locum subjecti transpositio ad probandam alteram enuntiationem, quæ ex ea transpositione sive conversione efficitur. Ea triplex affertur; simplex, per accidens, et per contrapositionem. Simplex, quæ fit manente eadem enuntiationis et quantitate et qualitate: fitque etiam tripliciter; in universali negante; ut "nullus homo est lapis, ergo nullus lapis est homo:" in particulari affirmante; ut, "aliquis homo est albus, ergo aliquod album est homo:" in affirmante denique universali et necessaria; ut "omnis homo est risibilis, ergo omne risibile est homo." Et hæc est una omnium conversionum verissima, quæ et "reciprocatio" dicitur, proprii scilicet cum suo subjecto, definiti cum sua definitione.

Conversio per accidens mutat enuntiationis quantitatem; universalem scilicet affirmantem in particularem: ut, "omnis homo est animal, ergo quoddam animal est homo." Per accidens hanc dici volunt, quia aliud prius sequitur, nempe, "quidam homo est animal," ex quo hoc deinde, simplici conversione, "ergo quoddam animal est homo."

Conversio per contrapositionem mutat enuntiationis qualitatem: universalem scilicet affirmantem in negantem: vel, in qua loco subjecti et prædicati, ponitur utriusque conversi contradictio: ut, "omnis homo est rationalis; ergo quodcunque non est rationale, non est homo: omne mortale est genitum; ergo quod non est genitum, non est mortale; vel, quod est non genitum, est non mortale: admittendi ad sacramenta, habent pœnitentiam et fidem; ergo qui hæc non habent, non sunt admittendi." Tres hosce modos conversionum ex Aristot. petunt: duos priores ex 1 Prior. c. 2, tertium ex 2 Top. c. 1, syllogisticæ reductionis gratia, cujus inutiliter infra ostendetur, ab ipso inventos.

Conversione autem hac ne decipiamur fortè, neque enim fidissima est, cautiones quædam adhiberi solent: prima, ne termini sint figurati; ut, "panis est corpus Christi." Secunda, ne quid mutiletur; ut "quidam cernit cæcum, ergo cæcus cernit quendam:" totum enim prædicatum non est "cæcum," sed "cernit cæcum;" ut etiam in hac; "omnis senex fuit puer, ergo quidam puer fuit senex;" non enim "puer," sed "fuit puer" totum prædicatum est; convertendum ergo, "quidam qui fuit puer, est senex." Tertia, ut casus obliqui à conversione facti, reddantur recti; ut, "aliqua arbor est in agro; ergo aliquod quod est in agro, est arbor," non sic, "ergo aliquis ager est in arbore."

Sed, omissis istis cautionibus, expeditior via est, conversionem omnem si dubia sit, tanquam sophisma petitionis principii rejicere; ut quæ sine medio termino probare rem dubiam conetur: de quo sophismate infra monebimus.

CAP. V.

De Axiomate copulato.

"Axioma compositum est quod vinculo conjunctionis continetur."

Hoc genus axiomatis Aristoteles totum prætermisit. Vulgò "propositio hypothetica" vocatur; i. e. conditionalis; angustè nimis; cum ea vox compositis non omnibus conveniat, ut suo loco patebit. Compositum autem dicitur, quia sententia est multiplex, quæ in plures resolvi simplices potest: nec tamen dicendum est, ex simplicib. axiomatis componi, sed ex argumentis, quæ conjunctionis vinculo composita, multiplicem sententiam efficiunt: idcirco autem axioma componitur, quia argumenta in eo conjuncta consentiunt et compositionem appetunt. Nulla autem hic ratio habetur quantitatis, generale sit an speciale, sed tantum compositionis. Ut autem verbum fuit vinculum simplicis, ita conjunctio est axiomatis compositi, ejusque proinde forma et quasi anima est.

"Itaque à conjunctione affirmata vel negata, affirmatur vel negatur." Conjunctione non negata, negatum axioma non erit, etiamsi partes omnes erunt negatæ.

"Contradictionisque pars vera est, pars falsa." De qua vulgus logicorum silet.

"Enuntiatum compositum est pro sua conjunctione congregativum aut segregativum.

"Congregativum est cujus partes tanquam simul veræ, conjunctione sua congregantur." Conjunctione videlicet non solùm illa grammatica verùm etiam sententiarum quavis relatione. Cùm autem relatio ista, sive grammatica sive logica, multiplex sit, essentiæ, consequentiæ, sive causæ, quantitatis, qualitatis, temporis, loci, relatio quidem essentiæ (cujus notæ sunt "is qui, id quod") et loci (cujus notæ sunt "ubi, ibi") ad simplicia axiomata referenda est; de reliquis suo loco.

"Congregativum enuntiat omnia consentanea affirmando, omni dissentanea negando." Hoc est, si unum consentaneorum subjecto attribuatur, alterum quoque attribuitur; et contrà, uno negato, alterum negatur: si unum dissentaneorum de subjecto affirmatur, alterum negatur; et contrà. Ita semper consentanea simul hic affirmanda vel neganda sunt, dissentanea non simul.

"Congregativum verò est copulatum aut connexum. Copulatum, cujus conjunctio est copulativa." Ut Æneid. 1.

> "Unà Eurusque Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis > Africus."

Hic igitur negatio erit et contradictio, negatæ conjunctione; "non unà Eurusque Notusque ruunt," &c.

"Socrates et doctus erat et formosus: Socrates non et doctus erat et formosus." Quòdsi hoc modo negaretur, "Socrates nec doctus erat nec formosus," (qui modus contradictionis est adhibendus cùm omnes partes sunt falsæ,) contradictio non esset axiomatica; non enim vinculum negaretur, sed partes; copulatio enim significat utrumque simul verum esse, ejus negatio non utrumque; at hæc negatio neutrum: ac si dictum esset, "Socrates et non doctus et non formosus erat:" deinde, in axiomate composito contradictionis pars una vera, altera est falsa; hic autem utraque: hoc ergo axioma, "Socrates nec doctus erat nec formosus," est potius axioma copulatum affirmatum, cujus partes negantur. Copulati autem negatio per axioma etiam discretum fieri potest, cùm partes non omnes falsæ sunt; ut infra intelligitur. Conjunctio denique hic sæpe non adest, sed intelligitur.

"Verum autem enuntiati copulati judicium pendet ex omnium partium veritate; falsum, ex una saltem parte falsa." Hoc est axioma copulatum judicatur esse verum, si omnes partes simul veræ sunt; falsum, si vel una pars erit falsa. Idem tradit Gellius, l. 16, c. 8. In copulato enim axiomate, veritas omnium partium spectatur, quia partes omnes absolute enuntiantur tanquam simul veræ.

"Huic generi affine est enuntiatum relatæ qualitatis, cujus conjunctio" logica potius est quàm grammatica, nempe "ipsa relatio."

Relata autem qualitas est plena similitudo: ut notæ ipsæ testantur; "qualis, talis, quemadmodum, sic." Eclog. 3.

> "Tale tuum carmen nobis, divine poëta,
> Quale sopor fessis in gramine.——"

Hic copulatum judicium est tanquam diceretur, sopor est fessis gratus, et sic tuum carmen nobis gratum est: cujus negatio, Non tale tuum carmen, quale sopor, &c.

Ad hunc etiam locum pertinet relatio quantitatis in plenis comparationibus: quarum notæ sunt, cùm à pari, "idem quod, tam quam, tanto quanto, tot quot, eò quò;" tum à majori, "non solùm, sed etiam;" tum à minori, "non modò non, sed ne," (quæ nota est copulati axiomatis affirmati, cujus partes negantur) "cùm tum." Relatio autem hæc et qualitatis et quantitatis, si hypotheticè, non absolutè enuntiatur, ad connexum potius referenda est.

Relationes autem loci ad axioma simplex rectius referuntur, ut supra est dictum. Neque enim in hujusmodi exemplo, "ubi amici ibi opes," est copulatum judicium, sed simplex et quidem generale; scilicet, omnem divitem amicos habere.

CAP. VI.

De Axiomate connexo.

"Axioma connexum est congregativum, cujus conjunctio est connexiva.

"Ut, si, nisi" affirmativè. Idem enim valet "nisi," quod "si non:" quo non totum axioma, sed antecedens tantum negatur: ut Æneid. 2,

> "—— Si miserum fortuna Sinonem > Finxit, vanum etiam mendacemque improba finget."

Cujus negatio est, negata conjunctione, "Non si miserum fortuna Sinonem finxit, vanum etiam mendacemque improba finget."

"Conjunctio etiam hæc interdum negatur apertiùs, negando consequentiam." Ut non continuò, non illicò, non idcirco, non ideo: his enim formulis non consequens axiomatis, id n. contradictionem non efficeret, sed ipsa partium consequentia quæ logica conjunctio est apertius negatur: ut pro Amer. "Non continuò, si me in sicariorum gregem contuli, sicarius sum." De Fato: "nec si omne enuntiatum verum est aut falsum, sequitur illicò causas esse immutabiles."

"Affirmatio enim significat, si sit antecedens, etiam consequens esse. Negatio itaque et contradictio statuit, si sit antecedens, non ideo consequens esse.

Potest et connexo pro axioma discretum contradici: ut, "quamvis omne enuntiatum sit verum aut falsum, non tamen causæ sunt immutabiles;" quod sequente capite liquebit.

"Sed cùm judicabis connexum absolute," i. e. per se suaque natura "verum esse, necessarium quoque judicabis; et intelliges hanc necessitatem ex necessaria partium connexione oriri, quæ ipsa potest esse vel in falsis partibus."

"Ut, si homo est leo, est etiam quadrupes," necessarium connexum est; quia argumentorum, quæ hic connectuntur, leonis scilicet et quadrupedis, connexio est necessaria, speciei scilicet cum genere. Unde efficitur axioma generaliter verum ac proinde necessarium; "omnis leo est quadrupes:" quod in connexio iudicium est absolutæ veritatis. Sic, si "Socrates est homo, est etiam animal," absolutè verum est et necessarium, quia omnis homo est animal: hujusque connexi consequens falsum esse non potest, nisi antecedens quoque falsum sit, quod aliud signum est absolutæ veritatis.

Quòd si consequens falsum fuerit, falsum item est antecedens. "Si illud, hoc: si non hoc, ne illud quidem." Atque ita, ut jam demonstravimus, si connexio absolutè vera est, erit quoque necessaria: sin ex conditione et pacto, sine quo connexum per se suaque natura verum non esset, erit tantummodò contingens.

"Quod si connexio sit contingens, et pro sua tantum probabilitate ponatur, judicium ejus tantum opinio fuerit.

Ut Terent. Andr.

> "Pamphile, si id facis, hodie postremum me vides."

Hoc est, si Philumenam uxorem ducis, ego hodie moriar: quod nemo sequi existimaverit, nisi hoc posito, Charinum, qui hoc dicit, Philumenam perditissimè amare. Per se enim nulla est connexionis necessitas inter nuptias Pamphili et interitum Charini. Qui autem ex amoris vehementia sic existimabit, ejus judicium non erit scientia, sed opinio.

Ut autem judicare possimus, quæ connexio sit absolutè vera, quæ non, spectanda argumenta sunt, quæ in axiomate connectuntur, consentiant inter se nec ne, et quo modo. Ut "si dies est, lux est," connexum est necessarium, quia dies sive sol ortus est causa lucis. "Si dies est, Dio ambulat," connexum est falsum aut contingens; quia nulla est affectio absolutè consentanea inter diem et Dionem.

"Connexio axiomati affinis est ista consequentiæ relatio:" quæ à nonnullis, "relatio causæ" dicitur; et axioma efficit, quod "Stoici causale" nominant; Laert. in Zenone: quia nempe antecedens est causa consequentis, adeoque vinculum ejus conjunctio causalis "cùm, quia, quoniam;" quibus respondet "ideo," vel "etiam: ut, cùm Tullius sit orator, est etiam peritus benè dicendi." Quanquam autem relata ista connexis affinia sunt, non nihil tamen discrepant: in antecedente enim connexi quædam conditio est, in hoc relato nulla: connexum potest ex falsis partibus verum esse, relatum hoc sive causale non potest esse verum, nisi antecedens verum fuerit: ut, "quia dies est, sol est supra horizontem."

Affinis est et relatio temporis axiomati connexo, ut ait ipse Ramus infra, c. 13.

Relatio autem temporis has habet notas, "tum cum, donec dum, quamdiu tamdiu:" ut apud Ovid. in epist.

> "Cùm Paris Œnone poterit spirare relicta > Ad fontem Xanthi versa recurret aqua."

Sic—"Donec eris felix, multos numerabis amicos."

Potest etiam connexum enuntiari sine ulla non modò relationis, verùm etiam connexionis nota; ut, "posita causa, ponitur effectum. Fac hoc, et vives." Ovid. in epist. "sume fidem et pharetram, fies manifestus Apollo." Nonnunquam etiam duob. negativis: Cic. pro Milone, "non hoc fragile corpus humanum mente regitur, et non regitur mente universum mundi corpus."

CAP. VII.

De Axiomate discreto.

"Axioma segregativum est, cujus conjunctio est segregativa.

"Ideoque argumenta dissentanea enuntiat.

"Enuntiatum segregativum est discretum aut disjunctum.

"Discretum, cujus conjunctio est discretiva." Discretum dicitur, quòd conjunctione illa segregativa discernuntur et segregantur, ea potissimum quæ leviter et ratione tantum dissentiunt.

"Itaque è dissentaneis præcipuè diversa enuntiat."

Præcipuè, quia diversorum notæ, "non hoc, sed illud," ut superiore libro dictum est, in diversis nonnunquam solent oppositis inservire. Ut autem diversorum ita etiam discreti axiomatis doctrina distinctionibus duntaxat, non conclusionibus, idonea est: et à reliquis propterea dialecticis, qui omnia ad syllogismum referunt, omissa. Sed rationis usus quicunque in logica prætermittendus non erat. Exempli gratia: Tuscul. 5, "Quanquam sensu corporis judicentur, ad animum referri tamen." Cujus negatio et contradictio est, "non quanquam corporis sensu judicentur, tamen ad animum referri: vel, quanquam sensu corporis judicentur, non tamen ad animum referri." Nam "tamen" est hic conjunctio præcipua. Quemadmodum autem copulati et connexi axiomatis negatio et contradictio discretum esse potest, ita vicissim copulatum vel connexum discreti: ut, "quanquam culpa vacat, non tamen suspicione caret:" cujus per copulatum contradictio est, "et culpa vacat, et suspicione caret;" vel per connexum, "si culpa vacat, etiam suspicione caret."

"Discretum enuntiatum judicatur esse verum et legitimum, si partes non solum veræ, sed etiam discretæ sint; falsum vel ridiculum contra."

Ut, "quanquam Ulysses formosus erat, tamen non erat infacundus," falsum est, quia antecedens est falsum. Sed si consequens modò verum est, axioma verum erit, etiamsi antecedens verum esse tantummodo concedatur. Hoc autem, "quanquam Menelaus formosus erat, tamen erat facundus," non est discretum, sed ne segregativum quidem: omnis enim segregativi axiomatis partes tanquam non simul veræ segregantur, hic verò tanquam simul veræ congregantur. "Quanquam Ulysses facundus erat, non tamen erat indisertus," est ridiculum, quia partes non sunt discretæ sed oppositæ.

CAP. VIII.

De Axiomate disjuncto.

"Axioma disjunctum est axioma segregativum, cujus conjunctio est disjunctiva."

Ut, "aut dies est, aut nox est. Aut vera est hæc enunciatio, aut falsa." Nam ut ex Cicerone citatur hoc exemplum, "omnis enuntiatio vera est aut falsa," videtur esse distributio potius quàm disjunctio. Distributio autem quatenus de toto diviso partes enuntiantur, axioma simplex et generale est, adeoque non compositum nedum disjunctum. Neque enim distributionis partes, quamvis inter se oppositæ, oppositionem vel disjunctionem ullam faciunt, sed eidem toti subjiciuntur, et in ejusdem simplicis axiomatis consequente verbi vinculo cum toto, quod antecedens est, consentiunt; at extra distributionem, ubi non de toto, sed de aliqua ejus parte vel specie enunciantur, tum demum axioma disjunctum efficiunt: ut, quod supra posuimus, "hæc enuntiatio aut vera est aut falsa."

"Hic significatur è disjunctis unicum verum esse."

Nempe quia opposita hic sola disponi debent. Atque id semper à differente significatur, tametsi aliquando accidit, ut disjunctorum vel plura uno, vel nullum omninò verum sit. Negatio igitur et contradictio erit, "non aut dies aut nox est."

"Et contradictione significatur, non necessario alterutrum verum esse."

"Nam si disjunctio absolutè vera est, est etiam necessaria; partesque disjunctæ sunt opposita sine ullo medio." De quibus vide superioris libri caput de contradicentibus.

'Veruntamen quamvis absolutè vera disjunctio, necessaria quoque sit; tamen nihil necesse est partes separatim necessarias esse."

Ut, "cras aut pluet aut non pluet," disjunctio est necessaria, quia ex contradicentibus constat, quæ sunt contraria sine medio: et tamen, "cras pluet et cras non pluet," utrumque contingens axioma est. Sic, "homo aut bonus est aut non bonus," &c.

"Nam disjunctionis necessitas pendet è necessaria partium oppositione et disjunctione, non ex earum necessaria veritate."

Hinc argumentum illud dissolvitur Chrysippi Stoici aliorumque veterum, apud Ciceronem de Fato; quo probare sunt conati, futura omnia esse necessaria et quasi fatalia, eò quòd necesse sit ea aut vera esse aut falsa. Disjunctio quidem, ut diximus, necessaria est; pars tamen disjunctionis alterutra talis erit, qualis causa ejus est; sive necessaria, sive contingens, i. e. vel libera vel fortuita.

Atque hæc de necessaria disjunctione, cujus judicium scientia est.

"Disjunctio autem sæpe est ex conditione."

"Ut si quæratur utrum Cleon venerit an Socrates, quia ita pactum si alterutrum tantum venturum esse."

"Itaque si disjunctio sit contingens (contingens autem est, si partes medium habent) non est absolutè vera, sed tantum opinabilis."

Qualis est frequenter in hominum usu. Ut Cæsar ad matrem: "hodie me aut pontificem videbis, aut exulem." Ovid. in epistola Leandri,

> "Aut mihi continget felix audacia salvo, > Aut mors solliciti finis amoris erit."

CAP. IX.

De Syllogismo et ejus Partibus.

Atque ejusmodi dispositio est axiomatica sive noetica axiomatis per se manifesti: sequitur dianoetica.

"Dianoëtica est cùm aliud axioma ex alio deducitur."

Vox Græca διάνοια, mentis et rationis discursum significat; qui tum fit maximè cùm sententia alia ex alia ratiocinando deducitur.

"Dispositio dianoëtica est syllogismus aut methodus."

"Syllogismus est dispositio dianoëtica qua quæstio cum argumento ita disponitur, ut posito antecedente, necessariò concludatur."

Est dianoia: est ergo discursus mentis ac rationis quo aliud ex alio ratiocinando colligitur: eam ratiocinantis quasi collectionem vox ipsa syllogismi significat: quæ quidem collectio sive deductio ab intellectus humani imbecilitate profecta est: quæ cùm rerum veritatem et falsitatem primo intuitu perspicere in axiomate non potest, ad syllogismum se confert, in quo de consequentia et inconsequentia earum judicare possit.

"Cùm itaque axioma dubium est, quæstio efficitur, et ad ejus fidem tertio argumento est opus cum quæstione collocato."

Quæstionis partes vulgò termini appellantur; et antecedens quidem minor terminus, consequens major terminus dicitur: quia antecedente latius ferè est consequens. Tertium autem argumentum ab Aristot. medium et medius terminus dicitur. Non quod semper medius inter duos quæstionis terminos in syllogismo collocetur, sed eò quòd quasi arbiter de consensu eorum inter se aut dissensu, disceptat et judicat. Atque hæc sunt tria illa argumenta, ex quibus solis omnis syllogismus conficitur; duo scilicet questionis, et tertium argumentum; quæ vulgò "tres termini" dicuntur. Termini autem isti non semper simplices sunt voces, sed orationes nonnunquam longiusculæ; nec semper casibus rectis, sed obliquis interdum efferuntur.

"Partes syllogismi duæ sunt; antecedens et consequens. Antecedens syllogismi pars est, in qua quæstio cum argumento disponitur."

"Syllogismi antecedens partes duas habet, propositionem et assumptionem: quæ vulgò præmissæ nominantur.

"Propositio est prior pars antecedentis, qua quæstionis saltem consequens cum argumento disponitur."

"Saltem;" quia nonnunquam tota quæstio cum argumento in propositione disponitur, ut infra patebit.

"Assumptio est secunda pars antecedentis, quæ assumitur è propositione."

Assumitur enim inde vel tertium argumentum vel tota assumptio, ut infra perspicietur. Hinc itaque argumentum tertium, sive medius terminus, dignoscitur, quòd bis ponitur ante conclusionem. Assumptio vulgo "minor propositio" dicitur, vel quia minorem vim obtinet, ex propositione videlicet deductam; vel quia minor terminus, i. e. antecedens quæstionis, in ea sæpe disponi soleat, non semper, ut infra intelligemus.

"Syllogismi autem pars consequens est, quæ complectitur partes quæstionis, eamque concludit. Unde complectio et conclusio dicitur."

Hinc sequitur, conclusionem et verbis et terminorum ordine, eandem planè esse cum proposita quæstione oportere; alioqui syllogismi fidem claudicare, et quasi depositum non reddere. Secundo hinc intelligitur illa regula, "tertium argumentum sive medius terminus nunquam ingreditur conclusionem." Ratio est, quia medium non est id quòd concluditur, neque de quo quicquam; sed id, quo adhibito, quæstio concluditur, vel duo ejus termini inter se consentire aut dissentire judicantur. Medius itaque terminus aut ulla pars ejus in conclusione si sit, syllogismum vitiosum facit; id facillime deprehenditur, si non solum quæstio proposita, sed præterea aliquid quod bis erat in præmissis repetitum, conclusionem intrat.

Cùm autem in omni syllogismo, ut ex ejus definitione constat, quæstio cum argumento ita disponatur, ut posito antecedente, i. e. concessis præmissis, necessariò concludatur: quæ necessitas non consequentis, sed consequentiæ, non materiæ, sed formæ est; hinc intelligitur, nullam in syllogismi forma differentiam esse contingentis et necessarii, sed syllogismum omnem necessario concludere, teste etiam Aristot. Prior. 1, 33, eamque necessitatem ex legitima dispositione quæstionis cum tertio argumento, non ex necessaria partium in antecedente dispositarum veritate pendere. Unde et illi redarguuntur, qui vulgò dividunt syllogismum in dialecticum et apodicticum, probabilem scilicet et demonstrativum, sive necessarium, cum et illa distinctio axiomatum sit, et syllogismi consequentia tam in contingenti, immo in falso necessaria sit, quàm in vero et necessario; immo ex falsis præmissis conclusio nunc vera nunc falsa necessariò sequatur: ut, "omnis leo est quadrupes: Socrates est leo; ergo Socrates est quadrupes." In quo simile quiddam habet syllogismus axiomati connexo, et fortasse originem ab eo ducit: nam ut connexum necessarium esse potest ex falsis partibus, modò ipsa connexio sit vera; ut, "si leo est quadrupes, et Socrates leo, Socrates necessario est quadrupes;" sic syllogismus necessariò concludit ex veris quidem partibus nil nisi verum, ex falsis et falsum et verum, modò ipsa dispositio sit legitima.

Quòd autem Aristotelici syllogismum dividunt in verum et falsum sive apparentem; verum, cujus materia vera est; in dialecticum sive probabilem, cujus materia contingens est, et apodicticum sive demonstrativum ac necessarium, eumque vel perfectum, quæ vocatur διότι sive à priori, quo accidens de subjecto per causam vel efficientem vel finalem positam quidem affirmatur, remotam verò negatur; et in imperfectum quæ vocatur του ὅτι sive à posteriori, quo accidens de subjecto per effectum probatur; hæc quidem divisio, qualiscunque est, cum axiomatis propria sit, et vel ad formam syllogismi ut in dialectico et apodictico, vel omninò ad artem, ut in falso sive sophistico, nihil pertineat, melius rejicitur.

APPENDIX.

Atque hæc syllogismi doctrina generalis fuit. Et rectum quidem index est sui et obliqui, et veritatis doctrina rectè tradita, errorem omnem ipsa per se indicat atque etiam redarguit. Verùm cùm non sit ea cujusque hominis perspicacia aut ingenii felicitas, ut vel omnes techmas adversarii animadvertere ex ipsis regulis, vel omnes artis regulas memoria tenere semper queat, alienum non erit de præcipuis captionibus quæ committere in hanc generalem syllogismi doctrinam solent, seorsim hic aliquid monere.

Peccatur autem terminis pluribus, vel apertius vel tectius. Apertius (ut puerilia de accentu, figura dictionis, plurium, quæ dicitur interrogationum, et similia omittam) cùm tres termini distinctè numerantur in propositione: ut, "qui est bonus et dialecticus, is est bonus dialecticus; Cleanthes est bonus et dialecticus; ergo, est bonus dialecticus." Hæc fallacia compositionis dicitur; quia divisa male componit. Contra; "qui est bonus dialecticus, is est bonus et dialecticus; Cleanthes," &c. Hæc fallacia est divisionis; quia composita male dividit; vel quia composita proponit, divisa concludit. Idem committitur etiam sine conjunctione: ut, "bonus citharædus est bonus; Nero est bonus citharædus; ergo, bonus." Bonus duplici significatione cum "citharœdo" disponitur in propositione; quatuor ergo termini. Sic etiam cùm non iisdem verbis aliud planè proponitur, aliud assumitur: ut, "dextera Dei est ubique; humanitas Christi sedet ad dextram Dei; ergo, humanitas Christi est ubique."

Amphibolia sive ambiguitas vel in syntaxi est, vel in ipsa re. In syntaxi; ut, "pecunia quæ est Cæsaris, possidetur à Cæsare; hæc pecunia est Cæsaris; ergo, possidetur à Cæsare." Ambiguitas in ipsa re, quæ et "prava expositio" vocatur, fit, cùm affectio rei non eadem assumitur quæ proponitur; mutata autem affectione, mutatur argumentum; ut, "quas carnes emisti, comedisti; crudas emisti; ergo, crudas comedisti." Hic propositio et de carnibus et de substantia carnium loquitur; assumptio, de qualitate earum: dicendum ergo erat, "quales carnes emisti," &c. Eadem est fallacia cum id quod in "abstracto," quod aiunt, proponitur, in "concreto" assumitur: ut "candidum est disgregativum visus; paries est candidus; ergo, paries est disgregativum visus." Etiam cùm in ipsa copula quartus terminus latet: ut "fortitudo non est clementia; principis est fortitudo; ergo, principis non est clementia." Hic verbum "est" in majore "esse," in minore "habere" significat; casuumque mutationem rectorum in obliquos inducit; qui quatuor esse terminos declarant. "Nullus puer diu vixit: Nestor fuit puer; ergo, Nestor non diu vixit." Hic major de eo qui est, minor de eo qui fuit puer loquitur; qui duo termini sunt. Quatuor denique sunt termini cùm plus est in conclusione quàm in præmissis.

Pauciores autem termini sunt ternis, cùm tertium argumentum deest. Hoc fit quoties vel idem sensu vel æque obscurum pro argumento sumitur; (idem enim non est tertium; æque obscurum non est argumentum) quæ "petitio principii," vel, ejus quod erat in principio nominatur; quia postulatur ipsa quæstio ut gratis, i. e. sine argumento concedatur: ut, "ensis est acutus; gladius est ensis; ergo, gladius est acutus." Vel, "quod omnis homo est, id singuli homines sunt; omnis homo est justus; ergo, singuli homines sunt justi." Huc refer jactatum illud, "quæ non amisisti habes, cornua non amisisti, ergo cornua habes." Habere et amittere privantia sunt et quidem sine medio quatenus talia, ergo non amittere et habere sunt idem, nullus itaque hic est medius terminus, sed perinde ac si diceres; quæ habes, habes, cornua habes, ergo habes. Hujus generis est, cùm tertium argumentum non integrum è propositione assumitur: ut, "omnes apostoli sunt duodecim; Petrus et Joannes sunt apostoli; ergo, Petrus et Joannes sunt duodecim." Hic "omnes" collectivè sumptum, pars est tertii argumenti, quod totum erat in assumptione assumendum. Ad hoc sophisma referendæ sunt denique omnes conversiones enuntiationum; quoties rem dubiam non argumento sive medio termino, sed conversione sola probare contendunt: de qua supra monuimus. Atque his ferè modis in formam syllogismi generalem peccatur.

Secundus est quæ vocatur fallacia "accidentis," sive quod idem est, à dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter: vel contrà, à dicto simpliciter ad dictum secundum quid; quoties id quod adjuncti est, subjecto attribuitur; aut contrà quod subjecti, adjuncto: ut, "quæ non restituenda sunt domino furioso, non restituenda sunt domino; "arma non restituenda sunt domino furioso; ergo, non domino:" vel contra: quæ "restituenda sunt domino, etiam domino furioso; arma domino; ergo, domino furioso." In his propositio semper falsa est.

Tertius est "ignoratio elenchi;" ("elenchus" autem est redargutio quælibet sive vera sive falsa) cùm leges oppositionis non observantur eidem numero, secundum idem, ad idem, et eodem tempore: ut "cæci vident; qui carent visu, sunt cæci; ergo, qui carent visu, vident." Propositio distinguenda est; nempe, qui fuerunt cæci, nunc vident. Sic; "is qui non videt cæcus est; dormiens non videt; est ergo cæcus." Ad idem non est: propositio enim de potentia, assumptio de actu videndi loquitur; vel quatuor sunt termini, et prava expositio dici potest. Aliis ignorantia elenchi est, cùm vel planè mutatur et torquetur status controversiæ, vel conclusio adversarii non directè opponitur nostræ thesi secundum canones legitimæ oppositionis.

Quartus est fallacia "consequentis," sive comparatorum, quæ è contrariis quidem sunt orta, sed parium collatione tractata, cum disputatur contraria esse contrariorum consequentia: quam regulam esse fallacem, l. 1, c. 18, copiose ostenditur: ut, "quæ eidem æqualia, inter se æqualia; ergo quæ eidem sunt inæqualia, inter se sunt inæqualia." Ut, 2, et 2, sunt inæquales ad 5; ergo sunt inter se inæquales. Duo latera quadrati symmetra non sunt diagono; ergo non sunt inter se.

CAP. X.

De Syllogismo simplici contracto.

"Syllogismus est simplex aut compositus.

"Simplex, ubi pars consequens quæstionis disponitur in propositione, pars antecedens in assumptione."

Ut syllogismi forma generalis erat dispositio quæstionis cum argumento, ita specialis quæque dispositio quæstionis cum argumento cujusque speciei forma est, Ex. gr. "homo est animal: Socrates est homo; ergo Socrates est animal." Hinc facile perspicitur, si quæstionis terminus major non disponatur in propositione majore, minor in minore, syllogismum non esse legitimum. Quòd si aliquando usu venit, ut antecedens quæstionis in propositione et consequens in assumptione disponi videatur, intelligere debemus syllogismi partes inverti: ut, "Socrates est homo: homo est animal; ergo Socrates est animal."

Ut autem syllogismorum tota ratio intelligatur (quod hoc loco fieri commodissimè posse arbitror) sciendum est eam duab. præcipuè legibus fundari; altera parium, altera generis ex loco petita. Ex parium loco; "quæ conveniunt in uno aliquo tertio, conveniunt inter se; et contrà, quæ non in uno tertio, non inter se." Ex loco generis; "quod generi generaliter attribuitur, id omnibus etiam attribuitur speciebus quæ sub eo genere continentur." Hæc regula vocatur in scholiis, "dictum de omni et nullo." Illa à geometricis primum sensu præeunte facilius inventa est; et præcipitur Aristot. 1, Prior. c. 1. Ut enim illic norma, "si duab. lineis æque conveniat, eas lineas demonstrat convenire inter se sive esse æquales;" eodem planè modo medius terminus si duob. conclusionis terminis conveniat, velut norma demon-strat, convenire duos illos inter se, et contrà. Itaque si quæstio affirmanda est, quærendum est per omnes inventionis locos argumentum quod utrique parti quæstionis conveniat: si neganda est, quærendum quod uni parti conveniat, ab altera dissentiat; nam si ab utraque parte dissentit, tertium argumentum esse non poterit, nihil n. probabit. Ex. gr. quæritur "an Socrates sit animal?" Si affirmanda est hæc quæstio, ad illa duo argumenta quæ in quæstione sunt, "Socrates et animal," quærendum aliquod tertium argumentum est, quod cum utraque parte quæstionis consentiat. Ejusmodi autem est homo: nam homo convenit cum "animali," ut species cum suo genere; cum Socrate, ut genus cum sua specie; ergo "Socrates et animal" conveniunt inter se; adeoque "Socrates est animal." Sin neganda est quæstio, ut, "Socrates non est bestia," quærendum est argumentum tertium, quod ab altera tantum parte dissentiat. Hujusmodi autem est "homo: homo n. non est bestia, at Socrates est homo; ergo Socrates non est bestia." Sin medius cum neutro quæstionis termino conveniat, neutrius norma esse potest; neque ostendit, inter se conveniant, necne; neque "de omni" dicit neque "de nullo;" adeoque nec probat quicquam nec refellit. Unde illa regula; "ex utraque præmissa negata nihil concluditur: Aristot. 1, Prior. c. 24, ut "nullus lapis est animal; nullus homo est lapis, nullus igitur homo est animal." Excipitur tamen ab hac regula, si medius terminus sit negatus, vel duplex negatio sit in majore: ut, "quod non sentit, non est animal: planta non sentit; ergo planta non est animal." Hic enim major, quæ videtur esse negata, æquipollet affirmatæ; eademque est acsi diceret, "omne quod sentit est animal:" negationesque istæ topicæ potius et infinitæ, quàm axiomaticæ sunt, partiumque negationes non totius axiomatis, hoc potius modo enuntiandi, "quod est non sentiens, est non animal:" et hoc affirmatum planè axioma est. Sed hac de re plura dicemus infra cap. 12, ad secundam speciem explicati. Cur autem complexio, negata antecedentis parte altera, negata quoque esse debet, ratio est, trita illa regula, "conclusio sequitur partem debiliorem:" negatumque debilius est affirmato, particulare generali, contingens necessario. Regulæ autem ratio est, quia conclusio est præmissarum quasi effectum: nullum autem effectum est toto genere dignius aut fortius sua causa. Fallit ergo hic paralogismus: "qui non differt à bruto differt à Sophronisci filio: Socrates non differt à Sophronisci filio; ergo non à bruto." Hæc conclusio non sequitur, uti debuit, assumptionem negatam, sed propositionem affirmatam: et enim "non differt à bruto" non propositionis totius, sed antecedentis duntaxat ejus est negatio: idemque valet, acsi affirmatum sic esset; "qui idem est cum bruto." Sequitur autem conclusio sive consequens partem antecedentis negatam non affirmatam, quia si partes conclusionis non consentiunt in argumento tertio, non consentiunt inter se: sequitur partem specialem, non generalem, quia genus concludit speciem, non species genus; juxta illud superius dictum "de omni et nullo."

"Syllogismus simplex (nimirum qui ex simplicibus axiomatis constat) est vel generalis, vel specialis, vel proprius."

"Generalis è propositione et assumptione generalibus."

Non ex generali etiam conclusione, ut patebit infra.

"Specialis est ex altera tantum generali."

Hæc enim regula firmissima quoque est, "ex utraque præmissa particulari nihil concluditur." Exigit enim dictum "de omni et nullo" partem antecedentis unam saltem generalem: nec non in duabus particularibus quatuor sunt termini: cùm enim individua, quæ vocant, "vaga," particulares propositiones faciunt, fit ut de alio subjecto major, de alio minor ferè loquatur: ut, "quoddam animal est homo: quoddam animal est brutum; ergo quoddam brutum est homo. Quidam sunt divites: quidam sunt docti; ergo quidam docti sunt divites."

"Proprius est ex utraque propria."

Cur autem ex utraque propria cùm non ex utraque particulari, quia nempe hæc certa sunt et de eodem dicta, illa vaga "ut suprà."

Hinc liquet, cur ut axioma, ita syllogismus specialis in particularem et proprium divida non potuerit, cùm syllogismus proprius non sit species syllogismi specialis. Quare autem partes omnes non sint propriæ, i. e. axiomata propria, infra etiam apparebit. Et syllogismus quidem proprius, etsi ab Aristotele neglectus, ab aliis rejectus sit, usum tamen frequentissimum habet.

"Simplex syllogismus est contractus partibus, vel explicatus."

Aristoteles in tres figuras dividit syllogismum; primam, secundam, et tertiam. Verùm hanc Rami dichotomiam esse commodiorem et naturæ ordini aptius respondere res ipsa demonstrabit.

"Contractus syllogismus est, cùm exemplum pro argumento ita subjicitur particulari quæstioni, ut utramque ejus partem antecedere et assumptione affirmatum esse intelligatur."

Exempli gratia: "quædam confidentia est virtus, ut constantia. Quædam confidentia non est virtus, ut audacia."

In his, ut cernimus, primò quæstio particularis duntaxat proponitur; generale enim, ut inquit Aristot. pr. 1, 6, et 2, 7, in hac specie, quæ tertia nimirum Arist. figura est, concludere non licet: addo etiam, neque proprium; quæ ratio est, cur syllogismus generalis non ex omnibus generalibus et proprium non ex omnibus propriis definitur, cùm in hac specie consequens sive conclusio debeat semper esse particularis, etiamsi utraque pars antecedentis generalis aut propria fuerit: unde sequitur, particulares duntaxat quæstiones in hac specie concludi. Deinde exemplum speciale pro argumento subjicitur sive subjungitur, ut "constantia."

Hujus autem syllogismi dispositio specialis hæc esse intelligitur, si contractum explicamus (tametsi nunquam ferè nisi contractus in usu occurrit) ut exemplum sive argumentum tertium, primò utramque partem quæstionis in præmissis, quod aiunt, antecedat, sive præmissæ utriusque subjectum sit.

"Hic autem argumentum sive exemplum utramque partem quæstionis antecedere intelligitur," quia quæstionis pars utraque argumento sive exemplo attribuitur, i. e. de eo vel affirmatur vel negatur; perinde quasi explicatè diceretur, "constantiam esse virtutem, et esse confidentiam; ergo quandam confidentiam esse virtutem." Item, "audaciam non esse virtutem, et tamen esse confidentiam; ideoque quandam confidentiam non esse virtutem." Exemplum ergo sive argumentum tertium in contracto, etsi quæstioni subjicitur, tamen si contractum explicas, et propositionis et assumptionis antecedens sive subjectum esse reperitur. Est autem contractus enthymematis quædam species, quæ, cùm explicatur, in peculiarem quandam syllogismi formam resolvitur, ideoque erat specialiter docenda. Secundò, postulat hujus syllogismi dispositio, ut assumptio semper affirmetur. Cùm enim tertium argumentum speciale exemplum sit, adeoque species antecedentis sive minoris termini quæstionis qui in assumptione semper disponitur, atque ita antecedens sit tertii argumenti genus; necesse est, genus de specie semper affirmari.

"Atque ista expositio quæstionis per exemplum quod subjicitur, principium syllogismi partibus explicati ab Aristot. 1, pr. 6, &c. efficitur, tanquam per se pleno syllogismi judicio clarior et illustrior."

Prior ergo est ordine syllogismus contractus explicato, cùm quia clarior, tum quia simplicior: est autem ita clarus, ut mens eum, sicuti est contractus, antè percipiat, quàm partibus explicari possit; ideoque usus disserendi contracta hac forma contentus, formam explicatam rarissime solet adhibere. Claritas autem ejus eximia vel hinc perspicitur; quòd cùm duo duntaxat hujus speciei sint sophismata, eorum inanitatem contracta hujus syllogismi forma facilius detegit quàm explicata, ut infra ostendetur.

Quod ad modos attinet hujus speciei, si contractam tantummodo formam spectamus, pluribus non est opus quàm duobus, uno affirmato, altero negato: quia non refert, utrum exemplum subalterna sit species an specialissima. Sin explicatam hanc speciem spectamus, plures habet modos quàm species reliquæ: quatuor autem sunt affirmati, totidem negati; quorum duo sunt generales, quatuor speciales, duo proprii: quatuor autem sunt in hac specie speciales modi, cùm in reliquis bini tantum sint; quia in hac specie propositio potest esse vel generalis vel particularis, in reliquis verò nunquam particularis est. Exempla hæc sunt.

Secundus est negatus generalis: ut, "audacia non est virtus: audacia est confidentia; ergo quædam confidentia non est virtus."

Affirmatis specialis duplex est; tertius et quartus. Tertius, cujus propositio est particularis: ut, "quidam sapiens est dives: omnis sapiens est laudabilis; ergo quidam laudabilis est dives."

Quartus, cujus propositio est generalis: ut, "omnis sapiens est laudabilis, quidam sapiens est pauper; ergo quidam pauper est laudabilis."

Negatus item specialis est duplex; quintus et sextus. Quintus, cujus propositio est particularis: ut, "quidam stultus non est fortunatus: omnis stultus et contemptus; ergo quidam contemptus non est fortunatus."

Sextus, cujus propositio est generalis: ut, "stultus non est beatus: quidam stultus est fortunatus; ergo quidam fortunatus non est beatus."

Reliqui duo proprii sunt, cùm exemplum est species specialissima sive individuum. Affirmatus est, "Socrates est philosophus: Socrates est homo: ergo quidam homo est philosophus." Negatus est, "Thersites non est philosophus: Thersites est homo; ergo quidam homo non est philosophus."

Contracti syllogismi duo vitia sive sophismata sunt, quæ definitione præcaventur. Unum, si quæstio sive conclusio particularis non sit: ut "omnis homo est rationalis: omnis homo est animal; ergo omne animal est rationale," ratio est, quia id quod non generaliter attribuitur in assumptione (non enim omne animal est homo) non potest esse generale subjectum conclusionis. Alterum est cùm assumptio est negata: ut, "homo est animal: homo non est bestia; ergo bestia non est animal." Quæ duo sophismata in contracta hujus syllogismi forma, facilius, ut suprà dixi, deteguntur, et primo statim intuitu ridentur: ut, "omne animal est rationale, ut homo: quædam bestia non est animal, ut homo."

CAP. XI.

De Prima Specie Syllogismi simplicis explicati.

Syllogismus explicatus præter ipsum nomen aliam definitionem non desiderat. Dicitur "explicatus," non quod semper omnibus occurrat partibus explicatus, sic enim vix millesimus quisque syllogismus occurrit, sed quod partes non modo in forma integra, verùm etiam in enthymemate semper distinctas habet.

"In syllogismo explicato propositio est generalis aut propria; et conclusio similis antecedenti aut parti debiliori."

"Syllogismi explicati species duæ sunt. Prima ubi argumentum semper sequitur, negatum in altera parte."

Hæc prima species explicati, "figura secunda" ab Aristotele dicitur. Prior autem hæc species efficitur, quia dispositio ejus est simplicior, ut ex altera specie collata comperiemus. Sequitur autem semper argumentum partem utramque quæstionis, consequentem in propositione, antecedentem in assumptione: unde ab Aristot. p. 1, 5, "prædicatum de ambabus" dicitur. Negatum autem dicitur argumentum in altera parte quia pars altera vel propositio nempe vel assumptio semper est negata. Unde cùm negata etiam conclusio semper necessariò sit, sequitur, hujus speciei modos omnes negatos esse, et negatas duntaxat quæstiones hac specie concludi, quæ omnis in refutationibus est posita.

Modi hujus syllogismi sex sunt; et omnes quidem, ut diximus, negati; duo generales, duo speciales, duo proprii.

Generalis primus, cujus propositio negatur: "Turbatus non benè utitur ratione: sapiens bene utitur ratione; sapiens igitur non est turbatus." Hoc exemplum in sua crypsi sic apud Ciceronem est, 3 Tuscul. "Quemadmodum oculus conturbatus non est probè affectus ad suum munus fungendum, et reliquæ partes totumque corpus à statu cum est motum, deest officio suo et muneri; sic conturbatus animus non est probè affectus ad exequendum munus suum. Munus autem animi est ratione uti: et sapientis animus ita semper affectus est, ut ratione optimè utatur; nunquam igitur est perturbatus." Crypsis hic unica redundantia est: nam ordo partium rectus est, nec ulla pars deest: prosyllogismus unus est propositionis: illustratur enim propositio similitudine plena, cujus redditio est ipsius propositionis sententia.

Generalis secundus, cujus assumptio negatur: "Res mortalis est composita: animus non est compositus; animus igitur non est mortalis." Hic syllogismus crypsi involutus est apud Cic. 1 Tuscul. quo is judicat animum immortalem esse. "In animi autem cognitione," inquit, "dubitare non possumus, nisi fortè in physicis plumbei sumus, quin nihil sit animis admixtum, nihil concretum, nihil coagmentatum, nihil duplex. Quod cùm ita sit, certè nec secerni, nec dividi, nec discerpi, nec distrahi potest; nec interire igitur: est enim interitus quasi discessus et secretio ac diremptus earum partium quæ ante interitum junctione aliqua tenebantur." In hoc exemplo partium ordo invertitur: nam postremo in loco propositionis sententia ponitur, interitum esse scilicet rerum compositarum, assumptio occurrit prima, "in animi autem cognitione," &c. Et ornatur synonymis: conclusio media est atque à causa illustratur, "ergo nec secerni, &c., nec interire igitur."

> "Livor, iners vitium, mores non exit in altos;
> Utque latens ima vipera serpit humo.
> Mens tua sublimis supra genus eminet ipsum.
> Grandius ingenio nec tibi nomen inest.
> Ergo, alii noceant, miseris, optentque timeri,
> Tinctaque mordaci spicula felle gerant.
> At tua supplicibus domus est assueta juvandis;

Hujus etiam exempli crypsis redundantia sola est: propositio suos habet prosyllogismos, et livor pro livido ponitur, adjunctum pro subjecto; et illustratur à contrario abjecto; isque à simili, "vipera:" assumptio, i. e. Maximi magnanimitas, illustratur partim à minori totius generis magnanimitate, partim à notatione nominis ejus, i. e. Maximi; cujus parem esse animi magnitudinem demonstrat: conclusio negat Maximum esse lividum, partim quia dissimilis sit lividorum, quos describit ab effectis, "ergo alii noceant," &c.; partim, quia ipse faciat quæ magnanimus consuevit, qui disparatus à livido est; "at tua supplicibus," &c.

Specialis secundus est, cujus assumptio negatur: "saltator est luxuriosus: Muræna non est luxuriosus; Muræna igitur non est saltator." Cic. pro Muræn. "Nemo enim ferè saltat sobrius, nisi fortè insanet: neque in solitudine neque in convivio moderato atque honesto. Intempestivi convivii, amœni loci, multarum deliciarum comes est extrema saltatio. Tu mihi arripis id quod necesse est omnium vitiorum esse postremum; relinquis illa quibus remotis, hoc vitium omnino esse non potest: nullum turpe convivium, non amor, non comessatio, non libido, non sumptus ostenditur: et cùm ea non reperiantur quæ voluptatis nomen habent, quæque vitiosa sunt, in quo ipsam luxuriam reperire non potes, in eo te umbram luxuriæ reperturum putas?" Hujus etiam syllogismi partes prosyllogismis exornantur. Propositionis sententia his verbis continetur, "intempestivi convivii," &c., quam prosyllogismus præcedens illustrat à contrariis, "nemo ferè saltat sobrius," &c; assumptio per partes explicatur, "nullum turpe convivium," &c., et à minoribus quibusdam illustratur: cujus etiam prosyllogismus præcedit, reprehensio nempe Catonis, quòd postularet consequens, non probato antecedente: postremo loco ponitur conclusio, quæ negat Murænam esse saltatorem repetendo quædam quæ in assumptione præcesserant; et interrogatione fortius negando.

> "Carmina proveniunt animo deducta sereno;
> Nubila sunt subitis tempora nostra malis.
> Carmina secessum scribentis et otia quærunt.
> Me mare, me venti, me fera jactat hyems.
> Carminibus metus omnis abest; ego perditus ensem
> Hæsurum jugulo jam puto jamque meo.
> Hæc quoque quæ facio, judex mirabitur æquus;
> Scriptaque cum venia qualiacunque leget."

Tres hic syllogismi sunt qui in unum sic reduci possunt: "Ut quis possit carmina bona scribere, oportet is lætus sit, otiosus, securus: ego nec lætus sum, nec otiosus, nec securus; ergo bona carmina non scribo." Pro assumptionibus prosyllogismi à dissentaneis et impedientibus causis ponuntur. Deinde conclusio sequitur, non ipsa quidem sed ejus consectarium; mirum esse si bona sunt; sed potius cum venia esse legenda, quia non sunt bona.

Proprius primus est, cujus propositio negatur; ut, "Agesilaus non est pictus ab Apelle: Alexander est pictus ab Apelle; Alexander igitur non est Agesilaus."

Proprius secundus est, cujus assumptio negatur: ut "Cæsar oppressit patriam: Tullius non oppressit patriam; ergo Tullius non est Cæsar."

Sophisma prima speciei proprium est, cùm argumentum tertium in altera parte antecedentis non negatur, ut definitio primæ speciei præcipit: unde illud vulgò dictum, Ex duabus affirmatis in secunda figura, nihil concluditur. Excipiendum tamen est, si propositio fortè axioma reciprocum sit: ut, "homo est animal rationale: Socrates est animal rationale; ergò Socrates est homo." Verùm hic potius inversio partium propositionis intelligenda est; "animal rationale est homo:" atque ita ad sequentem speciem syllogismi refertur.

CAP. XII.

De Secunda Specie Syllogismi simplicis explicati.

"Secunda species explicati syllogismi est, quando argumentum antecedit in propositione, sequitur affirmatum in assumptione."

Hæc species ab Aristotele, "prima figura" dicitur; sed naturæ ordine est postrema. Cùm enim in reliquis speciebus dispositio questionis cum argumento tertio simplex et uniusmodi sit, in hac specie duplex est; in propositione enim argumentum antecedit quæstionis consequentem, utpote specialius; in assumptione sequitur quæstionis antecedentem, utpote generalius; unde fortè medius terminus in hac solùm figura propriè dicitur. Quòd autem propositio nunquam particularis, conclusio semper antecedenti similis aut parti debiliori est, id habet commune cum explicata specie priore; hoc etiam cum contracta, affirmatum esse in assumptione; nisi in contracta, quæstionis antecedens ut generalius de argumento; in hac, argumentum de antecedente quæstionis affirmatur.

Hæc maxime figura fundatur dicto illo "de omni et nullo:" antecedens enim sive subjectum propositionis continet genus, adeoque est semper generalis, subjectum assumptionis continet speciem quæ de illo genere affirmata. Assumptio itaque semper esse debet affirmata. Ex quo sequitur, quicquid de genere in propositione dicitur, id de eo quod in assumptione species esse illius generis affirmatur, in conclusione rectissimè concludi. Quod si genus illud subjectum scil. propositionis termino infinito negante, seu topicè contradictorio exprimitur, non negata continuò censenda erit assumptio quamvis esse videatur; assumit n. tantummodo genus ex propositione termino illo topicè duntaxat contradictorio expressum, ipsa nihil axiomaticè negat: ut, "quisquis non credit, damnatur: aliquis Judæus non credit; ergo aliquis Judæus damnatur." Hic propositionis subjectum est genus "quisquis non credit," i. e. omnis non credens sive infidelis: Judæus est ex numero sive specie non credentium, id quod assumptio non negat, sed affirmat æque acsi sic diceret, "aliquis Judæus est non credens."

Ex hac autem affirmatione sequitur, nullum argumentum ab antecedente quæstionis dissentaneum, in hac secunda specie locum habere. De cætero, hæc species neque ad particulares quæstiones, ut contracta, neque ad negatas, ut prior species explicati, restringitur; sed ad omnia quæstionum genera concludenda rectè adhibetur.

Restant hujus speciei modi; qui quanquam partim affirmati sunt partim negati, plures tamen non sunt quàm in altera specie, ubi omnes erant solùm negati. Æqualitatis ratio est quòd assumptionis affirmatio, et solius inde propositionis negatio negatorum numerum minuit. Modi igitur hujus speciei sex itidem sunt; tres affirmati, tres item negati; utrique rursum sunt generales, speciales, et proprii.

Primus est affirmatus generalis: ut, "omne justum est utile; omne honestum est justum, omne igitur honestum est utile." Quod Cic. 2 Off. ita concludit: "quicquid justum sit, id etiam utile esse censent: item quod honestum, idem justum: ex quo efficitur, ut quicquid honestum sit, idem sit utile." Propositionis prosyllogismus à testimonio Stoicorum primo in loco ponitur, deinde omnes partes ordine sequuntur. Partes hujus syllogismi sunt axiomata relatæ essentiæ, quæ simplicium axiomatum vim habent.

Secundus modus est negatus generalis: "Timidus non est liber: avarus est timidus; avarus itaque non est liber." Hoc ita concluditur et judicatur ab Horatio, epist. l. 1, 16:

> "Quò melior servo, quò liberior sit avarus,
> In triviis fixum, cùm se demittit ob assem,
> Non video. Nam qui cupiet, metuet quoque: porro
> Qui metuens vivit, liber mihi non erit unquam."

In hoc exemplo duplex est crypsis, inversio partium et prosyllogismus. Primo in loco ponitur conclusio, eaque duabus prosyllogismis illustratur; primò à pari, quod "avarus" non "sit liberior servo:" secundò ab effectis, quod "se demittit ob assem." Tum ponitur assumptio "qui cupiet, metuet quoque." Propositio postremo in loco ponitur,

> "Qui metuens vivit, liber mihi non erit unquam."

Sic Terent. in Eunuch. concludit et judicat: "consilii expers, consilio regi non potest: amor est consilii expers; consilio itaque regi non potest." Syllogismus his verbis sequitur:

> "Here, quæ res in se neque consilium neque modum
> Habet ullum, eam consilio regere non potes.
> In amore hæc omnia insunt vitia; injuriæ,
> Suspiciones, inimicitiæ, induciæ,
> Bellum, pax rursum: incerta hæc si tu postules
> Ratione certâ facere, nihilo plus agas,
> Quàm si des operam, ut cum ratione insanias."

In hoc exemplo propositio suo loco est "quæ res in se, &c." Pro assumptione ponitur ejus prosyllogismus variorum amoris adjunctorum quæ consilium impediunt; amor consilii expers est, "quia in amore hæc insunt vitia, &c." Conclusio sequitur "incerta hæc, &c." Cu jus sententia comparatione parium comprehenditur, ergo si amorem consilio regere vis, " nihilo plus," &c.

Tertius modus est affirmatus specialis: " Consules propter virtutem facti, studiosè remp. tueri debent: Cicero est propter virtutem factus consul; Cicero igitur studiosè remp. tueri debet." Sic orator diligentiam suam, Agr. 2, concludit et judicat: " Nam cùm omnium consulum," ait, " gravis in repub. custodienda, cura ac diligentia debet esse, tum eorum maximè, qui non in incunabulis, sed in campo sunt consules facti. Nulli populo Rom. pro me majores nostri spoponderunt mihi creditum est: à me petere quod debeo, me ipsum appellare debetis. Quemadmodum cùm petebam, nulli me auctores generis mei vobis commendarunt: sic siquid deliquero, nullæ sunt imagines, quæ me à vobis deprecentur. Quare modò ut vita suppetat (quanquam ego sum is qui cam possim ab istorum scelere insidiisque defendere) polliceor vobis, Quirites, bona fide, remp. vigilanti homini, non timido, diligenti, non ignavo, commisistis." Partes hujus syllogismi prosyllogismis ornantur. Propositio à minori illustratur: cujus sententia est comparationis redditio, diversis illustrata: " nam cum omnium consulum gravis, &c. tum eorum maximè:" diversa sunt, " non in incunabulis, sed in campo." Assumptio sequitur, " nulli populi Rom. &c.," quæ iisdem rursus diversis illustratur, et à simili; meis, non majorum meritis; in campò, non in incunabulis: similitudo his verbis continetur; " quemadmodum cùm petebam, &c." Tandem conclusionis sententia sequitur illustrata, primùm testimonio promissi, obligationis vim habentis, " polliceor, &c.;" deinde diverso et disparato; " quare modo, &c." Ergo Cicero erit vigilans, non timidus; diligens, non ignavus.

Aliud exemplum: " quod optatum redierit, gratum est: Lesbia Catullo optata rediit; grata igitur est."

Insperanti, hoc gratum est animo propriè.
Quare hoc est gratum, nobis quoque charius auro,
Quod te restituis, Lesbia, mi cupido.
Restituis cupido atque insperanti ipsa refers te Nobis; ò lucem candidiore nota!
Quis me uno vivit felicior, aut magis hac quid Optandum vita dicere quis poterit?"

In hoc exemplo propositio videtur esse composita, simplex tamen est, et syllogismus simplex; quia simplex est dispositio argumenti cum partibus quæstionis. Duplex hic crypsis est, reversio et redundantia. Primo loco est propositio " si quicquam cupido,&c." i. e. quicquid cupido; " si " enim non semper connexi nota est. Assumptio est in quarto et quinto versu, Lesbia Catullo optata rediit. Conclusio est versu tertio illustrata à minori, " quare hoc est gratum et auro charius." Tribus postremis versibus iteratur sententia conclusionis, primùm ab adjuncto tempore, " ò lucem:" deinde à pari, " nemo me felicior, aut magis hac quid, &c."

Quartus modus est negatus specialis: " deceptor amantis puellæ non est laudandus: Demophoon est deceptor amantis puellæ; Demophoon igitur non est laudandus." Phyllis apud Ovidium ita judicat Demophoontem laudandum non esse.

" Fallere credentem non est operosa puellam
Gloria: simplicitas digna favore fuit.
Sum decepta tuis et amans et fœmina verbis;
Dii faciant laudis summa sit ista tuæ."

Propositio suum obtinet locum cum prosyllogismo adjunctæ simplicitatis, ut causæ cur deceptor non sit laudandus. Assumptio sequitur, sum " decepta tuis," &c. Conclusionis sententia imprecatione continetur, " dii faciant, &c."

Quintus modus est affirmatus proprius: ut, " Octavius est hæres Cæsaris: ego sum Octavius; sum igitur hæres Cæsaris."

Sextus modus est negatus proprius: ut, " Antonius non est filius Cæsaris: tu es Antonius; non es igitur filius Cæsaris."

Hujus itaque speciei laus est præ cæteris, quòd omnia quæstionum genera concludat; nempe generales, speciales, vel proprias, easque vel affirmatas vel negatas; et præsertim generales affirmatas: ob quam potissimum causam Aristoteles speciem hanc et reliquis anteposuit, quod primus ejus modus nempe " affirmatus generalis" sit maximè scientificus, post. l. 11, cùm præcepta artium solus demonstret, et reductionem reliquarum ad hanc figuram sive speciem laboriosè et subtiliter excogitavit, verum non sic præstat hæc species cæteris duabus, ut earum idcirco ad hanc reductio cum tanta ut sit, alphabeti vexatione elaboranda fuerit, quandoquidem et reliquæ species non imperfectæ sunt, nec minus necessariò concludunt, id enim syllogismi speciebus commune cunctis est, quæstiones denique illas, quæ ad ipsarum judicium rectè referuntur, interdum aptius concludunt, quàm in hac specie concludi queunt. Meritò itaque Galenus, l. 2, de placit. Hippoc. et Plat. reductionem hanc omnemque ejus supellectilem abecedariam tanquam vanissimæ subtilitatis doctrinam inanem ac futilem post Antipatrum et Chrysippum explodit. Et Keckermannus ipse, in P. Ramum ferè iniquior, reductionem tamen illam quam vocant " per impossibile," ad eos duntaxat refutandos inventam, homines sanè absurdos et rarò admodum repertos, qui utraque præmissa concessa, conclusionem negent, fatetur se potius propter consuetudinem scholarum, quàm propter magnum ejus usum retinuisse. At consuetudo certè gnaviter nugandi ejicienda è scholis potius, quàm retinenda erat.

Tres hic paralogismi refellendi sunt; quorum duo sunt utrique speciei explicatæ communes, propositio nimirum particularis, et conclusio partis non debilioris: utriusque exemplum hoc esse potest: " quoddam animal est rationale: bestia est animal; ergo bestia est rationalis." Et præterea totum medium, nempe " quoddam animal," non assumitur.

Proprius in hac specie paralogismus est argumenti negatio in assumptione: ut, " omnis homo est animal: equus non est homo; ergo equus non est animal."

Hic etiam " solus et unicus" pro negandi particulis habendi sunt; pariterque reddunt assumptionem captiosam: ut, " quicquid est in mea domo, est in oppido: unicus fons est in mea domo; ergo unicus fons est in oppido." Sic, " quicquid est risibile, est animal: solus homo est risibilis: ergo solus homo est animal." Tam enim hæ particulæ quàm negatio in minore, ostendunt non reciprocum esse majorem; adeòque conclusionem ex majore per minorem, vel generale ex proprio non sequi.

Expendenda porrò hic definitionis verba sunt; quæ non tam assumptionem ipsam quàm argumentum in assumptione affirmatum significant. Cùm enim propositionis antecedens (quod tertium argumentum est) negatione infinita topica duntaxat exprimatur, assumptionis consequens (quod etiam tertium argumentum est) eandem negationem retinere debet; alioqui non sequeretur argumentum affirmatum in assumptione, sed contradictione sublatum. Negatio autem hæc non dicenda est vel assumptionis vel argumenti negatio, sed argumenti infiniti affirmatio: tum enim demum negatur in assumptione argumentum, cùm illius negatio propositionis affirmationi opponitur. Exempli gratia: "qui non est dives, contemnitur. Posthumus non est dives; ergo Posthumus contemnitur." Assumptionem hic non negari probat affirmatio conclusionis: sed perinde est acsi hoc modo argumentaretur: "omnis homo qui non est dives, contemnitur: Posthumus est homo qui non est dives; ergo Posthumus contemnitur." Vel hoc modo: "omnis non dives contemnitur: Posthumus est non dives; ergo contemnitur." Sed hæc ex iis etiam quæ suprà ad definitionem ipsam hujus speciei diximus, puto non esse obscura.

Præterea in quibusdam exemplis, quorum propositio est reciproca, videtur interdum syllogismus iste habere assumptionem negatam; cùm dicendum sit potius, partes propositionis inverti, quæ si in ordinem revocentur, syllogismus erit in prima specie explicati: ut, "Joan. 8, 47. Qui ex Deo est, verba Dei audit: vos ex Deo non estis; ergo verba Dei non auditis." Propositio invertenda est: "qui verba Dei audit, is ex Deo est: vos non estis ex Deo; ergo verba Dei non auditis."

CAP. XIII.

De Syllogismo connexo primo.

Adhuc simplex Syllogismus fuit.

"Syllogismus compositus est syllogismus ubi tota quæstio est pars altera propositionis affirmatæ et compositæ; argumentum est pars reliqua."

Negat Aristoteles ullam esse syllogismi speciem præter tres figuras; et tamen ipse sæpe utitur composito, qui ad nullam ex tribus figuris referri potest: Verùm usus, optimus magister docet, sæpius in communi hominum sermone ac disputationibus, compositos adhiberi syllogismos, quàm simplices: ut qui multas quæstiones, multa argumenta commodè satis disponant, quæ syllogismi simplices respuunt. Theophrastus etiam et Eudemus, Aristotelis discipuli, quin etiam Stoici, et post eos Cicero et Boëthius, usum præceptorem secuti, compositos non omiserunt. Syllogismus autem compositus dicitur non tam quod ex compositis axiomatis, nam et simplex potest ex compositis, nimirum relatis constare, sed à composita dispositione quæstionis totius cum tertio argumento in propositione; unde assumptio tota etiam assumitur; et conclusio non partim ex propositione partim ex assumptione, sed tota ex propositione deducitur: propositio enim cùm sit composita, duas reliquas syllogismi partes (quæ axiomata simplicia sunt) conjunctionis vinculo conjunctas complectitur: pars illa efficit assumptionem quæ argumentum continet, altera conclusionem. Propositio autem debet esse affirmata, quia negata si esset, composita esse desineret, ipsa enim compositio negatione dissolveretur. Propositionem autem negatam efficit, ut de axiomate composito supra dictum est, non partium sed conjunctionis negatio; ut, "si non est animal, non est homo;" hæc propositio ex omnibus etiam partibus negatis affirmata est; rectè igitur inde assumitur atque concluditur, "at non est animal, ergo neque homo." Sin hoc modo dicerem, "non si non est animal, idcirco non est homo," ex hac negata propositione nihil omnino deduci aut concludi posset. In syllogismis itaque compositis ex ipsa conjunctionis vi deducuntur assumptio et conclusio. Ex duobus enim quæ propositione conjunguntur, aut unum assumitur ut alterum concludatur, aut unum tollitur ut alterum tollatur.

Specialis autem contradictio, ut in axiomate simplici jam diximus, particularis est aut propria. Tollere igitur propositionis partem aliquam in assumptione aut conclusione, est ejus contradictionem particularem aut propriam ponere. Particulari autem generaliter contradici, generali particulariter, ibidem etiam docemur. Exemplis rem planam suo quamque loco faciemus.

Sequitur nunc compositi syllogismi distributio: cujus genera ex propositionum compositione oriuntur: propositiones axiomata composita semper sunt: ex quatuor autem axiomatum compositorum generibus copulatum si affirmatum sit, non habet locum in composito syllogismo; si negatum, æquipollet interdum disjuncto: discretum syllogismi expers est, quia diversa ex quibus constat, nec planè consentiunt, et tamen ita leviter dissentiunt, ut uno posito vel remoto, non tamen sequatur alterum poni vel removeri; aut vim habet connexi.

"Syllogismus itaque compositus est connexus aut disjunctus."

"Syllogismus connexus est syllogismus compositus propositionis connexæ." Vel cujus propositio est axioma connexum.

Cùm autem axiomati connexo affine sit relatum temporis, ut ibidem ostendimus, etiam syllogismi connexi propositio poterit relata esse temporis: nam quantitatis, qualitatis, loci propositiones relatæ in simplicibus syllogismis locum habent; qui in iis propositionibus quæstionis duntaxat consequens cum argumento disponitur. Relatum denique consequentiæ, de quo supra cap. 6, syllogismus idoneus non est.

"Syllogismus connexus est duorum modorum.

"Primus modus syllogismi connexi est, qui assumit antecedens et consequens concludit."

Quo modo Cicero judicat et concludit l. 2, de divinatione: "si dii sunt, divinatio est: sunt autem dii; divinatio est igitur."

Aliud ex 3, Offic. "Atque si etiam hoc natura præscribit, ut homo homini, quicunque sit, ob eam ipsam causam, quòd is homo sit, consultum velit, necesse est secundum eandem naturam, omnium utilitatem esse communem. Quod si ita est, una continemur omnes et eadem lege naturæ. Idque ipsum si ita est, certè violare alterum lege naturæ prohibemur. Verum autem primum; verum igitur et extremum."

Propositio hujus syllogismi est sorites (de quo infrà) trium graduum, "si hoc natura præscribit, ut, &c."

"Frequenter hic non assumitur idem sed majus."

Ut 1 Catil. "Si te parentes odissent, discederes: nunc patria te odit (quæ communis est omnium nostrum parens) multo magis ergo discedes." Sed "majus illud" facile contineri in propositione poterit hoc modo; si propter odium parentum discederes, multo magis propter odium patriæ. "At illud; ergo hoc multo magis."

Simili ratione concluditur etiam majus vel minus: ut Cic. pro Quint. "Etsi vadimonium deseruisset, non debuisses tamen ad extrema jura descendere:" at non deseruit; multò minus ergo debuisti, vel multò magis non debuisti.

"Concludendi modus," ut supradiximus, "hic idem est quando propositio est relata temporis."

Ut, "cùm Paris Œnonem deseret, Xanthus recurrit; Paris Œnonem deseret; Xanthus ergo recurrit."

Sed tamen relata temporis ut et reliqua axiomata composita, id quod supra monuimus, ad syllogismum simplicem pertinebunt quoties non tota quæstio in propositione disponitur: quod quidem semper fit, cùm de certo et definito tempore quæstio est: ut si quæratur an hoc tempore sit æstas, hujusmodi erit syllogismus: "cùm sol est in Cancro, æstas est: at hoc tempore sol est in Cancro; ergo hoc tempore æstas est."

CAP. XIV.

De Syllogismo connexo secundo.

"Secundus modus connexi tollit consequens, ut tollat antecedens."

Hæc enim vis connexi axiomatis est, si consequens non sit, nec esse antecedens. Sic Cicero 4 de Fin., "docent nos," inquit, "dialectici, &c. Si illud, hoc: non autem hoc; igitur ne illud quidem."

Sequuntur exempli: "si ulli rei sapiens assentietur unquam, aliquando etiam opinabitur: nunquam autem opinabitur; nulli igitur rei assentietur." Hic consequens contradictione speciali in assumptione tollitur, "aliquandò, nunquam;" conclusio etiam antecedenti specialiter contradicit; "ulli rei, nulli rei."

Eodem syllogismo Ovid. 2 de Trist. stultitiam suam judicat:

> "Si saperem doctas odissem jure sorores,
> Numina cultori perniciosa suo.
> At nunc (tanta meo comes est insania morbo)
> Saxa memor refero rursus ad icta pedem."

Propositio est, "si saperem, Musas odissem:" cujus prosyllogismus est ab adjuncta pernicie. Assumptio, at non odi; quæ à simili exprimitur, "at nunc saxa memor, &c.," ergo non sapio: cujus conclusionis sententia in parenthesi est; "tanta meo, &c." Atque in hoc exemplo est contradictio propria.

"Hæ duæ syllogismi species sunt omnium usitatissimæ."

Non enim ea solùm argumenta quæ in simplicibus et disjunctis syllogismis disponi non possunt, in connexis facile disponuntur, sed etiam ex iis quæ possunt aliis formis concludi, multa in his speciebus facilius et promptius concluduntur: immo nullum omnino argumentum, quod in syllogismum usum habet, has connexi species respuit.

Modus posterior, qui assumit consequens ut concludat antecedens, est captio posterioris legitimi modi, affinis paralogismo ex omnibus affirmatis in prima specie explicati: ut, "si homo est leo, sentit: at sentit; ergo est leo." Utrumque hunc paralogismum Aristoteles appellat fallaciam consequentis; quæ toties fit quoties propositio non est reciproca.

Sed est etiam aliud sophisma secundi modi, cùm assumptio non tollit contradictione speciali; id est, quando consequenti vel generali generaliter, vel particulari particulariter contradicit. Generalis contradictionis exemplum est, "si omne animal est irrationale, omnis etiam homo est irrationalis: at nullus homo est irrationalis: nullum ergo animal est irrationale." Particularis hoc: "si homo est rationalis, aliquod animal est rationale: sed aliquod animal non est rationale; ergo nec homo."

CAP. XV.

De Syllogismo disjuncto primo.

"Syllogismus disjunctus est syllogismus compositus propositionis disjunctæ.

"Modi duo sunt." Sic etiam Cic. in Top. et Stoici apud Laërtium.

"Primus tollit unum, et reliquum concludit.

"Ut, aut dies est, aut nox: at dies non est; ergo nox est. Vel, nox non est; dies ergo est."

Ciceronis pro Cluentio judicium tale est: "sed cùm esset hæc illi proposita conditio, ut aut justè pièque accusaret, aut acerbè indignèque moreretur; accusare quoquo modo posset, quàm illo modo mori maluit." Disjunctio clarior sic erit: "aut accusandum aut moriendum: non moriendum; accusandum igitur." In hoc exemplo, ut est apud Cic., est partium inversio, totusque syllogismus in axiomate relato consequentiæ involvitur. Propositio non est absolutè vera, sed ex conditione. Assumptio et conclusio per comparationem minoris ponuntur; ita, ut conclusio præcedat.

Sic idem 2 Phil. ratiocinatur: "nunquamne intelliges tibi statuendum esse, utrum illi qui istam rem gesserunt, homicidæ sint an vindices libertatis? Attende, &c. Nego quicquam esse medium. Confiteor illos nisi liberatores populi Rom. conservatoresque reip. sint, plus quàm sicarios, plus quàm homicidas, plus quàm parricidas esse: siquidem est atrocius patriæ parentem, &c. Si parricidæ, cur honoris causa à te sunt et in hoc ordine et apud populum Rom. semper appellati? Cur, &c. Atque hæc acta per te. Non igitur homicidæ. Sequitur ut liberatores tuo judicio sint; quandoquidem tertium nihil potest esse." Quæstio hic proponitur initio de Cæsaris interfectoribus, "utrum," &c. Propositio proponitur axiomate connexo, "confiteor illos nisi," &c., quod æquipollet disjuncto; "aut vindices sunt libertatis aut plusquam homicidæ:" illustratur enim ea pars disjunctionis à majori: et præcedit prosyllogismus, quo ostenditur disjunctionem hanc esse sine medio, et proinde necessariam. Assumptio sequitur, "non sunt homicidæ;" idque confirmatur prosyllogismo à testimonio et factis ipsius Antonii. Prosyllogismus concluditur in secundo connexo, si parricidæ, cur, &c.? "at hæc acta per te; non igitur homicidæ." Conclusio denique sequitur, "ut liberatores fuerint;" idque repetito propositionis prosyllogismo confirmatur, "quandoquidem tertium sive medium nihil potest esse."

"Si partes disjunctæ propositionis sint duabus plures, judicandi concludendique ars erit eadem."

Sic Cic. judicat "Rabirium cum consulibus esse oportuisse. Aut enim cum consulibus, aut cum seditiosis, aut latuisse: at nec cum seditiosis fuisse, nec latuisse; fuisse ergo cum consulibus. Pro Rabir. Atqui videmus ait hæc in rerum natura tria fuisse, ut aut cum Saturnino esset, aut cum bonis, aut lateret. Latere autem, mortis erat instar turpissimæ: cum Saturnino esse, furoris et sceleris; virtus et honestas et pudor cum coss. esse cogebat." Propositio per se clara est. Assumptionis partes prosyllogismis illustrantur, primo à simili, deinde ab adjunctis. Conclusio prosyllogismo ab efficiente illustratur.

Notandum est in hoc modo non ita exigi specialem contradictionem, ut in reliquis; neque enim ad consequentiæ necessitatem pertinet in hoc modo, ut in reliquis, sed ad assumptionis solius veritatem. Si ergo assumptio generalem contradictionem ferre potest, per consequentiam licebit uti: ad consequentiæ enim rationem sufficit, alterum quovis modo tolli, ut reliquum concludatur, eademque conclusio erit, sive specialis sive generalis in assumptione contradictio fuerit, in altero verò modo secus erit, ubi contradictio in ipsam conclusionem cadit.

CAP. XVI.

De Syllogismo disjuncto secundo.

"Disjunctus secundus è propositione partibus omnibus affirmata assumit unum et reliquum tollit."

Secundus efficitur, quia minus generalis est primo, utpote proprietatibus quibusdam astrictus, quibus prior immunis erat. Proprietates autem hæ sunt, 1. partium omnium propositionis affirmatio, non totius modò propositionis, id enim syllogismis omnibus compositis commune est; et affirmari quidem propositio vel omnibus negatis partibus potest. 2. Assumptio affirmatur, quoniam in propositione affirmata fuerat. 3. In conclusione semper est negatio, eaque specialis contradictio: in primo quidem conclusio nonnunquam negatur; sed hoc tum sit cùm pars propositionis quæ concluditur negata fuit. Exempli gratia: "aut dies est, aut nox: dies est; ergo nox non est."

"Ejusmodi syllogismus efficitur è propositione copulata negata, quæ negata complexio," vel, quod Græcis idem est, negata copulatio dicitur, "et disjunctionis affirmatæ vim obtinet."

Pertinet autem ad hunc secundum duntaxat modum negata copulatio; quod cum in hujusmodi propositione quævis opposita disponi possint, ex uno eorum negato, nisi in iis qui medio carent, non necessariò alterum affirmatur et concluditur, quod fit in primo modo, sed ex altero affirmato alterum negatur, quæ communis est regula omnium oppositorum, et fit duntaxat in hoc secundo.

Ad sophismata quod attinet horum modorum, primi quidem nullum occurrit. Secundi quæ sunt, ex definitione redarguuntur. Primum est, si aliqua pars propositionis negata erit: ut, "leo aut animal est, aut non est homo; at non est homo, ergo nec animal." Secundum est, si assumptio sit negata; ut in exemplo superiore. Tertium est, si specialis contradictio non erit in conclusione: ut hoc; "aut homo est animal, aut omne animal est irrationale; sed homo est animal, ergo nullum animal est irrationale."

APPENDIX.

De Enthymemate, Dilemmate, et Sorite.

Expositis omnibus cùm simplicis tum compositi syllogismi speciebus, sequitur axiomatis et syllogismi communis affectio, vel potius anomalia, de qua antediximus, crypsis. Quæ in omni cum loquendi usu tum scribendi genere tam frequens est, idque brevitatis plerumque causa, ut nemo ferè syllogismos integros sine crypsi aliqua vel loquatur vel scribat.

Sed quoniam crypsis ejusque triplex modus syllogismorum omnes species afficiunt, ea re dicendi locus de syllogismi crypsibus ante non erat, quàm de syllogismi speciebus cunctis dictum esset.

"Si qua pars syllogismi defuerit, enthymema dicitur."

Ut ab exemplo: "Themistocli licuit urbem relinquere; ergo mihi." Addatur propositio; "quod Themistocli licuit, licet et mihi." Ab inductione: "inventio et dispositio in argumentis versantur; ergo Logica tota." Addatur assumptio; "logica tota est eorum inventio et dispositio."

Hoc etiam perpetuò observandum est, si conclusionis prædicatum deest, deesse majorem; si subjectum, minorem: si utrumque, syllogismi compositi majorem vel potius majoris antecedentem, quæ cum tota quæstione ut cum consequente disponitur; quod indicat plenum syllogismum fore compositum, et antecedens pars enthymematis erit antecedens majoris; totumque enthymema convertetur in majorem propositionem syllogismi connexi: ut "virtus reddit beatos; vitium ergo miseros." In antecedente hujus enthymematis nec antecedens nec consequens quæstionis apparet: totum igitur converte in axioma connexum aut disjunctum, plenum syllogismum compositum esse intelliges; ut, "si virtus reddit beatos, vitium reddit miseros; at illud; hoc igitur. Non est nox; ergo est dies." Totum converte in axioma disjunctum, majorem supplebis, et syllogismum plenum disjunctum conficies: "aut dies est, aut nox; non nox, ergo dies."

"Si quid ad tres illas syllogismi partes accesserit, prosyllogismus dicitur." Est enim ad partem aliquam syllogismi addita probatio.

"Partium etiam ordo sæpe confunditur." Quod utrumque accidit in dilemmate et sorite.

Dilemma est specialis quædam crypsis non syllogismi, sed syllogismorum; à duplici propositione dictum, quam "lemma Stoici" vocant, vulgò "disjunctivus biformis et syllogismus cornutus," quasi cornibus feriens; cujus vis in duobus axiomatis connexis citra syllogismi formam satis manifesta est: ut illud Martialis;

> "Hæc, si displicui, fuerint solatia nobis;
> Hæc fuerint nobis præmia, si placui."

Et illud in evangelio: "si bene locutus sum, cur me cædis? si male, testare de malo." Et reciprocum illud insigne Protagoræ magistri ad Euathlum discipulum, apud Gellium, l. 5, c. 10, et 11: "si contra te lis data erit, merces mihi ex sententia illa debebitur, quia ego vicero; sin vero secundum te judicatum erit, merces mihi ex pacto debebitur, quia tu viceris." Cui contrà Euathlus; "et ego, bone magister, utrovis modo vicero," &c. Hujusmodi est etiam illud apud Aristot. Rhet. 3, 23, "non agendum esse cum populo; quia, si justa dixeris, hominibus invisus eris; si injusta, Deo." Immo agendum esse cum populo: "nam, si injusta dixeris, hominibus gratus eris; si justa, Deo."

Explicatur autem hæc crypsis axiomate disjuncto; tot deinde syllogismis connexis vel etiam categoricis, quot erant disjuncti axiomatis membra: ut illud Biantis consilium de uxore non ducenda: "aut formosam duces, aut deformem; si formosam, communem; si deformem, pœnam: neutrum autem bonum; non est igitur ducenda uxor." Vel categoricè sic; "communis non est ducenda; formosa erit communis; ergo, &c.: pœna non est ducenda; deformis erit pœna; ergo, &c." Sed axioma illud disjunctum partes omnes disjunctas non enumerat: est enim media quæ nec formosa nec deformis est; et neutrius connexi consequens est vera; fieri enim potest, ut nec formosa communis, nec deformis pœna sit futura.

Sorites est syllogismus crypticus multarum propositionum continua serie ita progredientium, ut prædicatum præcedentis propositionis perpetuò sit subjectum sequentis, donec tandem consequens propositionis ultima concludatur de antecedente primæ: ut, "homo est animal; animal est corpus sentiens; corpus sentiens est vivens; vivens est substantia; ergo homo est substantia." Græcè autem sorites, "acervalis Latinè à Cicerone" dicitur; quia minutatim addit, et quasi acervum efficit.

Adhibetur ferè vel ad summum genus de infima specie, vel ad causam primariam, licet remotam, effecto attribuendam; et illud quidem per genera subalterna, ut in exemplo superiore; hoc per causas medias, ut in exemplo sequente: "quos Deus prænovit, eos prædestinavit; quos prædestinavit, eos vocavit; quos vocavit, eos justificavit; quos justificavit, eos glorificavit; ergo, quos prænovit, eos glorificavit."

Utitur autem sorites et subalternis generibus et subordinatis causis quasi tot mediis terminis ad probandum conclusionem; tot nempe quot sunt termini inter subjectum primæ propositionis et prædicatum conclusionis: quot autem termini medii, tot sunt syllogismi.

Est itaque progressio enthymematica syllogismos uno pauciores continens quàm propositiones. Syllogismus principalis habet pro majore propositionem conclusioni proximam; pro minoris termino minore, subjectum conclusionis pro termino majore; subjectum propositionis majoris: ex. gr. "quos justificavit, glori-ficavit; quos prænovit, justificavit; quos ergo prænovit, glorificavit." Reliqui sunt minorum prosyllogismi, et præcedens quisque probatio sequentis.

Unde intelligitur soritæ crypsis triplex, et defectus, et redundantia, et inversio. Si igitur partium, sive species sive causæ sint, non erit recta subordinatio firmaque connexio, sorites probus non erit: ut, "ex malis moribus existunt bonæ leges; ex bonis legibus salus reip.; ex reip. salute bona omnia; ergo ex moribus malis bona omnia." Hic causæ per se male subordinantur causæ per accidens.

Fallit hic etiam: "Si nullum tempus esset, nox non esset; si nox non esset, dies esset; si dies esset, aliquod tempus esset; ergo, si nullum tempus esset, aliquod tempus esset." Nam si nullum tempus esset, certè nec dies esset: fallit ergo in propositione secunda; quæ non verè continuatur; sed ponit effectum, sublata causa. Cætera sorites vitia habet cum aliis syllogismi speciebus communia.

CAP. XVII.

De Methodo.

"Methodus est dispositio dianoëtica variorum axiomatum homogeneorum pro naturæ suæ claritate præpositorum, unde omnium inter se convenientia judicatur, memoriaque comprehenditur."

Methodi permagnus est in omni vita usus, magna proinde laus. Hanc Plato, in Philebo, esse ait "donum hominibus divinitus datum." Aristoteles etiam "ordinem in maximis bonis" numeravit. Fabius, "Nec mihi," inquit, "errare videntur, qui ipsam rerum naturam stare ordine putant: quo confuso, peritura sunt omnia."

Est autem methodus dispositio variorum axiomatum homogeneorum, i. e. eorum quæ ad eandem rem pertinent, eandemque ad finem referuntur. Homogenea nisi fuerint, subordinata sibi invicem esse non poterunt, adeoque ne ordinata quidem. Itaque arithmeticum in geometria, geometricum in arithmetica, veluti heterogenium et alienum methodus excludit. Pro naturæ autem suæ claritate axiomata quæque præponenda sunt, prout argumenta priora, notiora, illustriora complectuntur. Prima autem præcedant an orta à primis parum refert, cùm utrorumque eadem affectio sit.

"Atque ut spectatur in axiomate veritas aut falsitas, in syllogismo consequentia et inconsequentia; sic in methodo consideratur, ut per se clarius præcedat, obscurius sequatur; omninòque ordo et confusio judicatur. Sic disponetur ex homogeneis axiomatis primo loco absoluta notione primum, secundo secundum, tertio tertium, et ita deinceps."

Prius autem sicut et posterius quinque modis dicimus: tempore, ut senem juvene; natura, ut causam effecto, genus specie; quicquid denique existendi consecutione est prius; i. e. quod alio posito, ponitur; et quo posito, aliud non ponitur, ut unitas binario: nonnunquam etiam ubi consecutio reciproca est, quod simul est tempore, natura tamen est prius, ut sol suo lumine. Bifariam etiam dicitur prius natura; generante scilicet, ut partes toto, simplex composito, media fine; vel intendente, ut totum partibus, compositum simplici, finis mediis. Prius dispositione sive loco dicitur, quod initio est proprius; ut in dicendo, narratio confirmatione. Prius dignitate; ut magistratus cive, aurum argento, virtus auro. Prius denique cognitione, quod cognitu facilius est: idque vel in se, vel nobis: in se quod natura est prius; nobis, quod posterius est, et sensibus objectum: illa perfectior est cognitio, hæc imperfectior.

"Ideòque methodus ab universalibus, ut quæ causas contineant, ad singularia perpetuò progreditur." Adeoque ab antecedentibus omninò et absolutè notioribus ad consequentia ignota declarandum.

Unde intelligitur agi hic de methodo tradendi sive docendi, quæ analytica rectè dicitur, non inveniendi. Methodus n. inveniendi quæ à Platone dicitur "synthetica," procedit à singularibus quæ tempore sunt priora, sensibusque se prius offerunt; quorum inductione generales notiones colliguntur: methodus autem docendi sive inventa et judicata disponendi, de qua hic agitur; contraria via, ut etiam docet Arist. 1 Metaph. c. 1, et 2, procedit ab universalibus, quæ natura sunt priora et notiora; non quo prius aut facilius cognoscantur, sed quòd posteaquam sunt cognita, præcedunt notionis natura et claritate quanto sunt à sensibus remotiora. Sic generales rerum species (ut optici etiam docent) citius in sensus incurrunt: et advenientem aliquem, judico prius animal esse quàm hominem, et hominem quàm Socratem. Atque hanc solam methodum Aristot. passim docuit.

"Sed methodi unitatem exempli doctrinarum et artium præcipuè demonstrant, præcipuèque vindicant.

"Quibus quamvis omnes regulæ generales sint et universales, tamen earum gradus distinguuntur: quantoque unaquæque generalior erit, tanto magis præcedet.

"Generalissima loco et ordine prima erit, quia lumine et notitia prima est.

"Subalternæ consequentur, quia claritate sunt proximæ: utque ex his naturæ notiores præponentur, minus notæ substituentur.

"Tandemque specialissima constituentur.

"Definitio itaque generalissima prima erit;" causas n. continet definitioni consectaria subjungentur, sive proprietatum si quæ sunt et ex definitione per se non patent, explicationis distributio sequetur.

"Quæ si multiplex fuerit, præcedet in partes integras partitio, sequetur divisio in species. Partesque ipsæ et species eodem ordine sunt rursus tractandæ ac definiendæ, quo distributæ fuerint.

"Et transitionum vinculis si longior inter eas intersit explicatio, colligandæ sunt: id n. auditorem reficit ac recreat."

"adhuc prima artis logicæ pars fuit," &c. Imperfecta est quæ alterutrum duntaxat ostendit vel quid dictum sit, vel quid sequatur: qualis illa l. 1, c. 18, "argumenta simplicia ita fuerunt," &c.

Exemplo sit grammatica. Hujus definitio, ut quæ generalissima sit, ex lege methodi primo loco statuatur; ars scilicet bene loquendi: secundo loco erit grammaticæ partitio, in etymologiam et syntaxin; tum etymologia, quæ de vocibus agit, definiatur; dein voces partes in literis et syllabis, speciesque in vocibus numeri et sine numero subsequantur, exituumque transitiones suis locis collocentur: atque ita omnium etymologiæ partium definitiones, distributiones, colligationes, exempla denique specialissima in singulis disponentur: idemque in syntaxi fiet. Hanc viam omnes artes sibi proposuerunt.

Moderni quidem duplicem methodum instituunt "syntheticam et analyticam: illam scientiis theoreticis tradendis, physicæ puta vel mathematicæ magis accommodatam; qua partes scientiæ ita disponuntur, ut à subjecto contemplationis universali ad particularia, à simplicibus ad composita progressus fiat: sic physica exorditur à corporis naturalis definitione; ad ejus deinde causas vel partes affectionesque generales ad species denique progreditur. Methodum analyticam definiunt, qua ita disponuntur partes scientiæ practicæ ut à notione finis fiat progressus ad notitiam principiorum vel mediorum, ad illum finem assequendum: sic in ethicis à fine, scilicet beatitudine, ad media, nempe virtutes proceditur: Verùm cùm hac utraque methodus una eademque via, à definitione scilicet generalissima, sive illa subjectum sive finem generalem contineat, ad minus generalia, à notioribus ad minus nota, à simplicibus ad composita æque utrobique dividendo progrediatur, non videtur ob diversam in definitione generali, illic subjecti, hic finis mentionem, duplicem esse methodum constituendam; sed unam potius, artium quidem tradendarum, eamque analyticam esse dicendam.

"Ideoque poetæ, oratores, omnesque omninò scriptores, quoties docendum sibi auditorem proponunt, hanc viam sequi volunt, quamvis non usquequaque ingrediuntur atque insistant."

Sic Virgilius, in Georgicis, distribuit propositam materiam in quatuor partes, ut antedictum est: primoque libro res communes persequitur, ut astrologiam, meteorologiam, deque segetibus et earum cultu disserit, quæ pars operis prima erat, tumque transitio adhibetur initio secundi libri.

"Hactenus arvorum cultus," &c.

Dein scribit generaliter de arboribus, tum specialiter de vitibus. Sic toto opere, generalissimum, primo; subalterna, medio; specialissima, extremo loco ponere studuit.

Eandem Ovidius, in Fastis, dispositionis hujus gratiam sequitur. Proponit initio summam operis.

"Hæc mihi dicta semel, totis hærentia fastis, Ne seriem rerum scindere cogar, erunt."

"Oratores in prooemio; narratione, confirmatione, peroratione hunc ordinem affectant, eumque artis et naturæ et rei ordinem appellant, et interdum studiosis assectantur."

Ut in Verrem, Cicero primùm proponendo tum partiendo. "Quæstor," inquit, "Cn. Papyrio cos. fuisti abhinc annos quatuordecim, et ex illa die ad hanc diem quæ fecisti, in judicium voco," &c. Propositio hic et definitio summæ rei est, tanquam in hoc judicio generalissima. Partitio sequitur: "hi sunt anni, &c., quare hæc eadem erit quadripartita distributio totius accusationis meæ." Quas partes quatuor earumque partium particulas deinceps suo quamque ordine et loco tractat, et transitionibus copulat; tres primas tertio libro; et sic deinceps.

"Hæc igitur in variis axiomatis homogeneis suo vel syllogismi judicio notis methodus erit, quoties perspicuè res docenda erit."

At cùm delectatione motuve aliquo majore ab oratore quovis aut poeta, ut quibuscum vulgo potissimum res est, ducendus erit auditor, crypsis methodi ferè adhibebitur; homogenea quædam rejicientur, ut definitionum, partitionum, transitionumque lumina. Quædam assumentur heterogenea, velut digressiones à re, et in re commorationes. Et præcipuè rerum ordo invertetur.

Sed oratoribus et poetis sua methodi ratio relinquenda est; vel saltem iis, qui oratoriam et poeticam docent.

PRAXIS LOGICÆ

ANALYTICA EX DOUNAMO.

AD CAPUT TERTIUM RAMIÆ DIALECTICÆ.

"Exemplum primum est causæ procreantis et conservantis ex Ovidii primo de Remed.

"Ergo ubi visus eris nostra medicabilis arte,
Fac monitis fugias otia prima meis.
Hæc, ut ames, faciunt: hæc quæ fecere tuentur;
Hæc sunt jucundi causa, cibusque mali.
Otia si tollas, periere Cupidinis arcus, Contemptæque jacent & sine luce faces."

In singulis, quæ ad efficientis doctrinam illustrandam afferuntur, exemplis, tria consideranda sunt, efficiens, effectum, efficiendi modus. In hoc exemplo effectum est amor, efficiens est otium, quod amorem efficit duplici modo, tum procreando, tum conservando, ut in secundo disticho poeta docet. Dispositio autem hujus exempli (ut pleniorem ejus analysin instituam) syllogistica est. Quæstio, quam poeta concludendam proponit, hæc est; fugiendum esse otium ei, qui ab amore immunis esse velit: eaque duobus syllogismis concluditur: in priori argumentum tertium ducitur ab effectis quidem otii, amoris verò causa procreante et conservante, hoc modo: amoris procreans et conservans causa vitanda est ei, qui ab amore ipso liber esse velit; otium verò amoris procreans et conservans causa est; otium igitur fugiendum est ei, qui ab amore liber esse velit. Propositio deest. Assumptio in secundo disticho primò simpliciter proponitur, deinde altera ejus pars de conservante per similitudinem cibi illustratur. Conclusio præcedit in primo disticho. Secunda ratio est consectarium ex assumptione prioris syllogismi deductum. Otium est causa procreans et conservans amoris; ergo sublato otio, amor tollitur. Cujus propositio et fundamentum est logicum illud axioma; sublata causa, tollitur effectum, quæ propositio si addatur, plenus erit syllogismus.

Exemplum secundum ibid. ex Æneid. 4.

"Non tibi diva parens, generis nec Dardanus auctor, Caucasus, Hyrcanæque admorunt ubera tigres."
Perfide; sed duris genuit te cautibus horrens

Exemplum tertium est solitariæ causæ, cap. 4, ex Æneid. 9.

"Me, me adsum, qui feci, in me convertite ferrum:
O Rutuli: mea fraus omnis: nihil iste nec ausus
Nec potuit."——

In hoc exemplo effectum est cædes Rutulorum. Efficiens hujus cædis Nysus. Quod autem ad modum attinet efficiendi, effecit, ut ipse de se ait, solus. Dispositio autem hujus exempli syllogistica est. Qui solus auctor est cædis, is solus est occidendus. Ego verò, inquit, solus auctor cædis sum; ergo, &c. Propositio deest: assumptio continetur versu 2. Mea fraus, i. e. culpa omnis, quam probat remotione sociæ causæ, nihil iste nec ausus est, &c. Conclusio versu 1. Me, me scilicet occidite, in me convertite ferrum, &c.

Ejusdem causæ exemplum aliud, in oratione Ciceronis pro Marcello. "Nam bellicas laudes solent quidam extenuare verbis, easque detrahere ducibus et communicare cum multis, ne propriæ sint imperatorum: et certè in armis militum virtus, locorum opportunitas, sociorum auxilia, classes, commeatus multum juvant: maximam verò partem, quasi suo jure, fortunâ sibi vendicat, et quicquid est prosperè gestum, id penè omne ducit suum. At verò hujus gloriæ, Cæsar, quàm es paulò ante adeptus, socium habes neminem: totum hoc quantumcunque est, quod certè maximum est, totum inquam, est tuum. Nihil tibi ex ista laude centurio, nihil præfectus, nihil cohors, nihil turma decerpit: quin etiam illa ipsa rerum humanarum domina fortuna in istius se societatem gloriæ non offert: tibi cedit, tuam esse totam ac propriam fatetur." Hoc exemplum continet plenam comparationem à minore ad majus, ad amplificandam Cæsaris laudem clementiæ. In proto exemplum est causarum, quæ cum aliis efficiunt. Effectum est victoria; efficiens imperator, non quidem solus, sed cum aliis, quarum alia principalis est, et imperatori quasi socia fortuna: aliæ adjuvantes et ministræ, cujusmodi quinque recensentur, militum fortitudo, locorum opportunitas, sociorum auxilia, classes, commeatus. In apodosi exemplum habemus solitariæ causæ: effectum est clementia in Marcellum, præstita, cujus causa et quidem sola est ipse Cæsar; eaque illustratur remotione causarum adjuvantium. Scopus Ciceronis est, ut ostendat Cæsarem plus laudis ob clementiam mereri, quàm propter res gestas: idque ostendit ex collatis inter se efficiendi modis, quod nimirum rerum gestarum Cæsar non solus auctor fuerit, clementiæ verò præstitæ solus. Jam verò efficiens plus laudis vel vituperationis meretur, quæ sola quid facit; quæ verò cum aliis, minus. Sic igitur hæc ratio potest concludi. ' Cujus Cæsar solus auctor est, id plus meretur laudis, quam cujus solus non est auctor. Rerum in bello gestarum solus auctor non est; clementiæ verò in Marcellum præstitæ solus; proinde clementia Cæsaris plus meretur laudis, quàm res in bello gestæ. Hujus syllogismi assumptio tantum in hoc exemplo proponitur; ejusque prior pars enumeratione causarum adjuvantium, posterior remotione earundem illustratur.

Ibidem exemplum causæ instrumentalis primo de Nat. Deor. "Quibus oculis animi intueri potuit vester Plato fabricam illam tanti operis, qua construi à Deo atque ædificari nondum facit? Quæ molitio? quæ ferramenta? qui vectes? quæ machinæ? qui ministri tanti operis fuerunt?" Syllogismus sic sese habet. Qui instrumenta non habuit, is mundum non creavit: Deus instrumenta non habuit; ergo, &c. Hujus syllogismi propositio falsissima deest; conclusio præcedit; assumptio sequitur: eaque per inductionem quandam specierum illustratur. Utraque autem tum assumptio tum conclusio per interrogationem ἐμφατικωτέρον negatur.

PETRI RAMI VITA,

EX

RECISIS DIGRESSIONIBUS, DESCRIPTA.

PETRUS Ramus natus est anno millesimo quingentesimo decimo quinto. Ejus avus, ut ipse in præfatione suæ Regiæ Professionis memorat, in Eburonum gente, familia imprimis illustri fuit: sed patria à Carolo, Burgundionum duce, capta et incensa, in Veromanduorum agrum profugus, ac spoliatus, carbonarium facere coactus est: hinc Ramo "carbonarius pater" probri loco objectus: sed pater agricola fuit. Puer vix è cunis egressus, ut ipse in Sheckiano epilogo de se narrat, duplici peste laboravit. Juvenis invita modisque omnibus repugnante fortuna, Lutetiam ad capessendas artes ingenuas venit. Erat statura corporis grandi ac generosa, vultu mitissimo, moribus integerrimis, valetudine firma ac robusta, quam perpetua abstinentia continentiaque et continuo labore etiam firmiorem reddidit. Lutetiæ magisterii titulum suscepturus, problema hoc sumpsit; "quæcunque ab Aristotele dicta essent, commentitia esse." Attoniti novitate atque insolentia problematis examinatores ac magistri, per diem integrum, sed irrito conatu, magistrandum, ut vocant, oppugnarunt. Ex hoc fortuito successu, ansam deinceps scriò et liberè in Aristotelem animadvertendi et inquirendi arripuit. Logicamque imprimis, utpote instrumentum reliquarum artium expolire instituit (ut ipse pluribus persequitur in epilogo, l. 5, Scholarum Dialecticarum) sed annum agens ætatis primum et vigesimum hæc moliri incœperat. Septimo post, primam, ut putatur, Dialecticam et Aristotelicas Animadversiones ad academiam Parisiensem edidit: sequente anno Euclidem Latinè, quam et præfatione commendavit. Ex eo tempore multos adversarios contra se irritavit, et præsertim duos homines, quos Talæus in academia sua dum contentionem totam enarrat, non nominat tamen. Vix, inquit, Aristotelicæ Animadversiones lectæ erant, cùm P. Ramus repentè ad prætorii tribunalis capitalem contentionem per certos homines falso academiæ nomine rapitur, novique criminis accusatur, quòd scilicet, Aristotelem oppugnando, artes enervaret: hac enim oratione Aristotelea actio instituta est. Hinc Aristoteleorum clamoribus agitatus, ad summum Parisiensis curiæ concilium traducitur. Id cum ex adversariorum sententia non procederet, novis artibus à senatu Parisiensi ad regiam cognitionem res defertur: constituuntur judices quinque bini ab utraque parte, quintus à rege nominatur; causam de singulis animadversionum capitibus dicere jubetur Ramus: qui tametsi de quinque judicibus tres infensissimos habebat, tamen ut mandato regio obtemperaret, ad diem constitutam adfuit; scriba unus aderat; qui rationes Rami et judicum sententias exciperet. Biduo magna contentione de dialecticæ artis definitione et partitione, quæ in logici organi libris nullæ essent, concertatum est. Tres Aristotelei judices primo die, contra omnes bene descriptæ artis leges, judicarunt ad dialecticæ artis perfectionem definitione nihil opus esse. Qui duo judices à Ramo lecti erant, contrà censuerunt. Postridie tres judices Aristotelei vehementer conturbati, de partitione assentiuntur, causamque in aliam diem rejiciunt. Verùm ne non damnaretur Ramus, novum concilium initur, ut ab initio tota disputatio retexatur, judicata pridie, pro nihilo habeatur. Ab ista judicum inconstantia provocat Ramus; sed frustrà; judicium n. sine provocatione tribus illus judicibus datur; condemnantur triumvirali illa sententia non solùm Animadversiones Aristotelicæ, sed Institutiones etiam Dialecticæ: auctori interdicitur, ne in posterum vel docendo vel scribendo, ullam philosophiæ partem attingeret: ludi etiam magno apparatu celebrantur, in quibus Ramus et Ramea Dialectica ludibrio habetur. Ab his difficultatibus unus omnium Carolus Lotharingus Ramum liberavit: Henrico enim regi persuaserat, philosophiam semper liberam esse oportere. Hinc Ramus pristinæ docendi ac scribendi libertati restitutus, per annos quatuor summa in pace studiis operam dedit. Anno ætatis trigesimo primo orationem de studiis philosophiæ et eloquentiæ conjungendis habuit: cum Talæo fratre (sic eum perpetuo vocat) professionis partes ita divisit, ut Talæus matutinis horis philosophiam, ipse pomeridianis eloquentiam doceret: in poetis, oratoribus, philosophis omnisque generis authoribus explicandis, usum dialecticæ demonstravit: id Ramo postea crimini datum est, quòd in philosophico studio non philosophos, sed, contra leges academiæ, pro philosophis poetas explicaret: purgat se Ramus; petitque ut gymnasium suum Præleum per probos et doctos homines invisatur. Sed judex quidam, nobilis adolescens, datus, discipulos Rami indicta causa, condemnat; publicis et scholis et sigillis et tabulis prohibet; omnibus denique academiæ muneribus et præmiis excludit. Ab hac sententia tam nova discipuli Rami ad Julianense philosophorum comitium provocant, et absolvuntur, modò præceptor eorum jurejurando confirmet, libros, academiæ legibus definitos, à se esse prælectos. Confirma Ramus; paulò tamen pòst ab eodem judice adolescente, non discipuli, ut antea, sed magistri eorum oppugnantur: Ramo injungitur, ut in publicis scholis disciplinam suam ipse detestaretur et ejuraret. Is ad superiores academiæ ordines secundò provocat: sed cùm vitandi tumultus causa, scripto se absens, defenderet, adolescens ille judex, etsi duabus appellationibus rejectus, tertiò judicat ac damnat. Quartò provocat Ramus: cùm provocationis diem accusator antevertisset, coactus est Ramus subito in senatum venire: hic iterum Carolus Lotharingus unico præsidio fuit: accusationem cujusdam audiit gravissimam Ramum Academicum nominantis, qui de humanis divinisque legibus dubitaret, qui lubricos D. Augustini locos ad effrænatam atque impiam libertatem suis auditoribus proponeret, et quo facilius incautis animis abuteretur, omnes logicas disputationes tolleret. Contra has calumnias facile se defendit Ramus. Decretum est itaque in senatu, uti Ramus discipulique ejus in pristinum atque integrum statum restituerentur. Ipse anno ætatis trigesimo sexto cùm Blessiis Carolus Lotharingus ad Henricum regem de disciplina Ramea retulisset, in numerum atque ordinem regiorum professorum per literas regias honorificè ad se scriptas, est cooptatus. Gratias itaque et regi Henrico et Carolo Lotharingo publicè egit; sibique persuasit, se à rege in præstantissima reip. parte esse collocatum; sibique adeo dies ac noctes esse summo studio enitendum, ne tanto muneri ac professioni eloquentiæ simul et philosophiæ deesset: unde animos adolescentium tanta audiendi et proficiendi cupiditate inflammavit, ut schola regia, licet ad audiendum amplissima, plerumque tamen auditorum concursum frequentiamque capere minime potuerit. Adversariorum petulantiam summa constantia tulit atque pervicit; symbolumque ejus hoc fuit, "Labor omnia vincit." Anno 1552, cum in Cameracensi schola frequentissimis auditoribus dialecticam suam auspicaretur, inter strepitus, clamores, sibilos nihil commotus, per intervalla clamorum, incredibili constantia perexit et peroravit: qua ejus virtute consternati inimici, in posterum minus ei molestiæ exhibuerunt. In Heidelbergensi etiam academia, principis authoritate ad profitendum adductus, consimiles æmulorum clamores invicto animo pertulit Adversus doctos aliquot homines Goveanum, Gallandium, Perionium, Turnebum, Melancthonum, pari silentio est usus. Viginti annis abstemius fuit, donec sanitatis causa medici vino uti suaserunt: vini enim fastidium ceperat ex quo infans in cellam vinariam clam parentibus irrepens, se tam immodicè ingurgitavit, ut mortuo similis humi reperiretur. Pro lectulo stramentis ad senectutem usque usus est. Cœlebs tota vita permansit. Prælei gymnasii labore (qui ipsi sine ullo publico stipendio erat mandatus) contentus fuit. A discipulis suis oblata munera, quamvis debita, tamen non accepit. Anno 1556, Ciceronianum edidit de optima juventutis instituendæ ratione. Pronuntiationem Latinæ linguæ in academia Parisiensi tunc temporis inquinatissimam, corrigendi author cumprimis fuit, reclamantibus licet Sorbonistis, pravarum omnium consuetudinum propugnatoribus tam obstinatis, ut sacerdotem quendam novatæ pronuntiationis coram senatu Parisiensi insimulatum, quasi ob hæresin, ut aiebant, grammaticam, amplissimis proventibus ecclesiasticis privandum contenderent: et lite quidem superiores videbantur discessuri, nisi P. Ramus cæterique professores regii ad curiam convolantes, judicii tam alieni insolentiam dissuasissent. Verùm illius temporis tam crassa ignorantia fuit, ut libris editis, proditum sit, in ea academia doctores extitisse, qui mordicus defenderent, "ego amat" tam commodam syntaxin esse, quàm "ego amo;" ad eamque pertinaciam comprimendam, authoritate publica opus fuisse. In mathematicis quid effecerit Ramus, Scholæ Mathematicæ aliaque ejus opera testantur. Ea meditantem, belli civilis calamitas interpellavit; acceptis igitur à rege literis, ad regiam Fontisbelaquei bibliothecam profectus, mathematicas prælectiones ad initio plenius et uberius retractavit. Tum in Italiam cogitabat, quo ipsum Bononia honorificè invitarat; vel saltem in Germaniam: sed viis omnibus terror mortis intentatus, rumor etiam Prælei sui indignis modis direpti ac bibliothecæ spoliatæ, ad re-giam Vincennarum proprius urbem revocarunt. Sed et alia vis etiam gravius urgebat, ut è Vincennis per invia itinera profugiendum esset, et subinde variis in locis delitescendum: in fuga tamen et latebris otium hospitesque sui cupidissimos reperit; in eoque otio Scholas Physicas conscripsit, vel potius inchoavit. Erumpente rursus bello civili, in optimatum castra profugit: eo tumultu post sex menses sedato, reversus, nihil in bibliotheca præter inania reperit scrinia; mathematicas tantùm commentationes Resnerus (qui Parisiis permansit) direptoribus commodùm eripuit. Impendente jam tertium civili bello, impetravit à rege Carolo ad invisendas exteras academias annuam dimissionem, quasi legationem liberam. In extremis regni finibus, vix militum quorundam manus, nisi prolato in medium diplomate regio, effugisset. Ter dimissus, ter repetitus, tandem velocitate summa eo pervenit, ubi sicariis licentia nequaquam parcat. Adventus ejus in Germaniam bonorum ac doctorum omnium singulari humanitate et gratulatione exceptus est. Argentorati Joannes Sturmius, ejus academiæ author simul et rector, peramanter eum accepit deinde academia toto adjunctis etiam quibusdam ad ampliorem gratulationem comitibus et baronibus, liberalissimè tractavit: quo die, denique, nobilissimæ nuptiæ in eo loco celebrabantur, in prytaneum summus urbis magistratus, publicæ gratulationis gratia cum Sturmio eum adduxit. Bernam prætericns, tantùm vidit, nec tamen sine consulis Stegeri honorifica liberalitate, atque Halleri, Aretii, aliorumque doctissimorum hominum amica gratulatione discessit. Tiguri, Henricus Bullengerus simulatque in urbem ingressus est Ramus, gratulator primus affuit, cœnamque ei apparavit, eruditissimis convivarum, Josiæ Simleri, Rodolphi Gualteri, Lodovici Lavalteri sermonibus longè gratissimam. Postridie cùm ab eodem Bullingero in aulam publicam deduceretur, miratus quid sibi vellet in eum locum frequentissimus civium cujusque ordinis conventus, quæsivit ex eo, ecquæ illic etiam, ut Argentinæ, nobiles nuptiæ celebrarentur. Cui Bullingerus, tibi, inquit, nostra civitas nuptias illas celebrat. Præbuit ei Heidelberga amicum Ursinum, Olevitanum, hospitem etiam Immanuelem Tremellium, fautorem denique ipsum Electorem Palatinum, qui discedentem Ramum, aurea imagine sua donavit. Inde Francofurtum pergens, à primariis aliquot civibus honorificè est acceptus: deinde Noribergam ad præstantissimos opifices et mechanicos aliosque viros doctos et præsertim Joachimum Camerarium, profectus est: hic jurisconsultorum collegio mandatum à senatu est, ut P. Ramo convivium publico urbis nomine instruerent. Inde Augustam perexit ubi urbis consul primarius eum liberalissimè tractavit, adhibitis in convivium eruditis variæ doctrinæ convivis, sed imprimis Hieronimo Wolfio, et Tichone Bracheo, cum quo post prandium in suburbanum consulis deductus, varios sermones de studiis mathematicis habuit. Rumore tandem restitutæ pacis revocatus, Lausannam contendit: hic a viris doctis exoratus, logicam ἀκρόασιν dies aliquot maximo concursu exhibuit. Geneva cum doctissimis hominibus tum de cœteris liberalibus studiis, tum de logicis collocutio illi assidua fuit, maximè cum Francisco de Cretensi et Andrea Melvino, Scoto. Cum aliis multis eruditissimis viris, in Italia Commandino et Papio, in Anglia Dio et Acontio, in Germania Chytreo, aliisque permultis amicitiam per literas jaxantè coluerat. Nobiles et inclytæ civitates eum magnis et honorificis muneribus, et sexcentorum coronatorum oblato stipendio appetiverunt. Joannes electus rex Pannoni amplissimo stipendio Albæ Juliæ regendam academiam illi obtulit. Cracoviam liberalissimè, immo in Italiam mille ducatorum stipendio Bononiam invitatus, patriam tamen deserere noluit: itaque Carolus ix, petitum undique calumniis domi, invidorùmque morsibus, non solùm præsenti ope sublevavit, sed honore auxit et amplificabit, eique vacationem à laboribus concessit. Tandem, anno 1572, in illa Parisiensi Christianorum ac civium internecione, indignissime periit. Necis causam sunt qui in æmulos ejus conferant: plerique eandem quæ ceteris ea nocte trucidatis fuisse existimant. Legatum annuum mathematico professori in Parisiensi academia luculentum testamento reliquit.

THE SECOND

AGAINST AN ANONYMOUS LIBEL

ENTITLED

"THE ROYAL BLOOD CRYING TO HEAVEN FOR VENGEANCE ON THE ENGLISH PARRICIDES."

TRANSLATED FROM THE LATIN,

BY ROBERT FELLOWES, A.M. OXON.

A GRATEFUL recollection of the divine goodness, is the first of human obligations; and extraordinary favours demand more solemn and devout acknowledgments; with such acknowledgments I feel it my duty to begin this work. First, because I was born at a time, when the virtue of my fellow-citizens, far exceeding that of their progenitors in greatness of soul and vigour of enterprize, having invoked heaven to witness the justice of their cause, and been clearly governed by its directions, has succeeded in delivering the commonwealth from the most grievous tyranny, and religion from the most ignominious degradation. And next, because when there suddenly arose many who, as is usual with the vulgar, basely calumniated the most illustrious achievements, and when one eminent above the rest, inflated with literary pride, and the zealous applauses of his partizans, had in a scandalous publication, which was particularly levelled against me, nefariously undertaken to plead the cause of despotism, I who was neither deemed unequal to so renowned an adversary, nor to so great a subject, was particularly selected by the deliverers of our country, and by the general suffrage of the public, openly to vindicate the rights of the English nation, and consequently of liberty itself. Lastly, because in a matter of so much moment, and which excited such ardent expectations, I did not disappoint the hopes nor the opinions of my fellow-citizens; while men of learning and eminence abroad honoured me with unmingled approbation; while I obtained such a victory over my opponent, that notwithstanding his unparalleled assurance, he was obliged to quit the field with his courage broken and his reputation lost; and for the three years which he lived afterwards, much as he menaced and furiously as he raved, he gave me no further trouble, except that he procured the paltry aid of some despicable hirelings, and suborned some of his silly and extravagant admirers, to support him under the weight of the unexpected and recent disgrace which he had experienced. This will immediately appear. Such are the signal favours which I ascribe to the divine beneficence, and which I thought it right devoutly to commemorate, not only that I might discharge a debt of gratitude, but particularly because they seem auspicious to the success of my present undertaking. For who is there, who does not identify the honour of his country with his own? And what can conduce more to the beauty or glory of one's country, than the recovery, not only of its civil but its religious liberty? And what nation or state ever obtained both, by more successful or more valorous exertion? For fortitude is seen resplendent, not only in the field of battle and amid the clash of arms, but displays its energy under every difficulty and against every assailant. Those Greeks and Romans, who are the objects of our admiration, employed hardly any other virtue in the extirpation of tyrants, than that love of liberty which made them prompt in seizing the sword, and gave them strength to use it. With facility they accomplished the undertaking, amid the general shout of praise and joy; nor did they engage in the attempt so much, as an enterprize of perilous and doubtful issue, as in a contest the most glorious in which virtue could be signalized; which infallibly led to present recompence; which bound their brows with wreaths of laurel, and consigned their memories to immortal fame. For as yet, tyrants were not beheld with a superstitious reverence; as yet they were not regarded with tenderness and complacency, as the vicegerents or deputies of Christ, as they have suddenly professed to be; as yet the vulgar, stupified by the subtle casuistry of the priest, had not degenerated into a state of barbarism, more gross than that which disgraces the most senseless natives of Hindostan. For these make mischievous demons, whose malice they cannot resist, the objects of their religious adoration; while those elevate impotent tyrants, in order to shield them from destruction, into the rank of gods; and to their own cost, consecrate the pests of the human race. But against this dark array of long received opinions, superstitions, obloquy, and fears, which some dread even more than the enemy himself, the English had to contend; and all this, under the light of better information, and favoured by an impulse from above, they overcame with such singular enthusiasm and bravery, that, great as were the numbers engaged in the contest, the grandeur of conception, and loftiness of spirit which were universally displayed, merited for each individual more than a mediocrity of fame; and Britain, which was formerly styled the hot-bed of tyranny, will hereafter deserve to be celebrated for endless ages, as a soil most genial to the growth of liberty. During the mighty struggle, no anarchy, no licentiousness was seen; no illusions of glory, no extravagant emulation of the antients inflamed them with a thirst for ideal liberty; but the rectitude of their lives, and the sobriety of their habits, taught them the only true and safe road to real liberty; and they took up arms only to defend the sanctity of the laws, and the rights of conscience. Relying on the divine assistance, they used every honourable exertion to break the yoke of slavery; of the praise of which, though I claim no share to myself, yet I can easily repel any charge which may be adduced against me, either of want of courage, or want of zeal. For though I did not participate in the toils or dangers of the war, yet I was at the same time engaged in a service not less hazardous to myself, and more beneficial to my fellow-citizens; nor, in the adverse turns of our affairs, did I ever betray any symptoms of pusillanimity and dejection; or shew myself more afraid than became me, of malice or of death: For since from my youth I was devoted to the pursuits of literature, and my mind had always been stronger than my body, I did not court the labours of a camp, in which any common person would have been of more service than myself, but resorted to that employment in which my exertions were likely to be of most avail. Thus, with the better part of my frame, I contributed as much as possible to the good of my country, and to the success of the glorious cause in which we were engaged; and I thought, that if God willed the success of such glorious atchievements, it was equally agreeable to his will, that there should be others by whom those atchievements should be recorded with dignity and elegance; and that the truth, which had been defended by arms, should also be defended by reason; which is the best and only legitimate means of defending it. Hence, while I applaud those who were victorious in the field, I will not complain of the province which was assigned me; but rather congratulate myself upon it, and thank the author of all good for having placed me in a station, which may be an object of envy to others, rather than of regret to myself. I am far from wishing to make any vain or arrogant comparisons, or to speak ostentatiously of myself, but, in a cause so great and glorious, and particularly on an occasion when I am called by the general suffrage to defend the very defenders of that cause; I can hardly refrain from assuming a more lofty, and swelling tone, than the simplicity of an exordium may seem to justify: and much as I may be surpassed in the powers of eloquence, and copiousness of diction, by the illustrious orators of antiquity; yet the subject of which I treat, was never surpassed in any age, in dignity or in interest. It has excited such general and such ardent expectation, that I imagine myself not in the forum or on the rostra, surrounded only by the people of Athens or of Rome; but about to address in this as I did in my former defence, the whole collective body of people, cities, states, and councils of the wise and eminent, through the wide expanse of anxious and listening Europe. I seem to survey as from a towering height, the far extended tracts of sea and land, and innumerable crowds of spectators, betraying in their looks the liveliest interest, and sensations the most congenial with my own. Here I behold the stout and manly prowess of the Germans, disdaining servitude; there the generous and lively impetuosity of the French; on this side, the calm and stately valour of the Spaniard; on that, the composed and wary magnanimity of the Italian. Of all the lovers of liberty and virtue, the magnanimous and the wise, in whatever quarter they may be found, some secretly favour, others openly approve; some greet me with congratulations and applause; others, who had long been proof against conviction, at last yield themselves captive to the force of truth. Surrounded by congregated multitudes, I now imagine, that, from the columns of Hercules to the Indian ocean, I behold the nations of the earth recovering that liberty which they so long had lost; and that the people of this island are transporting to other countries a plant of more beneficial qualities, and more noble growth, than that which Triptolemus is reported to have carried from region to region; that they are disseminating the blessings of civilization and freedom among cities, kingdoms, and nations. Nor shall I approach unknown, nor perhaps unloved, if it be told that I am the same person who engaged in single combat that fierce advocate of despotism; till then reputed invincible in the opinion of many, and in his own conceit; who insolently challenged us and our armies to the combat; but whom, while I repelled his virulence, I silenced with his own weapons; and over whom, if I may trust to the opinions of impartial judges, I gained a complete and glorious victory. That this is the plain unvarnished fact appears from this; that, after the most noble queen of Sweden, than whom there neither is nor ever was a personage more attached to literature and to learned men, had invited Salmasius or Salmasia (for to which sex he belonged is a matter of uncertainty) to her court, where he was received with great distinction, my defence suddenly surprized him in the midst of his security. It was generally read, and by the queen among the rest, who, attentive to the dignity of her station, let the stranger experience no diminution of her former kindness and munificence. But, with respect to the rest, if I may assert what has been often told, and was matter of public notoriety, such a change was instantly effected in the public sentiment, that he, who but yesterday flourished in the highest degree of favour, seemed to day to wither in neglect; and soon after receiving permission to depart, he left it doubtful among many, whether he were more honoured when he came, or more disgraced when he went away; and even in other places it is clear, that it occasioned no small loss to his reputation; and all this I have mentioned, not from any futile motives of vanity or ostentation, but that I might clearly show, as I proposed in the beginning, what momentous reasons I had for commencing this work with an effusion of gratitude to the Father of the universe. Such a preface was most honourable and appropriate, in which I might prove, by an enumeration of particulars, that I had not been without my share of human misery; but that I had, at the same time, experienced singular marks of the divine regard; that in topics of the highest concern, the most connected with the exigencies of my country, and the most beneficial to civil and religious liberty; the supreme wisdom and beneficence had invigorated and enlarged my faculties, to defend the dearest interests, not merely of one people, but of the whole human race, against the enemies of human liberty; as it were in a full concourse of all the nations on the earth: And I again invoke the same Almighty Being, that I may still be able with the same integrity, the same diligence, and the same success, to defend those actions which have been so gloriously atchieved; while I vindicate the authors as well as myself, whose name has been associated with theirs, not so much for the sake of honour as disgrace, from unmerited ignominy and reproach; but if there are any, who think that it would have been better to have passed over these in silent contempt, I should agree with them, if they had been dispersed only among those who were thoroughly acquainted with our principles and our conduct; but, how were strangers to discover the false assertions of our adversaries? When proper pains have been taken to make the vindication as extensive as the calumny, I think that they will cease to think ill of us, and that he will be ashamed of the falsehoods which he has promulgated; but, if he be past the feeling of shame, we may then well leave him to contempt. I should sooner have prepared an answer to his invective, if he had not entrenched himself in unfounded rumours and frequent denunciations that Salmasius was labouring at the anvil, and fabricating new libels against us, which would soon make their appearance; by which he obtained only a short delay of vengeance and of punishment; for I thought it right to reserve my whole strength unimpaired against the more potent adversary. But the conflict between me and Salmasius is now finally terminated by his death; and I will not write against the dead; nor will I reproach him with the loss of life as he did me with the loss of sight; though there are some, who impute his death to the penetrating severity of my strictures, which he rendered only the more sharp by his endeavours to resist. When he saw the work which he had in hand proceed slowly on, the time of reply elapsed, the public curiosity subsided, his fame marred, and his reputation lost; the favour of the princes, whose cause he had so ill-defended, alienated, he was destroyed after three years of grief rather by the force of depression than disease. However this may be, if I must wage even a posthumous war with an enemy whose strength I so well know, whose most vigorous and impetuous attacks I so easily sustained, there seems no reason why I should dread the languid exertions of his dying hour.

But now, at last, let us come to this thing, whatever it may be, that provokes us to the combat; though I hear, indeed, the cry not of the royal blood, as the title pretends, but that of some skulking and drivelling miscreant. Well, I beseech, who are you? a man, or nobody at all? Certainly one of the dregs of men, for even slaves are not without a name. Shall I always have to contend with anonymous scribblers? though they would willingly indeed pass for kings' men, but I much doubt whether they can make kings believe that they are. The followers and friends of kings are not ashamed of kings. How then are these the friends of kings? They make no contributions; they more willingly receive them; they will not even lend their names to the support of the royal cause. What then? they support it by their pen; but even this service they have not sufficient liberality to render gratuitously to their kings; nor have they the courage to affix their names to their productions. But though, O anonymous Sirs! I might plead the example of your Claudius, who composed a plausible work concerning the rights of kings, but without having respect enough either for me or for the subject to put his name to the production, I should think it scandalous to undertake the discussion of so weighty a subject, while I concealed my name. What I, in a republic, openly attempt against kings, why do you in a monarchy, and under the patronage of kings, not dare to do except clandestinely and by stealth? Why do you, trembling with apprehension in the midst of security, and seeking darkness in the midst of light, depreciate the power and the majesty of sovereigns by a cowardice, which must excite both hatred and distrust? Do you suspect that you have no protection in the power of kings? But surely, thus skulking in obscurity and prowling in disguise, you seem to have come not so much as advocates to maintain the right of kings as thieves to rob the treasury. What I am, I ingenuously profess to be. The prerogative which I deny to kings, I would persist in denying in any legitimate monarchy; for no sovereign could injure me without first condemning himself by a confession of his despotism. If I inveigh against tyrants, what is this to kings? whom I am far from associating with tyrants. As much as an honest man differs from a rogue, so much I contend that a king differs from a tyrant. Whence it is clear, that a tyrant is so far from being a king, that he is always in direct opposition to a king. And he who peruses the records of history, will find that more kings have been subverted by tyrants than by their subjects. He, therefore, who would authorise the destruction of tyrants, does not authorise the destruction of kings, but of the most inveterate enemies to kings. But that right, which you concede to kings, the right of doing what they please, is not justice, but injustice, ruin and despair. By that envenomed present you yourselves destroy those, whom you extol as if they were above the reach of danger and oppression; and you quite obliterate the difference between a king and a tyrant, if you invest both with the same arbitrary power. For, if a king does not exercise that power, (and no king will exercise it as long as he is not a tyrant,) the power must be ascribed, not to the king, but to the individual. For, what can be imagined more absurd than that regal prerogative, which, if any one uses, as often as he wishes to act the king, so often he ceases to be an honest man; and as often as he chooses to be an honest man, so often he must evince that he is not a king? Can any more bitter reproach be cast upon kings? He who maintains this prerogative, must himself be a monster of injustice and iniquity; for how can there be a worse person than him, who must himself first verify the exaggerated picture of atrocity which he delineates? But if every good man, as an ancient sect of philosophers magnificently taught, is a king, it follows that every bad one is, according to his capacity, a tyrant; nor does the name of tyrant signify any thing soaring or illustrious, but the meanest reptile on the earth; for in proportion as he is great, he is contemptible and abject. Others are vicious only for themselves: but tyrants are vicious, not only for themselves, but are even involuntarily obliged to participate in the crimes of their importunate menials and favourites, and to entrust certain portions of their despotism to the vilest of their dependants. Tyrants are thus the most abject of slaves, for they are the servants of those who are themselves in servitude. This name therefore may be rightly applied to the most insignificant pugilist of tyranny, or even to this brawler; who, why he should strenuously clamour for the interests of despotism, will sufficiently appear from what has been said already, and what will be said in the sequel; as also why this hireling chooses to conceal his name. Treading in the steps of Salmasius, he has prostituted his cry for the royal blood, and either blushing for the disgrace of his erudition, or the flagitiousness of his life, it is not strange that he should wish to be concealed; or perhaps he is watching an opportunity, wherever he may scent some richer odours of emolument, to desert the cause of kings, and transfer his services to some future republic. This was the manner of Salmasius, who, captivated by the love of gain, apostatised, even when sinking in years, from the orthodox to the episcopalians, from the popular party to the royalists. Thou brawler, then, from the stews, who thou art thou in vain endeavourest to conceal; believe me, you will be dragged to light, nor will the helmet of Pluto any longer serve you for a disguise. And you will swear downright, as long as you live, either that I am not blind, or that I was quicksighted enough to detect you in the labyrinth of imposture. Attend then, while I relate who he is, from whom descended, by what expectations he was led, or by what blandishments soothed to advocate the royal cause.

There is one More, part Frenchman and part Scot, so that one country, or one people, cannot be quite overwhelmed with the whole infamy of his extraction; an unprincipled miscreant, and proved not only by the general testimony of his enemies, but even by that of his dearest friends, whom he has alienated by his insincerity, to be a monster of perfidy, falsehood, ingratitude, and malevolence, the perpetual slanderer, not only of men, but of women, whose chastity he is no more accustomed to regard than their reputation. To pass over the more obscure transactions of his youth, he first made his appearance as a teacher of the Greek language at Geneva; where he could not divest himself either of the knave or fool; but where, even while secretly conscious, though perhaps not yet publicly convicted of so many enormities, he had the audacity to solicit the office of pastor in the church, and to profane the character by his crimes. But his debaucheries, his pride, and the general profligacies of his conduct, could not long escape the censure of the Presbyters; after being condemned for many heresies, which he basely recanted, and to which he still as impiously adhered, he was at last openly found guilty of adultery. He had conceived a violent passion for the maid-servant of his host, and even after she was married to another, did not cease to solicit the gratification of his lust. The neighbours often observed them together in close converse under a shed in the garden. But you will say this might have no reference to any criminal amours; he might have conversed upon horticulture, and have read lectures on the art, to the untutored and curious girl; he might one while have praised the beauty of the parterres, or regretted the absence of shade; he might have inserted a mulberry in a fig, and thence have rapidly raised a progeny of sycamores; a cooling bower; and might then have taught the art of grafting to the fair. All this and more he might, no doubt, have done. But all this would not satisfy the Presbyters, who passed sentence on him as an adulterer, and judged him unworthy of the ecclesiastical functions. The heads of those, and other accusations of the like kind, are still preserved in the public library at Geneva. But, even after this had become matter of public notoriety, he was invited, at the instance of Salmasius, to officiate in the French church at Middleburgh. This gave great offence to Spanheim, a man of singular erudition and integrity; who was well acquainted with his character at Geneva, though at last, but not without the most violent opposition, he succeeded in obtaining letters testimonial from the Genevese, but these only on the condition that he should leave the place, and couched in expressions rather bordering on censure than on praise. As soon as he arrived in Holland, he went to pay his respects to Salmasius; where he immediately cast his libidinous looks on his wife's maid, whose name was Pontia; for the fellow's lust is always inflamed by cooks and waiting-maids; hence he began to pay assiduous court to Salmasius, and, as often as he had opportunity, to Pontia. I know not whether Salmasius, taken by the busy attentions and unintermitted adulation of More, or More thinking that it would favour his purpose of meeting Pontia, which first caused their conversation to turn on the answer of Milton to Salmasius. But, however this might be, More undertook to defend Salmasius, and Salmasius promises to obtain for More the divinity-chair in that city. Besides this, More promises himself other sweets in his clandestine amour with Pontia; for, under pretext of consulting Salmasius in the prosecution of this work, he had free admission to the house at all hours of the night or day. And, as formerly Pyramus was changed into a mulberry tree, so More* seems suddenly transformed into Pyramus; but in proportion as he was more criminal, so he was more fortunate than that youth. He had no occasion to seek for a chink in the wall; he had every facility of carrying on his intrigue with his Thisbe under the same roof. He promises her marriage; and, under the lure of this promise, violates her chastity. O shame! a minister of the gospel abuses the confidence of friendship to commit this atrocious crime. From this amour no common prodigy accrued; for both man and woman suffered the pains of parturition: Pontia conceived a morill,† which long afforded employment to the natural disquisitions of Salmasius; More, the barren and windy egg; from which issued that flatulent cry of the royal blood. The sight of this egg indeed, at first, caused our monarchy-men, who were famishing in Belgium, to lick their chops; but the shell was no sooner broken, than they loathed the addle and putrid contents; for More, not a little elated with his conception, and thinking that he had obliged the whole Orange faction, had begun to anticipate a new accession of professorships and chairs, when he deserted his poor pregnant Pontia, as beneath his notice, to indigence and misfortune. She complained to the synod and the magistrates, of the injuries and the treachery which she had experienced. Thus the matter was brought to light, and afforded subject for merriment and observation in almost all places and companies. Hence some ingenious person wrote this distich,

> Galli ex concubitu gravidam te, Pontia, Mori,
> Quis bene moratam morigeramque negat? ‡
>
> O Pontia, teeming with More's Gallic seed,
> You have been Mor'd enough, and no more need.

Pontia alone was not seen to smile; but she gained nothing by complaint; for the cry of the royal blood soon overwhelmed the clamour about the rape, and the cries of the ruined fair. Salmasius deeply resented the injury and insult which were thus offered to himself and his family; and the derision to which he was exposed by his courteous and admiring friend; and perhaps this misfortune, added to his other mishaps in the royal cause, might have contributed to accelerate his end. But on this hereafter. In the mean time, Salmasius, with the fate of Salmasia, (for the fable is as appropriate as the name,) little thinking that in More he had got an hermaphrodite associate, as incapable of parturition as of procreation, without knowing what he had begot for him in the house, fondles the fruit of his travail, the book in which he was styled Great; justly perhaps in his own opinion, but very unfitly and ridiculously in that of other people. He hastens to the printer; and, in vain endeavouring to keep possession of the fame which was vanishing from his grasp, he anxiously attends as a midwife the public delivery of those praises, or rather vile flatteries, which he had so rapaciously sought this fellow and others to bestow. For this purpose Flaccus seemed the most proper person that could be found; him he readily persuades, not only to print the book, which nobody would have blamed, but also publicly to profess himself the author of a letter to Charles, filled with the most calumnious aspersions against me, whom he had never known. But when I shew, as I can from good authority, how he has acted towards others, it will be the less astonishing why he should so readily be prevailed on to commence such a wanton and unprovoked attack upon me; and with so little consideration, to father another's extravagance of slander and invective. Flaccus, whose country is unknown, was an itinerant bookseller, a notorious prodigal and cheat; for a long time he carried on a clandestine trade in London; from which city, after practising innumerable frauds, he ran away in debt. He afterwards lived at Paris, during the whole reign of James, an object of distrust and a monster of extortion. From this place he made his escape; and now does not dare to approach within many miles; at present he makes his appearance as a regenerated bookseller at the Hague, ready to perform any nefarious and dirty work to which he may be invited. And as a proof how little he cares what he says or what he does, there is nothing so sacred which a trifling bribe would not tempt him to betray; and I shall bring forward his own confession to shew that his virulence against me was not prompted, as might be supposed, by any zeal for the public good. When he found that what I had written against Salmasius had a considerable sale, he writes to some of my friends to persuade me to let any future publication of mine issue from his press; and promises a great degree of elegance in the typographical execution. I replied, that I had, at that time, no work by me ready for the press. But lo! he, who had lately made me such an officious proffer of his services, soon appears, not only as the printer, but the (suborned) author of a most scandalous libel upon my character. My friends express their indignation; he replies with unabashed effrontery, that he is quite astonished at their simplicity and ignorance of the world, in supposing that he should suffer any notions of right or wrong to disturb his calculations of profit and his speculations of gain: that he had received that letter from Salmasius together with the book; that he begged him to publish it on his own account, in the way he had done; and that, if Milton or any other person thought fit to write an answer, he should have no hesitation in printing it, if they would employ him in the business. This was nothing else than to say that he would readily publish an invective against Salmasius, or King Charles; for the reply could relate to no other persons. It is needless to say more. I have unmasked the man; I proceed to others; for he is not the only one who has served to embellish this tragic cry of the royal blood. Here then are the actors in the drama. The brawling prolocutor, the profligate Flaccus, or, if you had rather, Salmasius, habited in the mask and cloak of Flaccus, two poetasters drunk with stale beer, and More famed for adultery and rape. A marvellous company of tragedians! and an honest set for me to engage! But as such a cause was not likely to procure adversaries of a different stamp; let us now proceed to the attack of the individuals, such as they are; only first premising that, if any one think my refutation wanting in gravity, he should recollect, that I have not to contend with a weighty foe, but only a merry-andrew host; and that in such a work, instead of labouring to give it throughout the highest polish of elegance, it was right to consider what diction might be most appropriate to such a crew.

‡ It is impossible to give a literally exact rendering of this; I have played upon the name as well as I could in English.—R. F.

The Royal Blood crying to heaven for vengeance on the English parricides.

Your narrative, O More, would have had a greater appearance of truth, if you had first shewn that his blood was not justly shed. But as in the first dawn of the reformation, the monks, from their dearth of argument, had recourse to spectres and other impositions, so you, when nothing else will stand you in any stead, call in the aid of voices which were never heard, and superstitious tricks that have long been out of date. You would not readily give any of us credit for having heard a voice from heaven; but I could with little difficulty believe that you did actually hear a voice from hell. Yet, I beseech you, who heard this cry of the royal blood? Yourself? Mere trash; for first you never hear any thing good.* But that cry which mounts to heaven, if any but God hear, it can only be the upright and the pure; who, themselves, unstained with crimes, may well denounce the divine vengeance against the guilty. But how could you possibly hear it? or, as a catamite, would you write a satire against lust? For you seem, at the same time, to have fabricated this miraculous cry to heaven and to have consummated your amour with Pontia. There are not only many impediments in your sense, but many evil incrustations about your heart, which would for ever prevent such cries from reaching your ears; and if nothing else did, the many cries which are continually ascending to heaven against your own enormities would be sufficient for the purpose. The voice of that harlot, whom you debauched in the garden, and who complains that you, her religious teacher, was the author of her seduction demands vengeance against you. Vengeance is demanded against you by the husband, whose nuptial bed you defiled; it is demanded by Pontia, to whom you perjured your nuptial vow; it is demanded by that little innocent whom you caused to be born in shame, and then left to perish without support.—All these different cries for vengeance on your guilty head are continually ascending to the throne of God; which if you do not hear, it is certain that the cry of the royal blood you could never have heard. Thus your book, instead of the royal blood crying to heaven, might more fitly be entitled "More's lascivious neighing for his Pontia." Of that tiresome and addle epistle, which follows, part is devoted to Charles, part to Milton, to exalt the one, and to vilify the other. Take a specimen from the beginning: "The dominions of Charles," he says, "were thrown into the sacrilegious hands of parricides and Deicides." I shall not stay to consider whether this rant be the product of Salmasius, of More, or of Flaccus. But this, which makes others laugh, may well make Charles rave; for a little after he says that "no one was more devoted to the interests of Charles." What truly! was there no one more devoted to his interests than you, who offered to publish and to circulate the invectives of his enemies? How wretched and forlorn must be the situation of Charles, if a scoundrel of a printer dare to rank himself among his most confidential friends? Wretched indeed must he be, if the perfidious Flaccus equal his dearest friends in fidelity and affection! But could the fellow have spoken any thing either more arrogantly of himself, or more contemptuously of the king and the king's friends? Nor is it less ridiculous that a low-lived mechanic should be brought upon the stage to philosophise on the principles of government, and the virtues of kings; and to speak in a tone as lofty as even Salmasius or More. But indeed on this as well as other occasions I have discovered evident indications that Salmasius, notwithstanding the multiplicity of his reading, was a man of puerile judgment, and without any knowledge of the world; for though he must have read that the chief magistrates, in the well-arranged government of Sparta, were always wont to ascribe to some virtuous citizen the merit of every good saying which the worthless and the profligate might occasionally pronounce, he has shewn himself so utterly ignorant of all that is called propriety, as to ascribe to the vilest of men, sentiments which could become only the good and wise. Keep up your spirits, Charles; for the old rogue Flaccus, whose faith in providence is so great, tells you not to be depressed. Do not succumb under so many sufferings. Flaccus, the most unprincipled prodigal, who so soon lost all that he ever had, tells you not to despond when all is lost. Make the best of your ill-starred fortune. And can you help making the best of it when he advises, who, for so many years, by every species of peculation and iniquity, has been wont to subsist on the fortunes of others?

* Latin, male audis. There is a play upon the words.

"Drink deep of wisdom, for you are plunged in wisdom's pool." So counsels, so directs jolly Flaccus, the unrivalled preceptor of kings, who, seizing the leathern flaggon with his ink-smeared hands, drinks among his fellow workmen a huge draught to the success of your philosophy. This dares Flaccus, your incomparable partizan, who signs his name to admonitions, which Salmasius, which More, and your other advocates, have too little courage, or too much pride, to own. For, as often as you have any need of admonition or defence, they are always anonymously wise or brave; and at another's hazard rather than their own. Let this fellow therefore, whoever he may be, cease to make a barren boast of his vigorous and animated eloquence; for the author truly "fears to divulge his name, which has become so renowned by the exertions of his genius." But he had not the courage, even in that work which was to avenge the royal blood, to prefix a dedication to Charles without the vicarious aid of Flaccus, in whose words he was contented to say that, "if it might be permitted, he would dedicate the book to his majesty without a name." Thus having done with Charles, he next puts himself in a menacing posture against me. "After this proœmium" the wonderful "Salmasius will make the trumpet blow a deadly blast." You announce a new kind of harmony; for to the terrors of that loud-sounding instrument no symphony bears so close a resemblance as that which is produced by accumulated flatulency. But I advise Salmasius not to raise the notes of this trumpet to too high a pitch; for, the louder the tones, the more he will expose himself to a slap on the chops; which, while both his cheeks ring, will give a delightful flow to his well-proportioned melodies. You chatter on, "who has not his equal, nor near his equal, in the whole literary and scientific world." What assurance! Ye men of erudition, scattered over the world, can you think it possible that a preference over you all should be given to a grammatical louse, whose only treasure of merit, and hope of fame, consisted in a glossary; and who would at last be found to deserve nothing but contempt, if a comparison were instituted between him and men really learned. But this would not be affirmed by any except the lowest driveller, more destitute of understanding than even Flaccus himself. "And who has now employed in the service of your majesty, a stupendous mass of erudition, illuminated by a genius quite divine." If you recollect what I said above, that Salmasius took this letter, which was either written by himself or one of his creatures, to the printer, and intreated the servile artificer to affix his own name to the publication, you will discover the indisputable marks of a mind truly grovelling and contemptible; basely wooing a panegyrick on itself, and sedulously procuring, even from a fool, an unbounded prodigality of praise. "An incomparable and immortal work, which it is fruitless to revile, and in which it must astonish even the regular practitioners of the law, how a Frenchman should so soon bring himself to understand and to explain the English history, the laws, statutes, records, &c." Indeed how little he understood our laws, and how much he spoke at random on the subject, we have produced abundant evidence to shew. "But he will soon, in another impression which he is preparing against the rebels, stop the mouths of revilers, and chastise Milton according to his deserts." You, therefore, as that little avant courier of a fish, run before the Salmasian whale, which threatens an attack upon our coast; we sharpen our harpoons to elicit any oil or gall which his impetuous vengeance may contain. In the mean time we admire the more than Pythagorean tenderness of this prodigy of a man, who compassionating animals, and particularly fish, to whose flesh even Lent shews no indulgence, destined so many volumes to the decent apparelling of myriads of poor sprats and herrings, and bequeathed by will a paper coat to each.

> Rejoice, ye herrings, and ye ocean fry,
> Who, in cold winter, shiver in the sea;
> The knight, Salmasius, pitying your hard lot,
> Bounteous intends your nakedness to clothe.
> And, lavish of his paper, is preparing > Chartaceous jackets to invest you all.
> Jackets resplendent with his arms and fame,
> Exultingly parade the fishy mart,
> And sing his praise with checquered livery,
> That well might serve to grace the letter'd store
> Of those, who pick their noses and ne'er read.

This I wrote on the long expected edition of his far-famed work; in printing which he was strenuously engaged, while you, sir, were polluting his house by your scandalous amour with Pontia. And Salmasius appears to have long and industriously applied himself to the execution; for, only a few days before his death, when a learned person, from whom I received the information, sent to ask him when he would publish the second part of his argument against the supremacy of the Pope; he replied, that he should not return to that work till he had completed his labours against Milton. Thus I was preferred before the Pope; and that supremacy which he denied to him in the church, he gratuitously bestowed on me in his resentment. Thus I seem to have furnished a timely succour against his subversion of the papacy; and to have saved the Roman capital from the irruption of a second Catiline, not indeed like the Consul Tully, by the fasces of office, or the premonitions of a dream, but by very different means. Surely many cardinals' caps will be due to me on this account; and I fear lest the Roman Pontiff, by the transfer of a title, which lately belonged to our kings, should salute me with the appellation of Defender of the Faith. You see under what a cloud of disgrace Salmasius laboured to depress me. But ought he to have relinquished a post of honourable exertion to mingle in foreign controversies, or to have deserted the service of the church for political and external discussions, in which he had no knowledge and no concern? Ought he to have made a truce with the Pope? and, what was most base of all, after the utmost bitterness of hostility, to have sought a reconciliation with the Bishops? Let us now come to the charges which were brought against myself. Is there any thing reprehensible in my manners or my conduct? Surely nothing. What no one, not totally divested of all generous sensibility, would have done, he reproaches me with want of beauty and loss of sight.

A monster huge and hideous, void of sight.

I certainly never supposed that I should have been obliged to enter into a competition for beauty with the Cyclops; but he immediately corrects himself, and says, "though not indeed huge, for there cannot be a more spare, shrivelled, and bloodless form." It is of no moment to say any thing of personal appearance, yet lest (as the Spanish vulgar, implicitly confiding in the relations of their priests, believe of heretics) any one, from the representations of my enemies, should be led to imagine that I have either the head of a dog, or the horn of a rhinoceros, I will say something on the subject, that I may have an opportunity of paying my grateful acknowledgements to the Deity, and of refuting the most shameless lies. I do not believe that I was ever once noted for deformity, by any one who ever saw me; but the praise of beauty I am not anxious to obtain. My stature certainly is not tall; but it rather approaches the middle than the diminutive. Yet what if it were diminutive, when so many men, illustrious both in peace and war, have been the same? And how can that be called diminutive, which is great enough for every virtuous achievement? Nor, though very thin, was I ever deficient in courage or in strength; and I was wont constantly to exercise myself in the use of the sword, as long as it comported with my habits and my years. Armed with this weapon, as I usually was, I should have thought myself quite a match for any one, though much stronger than myself; and I felt perfectly secure against the assault of any open enemy. At this moment I have the same courage, the same strength, though not the same eyes; yet so little do they betray any external appearance of injury, that they are as unclouded and bright as the eyes of those who most distinctly see. In this instance alone I am a dissembler against my will. My face, which is said to indicate a total privation of blood, is of a complexion entirely opposite to the pale and the cadaverous; so that, though I am more than forty years old, there is scarcely any one to whom I do not appear ten years younger than I am; and the smoothness of my skin is not, in the least, affected by the wrinkles of age. If there be one particle of falsehood in this relation, I should deservedly incur the ridicule of many thousands of my countrymen, and even many foreigners to whom I am personally known. But if he, in a matter so foreign to his purpose, shall be found to have asserted so many shameless and gratuitous falsehoods, you may the more readily estimate the quantity of his veracity on other topics. Thus much necessity compelled me to assert concerning my personal appearance. Respecting yours, though I have been informed that it is most insignificant and contemptible, a perfect mirror of the worthlessness of your character and the malevolence of your heart, I say nothing, and no one will be anxious that any thing should be said. I wish that I could with equal facility refute what this barbarous opponent has said of my blindness; but I cannot do it; and I must submit to the affliction. It is not so wretched to be blind, as it is not to be capable of enduring blindness. But why should I not endure a misfortune, which it behoves every one to be prepared to endure if it should happen; which may, in the common course of things, happen to any man; and which has been known to happen to the most distinguished and virtuous persons in history. Shall I mention those wise and ancient bards, whose misfortunes the gods are said to have compensated by superior endowments, and whom men so much revered, that they chose rather to impute their want of sight to the injustice of heaven than to their own want of innocence or virtue? What is reported of the Augur Tiregias is well known; of whom Apollonius sung thus in his Argonauts;

> To men he dar'd the will divine disclose,
> Nor fear'd what Jove might in his wrath impose.
> The gods assigned him age, without decay,
> But snatch'd the blessing of his sight away.

But God himself is truth; in propagating which, as men display a greater integrity and zeal, they approach nearer to the similitude of God, and possess a greater portion of his love. We cannot suppose the Deity envious of truth, or unwilling that it should be freely communicated to mankind. The loss of sight, therefore, which this inspired sage, who was so eager in promoting knowledge among men, sustained, cannot be considered as a judicial punishment. Or shall I mention those worthies who were as distinguished for wisdom in the cabinet, as for valour in the field? And first, Timoleon of Corinth, who delivered his city and all Sicily from the yoke of slavery; than whom there never lived, in any age, a more virtuous man, or a more incorrupt statesman: Next Appius Claudius, whose discreet counsels in the senate, though they could not restore sight to his own eyes, saved Italy from the formidable inroads of Pyrrhus: then Cæcilius Metellus the high priest, who lost his sight, while he saved, not only the city, but the palladium, the protection of the city, and the most sacred relics, from the destruction of the flames. On other occasions Providence has indeed given conspicuous proofs of its regard for such singular exertions of patriotism and virtue; what, therefore, happened to so great and so good a man, I can hardly place in the catalogue of misfortunes. Why should I mention others of later times, as Dandolo of Venice, the incomparable Doge; or Boemar Zisca, the bravest of generals, and the champion of the cross; or Jerome Zanchius, and some other theologians of the highest reputation? For it is evident that the Patriarch Isaac, than whom no man ever enjoyed more of the divine regard, lived blind for many years; and perhaps also his son Jacob, who was equally an object of the divine benevolence. And in short, did not our Saviour himself clearly declare that that poor man whom he restored to sight, had not been born blind, either on account of his own sins or those of his progenitors? And with respect to myself, though I have accurately examined my conduct, and scrutinized my soul, I call thee, O God, the searcher of hearts, to witness, that I am not conscious, either in the more early or in the later periods of my life, of having committed any enormity, which might deservedly have marked me out as a fit object for such a calamitous visitation. But since my enemies boast that this affliction is only a retribution for the transgressions of my pen, I again invoke the Almighty to witness, that I never, at any time, wrote any thing which I did not think agreeable to truth, to justice, and to piety. This was my persuasion then, and I feel the same persuasion now. Nor was I ever prompted to such exertions by the influence of ambition, by the lust of lucre or of praise; it was only by the conviction of duty and the feeling of patriotism, a disinterested passion for the extension of civil and religious liberty. Thus, therefore, when I was publickly solicited to write a reply to the defence of the royal cause, when I had to contend with the pressure of sickness, and with the apprehension of soon losing the sight of my remaining eye, and when my medical attendants clearly announced, that if I did engage in the work, it would be irreparably lost, their premonitions caused no hesitation and inspired no dismay. I would not have listened to the voice even of Esculapius himself from the shrine of Epidauris, in preference to the suggestions of the heavenly monitor within my breast; my resolution was unshaken, though the alternative was either the loss of my sight, or the desertion of my duty; and I called to mind those two destinies, which the oracle of Delphi announced to the son of Thetis.

> Two fates may lead me to the realms of night;
> If staying here, around Troy's wall I fight,
> To my dear home no more must I return;
> But lasting glory will adorn my urn.
> But, if I withdraw from the martial strife,
> Short is my fame, but long will be my life. Il. ix.

I considered that many had purchased a less good by a greater evil, the meed of glory by the loss of life; but that I might procure great good by little suffering; that though I am blind, I might still discharge the most honourable duties, the performance of which, as it is something more durable than glory, ought to be an object of superior admiration and esteem; I resolved, therefore, to make the short interval of sight, which was left me to enjoy, as beneficial as possible to the public interest. Thus it is clear, by what motives I was governed in the measures which I took, and the losses which I sustained. Let then the calumniators of the divine goodness cease to revile, or to make me the object of their superstitious imaginations. Let them consider, that my situation, such as it is, is neither an object of my shame or my regret, that my resolutions are too firm to be shaken, that I am not depressed by any sense of the divine displeasure; that, on the other hand, in the most momentous periods, I have had full experience of the divine favour and protection; and that, in the solace and the strength which have been infused into me from above, I have been enabled to do the will of God; that I may oftener think on what he has bestowed, than on what he has withheld; that, in short, I am unwilling to exchange my consciousness of rectitude with that of any other person; and that I feel the recollection a treasured store of tranquillity and delight. But, if the choice were necessary, I would, Sir, prefer my blindness to yours; yours is a cloud spread over the mind, which darkens both the light of reason and of conscience; mine keeps from my view only the coloured surfaces of things, while it leaves me at liberty to contemplate the beauty and stability of virtue and of truth. How many things are there besides, which I would not willingly see; how many which I must see against my will; and how few which I feel any anxiety to see! There is, as the apostle has remarked, a way to strength through weakness. Let me then be the most feeble creature alive, as long as that feebleness serves to invigorate the energies of my rational and immortal spirit; as long as in that obscurity, in which I am enveloped, the light of the divine presence more clearly shines; then, in the proportion as I am weak, I shall be invincibly strong; and in proportion as I am blind, I shall more clearly see. O! that I may thus be perfected by feebleness, and irradiated by obscurity! And indeed, in my blindness, I enjoy in no inconsiderable degree the favour of the Deity; who regards me with more tenderness and compassion in proportion as I am able to behold nothing but himself. Alas! for him who insults me, who maligns and merits public execration! For the divine law not only shields me from injury, but almost renders me too sacred to attack; not indeed so much from the privation of my sight, as from the overshadowing of those heavenly wings, which seem to have occasioned this obscurity; and which, when occasioned, he is wont to illuminate with an interior light, more precious and more pure. To this I ascribe the more tender assiduities of my friends, their soothing attentions, their kind visits, their reverential observances; among whom there are some with whom I may interchange the Pyladean and Thesian dialogue of inseparable friends.

> Orest. Proceed, and be rudder of my feet, by shewing me the most endearing love.
> Eurip. in Orest.

And in another place,

> Lend your hand to your devoted friend,
> Throw your arm round my neck, and I will conduct you on the way.

This extraordinary kindness which I experience, cannot be any fortuitous combination; and friends, such as mine, do not suppose that all the virtues of a man are contained in his eyes. Nor do the persons of principal distinction in the commonwealth suffer me to be bereaved of comfort, when they see me bereaved of sight, amid the exertions which I made, the zeal which I shewed, and the dangers which I run for the liberty which I love. But, soberly reflecting on the casualties of human life, they shew me favour and indulgence as to a soldier who has served his time; and kindly concede to me an exemption from care and toil. They do not strip me of the badges of honour which I have once worn; they do not deprive me of the places of public trust to which I have been appointed; they do not abridge my salary or emoluments; which, though I may not do so much to deserve as I did formerly, they are too considerate and too kind to take away; and in short they honour me as much, as the Athenians did those whom they determined to support at the public expence in the Prytaneum. Thus, while both God and man unite in solacing me under the weight of my affliction, let no one lament my loss of sight in so honourable a cause. And let me not indulge in unavailing grief; or want the courage either to despise the revilers of my blindness, or the forbearance easily to pardon the offence. I return to you, Sir, whoever you may be, who, with a remarkable inconsistency, seem to consider me at one time as a giant, and at another as a dwarf. You end with expressing your wish, that the United Provinces may with as much ease, and as much success, put an end to this war, as Salmasius will put an end to Milton. To which wish, if I were cheerfully to assent, I think that I should not omen ill, nor ill implore for our success, or for the English interest.

But lo! again a dissonant and hissing cry! It seems as if a flock of geese were passing through the air. I now perceive what it is; the cry has no tragic tones; the chorus makes its appearance; when lo! two poetasters, if two there be, as diverse in colour as in form. Shall I call it a Sphinx, or that poetical monster of Horace, with a woman's head and an ass's neck, covered with motley plumes, and made up of limbs taken from every species of animals? Yes, that is the very thing! It is surely some rhapsodist or other, dressed out in scraps of verses with poetic rags; though it is uncertain whether there be one or two; for there is not the mention of a name. True poets are the objects of my reverence and my love; and the constant sources of my delight. I know that the most of them, from the earliest times to those of Buchanan, have been the strenuous enemies of despotism; but these pedlars and milliners of verse, who can bear? They applaud and they revile as it may happen, as gain, or passion, or the bottle may incite, without choice, discrimination, judgment, or moderation, princes and plebeians, the literate and illiterate, honest men and knaves. They heap together such a motley, indigested, and putrid mass of adulation, that it would be better to be prosecuted with contempt, than loaded with such praise. And he, whom they revile, should think it no small honour, that he has incurred the displeasure of such absurd and foolish miscreants. I doubt whether the first, if there be two, be a poet or a mason; for he so bedaubs the face of Salmasius, that he hardly leaves the space of a hair without a coating of plaster. He represents the giant-warring hero, riding in his triumphal car, brandishing the spear, the cestus, and all the foppery of war, attended by all the learned who walk on foot, but at an awful distance behind his chariot; since he is feigned to "have been commissioned by the Deity to heal the distractions of the world, and with an impenetrable shield, to protect kings in the possession of their rights, and in the splendour of their sovereignty." Salmasius must surely have been doating in a state of second infancy, when he could be so much taken by this encomium, as to cause it immediately to be published to the world. The poet must have been a miserable drudge, and without any feeling of propriety, to lavish such a prodigality of praise on a grammarian; a race of men who have been always thought to act as a sort of subordinate and menial part to the bard. The other does not make verses, but is stark mad; himself more raving than all the enthusiasts, who are the objects of his furious invective. As if he were the hangman in the employ of Salmasius, like the son of Dama, he invokes the Horatii and Cadmus; then, intoxicated with hellebore, he disgorges a whole cistern of abuse, which an index to Plautus shows him where to pilfer from the mouths of mountebanks and slaves. You would suppose, that his language was rather Oscan than Latin; or that he was croaking like the frog of a slimy pool. Then to shew you how much he is a master of iambics, he makes two false quantities in a single word; making one syllable long, where it ought to be short, and another short, where it ought to be long.

Hi trucidato rege per horrendum nefas.

Take away, O ass! those panniers of airy nothingness; and speak, if you can, three words that have an affinity to common sense; if it be possible for the tumid pumpkin of your skull to discover for a moment any thing like the reality of intellect. In the mean time, I abandon the pedagogue to the rods of his scholars. Do you go on to revile me as worse than Cromwell, since you cannot pay me a higher compliment. But shall I call you a friend, a fool, or an insidious foe? Friend you cannot be, for your language is that of an enemy. How then could you be such an egregious fool, as, in the orgasms of your virulence, to assign me the post of pre-eminence above so great a personage? For do you not perceive, or do you think me too dull to discern, that the violence of your hostility only serves to augment the splendor of my patriotism; and that the topics of my panegyric must be as numerous as your subjects of reproach. If I am most the object of your aversion, it is because you have most felt the force of my blows; because I have been the greatest obstacle in the way of your success. This proves that I have deserved well of my country; for the testimony of an enemy, however suspicious on other occasions, may be safely trusted with respect to his own sensations of resentment. Do you not remember that the poet, in the context which ensued between Ajax and Ulysses, for the arms of Achilles, leaves the matter according to the opinion of Nestor, to the decision, not of their Grecian friends, but of their Trojan foes.

To the cool Trojans let us leave the cause.

And a little after,

What sober justice dictates they'll decree,
From love and ev'ry partial bias free;

For all the Greeks alike incur their hate,
Alike the authors of their ruin'd state.

Thus says Q. Calaber. You must therefore be insidiously studious to oppress me with the public indignation; and thus you corrupt and pervert the open and manly vigour of an enemy, by the treacherous and inveterate indignity of your disposition; and you shew yourself, not only the worst of men, but the basest of enemies. But, good Sir, I will by no means frustrate your endeavours: for, though I may wish to rival Ulysses in the merits of his patriotism, I am yet no competitor for the arms of Achilles. I am not solicitous for an Elysium painted on a shield, which others may see me brandish in the contest; but I desire to bear upon my shoulders a real not a painted weight, of which I may feel the pressure, but which may be imperceptible to others. For since I cherish no private rancour, nor hostility against any man, nor any man that I know of against me, I am well contented, for the sake of the public interest, to be so much aspersed and so much reviled. Nor, while I sustain the greatest weight of the disgrace, do I complain because I have the smallest share of the profit or the praise; for I am content to do what is virtuous, for the sake of the action itself, without any sinister expectations. Let others look to that; but do you, Sir, know, that my hands were never soiled with the guilt of peculation; and that I never was even a shilling the richer by those exertions, which you most vehemently traduce. Here More again begins, and in his second epistle assigns the reasons for his writing; to whom? Why, truly, More, the perpetrator of adultery and rape, addresses "the lover of Christianity." You promise, Sir, a most pious epistle; but now for the reasons why you wrote. "That the anxious and attentive nations of Europe, and particularly the members of the reformed religion in France, might be made acquainted with the parricide and the parricides," &c. The French, and even the protestants themselves, were up in arms against the established laws; what they would have done farther if they had met with as much success as we have, cannot be known; but certainly their kings, if we may trust the accounts of those transactions, feared as much from them as ours did from us; nor could they help doing it, when they considered the tone of their manifestos, and the violence of their threats. Let them not therefore, whatever you may pretend, boast too much for themselves, nor judge too illiberally of us. He proceeds, "Indeed I have been in such habits of intimacy with persons of the first character in England." Those who are the best in his eyes, will be found the worst in those of other people. "That I do not hesitate to assert, that I am intimately acquainted with the vices, the principles, and the lives of those monsters in the shape of men." I thought that you had had acquaintance with none but bawds and whores; but you also thoroughly know what monsters are. "My English friends readily prevailed upon me to suppress my name," and this was discreetly done; for they thus hoped to derive more advantage from the effrontery of your assertions, and less harm from the profligacy of your character. They knew you well, they remembered your honest custody of the fruit in the garden; and that, even when become a shorn and polished priest, you could not keep your hands off Pontia. And surely not without reason; for if the word carnifex be derived, a conficiendâ carne, why may not you, by doing for Pontia, from a priest become a Pontifex. Though they could not but know this, and you could not be ignorant of it, yet, with an impiety that merits execration, and an assurance that surpasses belief, you openly assert, that you were studious only to vindicate the glory of God; and, at the same time, you inveigh against the hypocrisy of others, when there never was a more notorious mercenary, or unprincipled hypocrite, than yourself. In narrating the series of transactions, you say that you have derived great assistance from other writers, and particularly from the exposure of the late disturbances in England. Surely, Sir, you must be very deficient in discretion and capacity; when after so much parade and noise, you bring forward nothing of your own, but can deduce against us only some writers among the royalists, who may justly be suspected; but without an implicit reliance in whose veracity you cannot proceed a step. If there be occasion, we will refute those writers, and set aside one confutation by another; we will not answer them by you, but you by them. What you have produced of your own, you will find it difficult to defend; which, while it indicates a mind utterly void of all religious principles, every good man will shudder while he reads. "The love of God, and a lively sense of the insult that has been offered to his holy name, compels me to lift up my suppliant hands to heaven." Hide, O hide those hands, so foully stained with lust and rapine; nor, with hands such as those, attempt to touch the throne of God, with which you have so often polluted the rites of his religion, and the altars of his worship. The divine vengeance which you so lavishly imprecate on others, you will find at last that you have been invoking on yourself. Hitherto we have had only the prelude to the cry, but (now it is going to occupy the principal and almost sole part in the drama) it swells the cheek and strains the jaws in the act of mounting to heaven; whither, if it ascend, it will resound most effectually against the brawling More. "Since the majesty of kings has in all ages been held sacred," &c. You attack me, Sir, with much common-place abuse, and many malicious observations which are quite irrelevant to the purpose; for the murder of a king, and the punishment of a tyrant, are not the same thing; but do differ, and will for ever differ, as long as sense and reason, justice and equity, the knowledge of right and wrong, shall prevail among men. But enough, and more than enough, has been said on this subject; nor shall I suffer you, who have in vain assaulted me with so many senseless imprecations, at last to bring about my end with a plethory of disgust? You then say some fine things on patience and on virtue. But,

You talk on virtue, while on vice you pore,
And preach most chaste discourses while you whore.

You say that "all the protestants, particularly those in the Low Countries and France, are struck with horror at the crime which we have committed;" and immediately after, that "good men would every where think and speak differently on the subject." That you should be at variance with yourself is a matter of little moment; but what follows is of a more shocking and atrocious cast. You say that "the wickedness of the Jews, who crucified Christ, was nothing compared with ours, whether you regard the intentions of the parties, or the effects of the crime." Maniac; do you, a minister of Jesus, think so lightly of his crucifixion, as to have the audacity to assert, that the destruction of any king, whatever might be the intentions, or the effect, is equally atrocious? The Jews had the clearest and most convincing proofs that Jesus was the Son of God; but how could we possibly be led to believe, that Charles was not a tyrant? To diminish the enormity of the guilt, you very absurdly make mention of the effect; but I always observe, that the royalists, in proportion to their bigotry, are ready to depreciate the sufferings of Christ, in order to exalt those of their king; yet as they assert, that we ought principally to obey him for Christ's sake, they shew that they cherish no sincere regard either for Christ or for the king; and that they make their irrational and superstitious devotion to kings, only a pretext to conceal their ambitious, their sinister and interested, views. "Salmasius, therefore, that great sovereign of literature, advanced to the combat!" Cease, Sir, I beseech you, to disgust us with the application of such an epithet as "great" to Salmasius; which you may repeat a thousand times, without ever persuading any one that Salmasius was great; though you may, that More was little; a worthless scribbler, who, quite ignorant of propriety, lavished the appellation of great without any fitness or discrimination. To grammarians and critics, who are principally occupied in editing the works of others, or in correcting the errors of copyists, we willingly concede the palm of industry and erudition; but we never bestow on them the sirname of great. He alone is worthy of the appellation, who either does great things, or teaches how they may be done, or describes them with a suitable majesty when they have been done; but those only are great things, which tend to render life more happy, which increase the innocent enjoyments and comforts of existence, or which pave the way to a state of future bliss more permanent and more pure. But has Salmasius done any thing like this? Nothing at all; what, that is great, has he ever either taught or related? unless perhaps you except his writings against the bishops, and the supremacy of the pope; the merit of which he entirely effaced by his subsequent recantations; by the habits of his life, and his vindications of episcopacy. He, therefore, cannot fitly be termed a great writer, who either never wrote any thing great, or who basely recanted the best work that he ever wrote. He is welcome for me, to be "the sovereign of literature," and of the A, B, C; but you are not content with having him the "sovereign of literature," but must exalt him to be "the patron of kings;" and a patron well fitted to adorn such a station of sublimity. You have certainly shewn yourself very solicitous to promote the honour of kings, when in addition to their other illustrious titles, you would subjoin that of "the clients of Claud Salmasius." On this condition, O sovereigns of the world, you may be released from every restraint upon your power; if you will but do homage to Salmasius the grammarian, and make your sceptres bend beneath his rod. "To him kings will be indebted, as long as the world lasts, for the vindication of their honour, and the existence of their power." Attend, ye sovereigns! he who composes for you his beggarly defence, and who defends what no one attacked, has the arrogance to impute to himself the continuance of your dignity and your power. Such has been the effect of provoking this insolent grammarian from his cabinet of worms and moths, to support the cause of kings. "To whom the altar will be as much indebted as the throne;" not indeed for the protection, but for the scandalous desertion of its interests. Now, you lavish your panegyric in the defence of the royal cause; "you admire the genius, the erudition, the boundless diversity of matter, the intimate acquaintance with sacred and profane usages and laws, the impetuous volubility of diction, the limpid eloquence, which characterise that golden work." Though I contend that the work is deficient in all these qualities; (for what has Salmasius to do with eloquence?) yet that it was a truly golden composition, I am willing a hundred times to acknowledge; for it cost Charles as many guineas, without mentioning the sums which the author received from the Prince of Orange. "The great man never appeared more mighty in his strength; Salmasius was never more himself." He was truly so great that he burst; for we have seen how great he was in his former work; and shall perhaps see in what he may have left behind him on the same subject. I do not deny that Salmasius, on the first appearance of his book, was the general topic of conversation, and that he was in high favour with the royalists; that he was invited by the most august queen of Sweden, and received the most munificent presents; and, in short, that in the whole dispute, every circumstance was favourable to Salmasius and hostile to me. Men in general entertained the highest opinion of his erudition, the celebrity of which, he had been accumulating for many years, by many voluminous and massy publications, not indeed of any practical utility, but relating to the most abtruse discussions, and crammed with quotations from the most illustrious authors. Nothing is so apt as this to excite the astonishment of the literary vulgar. Who I was, no one in that country had ever known; his work had excited an impatient curiosity, which was increased by the magnitude of the subject. I had no means of exciting a similar interest, or a like ardour of expectation. Many indeed endeavoured to dissuade me from engaging with such a veteran; some from envy, lest I should, at any rate, gather some glory from the conflict with so mighty an adversary; others from fear, lest my defeat should prove injurious to myself, and to the cause which I had undertaken to defend. Salmasius was invigorated and cheered by the specious plausibility of his subject, by the inveterate prejudices, or rather rooted superstitions, of the vulgar, in favour of kingly power. All these were adverse to my undertaking, and impediments to my success; and it is the less surprising, that my answer, on its first appearance, should be less eagerly read, except by those who were anxious to learn, who had the inconsiderate audacity to enter the lists with Salmasius. But the work soon excited general approbation and delight; the author was lost sight of in the blaze of truth; and Salmasius, who had so lately been towering on the pinnacle of distinction, stripped of the mask which he had worn, soon dwindled into insignificance and contempt; from which, as long as he lived, he could never afterwards emerge, or recover his former consequence. But your penetrating mind, O! Serene queen of Sweden, soon detected his imposture; and, with a magnanimity almost above human, you taught sovereigns and the world to prefer truth to the interested clamours of faction. For though the splendor of his erudition, and the celebrity which he had acquired in the defence of the royal cause, had induced you to honour him with many marks of distinction, yet, when my answer appeared, which you perused with singular equanimity, you perceived that he had been convicted of the most palpable effrontery and misrepresentation; that he had betrayed the utmost indiscretion and intemperance, that he had uttered many falsehoods, many inconsistencies and contradictions. On this account, as it is said, you had him called into your presence; but when he was unable to vindicate himself, you were so visibly offended, that from that time, you neither shewed him the same attentions, nor held his talents nor his learning in the same esteem; and, what was entirely unexpected, you manifested a disposition to favour his adversary. You denied that what I had written against tyrants, could have any reference to you; whence, in your own breast you enjoyed the sweets, and among others the fame, of a good conscience. For, since the whole tenor of your conduct sufficiently proves, that you are no tyrant, this unreserved expression of your sentiments makes it still more clear, that you are not even conscious to yourself of being one. How happy am I beyond my utmost expectations! (for to the praise of eloquence, except as far as eloquence consists in the force of truth, I lay no claim,) that, when the critical exigences of my country demanded that I should undertake the arduous and invidious task of impugning the rights of kings, I should meet with so illustrious, so truly a royal evidence to my integrity, and to this truth, that I had not written a word against kings, but only against tyrants, the spots and the pests of royalty! But you, O Augusta, possessed not only so much magnanimity, but were so irradiated by the glorious beams of wisdom and of virtue, that you not only read with patience, with incredible impartiality, with a serene complacency of countenance, what might seem to be levelled against your rights and dignity; but expressed such an opinion of the defender of those rights, as may well be considered an adjudication of the palm of victory to his opponent. You, O queen! will for ever be the object of my homage, my veneration, and my love; for it was your greatness of soul, so honourable to yourself and so auspicious to me, which served to efface the unfavourable impression against me at other courts, and to rescue me from the evil surmises of other sovereigns. What a high and favourable opinion must foreigners conceive, and your own subjects for ever entertain, of your impartiality and justice, when, in a matter which so nearly interested the fate of sovereigns and the rights of your crown, they saw you sit down to the discussion, with as much equanimity and composure, as you would to determine a dispute between two private individuals. It was not in vain that you made such large collections of books, and so many monuments of learning; not indeed, that they could contribute much to your instruction, but because they so well teach your subjects to appreciate the merits of your reign, and the rare excellence of your virtue and your wisdom. For the Divinity himself seems to have inspired you with a love of wisdom, and a thirst for improvement, beyond what any books ever could have produced. It excites our astonishment to see a force of intellect so truly divine, a particle of celestial flame so resplendently pure, in a region so remote; of which an atmosphere, so darkened with clouds, and so chilled with frosts, could not extinguish the light, nor repress the operations. The rocky and barren soil, which is often as unfavourable to the growth of genius as of plants, has not impeded the maturation of your faculties; and that country, so rich in metallic ore, which appears like a cruel step-mother to others, seems to have been a fostering parent to you; and after the most strenuous attempts to have at last produced a progeny of pure gold. I would invoke you, Christina! as the only child of the renowned and victorious Adolphus, if your merit did not as much eclipse his, as wisdom excels strength, and the arts of peace the havoc of war. Henceforth, the queen of the south will not be alone renowned in history; for there is a queen of the north, who would not only be worthy to appear in the court of the wise king of the Jews, or any king of equal wisdom; but to whose court others may from all parts repair, to behold so fair a heroine, so bright a pattern of all the royal virtues; and to the crown of whose praise this may well be added, that neither in her conduct nor her appearance, is there any of the forbidding reserve, or the ostentatious parade, of royalty. She herself seems the least conscious of her own attributes of sovereignty; and her thoughts are always fixed on something greater and more sublime than the glitter of a crown. In this respect, her example may well make innumerable kings hide their diminished heads. She may, if such is the fatality of the Swedish nation, abdicate the sovereignty, but she can never lay aside the queen; for her reign has proved, that she is fit to govern, not only Sweden, but the world.

This tribute of praise, to so highly meritorious a queen, there is, I trust, no one who will not applaud; and which if others did not pay, I could not have withheld, without the imputation of the most heinous ingratitude. For, whether it be owing to the benign aspects of the planets, or to the secret sympathies and affinities of things, I cannot too much extol my good fortune, in having found, in a region so remote, a patron so impartial and so kind, whom of all I least expected, but of all the most desired. But now we will return, from this digression, to a quite different theme. You say, that "we were thrown into the most furious commotion on hearing of the royal defence, and that we looked around for some servile pedagogue, who might employ his venal pen in the vindication of the parricides." This is the mere effusion of your spite; for you must recollect, that, when the royalists were in search of a hawker for their lies, and a retailer of their malice, they applied to the grammarian Salmasius, who if he were not a menial, could never resist a bribe; who not only readily sold them his present work, but his good intentions for the future. And you must remember, that when Salmasius was anxiously ruminating, how he might re-establish his ruined character, and obliterate his shame, he was, by a certain retributive fatality, directed to you, who were then not officiating as a minister at Geneva, from which place you had been expelled, but as a worshipper of Priapus, of whose lascivious rites you made his house the shrine. Hence, nauseating those praises, which you had bestowed with so much extravagance, and which he had purchased with so much disgrace, his friendship was converted into the most inveterate hostility, and he cursed his panegyrist even in his dying hour. "They fixed upon one John Milton, a great hero truly, to oppose Salmasius." I did not know that I was a hero, though you perchance may be the progeny of some frail heroine, for you are nothing but a compound of iniquity. When I consider the good of the commonwealth, I may indeed lament, that I alone was selected to defend the people of England, though I could not readily have endured an associate in the fame. You say, that it is a matter of uncertainty who and whence I am. The same uncertainty attached to Homer and Demosthenes. Indeed, I had been early taught to hold my tongue and to say nothing; which Salmasius never could; and I accordingly buried those things within my breast, which if I had pleased to disclose, I could then have obtained as much celebrity as I now possess. But I was not eager to hasten the tardy steps of fame; nor willing to appear in public till a proper opportunity offered. For I did not regard the fame of any thing so much, as the proper time for the execution. Hence it happened, that I had not long been known to many, before Salmasius begun to know himself. "Whether he be a man or a worm!" Truly, I would rather be a worm in the way that David expresses it, ("I am a worm and no man,") than that my bosom, like yours, should be the seat of a never-dying worm. You say, that "the fellow, having been expelled from the university of Cambridge, on account of his atrocities, had fled his country in disgrace and travelled into Italy." Hence we may discern what little reliance can be placed on the veracity of those, from whom you derived your information; for all, who know me, know, that in this place, both you and they have uttered the most abominable falsehoods; as I shall soon make more fully appear. But, when I was expelled from Cambridge, why should I rather travel into Italy, than into France or Holland? where you, though a minister of the Gospel, and yet so vile a miscreant, not only enjoy impunity, but, to the great scandal of the church, pollute the pulpit and the altar by your presence. But why, Sir, into Italy? Was it that, like another Saturn, I might find a hiding-place in Latium? No, it was because I well knew, and have since experienced, that Italy, instead of being, as you suppose, the general receptacle of vice, was the seat of civilization and the hospitable domicile of every species of erudition. "When he returned, he wrote his book on divorce." I wrote nothing more than what Bucer on the Kingdom of Christ, Fagius on Deuteronomy, and Erasmus on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, which was more particularly designed for the instruction of the English, had written before me, for the most useful purposes and with the most disinterested views. Why what was not reprehensible in them, should constitute a charge of criminality against me, I cannot understand; though I regret that I published this work in English; for then it would not have been exposed to the view of those common readers, who are wont to be as ignorant of their own blessings, as they are insensible to others' sufferings. But shall you, base miscreant, set up a cry about divorce, who, having debauched Pontia, under the most solemn assurances of marriage, afterwards divorced her in a manner the most unprincipled and inhuman? And yet this servant of Salmasius is said to have been an Englishwoman, and a staunch royalist; so that you seem to have wooed her as a piece of royalty, and to have deserted her as the image of a republic (res publica), though you were the author of her degradation to that state of publicity, and, after having allured her from the service of Salmasius, reduced her to the condition of a public prostitute. In this manner, devotedly attached as you are to royalty, you are said to have founded many republics (res publicas) in one city, or to have undertaken the management of their concerns, after they have been founded by others. Such have been your divorces, or rather diversions, after which you proceed, as a ruffian, to attack my character. You now return to the invention of fresh lies. "When the conspirators were debating on the capital punishment of the king, he wrote to them, and, while they were wavering and irresolute, brought them over to determine on his death." But I neither wrote to them, nor could I have influenced the execution; for they had previously determined on the measure, without consulting me. But I will say more on this subject hereafter, as also on the publication of the Iconoclast. The fellow, (shall I call him a man, or only the excrement of a man,) next proceeding from his adulteries with servant maids and scullions, to the adulteration of the truth, endeavoured, by artfully fabricating a series of lies, to render me infa mous abroad. I must therefore crave the indulgence of the reader, if I have said already, or shall say hereafter, more of myself than I wish to say; that, if I cannot prevent the blindness of my eyes, the oblivion or the defamation of my name, I may at least rescue my life from that species of obscurity, which is the associate of unprincipled depravity. This it will be necessary for me to do on more accounts than one; first, that so many good and learned men among the neighbouring nations, who read my works, may not be induced by this fellow's calumnies, to alter the favourable opinion which they have formed of me; but may be persuaded that I am not one who ever disgraced beauty of sentiment by deformity of conduct, or the maxims of a free-man by the actions of a slave; and that the whole tenour of my life has, by the grace of God, hitherto been unsullied by enormity or crime. Next that those illustrious worthies, who are the objects of my praise, may know that nothing could afflict me with more shame than to have any vices of mine diminish the force or lessen the value of my panegyric upon them; and lastly, that the people of England, whom fate, or duty, or their own virtues, have incited me to defend, may be convinced from the purity and integrity of my life, that my defence, if it do not redound to their honour, can never be considered as their disgrace. I will now mention who and whence I am. I was born at London, of an honest family; my father was distinguished by the undeviating integrity of his life; my mother by the esteem in which she was held, and the alms which she bestowed. My father destined me from a child to the pursuits of literature; and my appetite for knowledge was so voracious, that, from twelve years of age, I hardly ever left my studies, or went to bed before midnight. This primarily led to my loss of sight. My eyes were naturally weak, and I was subject to frequent head-achs; which, however, could not chill the ardour of my curiosity, or retard the progress of my improvement. My father had me daily instructed in the grammar school, and by other masters at home. He then, after I had acquired a proficiency in various languages, and had made a considerable progress in philosophy, sent me to the University of Cambridge. Here I passed seven years in the usual course of instruction and study, with the approbation of the good, and without any stain upon my character, till I took the degree of Master of Arts. After this I did not, as this miscreant feigns, run away into Italy, but of my own accord retired to my father's house, whither I was accompanied by the regrets of most of the fellows of the college, who shewed me no common marks of friendship and esteem. On my father's estate, where he had determined to pass the remainder of his days, I enjoyed an interval of uninterrupted leisure, which I entirely devoted to the perusal of the Greek and Latin classics; though I occasionally visited the metropolis, either for the sake of purchasing books, or of learning something new in mathematics or in music, in which I, at that time, found a source of pleasure and amusement. In this manner I spent five years till my mother's death, I then became anxious to visit foreign parts, and particularly Italy. My father gave me his permission, and I left home with one servant. On my departure the celebrated Henry Wootton, who had been King James's ambassador at Venice, gave me a signal proof of his regard, in an elegant letter which he wrote, breathing not only the warmest friendship, but containing some maxims of conduct which I found very useful in my travels. The noble Thomas Scudamore, King Charles's ambassador, to whom I carried letters of recommendation, received me most courteously at Paris. His lordship gave me a card of introduction to the learned Hugo Grotius, at that time ambassador from the queen of Sweden to the French court; whose acquaintance I anxiously desired, and to whose house I was accompanied by some of his lordship's friends. A few days after, when I set out for Italy, he gave me letters to the English merchants on my route, that they might shew me any civilities in their power. Taking ship at Nice, I arrived at Genoa, and afterwards visited Leghorn, Pisa, and Florence. In the latter city, which I have always more particularly esteemed for the elegance of its dialect, its genius, and its taste, I stopped about two months; when I contracted an intimacy with many persons of rank and learning; and was a constant attendant at their literary parties; a practice which prevails there, and tends so much to the diffusion of knowledge and the preservation of friendship. No time will ever abolish the agreeable recollections which I cherish of Jacob Gaddi, Carolo Dati, Frescobaldo, Cultellero, Bonomatthai, Clementillo, Francisco, and many others. From Florence I went to Siena, thence to Rome, where, after I had spent about two months in viewing the antiquities of that renowned city, where I experienced the most friendly attentions from Lucas Holstein, and other learned and ingenious men, I continued my route to Naples. There I was introduced by a certain recluse, with whom I had travelled from Rome, to John Baptista Manso, Marquis of Villa, a nobleman of distinguished rank and authority, to whom Torquato Tasso, the illustrious poet, inscribed his book on friendship. During my stay, he gave me singular proofs of his regard; he himself conducted me round the city and to the palace of the viceroy; and more than once paid me a visit at my lodgings. On my departure he gravely apologized for not having shewn me more civility, which he said he had been restrained from doing, because I had spoken with so little reserve on matters of religion. When I was preparing to pass over into Sicily and Greece, the melancholy intelligence which I received, of the civil commotions in England, made me alter my purpose; for I thought it base to be travelling for amusement abroad, while my fellow citizens were fighting for liberty at home. While I was on my way back to Rome, some merchants informed me that the English jesuits had formed a plot against me if I returned to Rome, because I had spoken too freely on religion; for it was a rule which I laid down to myself in those places, never to be the first to begin any conversation on religion; but if any questions were put to me concerning my faith, to declare it without any reserve or fear. I nevertheless returned to Rome. I took no steps to conceal either my person or my character; and for about the space of two months, I again openly defended, as I had done before, the reformed religion in the very metropolis of popery. By the favour of God, I got safe back to Florence, where I was received with as much affection as if I had returned to my native country. There I stopped as many months as I had done before, except that I made an excursion for a few days to Lucca; and crossing the Apennines, passed through Bologna and Ferrara to Venice. After I had spent a month in surveying the curiosities of this city, and had put on board a ship the books which I had collected in Italy, I proceeded through Verona and Milan, and along the Leman lake to Geneva. The mention of this city brings to my recollection the slandering More, and makes me again call the Deity to witness, that in all those places, in which vice meets with so little discouragement, and is practised with so little shame, I never once deviated from the paths of integrity and virtue, and perpetually reflected that, though my conduct might escape the notice of men, it could not elude the inspection of God. At Geneva I held daily conferences with John Deodati, the learned Professor of Theology. Then pursuing my former route through France, I returned to my native country, after an absence of one year and about three months; at the time when Charles, having broken the peace, was renewing what is called the episcopal war with the Scots; in which the royalists being routed in the first encounter, and the English being universally and justly disaffected, the necessity of his affairs at last obliged him to convene a parliament. As soon as I was able, I hired a spacious house in the city for myself and my books; where I again with rapture renewed my literary pursuits, and where I calmly awaited the issue of the contest, which I trusted to the wise conduct of Providence, and to the courage of the people. The vigour of the parliament had begun to humble the pride of the bishops. As long as the liberty of speech was no longer subject to controul, all mouths began to be opened against the bishops; some complained of the vices of the individuals, others of those of the order. They said that it was unjust that they alone should differ from the model of other reformed churches; that the government of the church should be according to the pattern of other churches, and particularly the word of God. This awakened all my attention and my zeal —I saw that a way was opening for the establishment of real liberty; that the foundation was laying for the deliverance of man from the yoke of slavery and superstition; that the principles of religion, which were the first objects of our care, would exert a salutary influence on the manners and constitution of the republic; and as I had from my youth studied the distinctions between religious and civil rights, I perceived that if I ever wished to be of use, I ought at least not to be wanting to my country, to the church, and to so many of my fellow Christians, in a crisis of so much danger; I therefore determined to relinquish the other pursuits in which I was engaged, and to transfer the whole force of my talents and my industry to this one important object. I accordingly wrote two books to a friend concerning the reformation of the church of England. Afterwards, when two bishops of superior distinction vindicated their privileges against some principal ministers, I thought that on those topics, to the consideration of which I was led solely by my love of truth, and my reverence for Christianity, I should not probably write worse than those, who were contending only for their own emoluments and usurpations. I therefore answered the one in two books, of which the first is inscribed, Concerning Prelatical Episcopacy, and the other Concerning the Mode of Ecclesiastical Government; and I replied to the other in some Animadversions, and soon after in an Apology. On this occasion it was supposed that I brought a timely succour to the ministers, who were hardly a match for the eloquence of their opponents; and from that time I was actively employed in refuting any answers that appeared. When the bishops could no longer resist the multitude of their assailants, I had leisure to turn my thoughts to other subjects; to the promotion of real and substantial liberty; which is rather to be sought from within than from without; and whose existence depends, not so much on the terror of the sword, as on sobriety of conduct and integrity of life. When, therefore, I perceived that there were three species of liberty which are essential to the happiness of social life; religious, domestic, and civil; and as I had already written concerning the first, and the magistrates were strenuously active in obtaining the third, I determined to turn my attention to the second, or the domestic species. As this seemed to involve three material questions, the conditions of the conjugal tie, the education of the children, and the free publication of the thoughts, I made them objects of distinct consideration. I explained my sentiments, not only concerning the solemnization of the marriage, but the dissolution, if circumstances rendered it necessary; and I drew my arguments from the divine law, which Christ did not abolish, or publish another more grievous than that of Moses. I stated my own opinions, and those of others, concerning the exclusive exception of fornication, which our illustrious Selden has since, in his Hebrew Wife, more copiously discussed: for he in vain makes a vaunt of liberty in the senate or in the forum, who languishes under the vilest servitude, to an inferior at home. On this subject, therefore, I published some books which were more particularly necessary at that time, when man and wife were often the most inveterate foes, when the man often staid to take care of his children at home, while the mother of the family was seen in the camp of the enemy, threatening death and destruction to her husband. I then discussed the principles of education in a summary manner, but sufficiently copious for those who attend seriously to the subject; than which nothing can be more necessary to principle the minds of men in virtue, the only genuine source of political and individual liberty, the only true safeguard of states, the bulwark of their prosperity and renown. Lastly, I wrote my Areopagitica, in order to deliver the press from the restraints with which it was encumbered; that the power of determining what was true and what was false, what ought to be published and what to be suppressed, might no longer be entrusted to a few illiterate and illiberal individuals, who refused their sanction to any work, which contained views or sentiments at all above the level of the vulgar superstition. On the last species of civil liberty, I said nothing; because I saw that sufficient attention was paid to it by the magistrates; nor did I write any thing on the prerogative of the crown, till the king, voted an enemy by the parliament, and vanquished in the field, was summoned before the tribunal which condemned him to lose his head. But when, at length, some presbyterian ministers, who had formerly been the most bitter enemies to Charles, became jealous of the growth of the Independents, and of their ascendancy in the parliament, most tumultuously clamoured against the sentence, and did all in their power to prevent the execution, though they were not angry, so much on account of the act itself, as because it was not the act of their party; and when they dared to affirm, that the doctrine of the protestants, and of all the reformed churches, was abhorrent to such an atrocious proceeding against kings; I thought, that it became me to oppose such a glaring falsehood; and accordingly, without any immediate or personal application to Charles, I shewed, in an abstract consideration of the question, what might lawfully be done against tyrants; and in support of what I advanced, produced the opinions of the most celebrated divines; while I vehemently inveighed against the egregious ignorance or effrontery of men, who professed better things, and from whom better things might have been expected. That book did not make its appearance till after the death of Charles; and was written rather to reconcile the minds of the people to the event, than to discuss the legitimacy of that particular sentence which concerned the magistrates, and which was already executed. Such were the fruits of my private studies, which I gratuitously presented to the church and to the state; and for which I was recompensed by nothing but impunity; though the actions themselves procured me peace of conscience, and the approbation of the good; while I exercised that freedom of discussion which I loved. Others, without labour or desert, got possession of honours and emoluments; but no one ever knew me, either soliciting any thing myself, or through the medium of my friends; ever beheld me in a supplicating posture at the doors of the senate, or the levees of the great. I usually kept myself secluded at home, where my own property, part of which had been withheld during the civil commotions, and part of which had been absorbed in the oppressive contributions which I had to sustain, afforded me a scanty subsistence. When I was released from these engagements, and thought that I was about to enjoy an interval of uninterrupted ease, I turned my thoughts to a continued history of my country, from the earliest times to the present period. I had already finished four books, when after the subversion of the monarchy, and the establishment of a republic, I was surprised by an invitation from the council of state, who desired my services in the office for foreign affairs. A book appeared soon after, which was ascribed to the king, and contained the most invidious charges against the parliament. I was ordered to answer it; and opposed the Iconoclast to his Icon. I did not insult over fallen majesty as is pretended; I only preferred Queen Truth to King Charles. The charge of insult, which I saw that the malevolent would urge, I was at some pains to remove in the beginning of the work; and as often as possible in other places. Salmasius then appeared, to whom they were not, as More says, long in looking about for an opponent, but immediately appointed me, who happened at the time to be present in the council. I have thus, Sir, given some account of myself, in order to stop your mouth, and to remove any prejudices which your falsehoods and misrepresentations might cause even good men to entertain against me. I tell thee then, thou mass of corruption, to hold thy peace; for the more you malign, the more you will compel me to confute; which will only serve to render your iniquity more glaring, and my integrity more manifest. I had reproved Salmasius, because he was a foreigner, for meddling with our affairs; but you exclaim "that the defence intimately concerns those who are not English." Why? you say, that "the English may be supposed to be governed more by the spirit of party; but that the French will naturally pay more attention to the measures than the men." To which I retort, as before, that no remote foreigner, as you are, would have interfered in the distractions of our country, if he were not influenced by the most sinister considerations. I have already proved, that Salmasius was bribed; it is evident, that you obtained the professional chair through the interest of Salmasius, and the Orange faction; and what is worse, you were debauching Pontia, at the same moment that you were defaming the parliament. But the reason which you assign, why foreigners are the best judges in this business, is quite ridiculous; for if the English are carried away by party zeal, you, who make them your only guides, must certainly be infected by their antipathies. And if the English deserve no credit in their own cause, you must deserve much less, who have no knowledge whatever of our affairs, except what you derive from them, who, according to your own confession, ought not to be believed. Here again you launch out into the praises of the great Salmasius; great he certainly was, whom you employed as a sort of pimp, to procure his servant girl. You praise him nevertheless; but he saw reason to curse you before his death; and a thousand times blamed himself for not giving more credit to the account of your atrocities, which he had received from Spanheim, a venerable divine. You are now worked into a fury, and assert, that Salmasius had long lost the use of his reason. You demand the first post in clamour and in rage, and yet assign the precedence in obloquy and abuse to Salmasius; "not because he is violent in his language, but because he is Salmasius."

O trifler! you, I suppose, learned this casuistry when you courted Pontia. Hence your clamour is taught to quibble and to whine; hence, foaming with menace, "you shall experience at last," you say, "O base brutes, what my pen can do." Shall we dread you, O libidinous adulterer, or your pen, which is an object of dread only to cooks and chambermaids? For if any one should hold up only his finger when he detects you in your criminal amours, you would think it well if you escaped without your back being broken, or your body dismembered. "I am not so foolish," you say, "as to attempt the execution of a work, that was begun by Salmasius," but such a work, if he had not been void of understanding, he would never have attempted; you therefore seem jocosely to give the preference to Salmasius over yourself in want of brains. But you say, that "it is your province to invoke the vengeance of heaven on the murderers of the king;" which may be done by persons without any great share of erudition. Cry, shout, and brawl; continue to act the hypocrite, mouth religion, and practise lust. This God of vengeance whom you implore, will, believe me, one day arise in wrath, when he will begin with exterminating you, who are the servant of the devil, and the disgrace and pest of the reformed religion. To many, who blame the bitter invectives of Salmasius, you reply, that "this was the right way to deal with parricides, and such monsters of deformity." I am obliged to you for thus teaching me in what manner yourself and your associate friends ought to be treated; and for furnishing me with so fair a pretext for severity. Now since you have no argument to produce, and the rights of kings, with whatever shew of argument, had been already defended by Salmasius, your contumely and your rage evaporate in some miserable tales, some of which you have new-modelled from Salmasius, and interpolated others from that most confutable "confutation" of some anonymous scribbler who deserted not only his country but his name; and to the principal points of which, as I have already replied in my Iconoclast and my answers to Salmasius, no further reply can be necessary. Shall I always be compelled to go the same round, and answer every tautology of slanderous abuse? I will not do it; nor will I so misemploy my labour or my time. If any one think that his prostituted cries, his venal lamentations and frivolous declamation, deserve any credit, he is welcome for me to think so; for I have nothing to fear from such precipitate credulity. But I will just touch on a few of his points of attack, which may serve as a specimen of the rest, and give some insight into the character of the man and of the work. After having babbled a good deal of his exotic ignorance about the incorporation of the House of Commons and the House of Peers in one assembly, (a measure which no one in his senses would disapprove,) he says, that "this equality, introduced into the state, would naturally lead to the introduction of the same into the church; for episcopacy still remained, and if this be not downright anabaptism, I don't know what is." Who would have expected this from a Gallic minister and divine? I should hardly think that he knew what baptism is, who did not know what anabaptism is, if this were not. But if we will call things by their proper names, equality in the state is not anabaptism, but democracy, a far more ancient thing; and equality in the church is the practice of the apostles. But "episcopacy still remained." We confess that it did; and Geneva still remained, though that city had consulted the interests of religion, in expelling both her bishop and her lawful chief; and why should we be condemned for what they are approved? But you wish, Sir, to take vengeance upon the Genevese, by whom it is uncertain whether you were dismissed with ignominy, or openly excommunicated on account of your impieties. It is clear that you, with your friend Salmasius, apostatised from this evangelical form of church-government, and took refuge among the episcopalians. "Then," you say, "the republic passed into the hands of our levelling crew, so that it is evident that the same spirit prevailed at that time, which in the eighth year had perpetrated the impious murder of the king. Therefore the same spirit, as it seems, constituted your ministers, and perpetrated the parricide." Go on, as you have begun, to eructate the rage of your apostacy. You say that "there were not more than three petitions which demanded the punishment of the king." This is notoriously false. Those who have written an account of these transactions, mention not only three petitions of the kind, but many from different counties and from the armies in the course of one month; and three were presented in one day. You know how deliberately the matter was discussed in the senate, and that the people, suspecting them of too much lenity, resorted to petitioning, in order to put an end to their delays. How many thousands were there of the same opinion, who considered it to be either officious or superfluous to instigate the determination of the senate? I was one of these, though I made no secret of my sentiments. But suppose that the high rank of the accused had awed every tongue into silence, ought the parliament to have abstained from a decision, or have awaited the assent of the people, on which depended the issue of such momentous deliberations? For the supreme council of the nation was appointed by the people to curb the despotism of the king: and if on his capture, after the savage war which he had made, they had referred the question of his punishment to the decision of the people, and if they had acquitted him, what would those, who had so courageously restored our liberties, seem to have done, but to have furnished the king with the means of effecting their own destruction? Or if, after having been invested with full power to act as they thought best on the most momentous points, they should be compelled to refer to the multitude a question which far exceeded their capacity, and which they, conscious of their ignorance, had previously referred to the determination of the senate, where could this alternation of references and appeals have stopped? Where could we have found a place of rest in this turbulent eddy? How could we have procured any stability amid so much inconstancy, any security amid so much distraction? What if they had demanded the restoration of Charles to the crown? And such was the drift of some menaces, rather than petitions, which were presented by a few seditious persons, whose hatred one while, and whose compassion another, was wont to be equally senseless and malicious. Were we to make any account of these? "Who," as you say, "in order to set on foot a conference with the king, flocked from all parts of the country to the doors of the parliament-house, where many of them were put to death by the soldiery, according to the order of the senators. Some inhabitants of Surry, either incited by the malicious suggestions of others, or by their own disorderly inclinations, paraded the city with a petition, in a state of tumult and intoxication. They proceeded in a body to assail the doors of the house; they beat off the guard, and, without the smallest provocation, killed one man who was stationed at the door. Hence they were deservedly driven by violence; and two or three of their number were slain, breathing the fumes of intemperance more than the love of liberty." You every where concede, that "the Independents were superior, not in numbers, but in discipline and in courage." Hence I contend that they well deserved the superiority which they acquired; for nothing is more agreeable to the order of nature, or more for the interest of mankind, than that the less should yield to the greater, not in numbers, but in wisdom and in virtue. Those who excel in prudence, in experience, in industry and courage, however few they may be, will in my opinion finally constitute the majority, and every where have the ascendant. You intersperse many remarks on Cromwell, which I shall examine below; the rest I have replied to in my answer to Salmasius. Nor do you omit to mention the trial of the king, though your great rhetorician had made that the theme of his miserable declamation. You say that the peers, that is, in a great measure the pageants and courtiers of the king, were averse to the trial. I have shewn in the other work the futility of this remark. "Then that the judges were erased, because they had given it as their opinion, that a king of England could not, by the law of England, be put upon his trial." I know not what they then answered; I only know what they approve and vindicate. It is no uncommon, though a disreputable thing, for judges to be swayed by fear. "An obscure and insolent scoundrel was accordingly placed at the head of the base and iniquitous commission." It is not surprising that you, who are contaminated by so many vices and crimes, who are a compound of whatever is most impure and vile, whose conscience has become a sort of fungus utterly devoid of sensibility, who are so notorious for atheism, for sacrilege and cruelty, should dare to vent your calumnies on the most worthy and illustrious names. But, though your abuse is the highest praise, yet I will never seem to abandon the excellent personage, the friend whom I most revere, to the torrent of your defamation. I will vindicate him from the unprincipled and intemperate obloquy of the fugitives and the Mores, which he would never have incurred, if he had not shewn so much zeal for the good of the commonwealth. John Bradshaw (a name, which will be repeated with applause wherever liberty is cherished or is known) was sprung from a noble family.* All his early life he sedulously employed in making himself acquainted with the laws of his country; he then practised with singular success and reputation at the bar; he shewed himself an intrepid and unwearied advocate for the liberties of the people: he took an active part in the most momentous affairs of the state, and occasionally discharged the functions of a judge with the most inviolable integrity. At last when he was intreated by the parliament to preside in the trial of the king, he did not refuse the dangerous office. To a profound knowledge of the law, he added the most comprehensive views, the most generous sentiments, manners the most obliging and the most pure. Hence he discharged that office with a propriety almost without a parallel; he inspired both respect and awe; and, though menaced by the daggers of so many assassins, he conducted himself with so much consistency and gravity, with so much presence of mind and so much dignity of demeanour, that he seems to have been purposely destined by Providence for that part which he so nobly acted on the theatre of the world. And his glory is as much exalted above that of all other tyrannicides, as it is both more humane, more just, and more strikingly grand, judicially to condemn a tyrant, than to put him to death without a trial. In other respects, there was no forbidding austerity, no moroseness in his manner; he was courteous and benign; but the great character, which he then sustained, he with perfect consistency still sustains, so that you would suppose that, not only then, but in every future period of his life, he was sitting in judgment upon the king. In the public business his activity is unwearied; and he alone is equal to a host. At home his hospitality is as splendid as his fortune will permit; in his friendships there is the most inflexible fidelity; and no one more readily discerns merit, or more liberally rewards it. Men of piety and learning, ingenious persons in all professions, those who have been distinguished by their courage or their misfortunes, are free to participate his bounty; and if they want not his bounty, they are sure to share his friendship and esteem. He never ceases to extol the merits of others, or to conceal his own; and no one was ever more ready to accept the excuses, or to pardon the hostility, of his political opponents. If he undertake to plead the cause of the oppressed, to solicit the favour or deprecate the resentment of the powerful, to reprove the public ingratitude towards any particular individual, his address and his perseverance are beyond all praise. On such occasions no one could desire a patron or a friend more able, more zealous, or more eloquent. No menace could divert him from his purpose; no intimidation on the one hand, and no promise of emolument or promotion on the other, could alter the serenity of his countenance, or shake the firmness of his soul. By these virtues, which endeared him to his friends and commanded the respect even of his enemies, he, Sir, has acquired a name, which, while you and such as you are mouldering in oblivion, will flourish in every age and in every country in the world. But I must proceed; the king was condemned to lose his head. "Against this atrocity almost all the pulpits in London thundered out their censures." We are not to be so easily scared by that thunder upon wood. We remember the fate of Salmoneus, and trust that these persons will one day see cause to repent of their fulminating temerity. These were the very persons, who so lately, and with such vehemence, fulminated their censures against pluralists and non-residents. But some of these persons having grasped three, and others four, of the livings, from which they had fulminated the episcopal clergy, they hence became non-residents themselves, guilty of the very sin against which they had inveighed, and the victims of their own fulminating rage. Nor have they any longer a spark of shame; they are now grown zealous abettors of the divine right of tythes; and truly as their thirst for tythes is so insatiable, they should be quite gorged with the commodity, and ordered to have, not only a tenth part of the fruits of the earth, but of the waves of the sea. They were the first to counsel a war of extermination against the king; but when the king was made prisoner, after having been convicted, according to their own repeated declarations, as the author of so much misery and bloodshed, they affected to compassionate his situation. Thus, in their pulpits, as in an auction room, they retail what wares and trumpery they please to the people; and what is worse, they reclaim what they have already sold. But "the Scots demanded that the king should be restored to them, and mention the promises of the parliament, when they delivered up the king to the English." But I can prove, from the confession of the Scots themselves, that no such promise was given when the king was delivered up; and it would have been disgraceful for the English to have entered into any such stipulations with the Scotch troops, who were mercenaries in their pay. Why? Because the answer of the parliament to the representations of the Scotch, which was published on the fifteenth of March, clearly denies, that any assurances whatever were given respecting the treatment of the king; for they would have disdained to have submitted to such limitations of their right. But "they demanded that the king should be restored to them." These tender-hearted persons, I suppose, were melted with compassion, and could no longer endure the regrets of royalty; though on several occasions, in which the subject had been discussed in parliament, they had unanimously agreed that the king might be deprived of his crown for three principal reasons; the despotism of his government, his alienation of the royal domains, and the desertion of his subjects. In the parliament, which was held at Perth, it was asked, Is the king, who is evidently an enemy to the saints, to be excommunicated from the society of the faithful? But before they could come to any decision on this question, Montrose advanced with his troops and dispersed the convention. The same persons, in their answer to General Cromwell, 1650, confess that he was justly punished, but that there was an informality in the proceedings, because they had no share in the commission which condemned him. This transaction, therefore, which was so atrocious, without their participation, would have been highly patriotic with it; as if the distinctions of right and wrong, of justice and injustice, depend on their arbitrary disposition, or their capricious inclinations. If the king had been restored to them, would he have experienced greater clemency and moderation? But "the Scotch Delegates had first brought this answer from the English Parliament, that they were unwilling to alter the form of the English Government; though they afterwards answered that they had changed their former determination, and would adopt such measures as the public interest seemed to require:" and this answer was discreet and wise. What do you infer from hence? "This change of sentiment," you say, "was contrary to every engagement, to every stipulation, and to common sense." To such common sense as yours it may be adverse, who do not know the difference between a gratuitous promise and a solemn and positive engagement. The English freely state to the Scots, what they were under no obligation to do, the sentiments which they then entertained respecting the future form of their government; but the safety of the state soon persuaded them to embrace a different policy, if they would not violate the solemn assurances which they had given to the people. And which, do you think, was most binding on their consciences; their gratuitous reply to the Scotch Delegates, concerning the future form of their constitution, or the necessary oath which they had taken, the solemn engagement into which they had entered with the people, to establish the liberties of their country? But that a parliament or a senate may alter their resolutions according to circumstances, as you deem whatever I assert to be mere anabaptistical extravagance, I shall endeavour to shew you from the authority of Cicero in his oration for Plancius. "We should all stand, as it were, in some circular section of the commonwealth; in which since it is liable to a rotatory motion, we should choose that position to which the public interest seems to direct us: and this immediately, for I do not think it a mark of inconstancy to accommodate our measures, as we do the course which we steer at sea, to the winds and storms of the political horizon. It is a maxim, which I have found justified by observation, by experience, and by books, by the examples of the wisest and most illustrious characters in this and in other countries, "that the same men are not always bound to defend the same opinions, but only such as the circumstances of the country, the current of popular opinion, and the preservation of peace, seem to render necessary." Such were the sentiments of Tully; though you, Sir, would rather prefer those of Hortensius; such were the sentiments of those ages in which political wisdom flourished most; and which I deem it wise in the anabaptists to adopt. I could mention many other practices which are condemned as anabaptistical by these stripling teachers, and their chief Salmasius, who must be regarded as an illiterate dunce, if we look to things rather than to words. But you say that "the high and mighty chiefs of the United States of Holland most strenuously laboured, though to no purpose, both by supplications and by the offer of a ransom, to save the sacred life of the king." Thus to wish to buy off justice was the same as not to will the safety of the king; but they soon learned that we were not all merchants, and that the parliament of England was not a venal crew. With respect to the condemnation of the king, you say that "in order that the sufferings of Charles might be more nearly assimilated to those of Christ, he was exposed to the redoubled mockery of the soldiery." The sufferings of Christ were indeed more like those of malefactors, than the sufferings of Charles were like those of Christ; though many comparisons of this kind were hawked about by those who were zealous in forging any lie, or devising any imposture that might tend to excite the popular indignation. But suppose that some of the common soldiers did behave with a little too much insolence, that consideration does not constitute the demerit of the execution. I never before heard, nor did I ever meet with any person who had heard, that "a person, who implored God to have mercy on the king as he was passing to the scaffold, was instantly put to death in the presence of the monarch." I caused inquiries on the subject to be made of the officer who had the command of the guard during the whole time of the execution, and who hardly ever lost sight of the king's person for a moment; and he positively declared that he had never heard this before, and that he knew it to be utterly destitute of foundation. Hence we may learn what credit is due to your narrative in other particulars; for you will be found not to discover much more veracity in your endeavours to procure affection and respect for Charles after his death, than in your exertions to make us objects of general and unmerited detestation. You say that "on the fatal scaffold, the king was heard twice to sigh out to the bishop of London, remember! remember!" The judges were all in anxiety to know what the words, so emphatically repeated, meant; the bishop, according to your account, was sent for, and with a menace ordered to declare to what the reiterated admonition might allude. He, at first, with a preconcerted dissimulation, pleaded his sense of delicacy, and refused to divulge the secret. When they became more impatient, he at last disclosed, as if by constraint, and under the influence of fear, what he would not for the world have had unknown. "The king," said he, "ordered me, if I could gain access to his son, to inform him that it was the last injunction of his dying father, that, if he were ever restored to his power and crown, he should pardon you, the authors of his death. This was what his majesty again and again commanded me to remember." Which shall I say? that the king discovered most piety, or the bishop most deceit? who with so little difficulty consented to disclose a secret, which on the very scaffold was so mysteriously entrusted to him, for the purpose of disclosure? But O! model of taciturnity! Charles had long since left this injunction, among others, to his son, in his "Icon Basilicon," a book which was evidently written for this express purpose, that this secret, which had been so ostentatiously enveloped in obscurity, might be divulged with the utmost dispatch, and circulated with the utmost diligence. But I clearly see that you are determined to obtrude upon the ignorant some paragon of perfection, if not quite like Charles Stuart, at least some hyperborean and fabled hero, decorated with all the shewy varnish of imposture; and that you tricked out this fiction, and embellished it with the effusions of sensibility, in order to entrap the attention of the populace. But though I do not deny but that one or two of the commissioners might perhaps have briefly interrogated the bishop on this subject, I do not find that he was either purposely called before them, or deliberately and scrupulously interrogated, as if it were a matter of their general solicitude and care. But let us grant that Charles, on the scaffold, did deliver to the bishop these dying injunctions to his son to pardon the authors of his death; what did he do more than others have done in similar situations? How few persons are there about to die upon a scaffold, and to close for ever the tragedy of life, when they must forcibly feel the vanity of every thing human, who would not do the same; who would not, when on the point of leaving the stage of life, cheerfully lay aside their animosities, their resentments, their aversions, or, at least, pretend to do it, in order to excite compassion, or to leave behind them an opinion of their innocence? That Charles acted the hypocrite on this occasion, and that he never did sincerely, and from his heart, deliver any injunction to his son to pardon the authors of his death, or that his private were at variance with his public admonitions, may be proved by arguments of no small weight. For otherwise the son, who, in other respects was sufficiently obsequious to his father, would doubtlessly have obeyed this his most momentous and dying injunction, so religiously conveyed to him by the bishop. But how did he obey it, when two of our ambassadors, the one in Holland and the other in Spain, neither of whom had any share in the destruction of the king, were put to death by his orders or his influence? And has he not indeed more than once openly declared in his public memorials, that nothing should induce him to pardon the murderers of his father? Consider, therefore, whether this narrative of yours be likely to be true, which, the more it commends the father, reviles the son. Next, digressing from your purpose, you not only make the royal blood invoke the vengeance of heaven, but the people clamour against the parliament. You forget your own enormities at home, to engage in foreign considerations, in which you have no concern. Vile wretch, would the people ever employ you to plead their cause, whose breath is steaming with the effluvia of venereal putrescence? You ascribe to the people the clamours of fugitives and profligates; and, like a juggler on a stage, you imitate the shrieks and cries of the most hideous brutes. Who denies that there may be times, in which the vicious may constitute the majority of the citizens, who would rather follow Catiline or Antony, than the more virtuous part of the senate? But are not good citizens on this account to oppose the bad with vigour and decision? Ought they not to be less deterred by the smallness of their numbers, than they are animated by the goodness of their cause? Your beautiful scrap of declamation for the people of England, that it may not perish beyond recovery, I would advise you to insert in the Annals of Volusius; we do not want the savoury effusions of such a lecherous rhetorician. Next we are called to account for our injuries to the church. "The army is a Hydra-headed monster of accumulated heresies." Those who speak the truth, acknowledge that our army excels all others, not only in courage, but in virtue and in piety. Other camps are the scenes of gambling, swearing, riot, and debauchery; in ours, the troops employ what leisure they have in searching the Scriptures and hearing the word; nor is there one, who thinks it more honourable to vanquish the enemy than to propagate the truth; and they not only carry on a military warfare against their enemies, but an evangelical one against themselves. And indeed if we consider the proper objects of war, what employment can be more becoming soldiers, who are raised to defend the laws, to be the support of our political and religious institutions? Ought they not then to be less conspicuous for ferocity than for the civil and the softer virtues, and to consider it as their true and proper destination, not merely to sow the seeds of strife, and reap the harvest of destruction, but to procure peace and security for the whole human race? If there be any, who either from the mistakes of others, or the infirmities of their own minds, deviate from these noble ends, we ought not to punish them with the sword, but rather labour to reform them by reason, by admonition, by pious supplications to God, to whom alone it belongs to dispel all the errors of the mind, and to impart to whom he will the celestial light of truth. We approve no heresies which are truly such; we do not even tolerate some; we wish them extirpated, but by those means which are best suited to the purpose; by reason and instruction, the only safe remedies for disorders of the mind; and not by the knife or the scourge, as if they were seated in the body. You say that "we have done another and equal injury to the temporal property of the church." Ask the protestants of Holland, and even of Upper Germany, whether they ever spared the possessions of the church, against whom the Austrian Prince, as often as he makes war, hardly ever seeks for any other pretext than the restitution of the ecclesiastical domains. But that property did not belong to the church so much as the ecclesiastics, who, in this sense, might most justly be denominated churchmen; indeed they might have been more fully termed wolves than any thing else; but could there be any impiety in applying to the necessary exigencies of a war which they themselves had occasioned, and which we had no other resource for carrying on, the property of these wolves, or rather the accumulated ravages of so many ages of ignorance and superstition? But it was expected that the wealth which was ravished from the bishops would be distributed among the parochial clergy. They expected, I know, and they desired, that the whole should be diffused among them; for there is no abyss so deep which it is not more easy to fill, than it is to satiate the rapacity of the clergy. In other places there may be an incompetent provision for the clergy; but ours have an abundant maintenance; they ought to be called sheep rather than shepherds; they themselves are fed more than they feed others; every thing is fat around them, so that even their heads seem to swim in fat. They are stuffed with tythes in a way disapproved by the rest of the reformed churches; and they have so little trust in God, that they choose to extort a maintenance, rather by judicial force, and magisterial authority, than to owe it to divine providence, or the gratitude and benevolence of their congregations. And, besides all this, they are so frequently entertained by their pious auditors of both sexes, that they hardly know what it is to dine or sup at home. Hence they luxuriate in superfluities, rather than languish in want; their wives and children vie with the wives and children of the rich in luxury and refinement; and to have increased this tendency to prodigality, by an addition to their revenue, would have been the same as to infuse new poison into the church; a sort of pestilential malady, the introduction of which a voice from heaven lamented under Constantine. We have next to give an account of our enormities towards God, which principally concern our trust in the divine assistance, our prayers and fasts. But, vile miscreant! I will refute you out of your own mouth; and retort upon you that text of the apostle, "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?" Before our own master let us stand or fall. I will add also that saying of the prophet, "When I afflict my soul with fasting, this is turned to my reproach." The rest of your delirious effusions on this subject, which no one will take the trouble to read twice, I should do wrong to detail. Nor are those things more to the purpose, which you brawl out concerning our successes. Beware, Sir, beware, lest, after your Pontian toils, you should swell into a polypus of corpulency; and we need be under apprehensions, lest as the great Salmasius lately did, you should chill the baths. On the nature of success I will say a few words. Success neither proves a cause to be good, nor indicates it to be bad; and we demand that our cause should not be judged by the event, but the event by the cause. You now enter on political discussions, the injuries which we have done to all kings, and to all people. What injuries? for we never intended any; the affairs of our own government alone occupied our attention, we neglected those of others; we do not envy the good that may have accrued from our example, and we can ascribe the evil only to the abuse or misapplication of our principles. But, what kings or people ever appointed you to proclaim their injuries? Indeed others have heard their orators and ambassadors in the senate, and I have often heard them in the council, not only not complaining of any grievances, but voluntarily suing for our friendship and alliance. In the name of their kings and princes, they have often congratulated us on the state of our affairs, praying for the stability of our government and the continuance of our prosperity. This was not the language of hostility or hatred, as you assert; and you must either necessarily be convicted of falsehood, at which you never stick, or kings themselves of an insincerity and dissimulation, the most humiliating and most base. But you object to our confession, that we had set a salutary example to all people, and a formidable one to all tyrants. This is surely as heinous a crime as if any one were to say,

Could any thing be uttered more pernicious? This was the language of Cromwell to the Scots after the battle of Dunbar. And worthy indeed was it of him and of that noble victory. "The infamous pages of Milton abound with the same noisome ingredients." You always associate me with some illustrious colleague; and, on this occasion, you make me his equal, if not his superior; so that I might on this account think myself most honoured by you, if any thing honourable could proceed from you. "But those pages," you say, "were burnt at Paris by the hands of the common hangman, and by the orders of the parliament." I find that this was by no means done by the senate, but by one of the city officers, of what description I know not, but at the instigation of the clergy, those indolent vermin, who saw at a distance the fate which menaced, and which, I pray, may one day overtake their gluttony and extravagance. Do you imagine that we, in our turn, could not have burnt Salmasius's defence of the king? I could myself easily have obtained this permission from the magistrates, if I had thought that it merited any thing but contempt. You, in your endeavours to extinguish one fire by another, have only erected an Herculean pile, from which I shall rise with more lustre and renown; we with more discretion, did not think it right to communicate any animating heat to the icy chilliness of the royal vindication. But I wonder that the Thoulousians should have become so degenerate, that a defence of religion and of liberty should be burnt in a city, in which, under the Counts of Raymond, religion and liberty were formerly so nobly defended. "And I wish," you say, "that the writer had been burned as well." Is this your disposition, slave? But you have taken good care that I should not indulge a similar wish towards you; for you have been long wasting in blacker flames. Your conscience is scorched by the flames of adultery and rape, and of those perjuries, by the help of which you debauched an unsuspecting girl, to whom you promised marriage, and then abandoned to despair. You are writhing under the flames of that mercenary passion, which impelled you, though covered with crimes, to lust after the functions of the priesthood, and to pollute the consecrated elements with your incestuous touch. While you are acting the hypocrite, you utter the most horrid imprecations against hypocrisy; and every sentence of condemnation only serves to condemn yourself. Such are the atrocities, such the infamy, with which you are all on fire; these are the infuriated flames, by which you are tormented night and day; and you suffer a punishment, than which even your bitterest foe could not invoke one more severe. In the mean time, not one hair of my head is singed by the conflagrations which you kindle; but those affronts are balanced by much delight, and many sweets. One tribunal perhaps, or a single Parisian executioner, under some unlucky bias, burnt my book; but nevertheless, how many good and wise men through all France read it, cherished and admired it? How many, through the spacious tracts of Germany, the domicile of freedom, and wherever any traces of freedom yet remain? Moreover Greece itself, and Athens, the eye of Greece, mingles its applause in the voice of its noble Philyras. And this I can truly say, that, as soon as my defence appeared, and had begun to excite the public curiosity, there was no public functionary of any prince or state then in the city, who did not congratulate me when we accidentally met, who did not desire my company at his house or visit me at mine. But it would be wrong not to mention you, O Adrian Paul, the honour and the ornament of Holland, who, dispatched on a splendid embassy to us, though I had never the pleasure of seeing you, sent me frequent assurances of your extraordinary predilection and regard. This it often delights me to recollect, and which could never have happened without the special appointment of the Deity, that royalty itself courteously favoured me, who had apparently written against kings; and afforded to my integrity and veracity, a testimony next to the divine. For, why should I fear to say this, when I consider how zealously and how highly all persons extol that illustrious queen? Nor do I think, that he who was the wisest of the Athenians, and with whom I by no means wish to compare myself, was more honoured by the testimony of the Pythian oracle, than I am by the approbation of such a queen. If this had happened to me, when a young man, and orators might have taken the same liberties as poets, I should not have hesitated to prefer my fate to that of some of the gods themselves; for, while they contended for the prize of beauty or harmony before a human judge, I, in the most glorious of all contests, had the palm of victory adjudged to me by the voice of an immortal. Thus honoured and caressed, no one but a common hangman would dare to treat me with disrespect; and such an one has both done it and caused it to be done. Here you take great pains, as Salmasius had done before, to prevent us from justifying our struggles for liberty by the example of the Dutch; but the same answer will serve for both. They are mistaken who think that we want any example to direct us. We often found it necessary to cherish and support, but never to rival, the Dutch in their struggles for liberty. If any extraordinary courage in the defence of liberty be requisite, we are wont, not to follow others, but to go before them and to lead the way. But you also employ the most paltry oratory, and the most flimsy arguments, to induce the French to go to war with us.

"The spirit of the French," you say, "will never deign to receive our ambassadors." It has deigned, which is much more, voluntarily to send ambassadors three or four times to us. The French, therefore, are as noble minded as usual; but you are degenerate and spurious, and your politics betray as much ignorance as falsehood. Hence you attempt to demonstrate that "the negotiation of the United States was purposely protracted, because they wished neither to treat with us, nor to go to war with us." But it certainly behoves their High Mightinesses not to suffer their counsels to be thus exposed, and, I may say, traduced by a Genevese fugitive; who, if they suffer him any longer to remain among them, will not only debauch their women but their counsels. For they profess the most unfeigned amity; and have lately renewed a peace with us, of which it is the wish of all good men that it may be perpetual. "It was pleasant," he says, "to see how those ruffian ambassadors," he means the English, "had to contend with the mockery and the menace of the English royalists, but chiefly of the Dutch." If we had not thoroughly known to whom the murder of our former ambassador, Dorislaus, and the affronts which were offered to our two other ambassadors are to be ascribed, we might well exclaim, lo! a slanderous informant, who falsely accuses the very persons by whose bounty he is fed! Will you any longer, O Batavians! cherish and support a man, who, not contented with practising the most infamous debaucheries in the church, wishes to introduce the most sanguinary butchery into the state; who not only exposes you to violate the laws of nations, but falsely imputes to you the guilt of such violations?

The last head of his accusations is, "our injuries to the reformed churches." But how our injuries towards them, rather than theirs towards us? For if you recur to examples, and turn over the annals of history from the Waldenses and the Thoulousians to the famine of Rochelle, you will find that we, of all churches, have been the last to take up arms against tyranny; but the first "to bring the tyrant to a scaffold." Truly, because we were the first who had it in our power; and I think that they hardly know what they would have done if they had experienced similar opportunities. Indeed I am of opinion, that he against whom we wage war, must necessarily, and as long as we have any use of reason, be judged an enemy; but it has always been as lawful to put an enemy to death, as to attack him with the sword. Since then a tyrant is not only our enemy, but the public enemy of mankind; he may certainly be put to death with as much justice on the scaffold, as he is opposed with arms in the field. Nor is this only my opinion, or one of recent date; for common sense has long since dictated the same to others. Hence Tully, in his oration for Rabirius, declares, "If it were criminal to put Saturninus to death, arms could not, without a crime, have been taken up against Saturninus; but if you allow the justice of taking up arms against him, you must allow the justice of putting him to death." I have said a good deal on this subject at other times and in other places, and the thing is clear enough in itself; from which you may conjecture what the French would have done if they had the power. I add, moreover, that those who oppose a tyrant in the field, do all in their power to put him to death; indeed, whatever sophistry they may use, they have already morally put him to death. But this doctrine is not to be imputed to us more than to the French, whom you wish to exempt from the imputation. For whence issued that work of "Franco Gallia," except from Gaul, or "the defence against tyranny?" A book which is commonly ascribed to Beza. Whence others, which Thaunus mentions? But, as if I were the only author of the doctrine, you say, "Milton makes a pother about that, whose raving spirit I would have chastised as it deserves." You would have chastised, miscreant? You, whose atrocious proceedings, if the church of Middleburgh, which was disgraced by your impieties, had punished as they deserved, it would long since have committed you to the keeping of the devil; and if the civil power had rewarded you according to your desert, you would long ago have expiated your adulteries on a gibbet. And the hour of expiation seems on the point of arriving; for, as I hear, the church of Middleburgh, awakening to a right sense of your enormities and of its own disgrace, has expelled such a priest of lechery from her communion, and devoted you to perdition. Hence, the magistrates of Amsterdam have excluded you from the pulpit, that pious ears may no longer be scandalized, by hearing the sounds of your profligate effrontery in the bosom of the sanctuary. Your Greek professorship is now all that is left you; and this you will soon lose, except one single letter, of which you will not be the professor, but the pupil, pensile from the top [5]. Nor do I omen this in rage; I express only the truth; for I am so far from being offended with such revilers as you, that I would always wish for such persons to revile me; and I esteem it a mark of the divine benevolence, that those, who have most bitterly inveighed against me, have usually been persons whose abuse is praise, and whose praise is infamy. But what served to restrain the irruption of such impotence of rage? "Unless," you say, "I have been fearful of encroaching on the province of the great Salmasius, to whom I relinquish the undivided praise of victory over his great antagonist." Since indeed you now profess to consider me great, as well as him, you will find the difficulties of your undertaking increased, particularly since his death; though I feel very little solicitude about the victory, as long as truth prevails. In the mean time you exclaim, that "we are converting parricide into an article of faith, to which they secretly desire, though they do not openly dare to ascribe, the unanimous consent of the reformed churches; and Milton says, that it was the doctrine of the greatest theologians, who were the principal authors of the reformation." It was, I say; as I have more fully shewn in the tenure of kings and magistrates, and in other places. But now we are become scrupulous about doing what has been so often done. In that work, I have cited passages from Luther, Zuin-glius, Calvin, Bucer, Martyr, Paræus, and lastly, from that Knox, who you say alone countenances the doctrine which all the reformed churches at that time, and particularly those of France, condemned. And he himself affirms, as I have there explained, that he derived the doctrine from Calvin and other eminent theologians of that time, with whom he was in habits of familiarity and friendship. And in the same work you will find the same opinions supported by the authorities of some of our more pure and disinterested divines, during the reigns of Mary and Elizabeth. You conclude your work with a prolix effusion of your devotional abominations to the Deity. You dare to lift up your adulterous eyes and your obdurate heart to heaven! I will throw no impediments in your way, but leave you to yourself; for your impiety is great beyond the possibility of increase. I now return, as I promised, to produce the principal accusations against Cromwell, that I may show what little consideration particulars deserve, when the whole taken together is so frivolous and absurd. "He declared in the presence of many witnesses, that it was his intention to subvert every monarchy, and exterminate every king." We have often seen before what credit is due to your assertions; perhaps one of the emigrants ascribed this saying to Cromwell. Of the many witnesses, you do not mention the name of a single one; but aspersions, so destitute of proof, must be destitute of permanence. Cromwell was never found to be boastful of his actual exploits: and much less is he wont to employ any ostentatiousness of promise or arrogance of menace respecting atchievements which were never performed, and the performance of which would be so difficult. Those, therefore, who furnished you with this piece of information, must have been liars rather from a spontaneous impulse or a constitutional propensity, than from deliberate intention, or they would never have invented a saying so contrary to his character and disposition. But the kings, whose trembling apprehensions and vigilant precautions you labour to excite, instead of accommodating their policy to the opinions which may be casually uttered in the street, had better enter on the consideration of the subject in a manner more suitable to its dignity, and more likely to throw light upon their interests. Another accusation is, that Cromwell had persuaded "the king secretly to withdraw himself into the Isle of Wight." It is well known that the affairs of Charles were often rendered desperate in other ways, and thrice by flight; first, when he fled from London to York, next, when he took refuge among the Scotch in the pay of England, and lastly, when he retired to the Isle of Wight. But "Cromwell persuaded this last measure." This is to be sure beyond all possibility of doubt; but I wonder that the royalists should lavish such an abundance of praise respecting the prudence of Charles, who seems scarce ever to have had a will of his own. For whether he was among his friends or his enemies, in the court or in the camp, he was generally the mere puppet of others; at one time of his wife, at another of his bishops, now of his nobles, then of his troops, and last of all, of the enemy. And he seems, for the most part, to have followed the worst counsels, and those too of the worst advisers. Charles is the victim of persuasion, Charles the dupe of imposition, Charles the pageant of delusion; he is intimidated by fear or dazzled by hope; and carried about here and there, the common prey of every faction, whether they be friends or foes. Let them either erase these facts from their writings, or cease to extol the sagacity of Charles. Though therefore a superior degree of penetration is an honourable distinction, yet when a country is torn with factions, it is not without its inconveniencies; and the most discreet and cautious are most exposed to the calumnies of opposite factions. This often proved an obstacle in the way of Cromwell. Hence the presbyterians, and hence the enemy, impute every harsh treatment which they experience, not to the parliament but to Cromwell alone. They do not even hesitate to ascribe their own indiscretions and miscarriages to the fraud and treachery of Cromwell; against him every invective is levelled, and every censure passed. Indeed the flight of Charles to the Isle of Wight, which took place while Cromwell was at a distance, and was so sudden and unexpected, that he acquainted by letter every member then in the metropolis with the extraordinary occurrence. But this was the state of the case. The king, alarmed by the clamours of the whole army, which, neither softened by his intreaties nor his promises, had begun to demand his punishment, he determined to make his escape in the night with two trusty followers. But more determined to fly, than rightly knowing where to fly, he was induced, either by the ignorance or the cowardice of his attendants, to surrender himself to Hammond, governor of the Isle of Wight, whence he thought that he might easily be conveyed by ship into France or Holland. This is what I have learned concerning the king's flight to the Isle of Wight, from those who possessed the readiest means of obtaining information. This is also one of the criminal charges; that "the English under Cromwell procured a great victory over the Scots." Not "procured," Sir, but, without any solecism, gloriously atchieved. But consider how sanguinary that battle must have been, the mere idea of which excited such trembling apprehensions, that you could not mention it without striking your head against Priscian's pate. But let us see what was the great crime in Cromwell in having gained such a complete victory over the Scots, who were menacing England with invasion, with the loss of her independence. "During this confusion, while Cromwell is absent with his army:" yes, while he was engaged in subduing an enemy, who had marched into the very heart of the kingdom, and menaced the safety of the parliament: while he was employed in reducing the revolted Welsh to their obedience, whom he vanquished wherever he could overtake, and dispersed wherever he could find; the presbyterians "began to conceive a disgust against Cromwell." Here you speak the truth. While he is repelling the common enemy at the hazard of his life, and bravely defending their interests abroad, they are conspiring to ruin his reputation at home, and suborn one Huntington to take away his life. Does not this atrocious instance of ingratitude excite our abhorrence and our rage? By their instigation a mob of worthless people, reeking from the taverns and the stews, besieges the doors of the parliament, and (O indignity) compels them by clamour and intimidation, to vote such measures as they chose to dictate. And we should now have seen our Camillus, on his return from Scotland, after all his triumphs, and all his toils, either driven into exile, or put to an ignominious death, if General Fairfax had not openly remonstrated against the disgrace of his invincible lieutenant; if the whole army, which had itself experienced a good deal of ill-treatment, had not interposed to prevent such atrocious proceedings. Entering the metropolis, they quelled the citizens without much difficulty; they deservedly expelled from the senate those members who favoured the hostile Scotch; the rest, delivered from the insolence of the rabble, broke off the conference which had begun with the king in the Isle of Wight, contrary to the express orders of the parliament. But Huntington the accuser was left to himself; and at last, struck with remorse, solicited the forgiveness of Cromwell, and confessed by whom he had been suborned. These are the principal charges, except those to which I have replied above, which are brought forward against this noble deliverer of his country. Of how little force they are, is very apparent. But, in speaking of such a man, who has merited so well of his country, I should do nothing, if I only exculpated him from crimes; particularly since it not only so nearly concerns the country, but even myself, who am so closely implicated in the same disgrace, to evince to all nations, and as far as I can, to all ages, the excellence of his character, and the splendour of his renown. Oliver Cromwell was sprung from a line of illustrious ancestors, who were distinguished for the civil functions which they sustained under the monarchy, and still more for the part which they took in restoring and establishing true religion in this country. In the vigour and maturity of his life, which he passed in retirement, he was conspicuous for nothing more than for the strictness of his religious habits and the innocence of his life; and he had tacitly cherished in his breast that flame of piety which was afterwards to stand him in so much stead on the greatest occasions, and in the most critical exigencies. In the last parliament which was called by the king, he was elected to represent his native town; when he soon became distinguished by the justness of his opinions, and the vigour and decision of his counsels. When the sword was drawn, he offered his services, and was appointed to a troop of horse, whose numbers were soon increased by the pious and the good, who flocked from all quarters to his standard; and in a short time he almost surpassed the greatest generals in the magnitude and the rapidity of his atchievements. Nor is this surprising; for he was a soldier disciplined to perfection in the knowledge of himself. He had either extinguished, or by habit had learned to subdue, the whole host of vain hopes, fears, and passions, which infest the soul. He first acquired the government of himself, and over himself acquired the most signal victories; so that on the first day he took the field against the external enemy, he was a veteran in arms, consummately practised in the toils and exigencies of war. It is not possible for me in the narrow limits in which I circumscribe myself on this occasion, to enumerate the many towns which he has taken, the many battles which he has won. The whole surface of the British empire has been the scene of his exploits, and the theatre of his triumphs; which alone would furnish ample materials for a history, and want a copiousness of narration not inferior to the magnitude and diversity of the transactions. This alone seems to be a sufficient proof of his extraordinary and almost supernatural virtue, that by the vigour of his genius, or the excellence of his discipline, adapted, not more to the necessities of war, than to the precepts of Christianity, the good and the brave were from all quarters attracted to his camp, not only as to the best school of military talents, but of piety and virtue; and that during the whole war, and the occasional intervals of peace, amid so many vicissitudes of faction and of events, he retained and still retains the obedience of his troops, not by largesses or indulgence, but by his sole authority, and the regularity of his pay. In this instance his fame may rival that of Cyrus, of Epaminondas, or any of the great generals of antiquity. Hence he collected an army as numerous and as well equipped as any one ever did in so short a time; which was uniformly obedient to his orders, and dear to the affections of the citizens; which was formidable to the enemy in the field, but never cruel to those who laid down their arms; which committed no lawless ravages on the persons or the property of the inhabitants; who, when they compared their conduct with the turbulence, the intemperance, the impiety, and the debauchery of the royalists, were wont to salute them as friends, and to consider them as guests. They were a stay to the good, a terror to the evil, and the warmest advocates for every exertion of piety and virtue. Nor would it be right to pass over the name of Fairfax, who united the utmost fortitude with the utmost courage; and the spotless innocence of whose life seemed to point him out as the peculiar favourite of heaven. Justly indeed may you be excited to receive this wreath of praise; though you have retired as much as possible from the world, and seek those shades of privacy which were the delight of Scipio. Nor was it only the enemy whom you subdued; but you have triumphed over that flame of ambition and that lust of glory, which are wont to make the best and the greatest of men their slaves. The purity of your virtues and the splendour of your actions consecrate those sweets of ease which you enjoy; and which constitute the wished-for haven of the toils of man. Such was the ease which, when the heroes of antiquity possessed, after a life of exertion and glory, not greater than yours, the poets, in despair of finding ideas or expressions better suited to the subject, feigned that they were received into heaven, and invited to recline at the tables of the gods. But whether it were your health, which I principally believe, or any other motive which caused you to retire, of this I am convinced, that nothing could have induced you to relinquish the service of your country, if you had not known that in your successor liberty would meet with a protector, and England with a stay to its safety, and a pillar to its glory. For, while you, O Cromwell, are left among us, he hardly shews a proper confidence in the Supreme, who distrusts the security of England; when he sees that you are in so special a manner the favoured object of the divine regard. But there was another department of the war, which was destined for your exclusive exertions.

Without entering into any length of detail, I will, if possible, describe some of the most memorable actions, with as much brevity as you performed them with celerity. After the loss of all Ireland, with the exception of one city, you in one battle immediately discomfited the forces of the rebels: and were busily employed in settling the country, when you were suddenly recalled to the war in Scotland. Hence you proceeded with unwearied diligence against the Scots, who were on the point of making an irruption into England with the king in their train: and in about the space of one year you entirely subdued, and added to the English dominion, that kingdom which all our monarchs, during a period of 800 years, had in vain struggled to subject. In one battle you almost annihilated the remainder of their forces, who, in a fit of desperation, had made a sudden incursion into England, then almost destitute of garrisons, and got as far as Worcester; where you came up with them by forced marches, and captured almost the whole of their nobility. A profound peace ensued; when we found, though indeed not then for the first time, that you was as wise in the cabinet as valiant in the field. It was your constant endeavour in the senate either to induce them to adhere to those treaties which they had entered into with the enemy, or speedily to adjust others which promised to be beneficial to the country. But when you saw that the business was artfully procrastinated, that every one was more intent on his own selfish interest than on the public good, that the people complained of the disappointments which they had experienced, and the fallacious promises by which they had been gulled, that they were the dupes of a few overbearing individuals, you put an end to their domination. A new parliament is summoned: and the right of election given to those to whom it was expedient. They meet; but do nothing; and, after having wearied themselves by their mutual dissensions, and fully exposed their incapacity to the observation of the country, they consent to a voluntary dissolution. In this state of desolation, to which we were reduced, you, O Cromwell! alone remained to conduct the government, and to save the country. We all willingly yield the palm of sovereignty to your unrivalled ability and virtue, except the few among us, who, either ambitious of honours which they have not the capacity to sustain, or who envy those which are conferred on one more worthy than themselves, or else who do not know that nothing in the world is more pleasing to God, more agreeable to reason, more politically just, or more generally useful, than that the supreme power should be vested in the best and the wisest of men. Such, O Cromwell, all acknowledge you to be; such are the services which you have rendered, as the leader of our councils, the general of our armies, and the father of your country. For this is the tender appellation by which all the good among us salute you from the very soul. Other names you neither have nor could endure; and you deservedly reject that pomp of title which attracts the gaze and admiration of the multitude. For what is a title but a certain definite mode of dignity; but actions such as yours surpass, not only the bounds of our admiration, but our titles; and like the points of pyramids, which are lost in the clouds, they soar above the possibilities of titular commendation. But since, though it be not fit, it may be expedient, that the highest pitch of virtue should be circumscribed within the bounds of some human appellation, you endured to receive, for the public good, a title most like to that of the father of your country; not to exalt, but rather to bring you nearer to the level of ordinary men; the title of king was unworthy the transcendent majesty of your character. For if you had been captivated by a name over which, as a private man, you had so completely triumphed and crumbled into dust, you would have been doing the same thing as if, after having subdued some idolatrous nation by the help of the true God, you should afterwards fall down and worship the gods which you had vanquished. Do you then, Sir, continue your course with the same unrivalled magnanimity; it sits well upon you;—to you our country owes its liberties, nor can you sustain a character at once more momentous and more august than that of the author, the guardian, and the preserver of our liberties; and hence you have not only eclipsed the atchievements of all our kings, but even those which have been fabled of our heroes. Often reflect what a dear pledge the beloved land of your nativity has entrusted to your care; and that liberty which she once expected only from the chosen flower of her talents and her virtues, she now expects from you only, and by you only hopes to obtain. Revere the fond expectations which we cherish, the solicitudes of your anxious country; revere the looks and the wounds of your brave companions in arms, who, under your banners, have so strenuously fought for liberty; revere the shades of those who perished in the contest; revere also the opinions and the hopes which foreign states entertain concerning us, who promise to themselves so many advantages from that liberty, which we have so bravely acquired, from the establishment of that new government, which has begun to shed its splendour on the world, which, if it be suffered to vanish like a dream, would involve us in the deepest abyss of shame; and lastly revere yourself; and, after having endured so many sufferings and encountered so many perils for the sake of liberty, do not suffer it, now it is obtained, either to be violated by yourself, or in any one instance impaired by others. You cannot be truly free unless we are free too; for such is the nature of things, that he, who entrenches on the liberty of others, is the first to lose his own and become a slave. But, if you, who have hitherto been the patron and tutelary genius of liberty, if you, who are exceeded by no one in justice, in piety, and goodness, should hereafter invade that liberty, which you have defended, your conduct must be fatally operative, not only against the cause of liberty, but the general interests of piety and virtue. Your integrity and virtue will appear to have evaporated, your faith in religion to have been small; your character with posterity will dwindle into insignificance, by which a most destructive blow will be levelled against the happiness of mankind. The work which you have undertaken is of incalculable moment, which will thoroughly sift and expose every principle and sensation of your heart, which will fully display the vigour and genius of your character, which will evince whether you really possess those great qualities of piety, fidelity, justice, and self-denial, which made us believe that you were elevated by the special direction of the Deity to the highest pinnacle of power. At once wisely and discreetly to hold the sceptre over three powerful nations, to persuade people to relinquish inveterate and corrupt for new and more beneficial maxims and institutions, to penetrate into the remotest parts of the country, to have the mind present and operative in every quarter, to watch against surprise, to provide against danger, to reject the blandishments of pleasure and the pomp of power;—these are exertions compared with which the labour of war is mere pastime; which will require every energy and employ every faculty that you possess; which demand a man supported from above, and almost instructed by immediate inspiration. These and more than these are, no doubt, the objects which occupy your attention and engross your soul; as well as the means by which you may accomplish these important ends, and render our liberty at once more ample and more secure. And this you can, in my opinion, in no other way so readily effect, as by associating in your councils the companions of your dangers and your toils; men of exemplary modesty, integrity, and courage; whose hearts have not been hardened in cruelty and rendered insensible to pity by the sight of so much ravage and so much death, but whom it has rather inspired with the love of justice, with a respect for religion, and with the feeling of compassion, and who are more zealously interested in the preservation of liberty, in proportion as they have encountered more perils in its defence. They are not strangers or foreigners, a hireling rout scraped together from the dregs of the people, but for the most part, men of the better conditions in life, of families not disgraced if not ennobled, of fortunes either ample or moderate; and what if some among them are recommended by their poverty? for it was not the lust of ravage which brought them into the field; it was the calamitous aspect of the times, which, in the most critical circumstances, and often amid the most disastrous turns of fortune, roused them to attempt the deliverance of their country from the fangs of despotism. They were men prepared, not only to debate, but to fight; not only to argue in the senate, but to engage the enemy in the field. But unless we will continually cherish indefinite and illusory expectations, I see not in whom we can place any confidence, if not in these men and such as these. We have the surest and most indubitable pledge of their fidelity in this, that they have already exposed themselves to death in the service of their country; of their piety in this, that they have been always wont to ascribe the whole glory of their successes to the favour of the Deity, whose help they have so suppliantly implored, and so conspicuously obtained; of their justice in this, that they even brought the king to trial, and when his guilt was proved, refused to save his life; of their moderation in our own uniform experience of its effects, and because, if by any outrage, they should disturb the peace which they have procured, they themselves will be the first to feel the miseries which it will occasion, the first to meet the havoc of the sword, and the first again to risk their lives for all these comforts and distinctions which they have so happily acquired; and lastly, of their fortitude in this, that there is no instance of any people who ever recovered their liberty with so much courage and success; and therefore let us not suppose, that there can be any persons who will be more zealous in preserving it. I now feel myself irresistibly compelled to commemorate the names of some of those who have most conspicuously signalized themselves in these times: and first thine, O Fleetwood! whom I have known from a boy, to the present blooming maturity of your military fame, to have been inferior to none in humanity, in gentleness, in benignity of disposition, whose intrepidity in the combat, and whose clemency in victory, have been acknowledged even by the enemy: next thine, O Lambert! who, with a mere handful of men, checked the progress, and sustained the attack, of the Duke of Hamilton, who was attended by the whole flower and vigour of the Scottish youth: next thine, O Desborough! and thine, O Hawley! who wast always conspicuous in the heat of the combat, and the thickest of the fight; thine, O Overton! who hast been most endeared to me now for so many years by the similitude of our studies, the suavity of your manners, and the more than fraternal sympathy of our hearts; you, who, in the memorable battle of Marston Moor, when our left wing was put to the rout, were beheld with admiration, making head against the enemy with your infantry and repelling his attack, amid the thickest of the carnage; and lastly you, who in the Scotch war, when under the auspices of Cromwell, occupied the coast of Fife, opened a passage beyond Stirling, and made the Scotch of the west, and of the north, and even the remotest Orkneys, confess your humanity, and submit to your power. Besides these, I will mention some as celebrated for their political wisdom and their civil virtues, whom you, Sir, have admitted into your councils, and who are known to me by friendship or by fame. Whitlocke, Pickering, Strickland, Sydenham, Sydney, (a name indissolubly attached to the interests of liberty,) Montacute, Laurence, both of highly cultivated minds and polished taste; besides many other citizens of singular merit, some of whom were distinguished by their exertions in the senate, and others in the field. To these men, whose talents are so splendid, and whose worth has been so thoroughly tried, you would without doubt do right to trust the protection of our liberties; nor would it be easy to say to whom they might more safely be entrusted. Then, if you leave the church to its own government, and relieve yourself and the other public functionaries from a charge so onerous, and so incompatible with your functions; and will no longer suffer two powers, so different as the civil and the ecclesiastical, to commit fornication together, and by their mutual and delusive aids in appearance to strengthen, but in reality to weaken and finally to subvert, each other; if you shall remove all power of persecution out of the church, (but persecution will never cease, so long as ~ bribed to preach the gospel by a mercenary s forcibly extorted, rather than gratuit- d, which serves only to poison religion ,le truth,) you will then effectually have oney-changers out of the temple, who do truckle with doves but with the dove itself, pirit of the Most High. Then, since there in a republic men who have the same itch ng a multiplicity of laws, as some poetasters r making many verses, and since laws are worse in proportion as they are more numerous, shall not enact so many new laws as you abolish hich do not operate so much as warnings against s impediments in the way of good; and if you tain only those which are necessary, which do ound the distinctions of good and evil, which, y prevent the frauds of the wicked, do not pro- innocent freedoms of the good, which punish ithout interdicting those things which are ly on account of the abuses to which they ionally be exposed. For the intention of heck the commission of vice, but liberty is ool of virtue, and affords the strongest en- ts to the practice. Then if you make a ion for the education of our youth than has made, if you prevent the promiscuous in- ne docile and the indocile, of the idle and t the public cost, but reserve the rewards the learned, and of merit for the meri- ou permit the free discussion of truth zard to the author, or any subjection to n individual, which is the best way to urish and knowledge abound, the cen- learned, the envy, the pusillanimity, or ich measures the discoveries of others, degree of wisdom, by the measure of will be prevented from doling out in- cording to their own arbitrary choice. not dread to hear any truth, or any it may be, but if you shall least of ho think that they can never be f others depend on their caprice, with so much zeal and ve- only the bodies but the minds P of men, who labour to introduce into the state the worst of all tyrannies, the tyranny of their own depraved habits and pernicious opinions; you will always be dear to those, who think not merely that their own sect or faction, but that all citizens of all descriptions, should enjoy equal rights and equal laws. If there be any one who thinks that this is not liberty enough, he appears to me to be rather inflamed with the lust of ambition, or of anarchy, than with the love of a genuine and well regulated liberty; and particularly since the circumstances of the country, which has been so convulsed by the storms of faction, which are yet hardly still, do not permit us to adopt a more perfect or desirable form of government.

For it is of no little consequence, O citizens, by what principles you are governed, either in acquiring liberty, or in retaining it when acquired. And unless that liberty, which is of such a kind as arms can neither procure nor take away, which alone is the fruit of piety, of justice, of temperance and unadulterated virtue, shall have taken deep root in your minds and hearts, there will not long be wanting one who will snatch from you by treachery what you have acquired by arms. War has made many great whom peace makes small. If after being released from the toils of war, you neglect the arts of peace, if your peace and your liberty be a state of warfare, if war be your only virtue, the summit of your praise, you will, believe me, soon find peace the most adverse to your interests. Your peace will be only a more distressing war; and that which you imagined liberty will prove the worst of slavery. Unless by the means of piety, not frothy and loquacious, but operative, unadulterated, and sincere, you clear the horizon of the mind from those mists of superstition, which arise from the ignorance of true religion, you will always have those who will bend your necks to the yoke as if you were brutes, who notwithstanding all your triumphs will put you up to the highest bidder, as if you were mere booty made in war: and will find an exuberant source of wealth in your ignorance and superstition. Unless you will subjugate the propensity to avarice, to ambition, and sensuality, and expel all luxury from yourselves and from your families, you will find that you have cherished a more stubborn and intractable despot at home, than you ever encountered in the field; and even your very bowels will be continually teeming with an intolerable progeny of tyrants. Let these be the first enemies whom you subdue; this constitutes the campaign of peace; these are triumphs, difficult indeed, but bloodless; and far more honourable than those trophies, which are purchased only by slaughter and by rapine. Unless you are victors in this service, it is in vain that you have been victorious over the despotic enemy in the field. For if you think that it is a more grand, a more beneficial, or a more wise policy, to invent subtle expedients for increasing the revenue, to multiply our naval and military force, to rival in craft the ambassadors of foreign states, to form skilful treaties and alliances, than to administer unpolluted justice to the people, to redress the injured, and to succour the distressed, and speedily to restore to every one his own, you are involved in a cloud of error; and too late will you perceive, when the illusion of those mighty benefits has vanished, that in neglecting these, which you now think inferior considerations, you have only been precipitating your own ruin and despair. The fidelity of enemies and allies is frail and perishing, unless it be cemented by the principles of justice; that wealth and those honours, which most covet, readily change masters; they forsake the idle, and repair where virtue, where industry, where patience flourish most. Thus nation precipitates the downfall of nation; thus the more sound part of one people subverts the more corrupt; thus you obtained the ascendant over the royalists. If you plunge into the same depravity, if you imitate their excesses, and hanker after the same vanities, you will become royalists as well as they, and liable to be subdued by the same enemies, or by others in your turn; who, placing their reliance on the same religious principles, the same patience, the same integrity and discretion which made you strong, will deservedly triumph over you, who are immersed in debauchery, in the luxury and the sloth of kings. Then, as if God was weary of protecting you, you will be seen to have passed through the fire that you might perish in the smoke; the contempt which you will then experience will be great as the admiration which you now enjoy; and, what may in future profit others, but cannot benefit yourselves, you will leave a salutary proof what great things the solid reality of virtue and of piety might have effected, when the mere counterfeit and varnished resemblance could attempt such mighty atchievements, and make such considerable advances towards the execution. For, if either through your want of knowledge, your want of constancy, or your want of virtue, attempts so noble, and actions so glorious, have had an issue so unfortunate, it does not therefore follow, that better men should be either less daring in their projects or less sanguine in their hopes. But from such an abyss of corruption into which you so readily fall, no one not even Cromwell himself, nor a whole nation of Brutuses, if they were alive, could deliver you if they would, or would deliver you if they could. For who would vindicate your right of unrestrained suffrage, or of choosing what representatives you liked best, merely that you might elect the creatures of your own faction, whoever they might be, or him, however small might be his worth, who would give you the most lavish feasts, and enable you to drink to the greatest excess? Thus not wisdom and authority, but turbulence and gluttony, would soon exalt the vilest miscreants from our taverns and our brothels, from our towns and villages, to the rank and dignity of senators. For, should the management of the republic be entrusted to persons to whom no one would willingly entrust the management of his private concerns; and the treasury of the state be left to the care of those who had lavished their own fortunes in an infamous prodigality? Should they have the charge of the public purse, which they would soon convert into a private, by their unprincipled peculations? Are they fit to be the legislators of a whole people who themselves know not what law, what reason, what right and wrong, what crooked and straight, what licit and illicit means? who think that all power consists in outrage, all dignity in the parade of insolence? who neglect every other consideration for the corrupt gratification of their friendships, or the prosecution of their resentments? who disperse their own relations and creatures through the provinces, for the sake of levying taxes and confiscating goods; men, for the greater part, the most profligate and vile, who buy up for themselves what they pretend to expose to sale, who thence collect an exorbitant mass of wealth, which they fraudulently divert from the public service; who thus spread their pillage through the country, and in a moment emerge from penury and rags, to a state of splendour and of wealth? Who could endure such thievish servants, such vicegerents of thei[illegible]? Who could believe that the masters and a banditti could be the proper guardians [illegible] who would suppose that he should ever [illegible] hair more free by such a set of public fu[illegible] (though they might amount to five hundre[illegible] this manner from the counties and boroug[illegible] among them who are the very guardians o[illegible] and to whose custody it is committed, there [illegible] so many, who know not either how to use or t[illegible] liberty, who either understand the principles o[illegible] the possession? But what is worthy of remark, who are the most unworthy of liberty, are wo[illegible] behave most ungratefully towards their deli[illegible] Among such persons, who would be willing ei[illegible] fight for liberty, or to encounter the least peri[illegible] defence? It is not agreeable to the nature of that such persons ever should be free. Howe[illegible] they may brawl about liberty, they are slave[illegible] home and abroad, but without perceiving it; [illegible] they do perceive it, like unruly horses, that are of the bit, they will endeavour to throw off th[illegible] from the love of genuine liberty, (which a goo[illegible] loves and knows how to obtain,) but from t[illegible] of pride and little passions. But though t[illegible] tempt it by arms, they will make no adv[illegible] execution; they may change their mast[illegible] never be able to get rid of their servitude happened to the ancient Romans, wasted [illegible] enervated by luxury: and it has still m[illegible] fate of the moderns; when after a long i[illegible] they aspired under the auspices of Cres[illegible] tanus, and afterwards of Nicolas Ren[illegible] assumed the title of Tribune of the Pe[illegible] the splendour and re-establish the go[illegible] cient Rome. For, instead of fretting thinking that you can lay the blam[illegible] yourselves, know that to be free is th[illegible] to be pious, to be wise, to be temper[illegible] frugal and abstinent, and lastly, t[illegible] and brave; so to be the opposit[illegible] same as to be a slave; and it u[illegible] appointment, and as it were r[illegible] Deity, that that people whic[illegible] selves, and moderate their passions, but crouch under the slavery of their lusts, should be delivered up to the sway of those whom they abhor, and made to submit to an involuntary servitude. It is also sanctioned by the dictates of justice and by the constitution of nature, that he, who from the imbecility or derangement of his intellect is incapable of governing himself, should, like a minor, be committed to the government of another; and least of all, should he be appointed to superintend the affairs of others or the interest of the state. You therefore, who wish to remain free, either instantly be wise, or, as soon as possible, cease to be fools; if you think slavery an intolerable evil, learn obedience to reason and the government of yourselves; and finally bid adieu to your dissensions, your jealousies, your superstitions, your outrages, your rapine, and your lusts. Unless you will spare no pains to effect this, you must be judged unfit, both by God and mankind, to be entrusted with the possession of liberty and the administration of the government; but will rather, like a nation in a state of pupillage, want some active and courageous guardian to undertake the management of your affairs. With respect to myself, whatever turn things may take, I thought that my exertions on the present occasion would be serviceable to my country, and, as they have been cheerfully bestowed, I hope that they have not been bestowed in vain. And I have not circumscribed my defence of liberty within any petty circle around me, but have made it so general and comprehensive, that the justice and the reasonableness of such uncommon occurrences explained and defended, both among my countrymen and among foreigners, and which all good men cannot but approve, may serve to exalt the glory of my country, and to excite the imitation of posterity. If the conclusion do not answer to the beginning, that is their concern; I have delivered my testimony, I would almost say, have erected a monument, that will not readily be destroyed, to the reality of those singular and mighty atchievements, which were above all praise. As the Epic Poet, who adheres at all to the rules of that species of composition, does not profess to describe the whole life of the hero whom he celebrates, but only some particular action of his life, as the resentment of Achilles at Troy, the return of Ulysses, or the coming of Æneas into Italy; so it will be sufficient, either for my justification or apology, that I have heroically celebrated at least one exploit of my countrymen; I pass by the rest, for who could recite the atchievements of a whole people? If after such a display of courage and of vigour, you basely relinquish the path of virtue, if you do any thing unworthy of yourselves, posterity will sit in judgment on your conduct. They will see that the foundations were well laid; that the beginning (nay it was more than a beginning) was glorious; but, with deep emotions of concern will they regret, that those were wanting who might have completed the structure. They will lament that perseverance was not conjoined with such exertions and such virtues. They will see that there was a rich harvest of glory, and an opportunity afforded for the greatest atchievements, but that men only were wanting for the execution; while they were not wanting who could rightly counsel, exhort, inspire, and bind an unfading wreath of praise round the brows of the illustrious actors in so glorious a scene.
